On that day it was ordered by the houſe of commons, that Mr. Lloyd (ſon of the biſhop of Worceſter) ſhould be proſecuted by the attorney-general, 'after his privilege as a member of the lower houſe of convocation was out.' This being taken notice of by the ſaid lower houſe of convocation, they, on the 20th of November, ordered, that their prolocutor, and three of their members, ſhould wait on Mr. Speaker of the honourable houſe of commons, to return their humble thanks to him, and to that moſt honourable houſe, for the great favour which they had on all occaſions been pleaſed to expreſs: And particularly for the late regard which they of themſelves, without ſuggeſtion or ſollicitation, were pleaſed to have to the privileges of their houſe, in the caſe of one of their members, who had the misfortune to fall under their diſpleaſure. This was read to Mr. Speaker at his houſe, November 21, and the ſame day he read it in the houſe of commons; who thereupon paſſed a vote, by which it was reſolved, 'That the houſe would on all occaſions aſſert the juſt rights and privileges of the lower houſe of convocation.' Which made ſome conclude, that now they ſhould certainly carry their point. But the archbiſhops and biſhops, reſolving to ſtand their ground, the very next day, November 22, made anſwer to the lower houſe, that they thought they had offered what was ſufficient towards the ending the differences there had been between them. That they could not depart from the archbiſhop's right of proroguing the whole convocation, with conſent of his ſuffragans, according to conſtant uſage. That, by the ſame act, by which the convocation is prorogued, the whole buſineſs of the convocation is continued in the ſtate it is then in, to that farther day of the next ſeſſion. That they could not admit of their new claim, and that what had been offered, was ſufficient for the doing of any buſineſs to be done in convocation.

Upon this the lower houſe, repreſenting it as not ſo reaſonable, that either houſe ſhould be judge over the other in it's own cauſe, propoſed to refer the controverſy to the queen's deciſion, and to ſuch as ſhe ſhould appoint to hear and ſettle it.

The biſhops anſwered, that they did not admire their affecting to expreſs themſelves in a manner, that ſets the two houſes on ſuch an equality, as was inconſiſtent with the epiſcopal authority and the archbiſhop's preſidency. That they reckoned themſelves ſafe and happy in the queen's protection, and would pay all due ſubmiſſion to her orders; but could not think it proper to trouble her with the controverſy: And that it was not in their power to part with any of thoſe rights veſted in them by the conſtitution of the church, and the laws and cuſtoms of the realm. Indeed it would have been a ſtrange ſight, very acceptable to the enemies of the church, chiefly to papiſts, to ſee the two houſes of convocation pleading their authority and rights before a committee of council, that was to determine the matter. The lower houſe perceiving that, by oppoſing the biſhops in ſo harſh as well as unheard-of a manner, they were repreſented as favourers of preſbytery; to clear themſelves of that imputation, addreſſed the upper houſe the ſame day, ſignifying their concern to find themſelves aſperſed as ill-affected to the metropolitical and epiſcopal rights: and therefore they thought themſelves obliged to make and ſign the declaration annexed, praying their lordſhips not to credit any ſuch evil ſuggeſtions, and to cauſe their declaration to be entered in their books.

The ſubſtance of their declaration was, "Whereas they had been ſcandalouſly and maliciouſly repreſented as favourers of preſbytery, in oppoſition to epiſcopacy, they now declared, That they acknowledged the order of biſhops as ſuperior to preſbyters, to be of divine apoſtolical inſtitution, and that they claimed no rights, but what they conceived neceſſary to the very being of the lower houſe of convocation."

The party, that voted together and kept their intermediate ſeſſions, ſigned this declaration; and, in an additional addreſs of the ſame day, deſired the biſhops to concur in ſettling the doctrine of the divine apoſtolical right of epiſcopacy, that it might be the ſtanding rule of the church. This was a plain attempt to make a canon or conſtitution, without obtaining a royal licence, which by the ſtatute, confirming the ſubmiſſion of the clergy in Henry VIII's time, made both them and all who choſe them incur a præmunire. For this reaſon, many of the lower houſe, in a ſeparate addreſs to the archbiſhop, diſclaimed the 'declaration' as apprehenſive of the danger of ſuch a proceeding, though they did not object againſt the truth of their doctrine, praying, that their diſſent might be entered in their books.

Whilſt the biſhops were conſidering of an anſwer to the addreſs and declaration, the lower houſe preſented a petition to the queen, ſhewing, that, after ten years interruption of holding convocations, ſeveral queſtions aroſe in that in 1700, concerning the rights and liberties of the lower houſe, and particularly about prorogations and adjournments. That, obtained the peerage for him, in ſpite of the oppoſition of the tories, and eſpecially of the other four new peers, who, for a while, refuſed the peerage, if Mr. Harvey, a whig, were admitted to the ſame honour. The ducheſs brings this as an inſtance of her differing from the queen in her notions about the tories, to which ſhe adds a letter from the queen, to the ſame purpoſe.

"I am very glad to find by my dear Mrs. Freeman's, that I was bleſſed with yeſterday, that ſhe liked my ſpeech, but I cannot help being extremely concerned, you are ſo partial to the whigs, becauſe I would not have you, and your poor, unfortunate, faithful Morley differ in opinion in the leaſt thing. What I ſaid, when I writ laſt upon this ſubject, does not proceed from any inſinuations of the other party; but I know the principles of the church of England, and I know thoſe of the whigs, and that it is that, and no other reaſon, which makes me think as I do, of the laſt. And upon my word, my dear Mrs. Freeman, you are mightily miſtaken in your notion of a true whig: For the character, you give of them, does not in the leaſt belong to them, but to the church. But I will ſay no more on this ſubject, only beg, for my poor ſake, that you would not ſhew more countenance to thoſe, you ſeem to have ſo much inclination for, than to the church party."

[g] Other promotions were: The marquis of Caermarthen was made vice-admiral of the red; Graydon, vice-admiral of the white; Leake, vice-admiral of the blue; Byng, rear-admiral of the red; Dilks, rear-admiral of the white; and Beaumont, rear-admiral of the blue. On the 13th of March, three knights of the garter were inſtalled in St. George's chapel at Windſor. The elector of Hanover, by his proxy the lord Mohun; the duke of Bedford, in perſon; and the duke of Marlborough, by his proxy ſir Benjamin Bathurſt. Two days after, the queen appointed the earl of Denbigh to be lord-lieutenant of the county of Leiceſter; the lord Guildford, of Eſſex; and the earl of Dyſert, of Suffolk. On the 20th of the ſame month, the archbiſhop of York, the earl of Thanet, and the lord Guernſey, were admitted into the privy-council. The next day Jervaſe Pierrepoint was created baron Pierrepoint of Ardglaſs in Ireland; and, on the 24th, the earl of Rutland was made marquis of Granby, and duke of Rutland; and Edward Harley was, by the intereſt of his brother, the ſpeaker, appointed auditor of the impreſt, in the room of Thomas Done deceaſed.

the upper houſe had refuſed a verbal conference. That, in the next convocation, the ſame queſtion took place, and that it was expected they ſhould abſolutely ſubmit to their lordſhips judgment, though in their own cauſe. That in this convocation, they had applied to their lordſhips to ſuggeſt a method to ſettle the matter: But, not ſucceeding, had offered to ſubmit it to her majeſty's determination, which their lordſhips alſo declined. They therefore fled for protection and relief to her majeſty, begging ſhe would call the queſtion into her own royal audience, &c. The queen promiſed to conſider their petition, and ſend them an anſwer as ſoon as ſhe could. By this means the matter was brought into the hands of the miniſtry; the earl of Nottingham was of their ſide, but confeſſed, he underſtood not the controverſy. The judges and the queen's council were ordered to examine, how the matter ſtood in point of law, which was thus ſtated to them: The conſtant practice, as far as there were books or records, was, that the archbiſhop prorogued the convocation by a 'ſchedule;' of this the form was ſo fixed, that it could not be altered but by act of parliament: There was a clauſe in the 'ſchedule,' that continued all matters before the convocation, in the ſtate in which they were, to the day to which he prorogued them: Hence it was evident, that there could be no intermediate ſeſſion, for a ſeſſion of the lower houſe could, by paſſing a vote in any matter, alter the ſtate it was in. What opinion the lawyers came to in this matter was kept a ſecret. It was not doubted but they were againſt the pretenſions of the lower houſe. The queen made no anſwer to their addreſs; and it was believed, the reaſon was, becauſe the anſwer muſt, according to the opinion of the lawyers, have been contrary to what the lower houſe expected: And therefore the miniſters choſe rather to give no anſwer, and that it ſhould ſeem to be forgot, than that ſuch a one ſhould be given, as would put an end to the debate, which they intended to cheriſh and ſupport.

Mean while, the lower houſe looked on what they did in the matter of their declaration as a maſter-piece; for, if the biſhops concurred with them, they reckoned they gained their point; and, if they refuſed it, they reſolved to make them, who would not come up to ſuch a poſitive aſſertion of the divine right of epiſcopacy, paſs for the ſecret favourers of preſbytery. But the biſhops ſaw their deſigns, and therefore the archbiſhop ſent them for anſwer, that the preface to the form of ordination contained a declaration of three orders of miniſters from the apoſtles times, viz. Biſhops, prieſts, and deacons, to which they had ſubſcribed: But that he and his brethren conceived, that, without a royal licence, they had not authority to 'attempt, enact, promulge, or execute, any canon, &c. by whatever name it might be called, which ſhould concern either doctrine or diſcipline: And that this was the opinion of divers learned perſons in their own houſe: But that they took notice of their zeal for the epiſcopal order, and hoped they would act agreeably to it in their future proceedings.

The lower houſe, on February 11, replied, That they wondered at their lordſhips caution: That they would not ſo much as ſatisfy the lower clergy, that they did not diſſent from them, even in this point too. They took the freedom to tell their lordſhips, that they miſrecited the ſtatute of 25 Hen. VIII, and ſignify to them, that declaring their ſenſe concerning a truth in religion, ſpeculative only, and without requiring either aſſent or obedience, was not forbidden by that act: And intimate their ſorrow, that the reflections of ignorant and malicious men, of which they complained to their lordſhips, were rather likely to be confirmed by their lordſhips anſwer: And diſcover their reſentment of the cloſing admonition, &c. After this reply, theſe matters were at a full ſtand, when the ſeſſion came to an end by the prorogation of the parliament.

From thoſe diſputes in convocation, diviſions ran through the whole body of the clergy, and, to fix theſe, new names were found out: They were diſtinguiſhed by the names of HIGH CHURCH and LOW CHURCH. All that treated the diſſenters with temper and moderation, and were for reſiding conſtantly at their cures, and for labouring diligently in them; that expreſſed a zeal againſt the prince of Wales, and for the revolution; that wiſhed well to the preſent war, and to the alliance againſt France, were repreſented as ſecret favourers of paeſbytery, and as ill-affected to the church, and were called 'Low Churchmen:' It was ſaid, that they were in the church only, while the law and preferments were on it's ſide; but that they were ready to give it up, as ſoon as they ſaw a proper time for declaring themſelves: With theſe falſe and invidious characters did the high party endeavour to load all thoſe, who could not be brought into their meaſures and deſigns.

About this time the earl of Clarendon's hiſtory was put to the preſs, after it had lain by thirty years, it being thought a proper ſeaſon to publiſh it. For it was now become faſhionable to caſt reproach on her parliamentary right, on purpoſe to affront that of the late king, as well as the right of the houſe of Hanover. To do it the more effectually, the queen's heirſhip was traced down from Edward the confeſſor, and, as a viſible proof of it, the queen was put upon curing the 'King's Evil,' according to the divine gift, deſcended on all the hereditary kings from the Confeſſor. Care therefore was taken to inſert it in the public news-papers, in one of which it was ſaid: 'Yeſterday the queen was graciouſly pleaſed to touch for the King's Evil ſome particular perſons in private;' and, three weeks after, December 19, 'Yeſterday, about twelve at noon, her majeſty was pleaſed to touch at St. James's about twenty perſons afflicted with the King's Evil.' Again, at Bath, October 6, 'A great number of perſons coming to this place, to be touched by the queen's majeſty for the evil, her majeſty commanded Dr. Thomas Gardiner, her chief ſurgeon, to examine them all particularly, which accordingly was done by him; of whom but thirty appeared to have the Evil, which he certified by tickets as is uſual, and thoſe thirty were all touched that day privately, by reaſon of her majeſty's not having a proper conveniency for the ſolemnity.' To make the thing the more ſerious, an office is inſerted in the liturgy, to be uſed on this occaſion [h].

The beginning of the war in America proved unfortunate through the loſs of vice-admiral Benbow. He was ſent to the Weſt-Indies with a ſquadron of men of war, and ſtationed at Jamaica to watch the enemy in thoſe parts. He ſailed from Port Royal, the 11th of July 1702, in order to join rear-admiral Whetſtone. But having advice, on the 14th, by the Colcheſter and Pendennis, who joined him that day, that du Caſſe was expected in thoſe ſeas, he went in ſearch of him. Du Caſſe was carrying the Spaniſh duke of Albuquerque to his government of Mexico with a good number of troops on board. Benbow took and deſtroyed by the way eight or ten merchant ſhips, and a man of war capable of carrying fifty guns. The 19th of Auguſt, he diſcovered du Caſſe with four large ſhips of war, a frigate of thirty guns, which had been a Dutch fly boat, a ſmall ſhip full of ſoldiers, with a ſloop and three ſmall veſſels. Bembow, giving him chace, and reſolving to fight him, diſpoſed his ſhips in the following line, the Defiance, captain Richard Kirby; the Pendennis, captain Thomas Hudſon; the Windſor, captain John Conſtable; the Breda, vice-admiral Benbow with captain Fogg; the Greenwich, captain Cooper Wade; the Ruby, captain George Walton; and the Falmouth, captain Samuel Vincent. Being uneaſy to ſee ſome of his ſhips ſo long in coming up, and in diſorder, and obſerving, that the Defiance and Windſor did not make any haſte to come into their ſtation, he ſent to them to make more ſail. The night approaching, the admiral ſteered along ſide of the enemy, and endeavoured to keep near them, though not with a deſign to attack them before the Defiance was a-breaſt of the headmoſt ſhip. But, before this was done, the Falmouth in the rear attacked the fly boat, and the Windſor the ſhip a-breaſt of her, as alſo did the Defiance. Soon after the admiral was obliged to do the ſame, having received the fire of the French ſhip a-breaſt of him. The Defiance and Windſor, after they had received two or three broadſides from the enemy, broke from the line out of gun-ſhot. The two ſternmoſt ſhips of the French lay upon the admiral, which very much galled him, the ſhips in the rear not coming up as they ought. It was four o'clock when the engagement began, and it continued till it was dark. The admiral perceiving, that the French would decline fighting, if they could, reſolved to purſue them; and, believing that, if he led himſelf on all tacks, the other captains, for ſhame, would not fail to follow his example, he ordered the following line of battle, the Breda, Defiance, Windſor, Greenwich, Ruby, Pendennis, and Falmouth.

On the 20th, at break of day, the admiral was within gun-ſhot of the enemy; but the other ſhips, except the Ruby alone, which was up with him, were three, four, and five miles a-ſtern. At two in the afternoon, the ſea-breeze riſing, the enemy got into a line, making what ſail they could. The other ſhips not coming up, the admiral in the Breda, with the Ruby, plied their chace guns on them till night, when they left off, but kept them company all night. The 21ſt, at day-light, the admiral, being on the quarter of the ſecond ſhip of the enemy, and within point-blank ſhot, the Ruby being a-head of him, the French ſhip fired at the Ruby, which ſhe returned. The two French ſhips, which were a-head, fell off, there being little wind, and brought their guns to bear on the Ruby. The Breda brought her guns to bear on the French ſhip, and ſhattered her very much, which obliged her to tow off. But the Ruby was likewiſe ſo much ſhattered in her maſts, ſails, and rigging, that the admiral was obliged to lie by her, and ſend boats to tow her off. This action held almoſt two hours, during which the rear-ſhip of the enemy was a-breaſt of the Defiance and Windſor, who never fired a gun, though within point-blank. At eight o'clock in the morning, a gale of wind ſpringing up, the enemy made what ſail they could, and the admiral chaſed them, in hopes to come up with them. At two that afternoon the admiral got a-breaſt of two of the ſternmoſt of the enemy's ſhips; and in hopes to diſable them in their maſts and rigging, he began to fire on them, as did ſome of the ſhips a-ſtern; but, lying a-breaſt of them, they pointed wholly at him, which galled his ſhip much in her rigging, and diſmounted two or three of her lower tier guns. However, the admiral made what way he could after the French, who uſed all the ſhifts poſſible to avoid fighting. The 22d, at day-light, the Greenwich was about three leagues a-ſtern, though the ſignal for the line of battle was never ſtruck night nor day. The reſt of the ſhips were indifferently near, except the Ruby; the enemy being about a mile and half a-head. At three in the afternoon, the wind turned to the ſouthward, which before had been eaſterly. This gave the enemy the weather-gage; but, in tacking, the admiral fetched within gun-ſhot of the ſternmoſt of them, firing at each other; but, his line being much out of order, and ſome of his ſhips three miles a-ſtern, nothing could be done. In the night the enemy was very uneaſy, altering their courſes very often between the weſt and north. The 23d, about break of day, the enemy was about ſix miles abreaſt of them; and the fly-boat ſeparated from the enemy out of ſight. At ten o'clock, the enemy tacked, the wind being at eaſt north eaſt, but variable. The admiral fetched within point-blank ſhot of two of them, paſſing broadſides at each other. Soon after he tacked, and purſued them what he could. The Ruby being diſabled, the admiral ordered her for Port Royal. At eight that evening, the Engliſh ſquadron was about two miles diſtant from the enemy, they ſteering ſouth eaſt, and very little wind; then at north-weſt and variable. The admiral ſteered after them, but all his ſhips, except the Falmouth, fell much a-ſtern. At twelve the enemy began to ſeparate. The 24th, at two in the morning, the admiral came up within call of the ſternmoſt, and fired a broadſide, which the French returned. At three o'clock, by a chain-ſhot, Benbow's right leg was broke in pieces, and he was carried down; but this brave man preſently ordered his cradle on the quarter-deck, and continued the fight till day, when appeared the ruins of a ſhip of about ſeventy guns. The Falmouth aſſiſted in this affair very much, but no other ſhip. Soon after day, the admiral ſaw the other part of the enemy coming towards him with a ſtrong eaſterly gale; and at the ſame time the Windſor, Pendennis and Greenwich, a-head of the enemy, came to leeward of the diſabled ſhip, fired their broadſides, paſſed her, and ſtood to the ſouthward. Then the Defiance, following them, came alſo to leeward of the diſabled ſhip, and fired part of her broadſide. The diſabled ſhip did not fire above twenty guns at the Defiance, before ſhe ran away before the wind, lowered both her top-ſails, and ran to leeward of the Falmouth, which was then a gun-ſhot to leeward of the admiral, knotting her rigging, without any regard to the ſignal of battle. The enemy ſeeing the other two Engliſh ſhips ſtanding to the ſouthward, and expecting they would have tacked and ſtood with them, they brought to with their heads to the northward; but, ſeeing theſe three ſhips did not tack, bore down upon the admiral, ran between the diſabled ſhip and him, and ſhot his main top-ſail yard, and ſhattered his rigging much; none of the other ſhips being near him, nor taking any notice of the battle-ſignal. The captain of the Breda fired two guns at thoſe ſhips a-head, in order to put them in mind of their duty; and, on the other hand, the French, ſeeing this great diſorder, brought to, and lay by their own diſabled ſhip, manned her again, and took her in tow. The Breda's rigging being much ſhattered, ſhe lay by till ten o'clock, and, being then refitted, the admiral ordered the captain to purſue the enemy, who was then about three miles diſtance to leeward, having the diſabled ſhip in tow, ſteering north-eaſt, the wind at ſouth ſouth-weſt. The admiral, in the mean time, made all the ſail after them he could, the battle-ſignal being ſtill out: but the enemy taking encouragement from the behaviour of ſome of the Engliſh captains, the admiral ordered captain Fogg to ſend to the captains to keep their line, and to behave themſelves like men. Upon this, captain Kirkby came on board the admiral, and preſſed him very earneſtly to deſiſt from any further engagement; which made the admiral deſirous to know the opinion of the other captains; and, accordingly, he ordered captain Fogg to make the ſignal for all the other captains to come on board. Moſt of them concurring with captain Kirkby in his opinion not to fight, the admiral, not being able to prevail with them to come to any vigorous reſolutions, thought it not fit to venture any further; though, at this time, he was a broad-ſide of the enemy, and had a fair opportunity of fighting them, the maſts and yards in a good condition, and few men killed, except thoſe on board the Breda.

[h] Charles Barnard the ſurgeon, who had made this touching the ſubject of his raillery all his life-time, till he became body-ſurgeon at Court, and found it a good perquiſite, reſolved all difficulties by telling his companions with a fleer: 'Really one could not have thought it, if one had not ſeen it.' could

After this unfortunate action, admiral Benbow returned to Jamaica, where, on the 6th of October, he iſſued out a commiſſion to rear-admiral Whetſtone, and ſome captains, to hold a court-martial, for the trial of the captains Kirkby, Conſtable, Wade, and Hudſon, who were charged with cowardice, breach of orders, and neglect of duty, in the late engagement off Carthagena. The court-martial held four days, and, upon full proof, Kirkby and Wade were ſentenced to be ſhot to death, but the execution to be reſpited till her majeſty's pleaſure ſhould be known. Conſtable was cleared by his own officers and men of cowardice; but, the other crimes being proved againſt him, he was caſhiered from the queen's ſervice, with impriſonment during her pleaſure. And, as for Hudſon, he died ſome days before the trial. Captain Vincent, commander of the Falmouth, and captain Fogg, commander of the admiral's ſhip, were alſo tried for ſigning a paper with captain Kirkby and the reſt againſt engaging the French, when there was ſo fair an opportunity, with probability of ſucceſs. But, upon their alledging, that they did it only becauſe they were perſuaded, conſidering the cowardly behaviour of thoſe captains, that, upon another engagement, they would deſert, and leave the admiral in the Breda, and the Falmouth, a prey to the enemy: And upon the character given by the admiral, and others, of their great courage and gallant behaviour in the battle, the court thought fit only to ſuſpend them from their employment in her majeſty's ſervice; and withal, that their ſuſpenſion ſhould not take place, till the high admiral's pleaſure ſhould be known. The queen confirmed the ſentence paſſed upon the captains Kirkby, Wade, and Conſtable, who were ſent to England in the Briſtol man of war; and upon their arrival at Plymouth, on the 14th of April, 1703, the two firſt were immediately ſhot to death.

Admiral Benbow was very ſenſibly concerned at this diſappointment, and, having languiſhed for ſome time, died at laſt, on the 4th of November 1702, of the wounds, which he had received in the engagement, being extremely lamented, as one of the braveſt and moſt experienced ſea officers, that England ever bred. He was born at Shrewſbury in the county of Salop, and educated in the free ſchool there: And though his family was of good rank, yet it had been ſo reduced, that he was bound apprentice to a waterman. He afterwards uſed the ſeas, and became a privateer (as they themſelves called it) in the Weſt Indies. In proceſs of time he was made maſter of attendance at Deptford, where he continued ſeveral years. In the late war he was employed in bombarding St Malo, and by quick gradations raiſed to be a flag-officer, and ſent admiral of a ſquadron to the Weſt-Indies. He was a man of remarkable temperance and naturally charitable. As for his military virtues, he was bold and daring, and undaunted in the midſt of dangers. In a letter to his wife, after the engagement, he tells her, "That the loſs of his leg did not trouble him half ſo much, as the villainous treachery of ſome of the captains under him, which hindered him from totally deſtroying the French ſquadron." He was about fifty years old when he died.

Not long after colonel Robert Daniel arrived at Port-Royal from Carolina, and brought account, that colonel Moore, governor of that plantation, marched from Charles-Town in South-Carolina with five hundred men, in order to attack a colony of the Spaniards about three hundred miles diſtant, called St. Auguſtin near the Gulph of Florida: he ſoon poſſeſſed himſelf of the town, the inhabitants retiring with their beſt effects into a ſtrong fort, ſurrounded by a very deep deep and broad moat (in which they had laid up provisions enough to last them four months) where they defended themselves very obstinately. It being impossible to take this fort by storm, colonel Moore caused it to be blocked up, and sent colonel Daniel to Port Royal to borrow a mortar and some shells to bombard it, and doubted not, that he should, by that means, soon force them to surrender. If this expedition had succeeded, it would have greatly contributed to the security of South Carolina, there being no other place, from whence they could afterwards be disturbed, except a small settlement, which the French called the Pallisadoes, about two hundred miles farther in the country to the westward. But, some French and Spanish galleons being arrived at St. Augustin before the return of colonel Daniel, Moore was obliged to raise the blockade, and to return to his government by land, after having burnt the ship in which he came.

Some time before letters brought advice, that some frigates of English privateers attacked a place called Toulon on the continent, about ten leagues from Carthagena, which they took, plundered, and burnt. Thence they sailed to Caledonia, went up the river Darien, and so consorting with the Indians, were carried by them in twelve days march to the gold mines at Santa Cruz de Cana near Santa Maria. The ninth day of their march, they came to an out-guard of ten men, which the Spaniards had at some distance from the place, of whom they took nine; but the other escaping gave notice at the mines of their approach, upon which the richest of the inhabitants retired from thence with their money and jewels. However the English party, which consisted of about four hundred men, being come up, took the fort, and possessed themselves of the mines, where there remained about seventy negroes, whom they set to work, and continued there one and twenty days, in which time they got above eighty pounds weight of gold dust. They also found several parcels of plate, which the inhabitants had buried at leaving that place. The English, at their departure, burnt all the town, except the church, and returned to their sloops, bringing away the negroes. Some went further up the river in their sloops, having a design upon another gold mine, called Chocoa, and two of the sloops commanded by Plowman and Grandy sailing towards Cuba, landed near Trinidado; and with an hundred and fifty men took the town, burnt a great part of it, and brought off a very considerable booty.

On the 7th of March, colonel Codrington, governor of the Leeward Islands in America, came with the land-forces under his command on board a squadron of men of war, with divers privateers, and other vessels, before the island of Guadalupe, receiving several shot from the shore, though without doing any other mischief, than killing one man, and wounding a boy. The colonel stood off till the 10th, waiting for the Maidstone, and the small vessels, that carried the provision and ammunition. Upon the 12th, colonel Byam, with his own regiment, and two hundred of colonel Whetham's men landed by break of day, at a place called Les Petits Habitants, where they met with some opposition, but soon constrained the enemy to retire. About nine in the morning, colonel Whetham landed in a bay to the northward of a town called La Bayliffe, where he met with a vigorous resistance from all the enemies forces posted in very good and advantageous breast-works, plying the English with their great and small shot; yet, notwithstanding all their fire, the English marched up to their intrenchments with their muskets shouldered, not firing a shot, till they could lay the muzzles of their guns upon the enemy's breast-works. Here the English had three captains killed, before they made themselves masters of the enemy's intrenchments; which they did about noon, and in an hour after, of La Bayliffe, and the Jacobines church, which the enemy had fortified, and of ten pieces of their cannon. About two, the English took a platform with three pieces of cannon; and the marine regiment attacked the Jacobine plantation and breast-work all along the Jacobines river, which the enemy quitted upon the firing of two vollies only of small shot upon them. The next day the English possessed themselves of the great town called Basse Terre, and forced the enemy to retire into the castle and fort, which they defended till the third of April, and then, blowing them up, retired to the mountains. The English had now nothing to do but to send out parties to burn and destroy the enemy's houses, works, sugar-canes, and provisions, to ravage the country, and to bring in what cattle and plunder they could find; after which they burnt the town to the ground, razed the fortifications, took the best of the guns on board, and made their retreat without the loss of a man, and, reimbarking, returned to St. Christopher's [i]. But to return to Europe.

Whilst the queen was bestowing her favours on the church-party in England, some alterations were made in Scotland, which were as advantageous to the anti-revolutioners and episcopalians, as they were displeasing to the presbyterians. The earl of Marchmont, lord chancellor; the earl of Melvil, president of the council; earl of Selkirk, lord register; Adam Cockburne, of Ormiston, treasurer-deputy; sir John Maxwell, of Pollock, justice-clerk; earl of Leven, governor of the castle of Edinburgh; and the earl of Hyndford, one of the secretaries of state, were all laid aside. On the other hand, the duke of Queensberry, and the lord viscount Tarbat, were made secretaries of state; and the earl of Seafield, chancellor; the marquis of Annandale, president of the council; the earl of Tullibardin, (afterwards duke of Athol) lord privy-seal; the lord Boyle, treasurer-deputy; Mr. Roderick Mackenzey, of Preston-Hall, justice-clerk; sir James Murray, of Philiphaugh, lord register; and the earl of March, governor of Edinburgh-castle. And though all these, except the earl of March, had, at or since the revolution, been deeply engaged against the interest of king James and his family; yet the duke of Queensberry and his two dependents, the lord Boyle and sir James Murray, pretended to be quite of another mind: the marquis of Annandale, earl Seafield, and viscount Tarbat valued themselves upon having, once, opposed king William; and the marquis, every body believed, would, if kindly dealt with, go along with the prevailing party. But, before this change in the ministry was perfected, the scantiness of the funds provided by the last parliament, and the difficulties in collecting them, rendered it absolutely necessary to call a new parliament to sit in the spring of the year 1703. And therefore the earl of Seafield, then secretary of state, came down from London to Scotland, to influence the elections, which by a concurrence of several accidents were so managed, that a greater number of anti-revolutioners were chosen than had been known in any former parliament. At the same time, duke Hamilton, and some others, who had been the greatest persecutors of the presbyterians, set up for patrons of the episcopal clergy, and obtained from the queen a letter to the privy-council of Scotland, wherein, among other things, she said: 'We do, in the first place, recommend to your care the church now established by law, in its superior and inferior judicatures, such as sessions, presbyters, synods, and general assemblies; as also in the exercise of their holy functions, and in what concerns their persons and benefices. We are informed, that there are are many dissenters who, albeit they differ from the established church in opinion as to church-government and form, yet are of the protestant reformed religion, some of which are in possession of benefices, and others exercise their worship in meeting-houses. It is our royal pleasure, that they should be directed to live suitably to the reformed religion, which they profess, submissively to our laws; decently and regularly with relation to the church established by law, as good Christians and subjects; and, in so doing, that they be protected in the peaceable possession of their religion, and in their persons and estates, according to the laws of the kingdom. And we recommend to the clergy of the established discipline their living in brotherly-love and communion with such dissenters.'

Encouraged by these expressions and the queen's repeated assurances, that she would maintain the Church of England, and even the least member of it, in all their just rights and privileges; the episcopal clergy framed an address, to which, with great pains and many indirect methods, they procured many subscriptions, and which was presented to the queen, the 13th of March, by Dr. Skeen and Dr. Scot, introduced by the duke of Queensberry (who nine days before had been appointed high-commissioner) and viscount Tarbat [k].

[i] Father Daniel, though he mentions this descent of the English on Guadalupe, conceals all these circumstances to their advantage, and pretends, that they were repulsed with loss by the sieur Auger, governor of the island. Monsieur de Larrey says, that, Monsieur Gabaret arriving at Fort St. Mary's with two frigates, a flute, nine armed barks, and seven hundred men for the assistance of the inhabitants, the English did not think themselves a force sufficient to withstand them, and therefore reimbarked. The Author of the British Empire in America, Vol. II. 187, asserts, That all the successes of this expedition were rendered fruitless, by some unhappy differences among the commanders; though something must be imputed to the vigorous defence of the French, and the sickness of the English soldiers; which obliged the general to reimbark his men, after they were so near making a conquest of the whole island.

[k] The address was as follows.

'We, your majesty's most humble, dutiful, loyal, and most obedient subjects, look on it as no small blessing to have a queen of our ancient race of kings, who has always been a pattern of virtue, and a constant supporter and owner of the true reformed orthodox religion; and who, since her coming

The queen in her anſwer aſſured them of her protection, and endeavours to ſupply their neceſſities as far as conveniently ſhe could, and recommended them to live in peace and Chriſtian love with the clergy, who were by law inveſted with the church-government in her ancient kingdom of Scotland.

The next thing, which the enemies of the revolution improved to their advantage, was a proclamation of indemnity publiſhed by the queen, on the 6th of March 1702-3. It was ſet up for a maxim by the new miniſtry, that all the Jacobites were to be invited home; and therefore the proclamation was of a very large extent, indemnifying all perſons for all treaſons committed before April laſt, without any limitation of time for their coming home to accept of this grace, and without demanding any ſecurity of them for the future. Upon this conſiderable numbers of Jacobites came over to Scotland from St. Germain's and other parts of France, though they had forfeited their lives to the law by correſponding with the enemy, and practiſing againſt the government in king William's reign. Some of them pretended to be new converts, and together with others at home, who had ſtood out all king William's time, qualified themſelves to ſit in parliament by taking the oaths. The anti-revolutioners, being proud of this acceſſion of ſtrength, thought themſelves in a condition to preſcribe terms to the government, and carried matters to an unaccountable height.

This was the poſture of affairs in Scotland, before and at the time, when the queen found it neceſſary to ſatisfy the nation by calling a new parliament. The epiſcopal party thought themſelves ſo ſecure of a majority, that they every where gave out, they ſhould be able to vote down preſbytery, and to reſtore patronages, or at leaſt to carry a toleration, ſo as their own clergy might be called to benefices, as well as the preſbyterians. Nor did their confidence terminate in humbling the preſbyterians of Scotland, but they flattered themſelves alſo with the hopes of mortifying the revolution-party of the Church of England; and this they were prompted to expect by a North-country clergyman, turned out in 1694 for refuſing the oaths to king William, whom they had ſince employed as their agent at London, and who, upon the death of that prince, in a letter to thoſe, who employed him in Scotland, expreſſed himſelf thus: 'The Church of England was ſo much out of order during the late reign, that it will take ſome time to put matters right, which her majeſty is firmly reſolved to ſee to with all convenient haſte.' Thus they endeavoured to ſpread the belief, that the queen was their friend, while the greateſt part of them not only refuſed to ſwear allegiance to her, but ſome of thoſe, who had taken the oaths, made no ſcruple openly to confeſs, 'That they ſwore to her only as a Tutrix or Regent, during the minority of her ſuppoſed brother.' By this it appears, that the whole kingdom of Scotland was in a ferment at the ſitting down of the parliament. The country-party (which took its riſe from the affair of Darien, and had diſputed the legality of the continuance of the convention-parliament) of which duke Hamilton and the marquis of Tweedale were the leaders, inſiſted upon the redreſs of thoſe grievances, which the country laboured under in the former reign. The preſbyterians in general, and others of revolution principles, who were headed by the duke of Argyle, were alarmed at the bold proceedings of the anti-revolutioners, of whom the earl of Hume was chief. This divided the country party among themſelves; for, moſt of that party in the late reign being revolution-men, they were jealous of the new acceſſion of anti-revolutioners; and therefore it was not poſſible for them to concert meaſures together. Theſe jealouſies were heightened by new diſcoveries, which the anti-revolutioners had made of their ſentiments in council and elſewhere: That they were againſt ratifying the ſeveral ſteps of the revolution, and the proceedings of king William's parliament on that head; but thought beſt to paſs it over as a thing extraordinary and out of courſe; and alledged, that all parties might be ſafe enough under the ſhelter of her majeſty's general indemnity. The revolutioners knowing well, that, according to the old conſtitution of the kingdom, general pardons granted out of parliament afford but little ſafety, when queſtioned in parliament, deſpiſed the motion, and thought fit to leave thoſe to plead the indemnity, who believed they needed it, but conceived themſelves not to be of that number, and therefore reſolved upon a parliamentary ratification of the revolution. This they judged to be the moſt effectual way to prevent after-blows from the oppoſite party, whoſe deſigns became more ſuſpicious by their inſiſting on a diſſolution of the garriſon of Inverlochy, which was a great curb upon the popiſh highlanders, and rigid prelatiſts of the North, the great ſtrength of the anti-revolution party.

[1703.] In this diſpoſition of affairs the parliament met at Edinburgh, the 6th of May 1703, and, the duke of Queensberry, her majeſty's commiſſioner, having taken his ſeat on the throne, the queen's letter was read, wherein ſhe recommended to them to raiſe a ſupply for the forces, to encourage trade, and to proceed with wiſdom, prudence, and unanimity [1]. Then the lord high-commiſſioner, and the earl of Seafield lord chancellor, made ſpeeches, enlarging upon the heads of the queen's letter. This done, duke Hamilton, after a ſpeech proper to the ſubject, offered the draught of a bill, for recognizing her majeſty's undoubted right and title to the imperial crown of Scotland, according to the declaration of the eſtates of the kingdom, containing the claim of right, which was received and read the firſt time, and a ſecond reading unanimouſly ordered the 15th of May, when the queen's advocate, ſir James Stuart, offered an additional clauſe, 'That it ſhould be treaſon to quarrel her majeſty's right and title to the crown, or her exerciſe of the government from her actual entry to the ſame.' This clauſe being read, it was urged by ſome, that it was diſhonourable to her majeſty, becauſe it implied, that the houſe were giving her majeſty an indemnity for the actings and exerciſe of her power ſince her acceſſion to the throne. It was anſwered, that the words meant only in general her majeſty's right to exerciſe her power. To which it was replied, that, whatever was the meaning of thoſe, who had offered the clauſe, yet the words could not admit of any ſuch meaning, unleſs either the laſt part of the clauſe was altered thus: 'her being in the exerciſe of the government.' To this it was again anſwered, in behalf of the clauſe, That by the late queen Mary's death, without heirs of her body, the right of ſucceſſion came to the queen; upon the proſpect of king William's death, ſeeing by the entail ſhe was to ſucceed 'before any children' of his body. But that the exerciſe did never accrue to her till his actual death and her actual acceſſion; and that therefore it was proper, not only to recognize her right to the ſucceſſion; but alſo to recognize her actual exerciſe, and to ſecure it by a ſanction of treaſon. To this it was replied by the duke of Hamilton's friends, that theſe rights ſpoken of did not import any other, than the apparent right of an heir before or after his immediate predeceſſor's death; the firſt of which naturally vaniſhes upon the exiſtence of the ſecond. That the act, as at firſt offered, fully recognized theſe and all manner of rights, which were or could be in her majeſty's perſon; but that the clauſe now offered did moſt diſhonourably ſuperadd a ratification and ſanction of her majeſty's exerciſe, and muſt point at one of theſe three things: Firſt, either it ſuppoſed, that there had been ſomething lame and defective in her majeſty's right and title abovementioned, which had been, ſince her actual ſucceſſion, ſupplied by her majeſty's acts of adminiſtration and exerciſe, and therefore her exerciſe was propoſed to be ratified towards validating her infirm title. But, as there was not the leaſt defect in her majeſty's right and title, therefore this clauſe was unneceſſary and dangerous. That, in the ſecond place, the clauſe inſinuated, that her majeſty, ſince her acceſſion, had exerciſed ſome acts of adminiſtration; to indemnify which, a vote of this houſe ſeemed neceſſary. That, whatever might be charged upon the miniſtry, it was the higheſt indignity done to her majeſty, to expoſe her exerciſe of her royal power to the leaſt ſuſpicion by ſuch a clauſe. And, in the laſt place, that no other reaſon could be given for the tenaciouſneſs of the miniſtry in promoting a clauſe ſo diſhonourable to the queen, but that they themſelves muſt be conſcious, that, contrary to law, they had been inſtrumental in adviſing her ing to the crown of her illuſtrious anceſtors, has ſhewn ſuch good and generous inclinations to make all her ſubjects live happily, that we have preſumed moſt humbly to addreſs your majeſty to take into your royal conſideration the condition of the ſubjects of the epiſcopal perſuaſion in this kingdom. It is not unknown to your majeſty, the hard meaſure and diſcouragements they met with of late years, particularly thoſe of the clergy, though they have always behaved themſelves (as their principles oblige them to do) peaceably and ſubmiſſively to ſupreme authority.

'May it therefore pleaſe your ſacred majeſty to take thoſe into your royal protection, and give liberty to ſuch pariſhes, where all or moſt of the heritors and inhabitants are of the epiſcopal perſuaſion, to call, place, and give benefices to miniſters of their own principles, which the preſbyterians themſelves can have no reaſon to complain of; for, if the plurality, they pretend to, be true, by this act of grace, neither their churches nor benefices are in hazard: which favour will oblige us more and more, out of gratitude as well as duty, to ſend up our prayers to Almighty God, that the ſame good providence, which places your majeſty upon the throne, and has bleſſed the beginning of your reign with ſuch glorious ſucceſs, may preſerve your majeſty for a bleſſing to theſe lands; and that we may never want a true proteſtant of the ſame royal blood to govern us while ſun and moon endure.'

majeſty, to exerciſe ſome acts of adminiſtration, ſuch as the calling together the late parliament, which had continued during all the time of the late reign, and promoting in it ſome commiſſions, laws, and powers, beyond the limitations which determined the being, and circumſcribed the power of that parliament: and, being ſenſible, that their advice might very juſtly rebound upon themſelves, they ſhuffled in this diſhonourable clauſe, hoping, under the name of her majeſty's exerciſe, to ſhelter themſelves: but that, whatever might become of this clauſe at this time, it was hoped, that the wiſdom of the houſe would, in due time, paſs a cenſure on thoſe advices, which were like to diſcompoſe her majeſty's quiet, and endanger the welfare of the nation. The duke of Hamilton concluded with ſaying, 'That he had the honour of offering this act for recognizing her majeſty's authority, right, and title; that he had been in hopes, that ſo dutiful an act would have paſſed the vote of this houſe with all imaginable chearfulneſs; and that he was both ſorry and ſurprized to find any thing thrown in, which could create the leaſt demur in it; but let thoſe anſwer for it, who were the authors.' After a long debate, it was again moved, that inſtead of the words, 'her exerciſe of the government,' the following words might be added, 'her being in the exerciſe of the government.' But, by the concurrence of the cavaliers, it was carried by a conſiderable majority, that the clauſe brought in by the queen's advocate ſhould be added to the act, which, on the 19th of May, was touched by the ſceptre, and made a law [m]; but, before that was done, duke Hamilton deſired, 'That it ſhould be remembered, that, at paſſing this act, it was expreſsly declared, that the meaning of the advocate's clauſe could affect only the queen's exerciſe of her government, and not the actings of her miniſtry and that, therefore, whatever challenge might be given afterwards to the illegality of the actings of the late parliament, might not be conſidered as a violation of this act.'

After the act had received the royal aſſent, the earl of Hume, who was one of thoſe that had qualified himſelf ſince king William's death, preſented the draught of an act for the ſupply, but, before it was read, the marquis of Tweedale ſaid, that he had an overture to make to the houſe, which he hoped would, by reaſon of its importance, be preferred to all other buſineſs. After ſome debate, it was agreed, that the draught and overture ſhould both be read, provided, that nothing ſhould be ſpoken to either. And accordingly the act for ſupply was read, as was afterwards the marquis of Tweedale's overture 'for a reſolve of parliament, that, before all other buſineſs, the parliament might proceed to make ſuch conditions of government, and regulations in the conſtitution of this kingdom, to take place after the deceaſe of her majeſty and heirs of her body, as ſhould be neceſſary for the preſervation of their religion and liberty.' Both which overtures were ordered to lie on the table.

The compliance of the cavaliers with the court in the act of Recognition, was extremely cenſured by many of their party; but they were induced to gratify the queen in this point, out of expectation of being intruſted with the adminiſtration of affairs; for which reaſon it was likewiſe unanimouſly reſolved, in a full meeting, that the earl of Hume ſhould the next day make the motion for a ſupply. And, upon theſe accounts, the duke of Queenſberry renewed his engagement to ſtand firmly by them, and inform the queen what ſignal ſervices they had done. But this good correſpondence did not laſt long; for, within two or three days, the duke's deportment induced many of the cavaliers to ſuſpect his ſincerity. A writer of that party is of opinion, that the duke was once ſeriouſly embarked with them, but left them upon this occaſion. On the day the earl of Hume was to move for a ſupply, his grace called a council, and acquainted them of it; with which all agreeing, they adjourned with a deſign to ſupport the earl of Hume's motion. A few minutes after the duke of Argyle, marquis of Annandale, and earl of Marchmont, waited upon the high-commiſſioner, and, withdrawing privately with him, told him, 'That they had been that morning with a conſiderable number of parliament-men, wherein it was reſolved to move for an act ratifying the Revolution, and another the preſbyterian government, and preſs to have them preferred to the act of ſupply, which they were certain to carry; but firſt they thought fit to acquaint his grace with their deſign, and aſk his concurrence.' The duke begged them to forbear, becauſe he had now an opportunity of obtaining a ſupply; and, if he ſlipped that, he might never have another; and promiſed, that, when this was over, he would go into whatever they propoſed. But the others refuſed to comply, being rather willing, that there ſhould be no ſupply granted at all, than that it ſhould proceed from the cavaliers: and thus they left the high-commiſſioner in great perplexity, who durſt not venture to puſh the act of ſupply, knowing, that the duke of Hamilton and his party would join the duke of Argyle and his friends, and ſo the act would be rejected. On the other hand, he foreſaw, what ſir James Murray of Philiphaugh had that morning intimated to him, That, if he ſupported the duke of Argyle in his deſigns, the cavaliers would leave him; by which means his intereſt would be diminiſhed, and he be obliged to depend on the duke of Argyle, marquis of Annandale, and other revolutioners and preſbyterians. While he was in this ſuſpence, the duke of Argyle, who had more intereſt with him than any other perſon, ſoon returned, and, in a private converſation, repreſented to him the improbability of his ſucceeding by the methods which he was then upon; and dexterouſly awakened his jealouſy of the duke of Hamilton, who, notwithſtanding what had happened of late, had more intereſt with the cavaliers than any other, and who, as ſoon as they had gained their point, was likely to become their leader. This, together with the dread of being abandoned by the duke of Argyle and the marquis of Annandale, wrought ſo powerfully with the high-commiſſioner, that, from that moment, he reſolved to deſert the cavaliers; but, the better to carry on his deſigns, he reſolved at the ſame time to diſſemble as much as poſſible, which however availed him but little.

On the 26th of May, the commiſſioner from the throne informed the houſe, 'That, having now ſate twenty days, he did not doubt but they were all convinced, that the preſent ſtate of affairs required a competent ſupply for maintaining the army: That the act, offered a week before for that purpoſe, had ever ſince lain upon the table: wherefore he deſired, that it might be now read; and promiſed, that they ſhould have full time afterwards allowed them to go upon other buſineſs.' Notwithſtanding this ſpeech, it was moved, that, before the ſupply, the marquis of Tweedale's overture ſhould be taken into conſideration. Upon this the debate turned into a competition, Whether the Act of Supply, or the Overture, ſhould firſt take place? In behalf of the overture, was urged the great importance of it; and in behalf of the ſupply, the neceſſity of it, and the commiſſioner's promiſe, that after the firſt reading of the ſupply-act, there ſhould be time given for other buſineſs. To this a member anſwered, 'That he had all the deference imaginable for the lord commiſſioner's aſſurances, and doubted not but the whole houſe had the ſame; but he doubted extremely, that his grace could be maſter of himſelf in that point. Who knows (added he), but that, after all his grace's good purpoſes, the treaſurer of England may cauſe to adjourn the houſe, when he ſhall think fit, notwithſtanding all the aſſurances which the miniſtry can give. It is too well felt, that the influence of foreign counſels, from one corner of the world or other, have determined Scots affairs for theſe many years; and there is no appearance of diſcontinuing theſe practices.' He concluded, 'That from the matter of this overture might ariſe ſuch ſettlements as might make a Scots nation ſtand upon a Scots bottom; and therefore it was fit to prefer the conſideration of it to any other buſineſs whatſoever [n].'

After ſeveral warm ſpeeches and long debates, the houſe

[m] The act ran thus: The eſtates of parliament conſidering, that, by the death of the late king William of ever glorious memory, the crown and royal dignity of this kingdom is by right devolved upon queen Anne, our preſent gracious ſovereign, conform to the declaration of the eſtates of this kingdom; therefore the eſtates of parliament for themſelves, and in the name and behalf of the whole ſubjects of this kingdom, aſſert, recognize, and acknowledge, her majeſty's undoubted right and title to the imperial crown of this kingdom; and her majeſty, with advice and conſent of the ſaid eſtate of parliament, doth ſtatute and declare, that it is, and ſhall be high-treaſon in any of the ſubjects of this kingdom, to diſown, quarrel, or impugn her majeſty's right and title to the crown of this kingdom, or 'her exerciſe of the government thereof, from her actual entry into the ſame.'

[n] Another member urged, upon the point of the abrupt adjournment of the parliament, "That it muſt ſtill be freſh in every man's memory, that inſults were made upon the ſovereignty and independency of this nation, in the matter of their late trading company, both before their ſettlement in Darien by the legal actings of the Scots parliament, and by the ſcandalous memorials given in by the Engliſh reſident at Hamburgh, moſt falſely repreſenting the Scots company as private perſons, having no authority; as alſo, by the ſaid reſident's uſing threatening denunciations and expreſſions againſt the Hamburghers, if they ſhould enter into any trading ſociety with them: And likewiſe, after that company was ſettled in Darien, by their moſt barbarous and inhuman execution of ſome proclamations iſſued out againſt them. That, whether theſe moſt injurious ſtretches were calculated really for the ſake of an intereſt altogether foreign to this iſland, it was not proper here to diſpute; but, that it was certain, that this had raiſed an inſuperable jealouſy in the Scots nation, which could not fail, ſome time or other, to break forth into conſequences dangerous to the nation. And therefore he concurred with thoſe noble and worthy members in promoting the overture, from which he ſhould expect, that ſome laws ſhould be enacted towards regulating the adminiſtration and government at home, as might deliver a Scots prince and miniſtry from foreign influence, and might thereby compoſe thoſe hurtful jealouſies, in all times coming, to the mutual peace and quiet of the whole iſland."

came to this reſolve, "That the parliament will proceed to make ſuch acts as are neceſſary or fit for ſecuring our religion, liberty and trade, before any act for ſupply, or any other buſineſs whatſoever." Whereupon the marquis of Athol offered 'an act for the ſecurity of the kingdom, in caſe of her majeſty's deceaſe.' But, before it was read, the duke of Argyle offered his act, 'ratifying the late revolution, and all the acts following thereupon; Mr. Fletcher of Salton, an act, containing ſeveral limitations upon the ſucceſſion, after the death of her majeſty, and the heirs of her body: the earl of Rothes, an act, that, after her majeſty's death, and failing heirs of her body, no perſon coming to the crown of Scotland, being at the ſame time king or queen of England, ſhould, as king or queen of Scotland, have power to make peace or war, without the conſent of parliament; the earl of Marchmont, an act for ſecuring the true proteſtant religion and preſbyterian government; and ſir Patrick Johnſon, an act, allowing the importation of all ſorts of wines, and other foreign liquors:' all which acts were placed, and ordered to lie on the table.

On the firſt of June, an 'act for toleration to all proteſtants, in the exerciſe of religious worſhip,' preſented by the earl of Strathmore, being read, a ſtrong repreſentation was offered againſt it in the name, and at the appointment of the late general aſſembly, which concluded with theſe words: "That they were perſuaded, that to enact a toleration for thoſe of the epiſcopal way (which God of his infinite mercy avert) would be to eſtabliſh iniquity by a law, and would bring upon the promoters thereof, and their families, the dreadful guilt of all thoſe ſins and pernicious effects, that might enſue thereupon." The promoters of the toleration finding by this repreſentation, that it was like to meet with great oppoſition, agreed not to inſiſt upon it, leſt thereby they ſhould offend and loſe many, who, at preſent, ſided with them againſt the court.

Thus, not only all the hopes of the epiſcopal party for a toleration (which they had made no doubt of carrying) were entirely loſt, and every thing relating to the church continued in the ſame ſtate in which it was during the late reign, but the preſbyterians got a new law in their favour, which gave them as firm a ſettlement, and as full a ſecurity, as law could give. For, on the 3d of June, an act paſſed for preſerving the true reformed proteſtant religion, and confirming preſbyterian church government and diſcipline by kirk ſeſſions, preſbyteries, provincial ſynods, and general aſſemblies, as agreeable to the word of God, and the only government of Chriſt's church within this kingdom [o]. Nor was this all. For, on the 7th of June, the parliament proceeded to conſider the duke of Argyle's act, which conſiſted of three clauſes: For ratifying and perpetuating the firſt act of king William's parliament, that the three eſtates then met together were a lawful and free parliament: For declaring it high treaſon to diſown the authority of that parliament, or to endeavour, by writing, or ſpeaking, or other open act or deed, to alter or innovate the 'claim of right,' or any article thereof. The two firſt clauſes were agreed to without any oppoſition; but the third, relating to the claim of right, raiſed a very warm debate. It was alledged, that many libels had been ſpread, reflecting on the 'claim of right,' and tending to unhinge the preſent happy ſettlement. To which it was anſwered, 'That there were ſtanding laws, by which the authors of ſuch libels might be puniſhed; but that the import of ſuch a general and peremptory clauſe would be of moſt dangerous conſequence: That it would fetter men in their common converſation, which, though never ſo innocent, might by theſe words, 'endeavour by writing or ſpeaking,' bring all the ſubjects, whether in the miniſtry or not, into daily ſnares; and, in ſhort, that it would bind up the government, and the wiſdom of the nation itſelf, in all ſucceeding ages, from making ſuch alterations and reformations, as, in courſe of time, and various circumſtances of things, ſhould be judged neceſſary.' To this purpoſe James Moore of Stennywood ſaid, 'That he was ſure, and every body knew, that the ſhire of Aberdeen, which he had the honour to repreſent, was of epiſcopal perſuaſion; and if, after this act was paſſed, his countrymen ſhould, in diſcharge of their own conſciences, in a regular way addreſs the ſovereign or parliament (which, by the 'claim of right,' is the privilege of every ſubject) for a rectification of the preſent preſbyterian eſtabliſhment, which, in his opinion, was neither infallible nor unalterable, he deſired to know, whether ſuch an addreſs ſhould import treaſon?' To this ſir William Hamilton of Whitlow anſwered, That indeed this act did not preclude addreſſing for a toleration; but he was of opinion, that if, after it was paſſed into a law, any perſon ſhould own, that he thought preſbyterian government a wrong eſtabliſhment, and that epiſcopacy ought to be reſtored, ſuch a perſon was guilty of high-treaſon. This occaſioned a long and warm debate, wherein the dangers that would ariſe from this act, both to the government and the ſubject, were fully laid open. However the queſtion for approving the act was carried in the affirmative, though there were ſixty members againſt it, and many 'non-liquets,' (or ſilent members) and ſeveral of the country party, who were preſbyterians; but all the miniſtry and their dependants went into it, except the marquis of Athol, the lord juſtice Clerk, the lord viſcount of Tarbat, and ſome of their, and the lord-commiſſioner's friends, who, at this time, began to break with the court, and join in a particular correſpondence with the cavaliers.

By this act the preſbyterian government acquired new ſtrength; for the claim of right was not only confirmed (one article of which was againſt epiſcopacy and for preſbytery) but it was declared high-treaſon to endeavour any alteration in it. The late king, though it had been often propoſed to him, would never conſent that this ſhould paſs into an act. He ſaid, he had taken the crown on the terms of that claim, and therefore would never make a breach on any part of it; but he would not bind his ſucceſſors, by making it a perpetual law. Thus a miniſtry, that carried all matters relating to the church to ſo great a height, yet, with other views, gave a fatal ſtroke to the epiſcopal intereſt in Scotland, to which king William would never give way.

As ſoon as the cavaliers perceived, that the duke of Queenſberry's friends and dependents appeared againſt the act of toleration, and for the acts eſtabliſhing the preſbyterian government, and ratifying the late revolution, they immediately concluded, that they were betrayed, and declared this opinion in a meeting of the cavaliers. Upon this it was reſolved to ſend four of their number, the earls of Hume and Strathmore, George Lockhart of Carnwath, and James Ogilvy of Boyne, to repreſent to him, how much they were ſurprized to find his friends behave after ſuch a manner; and that they hoped he would remember his vows and promiſes, and how they had ſerved the queen. He excuſed his conduct, as neceſſary to pleaſe ſuch of the miniſtry, as were ſo inclined, leſt otherwiſe the queen's affairs ſhould ſuffer prejudice: and then he renewed his former promiſes, with the moſt ſolemn proteſtations. They replied, 'That they believed this would not ſatisfy thoſe, who had ſent them to him; and that neither his grace nor the queen could blame them for looking to themſelves, ſince it was plain, he was imbarked with a party, and entered into meaſures quite contrary to the capitulation made and agreed to between him and them.' Having made a report to their conſtituents, it was unanimouſly reſolved not to enter into any concert with the court, or any other party, but to ſtand by themſelves firm to one another, and jointly go into ſuch meaſures, as, when propoſed by any party, ſhould be by the majority of themſelves, eſteemed for the intereſt of their country. This engagement they all faithfully performed during this whole ſeſſion, except only the earls of Belcarras and Dunmore, who adhered to the court. Hitherto they had been firm to their party, eſpecially Belcarras, who had, after the revolution, been ſometime in France, and, not many years before this, had obtained liberty to return home.

The bill, which occaſioned the longeſt debates in this remarkable ſeſſion, was that for ſecurity of the kingdom, in caſe of her majeſty's deceaſe. From the 9th of June to the 30th, there was little done in relation to the public, except the reading this act, and reaſoning upon the ſeveral clauſes

[o] Lockhart, in his memoirs, ſays, Many members argued againſt it, but none with more ſpirit than ſir David Cunningham of Milcraigg, who urged, that it was uncharitable to affirm, as this act did, that 'the preſbyterian government was the only church of Chriſt.' To this the marquis of Lothian replied, 'That the clauſe was right, ſince he was ſure the preſbyterian government was the beſt part of the Chriſtian religion;' which raiſed great mirth in the houſe. However, the act paſſed; but it was evident, that the preſbyterian party was not ſo conſiderable as had been imagined; and that, if the queen had been as epiſcopal in Scotland as in England, ſhe might eaſily have overturned preſbytery. For at this time the houſe conſiſted of about two hundred and forty members, thirty of whom voted againſt the act, and eighty-two were 'non-liquets,' which laſt were all epiſcopal, but choſe to be ſilent, either becauſe there was not then a formed deſign againſt preſbytery, or in order to pleaſe the court; ſo that, properly ſpeaking, there was not a plurality of above ſixteen voices for the act; among whom, ſuch as the duke of Hamilton, the earl of Eglinton, and many others, were no ways preſbyterians; ſo that, had the queen deſigned to introduce epiſcopacy, it would not have been any hard taſk to have done it.

The

of it; for it was agreed, that it ſhould be conſidered paragraph by paragraph. When therefore, on the 9th of June, the bill was taken into conſideration, many ſpeeches were made, recommending to the members to proceed in that matter with the utmoſt caution and deliberation. Among the reſt, the lord Belhaven made a deduction of the ſeveral projects, which, from Henry the VIIth's time, had been ſet on foot towards uniting the two kingdoms, with an enumeration of the inſtances of decay in the Scots nation, ſince their kings reſided in England, and of the opportunities they had loſt of making good terms for themſelves, by the artful offers of an union, made to them by their neighbours to lull them aſleep; concluding, that by this act they had it in their power to provide againſt any further diſappointments.

After the houſe had entered upon the conſideration of ſome clauſes of the act, it was repreſented, that it would be neceſſary to reſcind the ſecond act of the third parliament of king Charles II. 'eſtabliſhing the ſucceſſion of the crown in the next blood in the royal line, of whatſoever religion.' Whereupon the queen's advocate took out of his pocket an act ready drawn 'for reſcinding the ſaid act, ſo far as the ſame was inconſiſtent with the claim of right, and the preſent ſettlement made in king William's time.' Againſt this it was urged, that, by the claim of right, all popiſh ſucceſſors being excluded, they ſhould by this clauſe determine the ſucceſſion to be lodged in the family of Hanover, who were the neareſt proteſtants of the royal blood. And though the generality of the preſbyterians, and all the miniſtry, except the marquis of Athol, viſcount Tarbat, and the lord juſtice Clerk, preſſed to have this act read the firſt time; yet it was carried by a conſiderable majority, that it ſhould lie on the table[p].

On the 1ſt of July, the 'act for the ſecurity of the kingdom' being read, a member voted for inſerting in it ſuch preliminaries, in caſe of a ſucceſſor not of the queen's own body, as ſhould ſufficiently ſecure the Scots nation againſt the misfortunes ariſing from the influence of foreign counſels. This was ſeconded by a great many members; and, after ſome debate, it was agreed, that the act ſhould be conſidered paragraph by paragraph. The next day it was reſolved, that the eſtates of the nation ſhould meet upon the 20th day after the queen's deceaſe, and that the government ſhould be lodged in their hands on that day. The 5th of July, a clauſe was added, excluding papiſts from being members of the eſtates; and, on the 6th, another clauſe was offered, "That no Engliſhman or foreigner, having a Scots title, and not having an eſtate of a thouſand pounds ſterling yearly rent within this kingdom, ſhall have place and vote in that meeting of eſtates." Againſt this clauſe it was urged by the marquis of Athol, that the privilege of peerage belonged to ſome by birth, and to others by immediate creation. That, in the firſt of theſe caſes, the private birthright of ſome noblemen might be injured; and, in the other, the prerogative ſeemed to be impaired. To this it was anſwered, firſt, that this clauſe was no incroaching upon the property and birthright of thoſe peers, who were to be excluded at that time, ſeeing the excluſion was for that time alone, at which there was an affair to be negotiated, which was purely a Scots concern, viz. The chuſing a ſucceſſor for the kingdom of Scotland. Secondly, That poſſeſſion and property is the true title for repreſentation; and, though the crown, which is the fountain of honour, be not reſtrained to diſpenſe titles according to that rule, yet, in this very nice caſe, there could be no exception made againſt excluding thoſe from voting, who, not only had no poſſeſſion or intereſt in Scotland to repreſent, but who, on the contrary, had poſſeſſion and intereſt elſewhere, which might claſh with the intereſt of the Scots nation. Thirdly, That in the affair, which was to be the ſubject-matter of the conſideration of that meeting of the eſtates, the nominating a ſucceſſor, the Engliſh were already predetermined and pre-engaged in their own choice. And though it ſhould prove to be the intereſt of Scotland, not to enter into the ſame nomination with England, yet thoſe predetermined peers, who had eſtates in England, would never riſque them, to give a fair vote for the intereſt of Scotland, where they had no eſtate to loſe; and therefore the clauſe was inſiſted on as proper. After ſome debate, the clauſe was put to the vote, and carried in the affirmative; but, before voting, the marquis of Athol proteſted, that this vote might not prejudice the undoubted right of all Scots proteſtant peers: To which proteſt ſeveral other peers adhered. Then the marquis of Annandale, the duke of Argyle, and the earl of Kincardine alſo proteſted, that the vote might not be prejudicial to the privileges of the peers of Scotland, whether they be Scotſmen or Engliſh.

On the 7th of July, it was moved, That ſuch limitations, as ſhould be thought neceſſary to be put upon the ſucceſſor, might be conſidered; and particularly a cauſe was offered, that the kingdom ſhould not be engaged in any war, but by advice and conſent of the parliament. This clauſe being read, a long debate enſued, wherein it was urged, "That the ſettling the limitations upon the ſucceſſor was more proper to be done by that parliament or meeting of the eſtates, which ſhould name the ſucceſſor; and that the whole 'act of ſecurity' might perhaps be loſt, if it ſhould be cramped by ſuch limitations." Upon which, it was carried by a majority of twenty-ſix voices, 'not to proceed to the limitations on the ſucceſſor in this act.' However, it was afterwards voted, that the act touching peace and war ſhould be conſidered, next after the act of ſecurity.

On the 9th of July, upon a debate relating to the regency, in caſe the ſucceſſor to be named were under age, it was reſolved to refer that matter to the wiſdom of the meeting of the eſtates. Five days after it was moved, that the clauſe, impowering the meeting of the eſtates to declare a ſucceſſor to the crown of the royal line and of the proteſtant religion, might receive the addition of theſe words, 'of the true proteſtant religion, as by law eſtabliſhed, within this kingdom.' Againſt which it was urged, That the coronation oath was a ſufficient teſt to engage the ſucceſſor (being a proteſtant) to maintain the church, as by law eſtabliſhed. To this it was anſwered, "That ſince the wiſdom of this houſe had thought fit to exclude Papiſts, who profeſſed the doctrine of 'tranſubſtantiation,' from having an acceſs to a Scots government; ſo he ſaw no reaſon, why Lutherans, who profeſs the doctrine of 'conſubſtantiation,' ought not likewiſe to be excluded; and more eſpecially conſidering, that by this means the 'family of Hanover' would be excluded, which was both 'proper and neceſſary,' conſidering that the Engliſh had named that family for their ſucceſſor. For he ſaw plainly, that the Scots nation muſt reſolve to be in continual ſlavery, if they ſhould go into the ſame nomination with England, unleſs they had ſuch conditions of government ſettled within themſelves, as might ſecure their liberty and trade; of which he ſaw no great appearance at this time, ſince it was evident from ſeveral ſtruggles within theſe few days, that the miniſtry were in concert with the miniſtry of England, to continue the Scots nation under the ſame ſlavery as formerly; and therefore he did ſecond that clauſe, and would ſecond any other clauſe whatſoever, which might put the Scots nation under a 'diſtinct' government from that of England, ſeeing they could not obtain ſuch 'reaſonable terms,' as might make them eaſy under one and the ſame ſucceſſor." Upon this occaſion Mr. Grant informed the houſe, that he had inſtructions from the barons of the ſhire of Inverneſs, whom he repreſented, not to enter into any terms of ſucceſſion, the ſame with England, unleſs firſt there ſhould be ſuch conditions of government, and terms of union of trade, previouſly concerted, paſſed, and ratified by the parliaments of both kingdoms, as ſhould put the Scots nation upon an equal foot with their neighbours. After ſome debate, the queſtion was ſtated, either to 'add the words offered to the clauſe,' or to 'reſt upon the ſecurity by the coronation oath;' and it was carried for reſting on the coronation oath.

On the 16th of July, a clauſe was offered by the earl of Roxburgh, "providing the ſucceſſor to be named by the meeting of the eſtates be not the ſucceſſor to the crown of England, unleſs in this ſeſſion of parliament there be ſuch conditions of government ſettled and enacted, as may ſecure the honour and independency of the crown of this kingdom, the freedom, frequency, and power of parliaments, and the religion, liberty, and the trade of the nation from the Engliſh or foreign influence." It was urged againſt the clauſe that it imported limitations upon the ſucceſſor, which had been by a former day's vote excluded out of this act. To which it was anſwered, That by this clauſe there was no limitation deſigned to be brought into this act, but that the clauſe did only in general ſecure a capitulation for ſome proper conditions of government to be ſettled in the ſeſſion of parliament, 'in caſe the nation ſhould think fit to name the ſame ſucceſſor with England,' in the ſame manner as the other day's reſolve had made a capitulation for the 'act of peace and war' in particular. It was again objected, That, as this clauſe was conceived, the making of the conditions of government was too preremptorily reſtrained to this ſeſſion of parliament; and therefore it was moved, that, inſtead of 'this ſeſſion of parliament,' it ſhould be, 'in this or any other ſeſſion of parliament.' To this it was anſwered, "That whilſt the members were deſigning to ſecure a 'capitulation' for ſettling ſuch conditions of government, as might anſwer no leſs important ends than the honour and ſafety of the Scots crown, relieving the nation from ſlavery, and thereby to extinguiſh the jealouſies, which muſt, for all future ages, make both nations uneaſy; that, when they were projecting ſuch good things with all imaginable diſpatch in this parliament, they were told of an expedient for a new delay, by turning them off to ſome future parliament; which, upon the whole matter, aimed at nothing leſs than an entire diſappointment of thoſe generous deſigns. And therefore it was hoped, that the wiſdom of the houſe would enter immediately into the clauſe, as at firſt offered." The queſtion being put, whether 'to add the clauſe, or not,' ſome members threw in a great many new expedients, which occaſioned ſeveral warm ſpeeches; and it being late, and the houſe in great heat and confuſion, ſeveral members preſſed for a delay. The chancellor ſeconded this motion, adding, that this debate ſhould be reſumed the next ſitting, and, by the commiſſioner's order, adjourned the parliament for four days. This adjournment without a vote, in the midſt of a debate, was immediately proteſted againſt as illegal, and an addreſs to the queen was framed and ſubſcribed by above ſeventy members; but, on the 20th of July, the next day of meeting, the chancellor declaring, "That there was no manner of deſign by that adjournment to encroach upon the privilege of the parliament;" a ſtop was put to the addreſs. The next day, the houſe proceeded on the earl of Roxburgh's clauſe; but, after reading it, there was another offered by the queen's advocate, "providing, that, after her majeſty's deceaſe, without heirs of her body, the ſame perſon ſhall in no event be capable to be king or queen of both kingdoms of Scotland and England, unleſs a free communication of trade, the freedom of navigation, and the liberty of the plantations be fully agreed to, and eſtabliſhed by the parliament and kingdom of England, in favour of the kingdom and ſubjects of Scotland, at the ſight, and to the ſatisfaction of this or any enſuing parliament of Scotland, or the ſaid meeting of eſtates." After this clauſe was read, it was moved, that it ſhould be added to the 'act of ſecurity,' inſtead of the clauſe offered by the earl of Roxburgh; and this motion was ſeconded by all the miniſtry and their dependents. After a long debate, ſome urging, to have the clauſe offered relating to the 'conditions of government' added to the 'act of ſecurity;' others inſiſting, to have the clauſe relating to 'communication of trade' added; it was propoſed, that both the clauſes ſhould be joined, and added to the 'act of ſecurity,' which, on the 26th of July, was, after a long debate, carried by a majority of ſeventy-two voices: But the marquis of Annandale, lord preſident, and the duke of Argyle proteſted againſt it, to which ſeveral others adhered. Other clauſes were afterwards offered, and, notwithſtanding the ſtrong oppoſition from the miniſtry, added to the 'act,' which, on the 15th of Auguſt, was read, and approved by a majority of fifty-nine voices[q]. The act of ſecurity being thus ſolemnly paſſed, inſtances were made to the commiſſioner, that he would give the royal aſſent, which, it was urged, would encourage the members to go the more chearfully upon the matter of ſubſidies. And it was alſo repreſented, that the negative to any act approved in parliament had never been aſſerted before the year 1660. But the high commiſſioner declined giving an anſwer till the 10th of September, when he told them, in a ſpeech, that he had received the queen's pleaſure, and was empowered to give the royal aſſent to all the acts voted in this ſeſſion, excepting only 'the act for ſecurity of the kingdom.' Upon this, it was moved, that the queen ſhould be addreſſed for her aſſent; but, the queſtion being put, it was carried againſt this addreſs by twelve voices. Both before and after the commiſſioner had refuſed to paſs the ſecurity-act, there were ſeveral remarkable motions and bills, particularly upon the ſubject of limitations. On the 6th of September, the earl of Marchmont gave in an act concerning the ſucceſſion, which occaſioned very great heats in the houſe, becauſe he had named in it the family of Hanover, and was therefore rejected by many, as contrary to the act of ſecurity. Whether the earl was provoked to bring in this overture by the madneſs of the St. Germain's party, or by the jealouſy of ſome of thoſe of of the revolution, it appeared, that it was not done by concert, and therefore gave a general diſguſt. After this, ſuch limitations were offered, as almoſt turned the monarchy into a commonwealth, with the empty name of a king: For it was propoſed, that the whole adminiſtration ſhould be committed to a council, named by the parliament, and that the legiſlature ſhould be entirely in the parliament, by which no ſhadow of power was left with the crown, and it was to be merely a nominal thing. But after many warm debates, theſe matters were put off by a ſudden adjournment. However, one act of limitation upon a ſucceſſor paſſed, which was of ſome importance. It was declared, that, after her majeſty's deceaſe, no king or queen of Scotland ſhould have power to make war or peace, without conſent of parliament. An act alſo paſſed, allowing the importation of French wines, and other liquors, which, as was pretended, were to be imported in the ſhips of a neutral ſtate. The truth was, the revenue was ſo exhauſted, that they had not enough to ſupport the government without ſuch help. Thoſe, who deſired to drink 'Claret,' and all concerned in trade ran into it, by which means the bill was carried, though with great oppoſition. The jacobites were alſo for it, ſince it opened a free correſpondence with France. It was certainly againſt the public intereſt of the government, in oppoſition to which private intereſt does often prevail. As there were acts in being, that made ſlanderous ſpeeches or writings puniſhable with death, it was now enacted, that ſuch crimes ſhould be puniſhed according to the demerit of the tranſgreſſion, by fining, impriſonment, or baniſhment. An act alſo paſſed in favour of the company trading to Africa and the Indies; and another, for a commiſſion concerning the public accounts. Moreover, the parliament made void the commiſſion for treating of an union with England, and diſcharged any other commiſſion for that end, without their conſent. Notwithſtanding theſe, and the acts for ratifying the claim of right, and eſtabliſhing the preſbyterian church-government: Since the duke of Queenſberry would not paſs the act for the ſecurity of the kingdom, nor ſuffer them to proceed in their limitations upon a ſucceſſor, they would give no ſupply; and he was forced to adjourn the parliament to the 12th of October, without having any ſubſidies granted. By this means the pay of the army, with the charge of the government, was to run upon credit; and matters were like to come to extremities, for a national humour of rendering themſelves a free and independent kingdom had ſo inflamed them, that they ſeemed capable of the moſt extravagant things that could be ſuggeſted to them[r].

[p] The author of the proceedings in this parliament, ſays, (p. 228.) This clauſe, for reſcinding the act of 1681 about the Succeſſion, occaſioned great debates among the ſeveral parties upon different views. The St. Germain's party were againſt reſcinding it totally, becauſe, being made in favour of the duke of York and the lineal ſucceſſion, they think it may ſtill give them a handle to bring in his pretended ſon. The Hanover party was againſt reſcinding it totally, becauſe they think that, popiſh ſucceſſors being excluded by the claim of right, the next proteſtant in the line ſucceeds of courſe, and the duke of Hamilton and the country party were for reſcinding it totally, to cut off both thoſe pretenſions; and, when it came to the vote, it was carried only by one, and that too a great miniſter of ſtate, that it ſhould not be totally reſcinded, but in ſo far only as it might countenance a popiſh ſucceſſor.

Thus ended this famous ſeſſion of parliament, in which the greateſt part of the miniſtry had abandoned the duke of

[q] The other clauſes were:

That the eſtates ſhould not nominate a ſucceſſor, till twenty days after their meeting: That it ſhould be high-treaſon to adminiſter the coronation-oath, but by the appointment of the eſtates; or to own any perſon as king or queen, after her majeſty's deceaſe, till they take the coronation oath, and accept the terms of the claim of right, and ſuch conditions as ſhall be ſettled in this or any enſuing parliament: That, in caſe there be no parliament at the queen's death, the adminiſtration ſhall be in the hands of ſuch members of parliament, and of the privy-council laſt in being, as ſhall be in Edinburgh, or come there before the 20th day: That all commiſſions of the civil officers, except ſheriffs, ſtewards, and juſtices of the peace, and of all military officers above captains, ſhall, upon the queen's deceaſe, be void: That all proteſtant heretors and freeholders, and all burghs, ſhall forthwith provide themſelves with fire-arms, for all the fencible men within their reſpective bounds, and diſcipline them once a month.

[r] The proceedings of the parliament, after the 13th of Auguſt, when the act for ſecurity of the nation was finiſhed, may be ſeen in the following extracts: When the parliament found the commiſſioner would not give an anſwer to their inſtances for paſſing the ſecurity-act, it was moved, on the 25th of Auguſt, that the houſe ſhould go upon the conſideration of ſome overtures for ſecuring the liberties of the nation, conformable to the tenor of the grand reſolve, entered into the 28th of May. Againſt which it was urged, that, according to the terms of that reſolve, the houſe had already made conſiderable progreſs in the matter of religion and liberty; and that trade was next in order. Upon which ſeveral acts for trade were offered and read, particularly, an act allowing the importation of all ſorts of wines and other foreign liquors. As this overture was oppoſed by ſeveral members as prejudicial to the trade of the nation, it was alledged by one of the miniſtry, that it was very well known, that the cuſtoms on wines was the chief fund for the 'Civil Liſt;' and unleſs the importation of French wines were reſtored, the government could not be ſupported, conſidering, that the funds were now very far deficient. This was ſeconded by another miniſter, repreſenting the great benefit which would ariſe to the kingdom in general, and to the towns in particular, by the French trade; and concluding, "That unleſs that act was paſſed, 'the ſubjects might plow up their towns, and burn their ſhips.'" To this a member anſwered, "That, ſince he heard ſuch harſh expreſſions as theſe come from about the throne, for no other reaſon, but to amuſe and miſlead the boroughs with pretended advantages of trade, the members muſt take the liberty to tell their mind the more freely. That he Queenſberry, and particularly the earl of Seafield, lord chancellor, the marquis of Athol, lord privy-ſeal, and the lord viſcount Tarbat, ſecretary of ſtate, with all who depended on them; yet, upon the concluſion of the ſeſſion, the marquis was made a duke, and the lord Tarbat earl of Cromarty; which looked like rewarding them for their oppoſition. The marquis of Douglaſs, though under age, was likewiſe made a duke; the viſcounts of Stair and Roſeberry were created earls of the ſame name; the lord Boyle, earl of Glaſgow; James Stuart of Bute, earl of Bute; Charles Hope of Hopton, earl of Hopton; John Crawford of Kilbiruce, viſcount of Garnock; and ſir James Primroſe of Carrington, viſcount of Primroſe. Soon after, the queen reſolved to revive the order of the thiſtle, which had been raiſed by her father, but was let fall by the late king. It was to be carried in a green ribbon, as the George is in a blue, and the glory was in the form of a St. Andrew's croſs, with a thiſtle in the middle. Argyle and Athol, Annandale, Orkney and Seafield, were the firſt, who had it, the number being limited to twelve.

To ſuch a height did the diſorders in that kingdom riſe, that great ſkill and much ſecret practice ſeemed neceſſary to ſet matters right there. The averſion and jealouſy towards thoſe, who had been moſt active in the laſt reign, and the favour ſhewn to thoſe, who were in king James's intereſt, had an appearance of bringing matters out of an exceſs to a temper; and it was much magnified by thoſe, who intended to flatter the queen, on deſign to ruin her. Though the ſame meaſures were taken in England, yet there was leſs danger in following them there than in Scotland. Errors might be ſooner obſerved, and eaſier corrected, where perſons are in view, and are watched in all their motions; but this might prove fatal at a greater diſtance, where it was more eaſy to deny or palliate things, with greater aſſurance. The duke of Queenſberry's ingroſſing all things to himſelf increaſed the diſguſt at the credit he was in. He had begun a practice of drawing out the ſeſſions of parliament to an unuſual length; by which his appointments exhauſted ſo much of the revenue, that the reſt of the miniſters were not paid; which will always create diſcontent. He truſted entirely to a few perſons, and his conduct was liable to juſt exceptions. Some of thoſe, who had the greateſt credit with him, were believed to be engaged in a foreign intereſt; and his paſſing, or rather promoting the act, which opened a correſpondence with France, was conſidered as a deſign to ſettle a commerce there; and upon that his fidelity or his capacity were much queſtioned.

Whilſt things were in this ſituation in Scotland, there were alſo high diſcontents in Ireland, occaſioned by the behaviour of the truſtees for forfeited eſtates. The duke of Ormond was the better received, when he went to that government, becauſe he came after the earl of Rocheſter, till it appeared, that he was in all things governed by him; and that he purſued the meaſures, which that earl had begun to take, of raiſing new diviſions in that kingdom; for, before that time, the only diviſion in Ireland was that of Engliſh, and Iriſh, proteſtants and papiſts. But now an animoſity came to be raiſed there, as in England, between whig and tory. The wiſer ſort of the Engliſh reſolved to oppoſe this all they could, and to proceed with temper and moderation. The parliament was opened at Dublin, on the 21ſt of September, with a ſpeech by the duke to both houſes, importing, 'That it were to be wiſhed, they were in a condition to provide for ſuch fortifications, as would much conduce to the ſafety of the kingdom, and particularly at Limerick, and for building the barracks. But that, which her majeſty expected from the commons at that time, was only, that the public debts be diſcharged, and the revenue made equal to the expence of the government, which was much increaſed by the charge of the barracks; and they were found ſo uſeful, did openly aver, that it was plain to all this houſe, that the nation was ruined in all its concerns both of liberty and trade, by the moſt treacherous artifices of thoſe, who were in the miniſtry." Upon this ſome about the throne ſaid, that theſe expreſſions ought 'to be taken notice of.' To which the ſame member anſwered, "That he heard it murmured about the throne, that his expreſſions ought to be taken notice of; but he defied any body to take notice of them, for they all knew too well, that what he had ſpoken was a certain truth." It was again urged in behalf of the act, "That upon farther enquiry it would be found, that the trade with France was a trade beneficial to the nation, becauſe the French took Scots goods in return for their wines." So that, after a long and angry debate, the act was ordered to be marked a firſt reading.

The 6th of September, the earl of Marchmont deſired leave of the houſe to withdraw an 'act, containing ſome limitations upon the ſucceſſor,' which had been lately preſented by him, but had not yet been read. His deſire being granted, as ſoon as his lordſhip had withdrawn that act, he begged leave to preſent another in its room, which he deſired might be read. This was an act to 'ſettle the ſucceſſion on the houſe of Hanover;' and, as his lordſhip had not ſignified what the import of it was, no body oppoſed his motion for the reading of it; but when the clerk came to that paragraph, where it ſubſtitutes the princeſs Sophia, &c. no ſooner were thoſe words out of his mouth, but the whole houſe was in a flame. Some moved to have the overture burnt; and others to have the earl, who offered it, called to the bar, and others to have him ſent to the caſtle. After the houſe had ſhewed a general diſſatisfaction againſt the thing, at length the chancellor procured ſilence, and the clerk was ordered to read it through; and the earl of Marchmont deſired it might be marked a firſt reading, and was ſeconded by the marquis of Lothian and another member. But they were ſo warmly oppoſed, that there was not a vote demanded; and the earl of Marchmont propoſed only, that the overture might be marked in the minutes, expreſſing the import of it, urging, "That the minutes ought always to record the matter of fact as paſſed in parliament." This was warmly oppoſed by a member, who ſaid, "That though it is both cuſtomary and proper, that every thing, which is moved in the houſe, be marked in the minutes; yet the act now offered by the earl of Marchmont ought to be diſtinguiſhed by ſome particular mark of indignation from this houſe, ſeeing the generality of the members had ſufficiently ſhewn their ſentiments, in relation to the nomination of a ſucceſſor, and had ſo frequently in this ſeſſion declared it to be their opinion, that the nation was at preſent in a very improper ſtate for nominating a ſucceſſor the ſame with England: And therefore the beſt he could ſay, in behalf of this moſt unreaſonable overture, was to move, that it might be buried in oblivion, and not marked in the minutes." Another member ſaid, "That he heard an act offered, which ſeemed to contain ſome things inconſiſtent with the 'act of ſecurity,' which had lately paſſed the vote of the houſe; and it was not unlikely, that the jealouſy, which the members had contracted, that this act of ſettlement was not to receive the royal aſſent, prompted them to find out new acts to ſupply it. That he very plainly foreſaw, that this would promote the jealouſy, which this nation had already contracted againſt their neighbours; and therefore he moved, that the lord chancellor might, as the mouth of the houſe, addreſs her majeſty's repreſentative to give the royal aſſent to that act." This motion was ſeconded by a great many members; and, the earl of Marchmont ſtill inſiſting to have this act marked in the minutes as a privilege naturally due to all overtures, the queſtion was ſtated, whether to mark the overture in the minutes, or not? And it was carried in the negative by fifty-ſeven votes.

On the 9th of September, it was repreſented by a member, "That this parliament had now ſate very long, and, after a vaſt expence of money, time, and pains, had at length paſſed an act for the ſecurity of the nation; and as it would be ſome recompence to the members to ſee that act receive the royal aſſent, ſo it would, no doubt, be very ſatisfactory to the nation. And therefore he begged, that her majeſty's commiſſioner would give the royal aſſent to the act." This was ſeconded by a great many members; and, at length, a motion was made, that the houſe ſhould 'addreſs her majeſty to give the royal aſſent.' Againſt this it was urged, That the parliament had already done their part, by voting the act, and what remained to be done, was the queen's part; and that there was no need for addreſſing, ſeeing it was notified to the queen, that the parliament had voted the act. To this it was anſwered, "That, no doubt, it was made known to her majeſty by her miniſtry, that this act had paſſed the vote of the houſe: But that every body knew very well, that courtiers never fail to repreſent the 'black-ſide' of things; and therefore he concurred in that motion of ſeconding the former vote of the houſe, by a dutiful addreſs to her majeſty." After ſome further debate, and ſeveral warm ſpeeches, it was repreſented by the marquis of Tweedale, that it was ſomewhat too haſty to addreſs her majeſty for her aſſent, until the houſe knew from the commiſſioner, whether he was already inſtructed for that purpoſe; and therefore he begged, that the commiſſioner would declare his intentions. A great many members ſeconded this motion, and preſſed, that the commiſſioner would give the houſe ſo much ſatisfaction, as to let them know, whether or no he was inſtructed to paſs this act. But his grace did not think fit to give any anſwer in the matter. Thereupon another member, Mr. Fletcher of Salton, ſaid, "That he had ſeldom ſeen any benefit from addreſſes, and for that reaſon he was very little concerned, whether this houſe did at preſent addreſs her majeſty, or not. That he thought, that the acts, which the houſe had voted, were but very ſlender fences for the ſecurity of the nation: That the nation's caſe was deſperate, and the proviſions muſt be ſuitable. That he found ſome people were too forward in promoting the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover, and others that of the prince of Wales; and that they were both contented to ſacrifice their own and their nation's liberty, rather than not accompliſh their deſigns. That he did conſider it as a very melancholy proſpect for this nation, that they were not to expect either of thoſe two ſucceſſors, but at the rate of being ſlaves, not to 'their princes,' but to 'their neighbours;' for ſuppoſing, that, upon the one hand, this nation ſhould ſubmit either willingly, or by commiſſion, to the ſucceſſor of England, without ſuch conditions of government within themſelves, as ſhould ſecure them againſt the ſole influence of the Engliſh miniſtry upon their joint prince, in that caſe they were no better than ſlaves: Or, if, on the other hand, the Scots ſhould force their ſucceſſor upon the Engliſh, without ſecuring to themſelves the conditions beforementioned, they muſt ſtill reſolve to be under the ſame dependence, when conquerors, as when conquered. And therefore, that it was abſolutely neceſſary for them to ſettle ſuch conditions of government, as might place them in a reaſonable ſtate of freedom and ſecurity, whoſoever might be the ſucceſſor; and that to this purpoſe he offered an act, which might anſwer thoſe ends." The firſt draught ran thus: "Our ſovereign lady, with the advice and conſent of the eſtates of parliament, ſtatutes and ordains, that, after the deceaſe of her majeſty (whom God long preſerve) and failing heirs of her body, no one ſhall ſucceed to the crown of this realm, that is likewiſe ſucceſſor to the crown of England, but under the limitations following; which, together with the coronation-oath and claim of right, they ſhall ſwear to obſerve: That all places and offices, both civil and military, and all penſions formerly conferred upon our kings, ſhall ever after be given by parliament: That a new parliament ſhall be choſen every Michaelmas head-court, to ſit the 1ſt of November thereafter, and adjourn themſelves from time to time till next Michaelmas; and that they chuſe their own preſident: That a committee of thirty-ſix members, choſen by and out of the whole parliament, without diſtinction of eſtates, ſhall, during the intervals of parliament, under the king, have the adminiſtration of the government, be his council, and accountable to parliament; with power, on extraordinay occaſions, to call the parliament together."

After the act was read, the member ſaid, "That he had not in this act made any nomination of a ſucceſſor: and it was his opinion, that this nation was not, at preſent, in a condition for ſuch a nomination; but ſeeing there was a great zeal amongſt ſome for promoting the ſucceſſion of Hanover, and no leſs among others for promoting that of the prince of Wales; therefore, to

and ſo great an eaſe to the country, that they ought not to be neglected." He aſſured both houſes, "That, ſince the queen had done him the honour to place him in that ſtation, as his duty and gratitude obliged him to ſerve her majeſty with the utmoſt diligence and fidelity; ſo his inclination and intereſt, and the examples of his anceſtors, were indiſpenſable obligations upon him to improve every opportunity, to the advantage and proſperity of this his native country: And that, ſince he had no other deſign, than what they all aimed at, the queen's ſervice, and the good of their country, he only recommended to them, that they might unite and agree in the ſame meaſures, and purſue them with wiſdom and temper." The commons, being returned to their houſe, made choice of Allen Brodrick, the queen's ſollicitor-general, to be their ſpeaker. The firſt thing both houſes went upon was the framing addreſſes, both to the queen and the lord lieutenant, which carried the compliments to the duke of Ormond ſo far, as if no other perſon, beſides himſelf, could have given them the ſettlement, they expected from his government. The truſtees of the forfeited eſtates had raiſed a ſcandal upon the Iriſh nation, as if they deſigned to ſet up an independence upon England; ſo that the commons, in their addreſs to the queen, ſaid, "They could not, but with the deepeſt concern, take notice to her majeſty, that her enemies, by many groundleſs and malicious calumnies, had miſrepreſented them; the ſad and ſevere effects whereof they too ſenſibly felt; and eſpecially, as if they thought themſelves, or deſired to be, independent of the crown of England. That therefore, to vindicate themſelves from ſuch foul and unworthy aſperſions, they declared and acknowledged, that the kingdom of Ireland was annexed and united to the imperial crown of England." The commons, on all occaſions, expreſſed their hatred of the truſtees, and of their proceedings; yet they would not preſume to meddle with any thing they had done purſuant to the act that paſſed in England, inveſting the truſt in them. Accordingly, on the 25th of September, they reſolved, that all the proteſtant freeholders of that kingdom had been falſely and maliciouſly miſrepreſented, traduced, and abuſed, in a repreſentation of them made in a book, intitled, 'The Report of the commiſſioners, appointed to enquire into the Iriſh forfeitures;' in which were theſe words: "And indeed it does appear, that the freeholders of this kingdom, through length of time, and by contracting new friendſhips with the Iriſh, or by interpurchaſing with one another, but chiefly through a general diſlike of the diſpoſitions of the forfeitures, are ſcarce willing to find any perſon guilty of the late rebellion, even upon full evidence." And it appearing to the houſe, that Francis Anneſley, mem-

to ſatisfy both, he had another act ready to offer, but which he need not read, ſeeing it was the very ſame with what was already offered in every circumſtance, excepting only that it had a blank in it for nominating a ſucceſſor. That he moved, that the members might go to work, and paſs this act; and, immediately after that, let each party try their ſtrength, and let the ſtrongeſt carry the nomination, and fill up the blank, according to the mind of the plurality. That thus far he begged leave to declare his opinion, That he had rather concur in the nominating the moſt rigid papiſt with thoſe conditions of government, than the trueſt proteſtant without them.' This motion was ſeconded by ſeveral members; but others urged againſt it, 'That the houſe was now in the middle of an act of trade, which ought to be finiſhed before any other buſineſs.' After ſome debate, and a great many new inſtances to the commiſſioner, to give the royal aſſent to the 'act of ſecurity,' a member ſaid, "That he found this houſe was to get no ſatisfaction from her majeſty's commiſſioner at this time; and it ſeemed, the nation was to expect as little good; and therefore, the next beſt clauſe was to prevent damage as much as poſſible. That it was to be noted, that there were lately ſome meetings betwixt ſome ſubjects of both kingdoms, in which ſeveral matters were agitated, in relation to an union between the two nations. That he ſhould not deſcend to an enquiry into the nature of the powers, by virtue of which the ſubjects of Scotland did meet upon ſuch a treaty. That thoſe things might be ſpoke to in due time; but at preſent he humbly conceived, there were two things worthy the conſideration of this houſe: The one was, that, ſeeing ſuch a treaty had been entered upon by ſome of the ſubjects of this nation, it ſeemed ſtrange, that nothing of that ſort had all this ſeſſion of parliament been laid before this houſe; and therefore he moved, That it be now laid before the houſe, to be conſidered by the members. The other thing was, that, ſeeing there were a great many things to be ſaid in relation to that treaty, which might be more ſeaſonably taken notice of at another time, therefore he moved, that a ſtop might be put to any further proceedings in that matter." This motion was ſeconded by a great many members; and after ſome debate, there was a motion made and acquieſced to without a vote, "That the progreſs, and advances, made in the ſaid treaty, might be laid before the parliament next ſederunt, and declared by a vote of parliament, that the commiſſion granted for the ſaid treaty was determined and extinct; and that there ſhould be no new commiſſion for treating of any union betwixt the kingdoms of Scotland and England, without conſent of parliament." After this was over, a great many members preſſed the commiſſioner to give the royal aſſent to the 'act of ſecurity;' but no anſwer was made from the throne. At length a member ſaid, That, ſeeing ſo much had been ſaid without an anſwer, it was better to leave the commiſſioner to his reflections; that, perhaps, he would be ready to comply againſt next day; and that, therefore, he moved the houſe ſhould proceed to finiſh the act againſt the exportation of wool (which had been marked the firſt reading) and this was accordingly gone upon, put to the vote, and approved.

The next day, September 10, the commiſſioner made the following ſpeech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"It was with great uneaſineſs to me, that I was forced to be ſilent yeſterday, when ſo many did appear earneſt, that I ſhould ſpeak. I have all the inclinations in the world to give you full ſatisfaction; but I thought, that I ought not to be preſſed to give the royal aſſent, or to declare my inſtructions in parliament, which I had made known to many noble and worthy members, beſides the queen's ſervants.

"Now that theſe inſtances are let fall, and that you have proceeded to other buſineſs, to teſtify how willing I am to give you contentment in any thing, that is in my power, I tell you freely, That I have received her majeſty's pleaſure, and am fully impowered to give the royal aſſent to all the acts voted in this ſeſſion, excepting only that act, intitled, 'An act for the ſecurity of the kingdom.' You may eaſily believe, that requires her majeſty's further conſideration. At the ſame time her majeſty expects you will mind your own ſafety, in making neceſſary proviſions for the troops upon the preſent eſtabliſhment; and that you will put the trade and cuſtoms on that foot, that the civil liſt may be ſupported. And I intreat your lordſhips to finiſh theſe as quickly as poſſible, that this ſeſſion may be put to a ſpeedy and happy concluſion."

The commiſſioner having ended his ſpeech, a member ſaid, "That, had it been ſpoke in the beginning of the ſeſſion, it might have ſaved a great deal of labour and expence; for this was plainly to tell the parliament, 'that all their buſineſs was to raiſe a ſubſidy for the army, and cuſtoms for the civil liſt;' and that then the ſeſſion ſhould be happily concluded by an adjournment." This was followed by a debate concerning the queen's negative. It was urged, "That the third act of the firſt ſeſſion of the firſt parliament of king Charles II. (which is the only act, upon which the negative is founded) was only made to obviate a practice, which had been uſurped by the eſtates in the time of the late rebellion, of making laws by their own vote, and promulgating ſuch votes, as having the authority of laws, without the royal aſſent: And therefore by the ſaid act it is declared, 'That the royal aſſent is neceſſary and eſſential to give the force of a law to the vote of the houſe;' but from thence it could not be inferred, that the aſſent could be refuſed to an act offered, and ſolemnly paſſed the houſe; and that, till of late, the negative had never been interpoſed; and that but in very few caſes." After ſome debate, a motion was made to addreſs her majeſty, 'That ſhe would pleaſe to gratify the houſe in giving the royal aſſent to the act:' But the queſtion being put, 'Addreſs or proceed to other buſineſs;' it was carried, 'proceed to other buſineſs,' by twelve voices. After this, Mr. Pringle, who had been ſecretary to the treaty of union, was ordered to lay the minutes of that treaty before the houſe at their next ſitting.

On the 13th of September, it was moved, that, ſeeing the royal aſſent had been refuſed to the 'act of ſecurity,' therefore it was proper to go upon other overtures for the ſecurity of the nation upon the event of the queen's demiſe. Againſt this it was urged, that the houſe had concluded by a late reſolve to go upon overtures for trade: To which it was anſwered, That this laſt reſolve had been entered into, 'after the act of ſecurity' had paſſed the vote of the houſe, and whilſt it was not doubted, that the royal aſſent would be given to it; but that now, the royal aſſent being refuſed, the houſe did naturally recur to the ſtate of their firſt grand reſolve, entered into the 28th day of May. To this it was again replied, that the 'act of ſecurity' was indeed now laid aſide, but perhaps it might afterwards receive the royal aſſent, when her majeſty had farther conſidered of it; and that, beſides this 'act of ſecurity,' there were ſome other very valuable acts paſſed in conſequence of that grand reſolve; ſuch as the act 'ſecuring preſbyterian government,' the 'act ratifying the claim of right, &c.' to which acts the royal aſſent was now promiſed by her majeſty's commiſſioner: and therefore it was high time to go upon ſome further acts for trade. After a long and warm debate, the queſtion being put, 'To proceed either upon the act for limitation or upon overtures for trade?' It was carried for the latter by a majority of eleven voices. This vote being over, the act 'for importing wine' was read, and, the queſtion for approving it being inſiſted on, the marquis of Tweedale ſaid, That ſeeing no arguments could prevail with ſome people to part with this 'ſcandalous and pernicious act,' he thought it was very proper, that all honeſt men, who wiſhed well to the trade of their country and the honour of their queen, ſhould clear themſelves of the leaſt aſſent to it: And therefore, before the act was put to the vote, he entered a proteſtation for himſelf, and in the name of ſuch as ſhould adhere to it, 'That this act allowing the importation of French wines and brandy, ought not to paſs, as being diſhonourable to her majeſty, inconſiſtent with the grand alliance, wherein ſhe was engaged, and prejudicial to the honour, ſafety, intereſt, and trade of this kingdom.' He deſired, that this proteſtation might be marked and inſerted in the records of parliament; and the ſame was adhered to by twenty peers, forty three repreſentatives for ſhires, and twenty-one repreſentatives of boroughs; and then, the clauſe being put to the vote, it was carried in the affirmative. The next day, September 14, a clauſe was offered, 'That no Scots ſhips ſhould trade directly with France now in time of war;' but ſeveral members objecting againſt it, the act was carried by a vote without it.

On the 15th of September, it was urged by a member, 'That this had been a very tedious and expenſive ſeſſion of parliament: That moſt part of it had been employed in adjuſting the 'act of ſecurity' of this nation after her majeſty's deceaſe. That, ſeeing this act of ſecurity was now laid aſide, it was therefore high time for the houſe to employ themſelves in making new conditions. That, there was an act now lying upon the table, offered by Mr. Fletcher, which he moved might be the ſtandard of future deliberations, as that formerly offered by the marquis of Athol had been the foundation of the act of ſecurity.' This motion being ſeconded by many members, the lord treaſurer repreſented, that the parliament had ſat a long time without providing funds for the army, which muſt of neceſſity be ſupported, both for maintaining the peace at home, and for defending the nation againſt invaſions from abroad: That there was an act now upon the table, which had been long before preſented for that purpoſe: And he moved, that it might receive a firſt reading. This was oppoſed by a member, who ſaid, 'That it ſeemed very unſeaſonable to propoſe a ſupply at this time, when the houſe had ſo much to do for the ſecurity of the nation; it being well known, that this parliament ſhould have no time allowed them after the ſupply was granted; though, for his part, he ſaw nobody unwilling to go upon the ſupply in due time, yet he thought it was very little encouragement for the nation to grant a ſupply, when they found themſelves fruſtrated of all their labour and ber of it, and John Trenchard, Henry Lanford, and James Hamilton, were authors of that book; it was reſolved that they had ſcandalouſly and maliciouſly miſrepreſented and traduced the proteſtant freeholders of that kingdom, and endeavoured to create a miſunderſtanding and jealouſy between the people of England and the proteſtants of that kingdom. Upon which Anneſley was expelled the houſe, with this particular mark of diſgrace, that no warrant ſhould be iſſued this ſeſſion to elect a new member for Down Patrick in his room. Hamilton being dead, no queſtion was put about him, and Trenchard was got ſafe into England.

The truſtees haſtily finiſhed their affairs before the meeting of this parliament; and ſome London merchants, underſtanding there were good pennyworths to be had, ſent agents over to Dublin to purchaſe, in a lump, what was left unſold. To do it as a corporation, they examined the powers in the charters of ſeveral companies in London, that they might purchaſe under one, by which the company was impowered to buy lands without ſtint, or, at leaſt, a very large one; ſuch was the charter to the ſword-blade company, erected and incorporated to ſet up that manufacture in Cumberland, or one of the neighbouring counties, for the uſe of the army, on the breaking out of the firſt confederate war. They were enabled to purchaſe lands, to build mills upon the rivers, and to provide for the reception and entertainment of a great number of manufacturers from Germany; which not turning to account, the ſword-cutlers ſold their charter to thoſe London merchants, who purchaſed about twenty thouſand pounds a year of the forfeited eſtates, and ſome of the beſt of thoſe eſtates, for a ſum not much greater than it was ſaid the grantees, or thoſe that held of them, offered without putting the public to a penny charge: And theſe merchants, by the ſtile of 'The Governor and Company, for making the ſword-blades in England, prayed, that heads of a bill might be brought in, for enabling them to take conveyances of lands in Ireland.' But the parliament were ſo little diſpoſed to guaranty the bargains of the truſtees, that their petition was ordered to lie upon the table; and there it lay with others that had no better ſucceſs[f].

The commons expelled Mr. John Aſgill (who was at the ſame time member of the houſe of commons in England) for a ſtrange book he had publiſhed, to prove, out of ſcripture, that a true Chriſtian ought to have ſo great a ſtock of faith as to be tranſlated to heaven without dying. He had, as agent to the forementioned ſword-blade company, offered to lend money to the public in Ireland, at ſix per cent. on condition the parliament would paſs an act to confirm their purchaſe of the forfeited eſtates; but the company diſowned him in that offer, and, being ſummoned to appear before the houſe, to anſwer for his prevaricating with them, he pleaded his privilege as a member of parliament in England. Beſides his expulſion, he was voted incapable of ever ſitting in any parliament in Ireland.

The commons purſued the truſtees of the forfeited eſtates ſtill farther. For, in a repreſentation of the ſtate and grievances of the nation, which they agreed to offer to the queen, they began with complaining, 'That whereas her majeſty's royal predeceſſors, of bleſſed memory, had always had the glory of being kings and queens of a free people, diſtinguiſhed from the reſt of Europe by the eminent privilege of being governed by their own laws, and of enjoying their liberties under the dominion of a ſovereign prince, according to the moſt equal and juſt model of government that ever was framed; yet the conſtitution of that kingdom of Ireland had been of late greatly ſhaken, the lives, liberties, and eſtates of the ſubjects thereof being called in queſtion, and tried in a manner unknown to their anceſtors. That when they conſidered the charge, which the ſubjects of that kingdom had been unneceſſarily put to by the late truſtees for the forfeited eſtates, in defending ſuch their juſt rights and titles, and expence for theſe ſeveral months, and when the whole nation ſaw, that the ſupplies ſerve for no other uſes, but to gratify the avarice of ſome inſatiable miniſters.' This occaſioned a long debate, and many warm ſpeeches, were made in behalf of Mr. Fletcher's act in particular, and on the ſtate of the nation in general; and at length Mr. Fletcher himſelf ſpoke in favour of his own act, entering into the detail of it. Among the many arguments for promoting it, and the good conſequences which would ariſe from it, he urged, 'That it would ſave a great ſum, which was yearly expended by ſuch as went to court to look after places. That this ſum might ſerve for a good ſtock for trade. That by this act the nation would be free from the influence of Engliſh miniſters, by having their own places beſtowed by a Scots parliament. That ſuch an eſtabliſhment would not turn the form of the Scots government into a commonwealth, ſince there are precedents for it in ſome of the moſt abſolute monarchies in the world, particularly China, where all offices are beſtowed by the prince upon recommendation from his ſeveral councils in the ſeveral parts of his kingdoms: Nor would the prerogative be impaired by it, for, as to the prince's concern, it was only changing hands between the advice of an Engliſh miniſtry and that of a Scots parliament. That a Scots parliament muſt know, who are perſons fit for the ſervice of their prince and nation better than Engliſh miniſters, who, through their being unacquainted with the Scottiſmen and Scots affairs, might commit miſtakes hurtful to both nations. That the Engliſh would be gainers by this act, as well as the prince, ſince all the advantage, they had by the preſent eſtabliſhment, was to have the vanity of directing Scots affairs by the humour of a few of their own miniſters, who (as appeared of late) had very much miſtaken the intereſt of England, in ſome directions they gave relating to the Scots affairs. That by theſe means Scotland was impoveriſhed, and rendered incapable of giving that joint aſſiſtance againſt the common enemy which otherwiſe they might, if they were allowed to manage their own trade and buſineſs to the beſt advantage. That theſe difficulties muſt certainly make the nation uneaſy in their preſent condition, and would certainly diſpoſe them to lay hold on any opportunity of amending their condition, though to the ruin of their neighbours.'

The chancellor made an anſwer to this ſpeech, repreſenting the act as having a ſcheme for a commonwealth, and tending to innovate the conſtitution of the monarchy. And then the miniſtry offered a ſtate of a vote for giving a firſt reading either to Mr. Fletcher's act, or to the act of ſubſidy. There were many of the country-party, who had no mind to go to the full extent of Mr. Fletcher's act, but were withal reſolved to go upon the conſideration of overtures for the liberty of the nation. Theſe urged another ſtate of a vote, viz. 'overtures for ſubſidies, or overtures for liberty?' But the miniſtry preſſed the firſt ſtate of the vote. Upon which Mr. Fletcher alledged, 'That he had the honour to offer an act for ſecuring the liberties of the nation againſt Engliſh influences. That it was his opinion that the condition of the nation was ſo far gone into ruin, that the proviſions in this act were abſolutely neceſſary for its relief. That he doubted not to make this appear by reaſons unanſwerable; but that he found ſome people very ready to pervert the meaning of good deſigns: and leſt any ſuch bad handle ſhould be made of an overture, which he had ſincerely deſigned for the good of his country, he begged leave to withdraw his overture:' adding, 'That he ſhould be very ready to go into ſuch overtures, as the wiſdom of the houſe ſhould judge moſt proper for the honour and ſafety of the nation.' Then the other ſtate of the vote was offered, 'overtures for liberty, or overtures for a ſubſidy.' Here the miniſtry were at a loſs, for they knew, that overtures would be carried; and, by Mr. Fletcher's withdrawing his act, they were obliged to look out for another ſtate of a vote. This put them to a conſultation about the throne, during which time the members called from all ſides of the houſe for a vote upon the queſtion, as ſtated, 'Liberty or Subſidy,' and a great many warm expreſſions were thrown out againſt the miniſtry from people of all ranks. After ſome time ſpent in this manner, during which ſeveral uncertain and imperfect overtures of differing ſtates of queſtions were made; the commiſſioner moved from the throne, 'That if the houſe would agree to allow a firſt reading to the ſubſidy act, he did promiſe, that it ſhould not be heard of for three enſuing ſeſſions.' To this a member anſwered, 'That he believed, that thoſe about the throne did not expect, that this overture would take in the houſe: that the import of it was plainly this, that the act for a ſubſidy ſhould get a firſt reading now; then the houſe ſhould have three ſhort ſittings for the 'liberties' of the nation; and the fourth ſhould compleat the ſubſidy; after which the houſe was ſure to be adjourned. But, that he was certain the houſe was better acquainted with the artifices of the miniſtry, than to be miſled by ſuch overtures.' Another member urged, 'That it was now plain the nation was to expect no other return for their expence and toil, than to be put to the charge of a ſubſidy, and to lay down their necks under the yoke of ſlavery, which was prepared for them from that throne.' A third member ſaid, 'That he inſiſted upon having a vote upon the queſtion which had been put. That he found, that, as the liberties were ſuppreſſed, ſo the privileges of parliament were like to be torn from them: but that he would rather venture his life than it ſhould be ſo; and ſhould rather "die a freeman than live a ſlave." Some preſſed for the vote, and particularly the earl of Roxburgh, who added, 'That, if there was no other way of obtaining ſo natural and undeniable a privilege of the parliament, "They would demand it with their ſwords in their hands." Whether or no the commiſſioner had information, that the houſe would adhere to what they propoſed to be done, it is certain, that the foot-guards were ordered to be in readineſs, and that for ſeveral days before, a grand guard was ſet upon the Netherbow Port; and lieutenant-general Ramſey was heard to ſay, in his cups, 'That means would be found to make the parliament calm enough.' However, the commiſſioner, perceiving he ſhould be torn in pieces, if he withſtood the formidable oppoſition he ſaw againſt him, ordered the chancellor to acquaint the houſe, 'That it was yielded the parliament ſhould proceed upon overtures for liberty next ſeſſion.' Upon which aſſurance the members met the next morning, in order to prepare an overture for their purpoſe, which was in ſubſtance as follows: 'That the elective members ſhould be choſen for every ſeat at the Michaelmas head courts: That there ſhould be a parliament held once in two years at leaſt; That the ſhort adjournments 'de die in diem' ſhould be made by the parliaments themſelves as in England: That no officer of the army, cuſtoms, exciſe, or gratuitous penſioner, ſhould ſit as an elective member.' If ſuch an act had received the royal aſſent, the country-party had reſolved on giving a ſupply: but the commiſſioner was not inſtructed to purchaſe at that rate; and, having notice of what paſſed, he called for ſuch acts as he was impowered to paſs, and, having given the royal aſſent to them, made the following ſpeech to the parliament:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"We have now paſſed ſeveral good acts for our religion, liberty, and trade, which I hope will be acceptable to all her majeſty's good ſubjects. I wiſh you had alſo given the ſupplies neceſſary for the maintaining of her majeſty's forces, and preſerving the peace and ſafety of the kingdom. But ſince, I hope, this may yet be done in due time, and that beſides ſome queſtions and difficulties are fallen, that, in all probability, you can have no time to determine; and that withall, it is fit her majeſty ſhould have time to conſider upon ſuch things, that have been laid before her; and that we may know her mind therein more perfectly, a ſhort receſs appears at preſent to be neceſſary, and that this parliament be adjourned for ſome time. And therefore I have ordered my lord chancellor to adjourn this parliament until the 12th of October next.' Which the lord-chancellor did accordingly.

[f] The ſword-blade company ſold their eſtates afterwards to Mr. John Edwards, who had them cheap enough to have made a quick and a good market. Oldmix. II. 308.

as had, after many and expenſive delays, been allowed by the ſaid truſtees, had exceeded in value the current caſh of that kingdom; they had but too great reaſon to believe, that this had been principally occaſioned through falſe and malicious reports and miſrepreſentations made of the proteſtants of that kingdom, by deſigning and ill-meaning men, in order to create a miſunderſtanding between England and Ireland, and to promote beneficial employments for themſelves[s]."

The commons offered the neceſſary ſupplies, and granted 150,000l. to make good the deficiency of the neceſſary branches of the eſtabliſhment, for the ſupport of the government for two years, ending at Michaelmas 1705. But, though the commons granted the ſupplies, they took exceptions to the accounts that were laid before them, and obſerved ſome errors in them. This begot an uneaſineſs in the duke of Ormond; for, though he was generous, and above all ſordid practices, yet, being a man of pleaſure, he was much in the power of thoſe who acted under him, and whoſe integrity was not ſo clear. A committee having been appointed to inſpect the public accounts, they had the thanks of the houſe, for ſaving the kingdom 103,368l. which by miſrepreſentation had been charged as a debt upon the nation, and were ordered to examine what perſons were concerned in repreſenting ſuch a ſum, over and above the funds granted by parliament, and the revenue neceſſary to ſupport the government, and pay the public debts to Michaelmas 1703. The commons likewiſe voted ſeveral penſions amounting to above 17000l. a year, to be unneceſſary branches of the eſtabliſhment, and voted a proviſion for all the half pay officers[t]. They enacted the ſucceſſion of the crown to follow the pattern ſet them by England, in every particular, making it high-treaſon in Ireland, by word or writing, to impeach the ſucceſſion, as limited by ſeveral acts. But the great deſign of the commons was, to break the power of popery, and the intereſt, that the heads of the Iriſh families had among them. To this end they paſſed an act to prevent the growth of popery; and, to make it the more ſolemn, the ſpeaker, attended by the houſe of commons, preſented a bill, on the 23d of November, to the lord-lieutenant, and made a ſpeech on the occaſion to the following effect: "That they looked on this bill to be of ſuch importance to their future well being, that they had begged leave to attend his grace in a body with it, and not ſend it, as in caſes of leſs weight as uſual, by particular members. That the oppoſition conſtantly made in England by the papiſts of Ireland, againſt whatever might tend to the ſecurity of her majeſty's proteſtant ſubjects, induced the commons to lay theſe heads of a bill in this ſolemn manner before his grace. That they thought it now more particularly neceſſary, being well informed, and fully convinced, that great ſums of money had been lately raiſed among them, to oppoſe the paſſing a bill of this nature in England; yet they doubted not, but the weight of the thing, and juſtice of their deſires, would be ſo effectually laid before her majeſty by his grace, that all obſtacles would be ſurmounted, and an opportunity given them of aſſenting to the paſſing into law, what they conceived would be the greateſt ſecurity to the proteſtant religion and intereſt there[u]."

This 'bill to prevent the growth of popery' was ſomewhat like that, which had paſſed in England three years before, but with ſome more effectual clauſes, for the want of which no advantage had been received in England from that act. The main difference was that, which made it look leſs invidious, and yet was more effectual for breaking the dependence on the heads of families: For it was provided, that all eſtates ſhould be equally divided among the children of papiſts, notwithſtanding any ſettlements to the contrary, unleſs the perſons, on whom they were ſettled, qualified themſelves by taking the oaths, and coming to the communion of the church. This ſeemed to carry no hardſhip to the family in general, and yet gave hopes of weakening that intereſt ſo conſiderably, that the bill was thus ſolemnly offered to the duke of Ormond. Accordingly it was ſent over to England warmly recommended by him; but was as warmly oppoſed by thoſe, who had a mind to have a ſhare in the preſents, that were ready to be made by the papiſts, who had raiſed a conſiderable ſum for that purpoſe. The pretence for oppoſing it was, that, while the queen was ſo deeply engaged with the emperor, and was interceding for ſome favour to the proteſtants in his dominions, it ſeemed not ſeaſonable, and was ſcarce decent, to paſs ſo ſevere a law againſt thoſe of his religion. This pretence had the leſs ſtrength, ſince it was very evident, that all the Iriſh papiſts were in the French intereſt, and therefore there was no reaſon to apprehend, that the emperor would be much concerned for them. The parliament of England was ſitting, when this bill came over, and people were intent upon the iſſue of it, ſo that the miniſters judged it was not ſafe to deny it; but a clauſe was added, which they hoped would hinder its being accepted in Ireland. That matter was carried ſo ſecretly, that it was known to none, but thoſe who were at the council, till the news of it came from Ireland upon its being ſent thither. The clauſe was to this purpoſe, that none in Ireland ſhould be capable of any employment, or of being in the magiſtracy in any city, who did not qualify themſelves by receiving the ſacrament according to the teſt-act paſſed in England; which before this time had never been offered to the Iriſh nation. It was hoped, that, on account of this clauſe, thoſe in Ireland, who promoted it moſt, would now be the leſs fond of it, when they found it thus clogged.

[s] The reſt of the repreſentation was as follows:

"For, although her majeſty had been graciouſly pleaſed to aſſure them, that nothing of that kind had made any impreſſion on her majeſty to their prejudice, yet they were very ſenſible, that that nation had exceedingly ſuffered thereby in the opinion of England. That they could not, without the greateſt grief of heart, reflect upon the great decay and loſs of their trade. That the kingdom being almoſt exhauſted of its caſh, and themſelves hindered from earning their livelihood, and from maintaining their own manufacturies, their poor were thereby become very numerous, eſpecially the induſtrious proteſtants, who, in a country, wherein the number and power of the papiſts is very formidable, ought, as they humbly conceived, to be encouraged. That very many proteſtant families had been conſtrained to remove out of that kingdom, as well into Scotland, as to the dominions of foreign princes and ſtates. That their foreign trade, and its returns, were under ſuch reſtrictions and diſcouragements, as now to become in a manner unprofitable, although that kingdom had of late, by its blood and treaſure, contributed to ſave the plantation trade to the people of England. That the want of holding frequent parliaments in Ireland had been a great encouragement to evil-minded men, who intended nothing but their own gain, though accompanied with the ruin and oppreſſion of her majeſty's good ſubjects. That many civil officers were arrived at ſuch a pitch of corruption, through hopes of impunity, as was almoſt inſupportable, thereby getting vaſt eſtates in a ſhort time in a poor country: That others, in conſiderable employments, dwelt and reſided for the moſt part out of the kingdom, thereby neglecting the perſonal attendance on their duty, whilſt, in the mean time, their offices, (which in effect were made mere 'ſine cures') were but indifferently executed, to the great detriment of her majeſty's good ſubjects, and the great failure of juſtice; ſo that they were fully convinced that nothing but frequent parliaments, with permiſſion for them to ſit, and do the buſineſs of the nation, could prevent, or reform ſo great and notorious abuſes. That they offered to her majeſty's princely conſideration this their moſt humble repreſentation, with hearts full of a ſenſe of their miſerable condition, yet ſupported with the hopes they had from the auſpicious reign of her moſt ſacred majeſty; not doubting her majeſty's care and protection of them. For it was from her majeſty's gracious interpoſition alone in their favour, that they propoſed to themſelves relief from theſe their manifold groans and misfortunes. And that they could not deſpair of her goodneſs extended towards them in ſuch a prudent and gracious manner, as might afford them relief, according to the exigences of their condition, by reſtoring them to a full enjoyment of their conſtitution, or by promoting a more firm and ſtrict union with her majeſty's ſubjects of England; which would be to the advantage of that kingdom, nothing being a more certain truth, than that whatever riches Ireland can acquire, muſt at laſt neceſſarily center in the ſeat of the government." Concluding with theſe wiſhes: "May the choiceſt bleſſings of the great creator and preſerver of all things conſtantly attend your moſt ſacred majeſty: May you long continue to be the choiceſt bleſſing of your people, and the aſſerter of the liberties of Europe; And may we, your poor ſubjects of Ireland, be an eminent inſtance of your majeſty's having a juſt right to that moſt glorious title, that we may heartily join with the reſt of mankind in proclaiming, that your moſt excellent majeſty is not only the greateſt, but the beſt and juſteſt prince, that ever reigned."

On the 25th of October, Mr. Southwell, ſecretary of ſtate, acquainted the houſe of commons, "That their repreſentation was a matter of the higheſt conſequence; and that his grace would take ſuch care of it as might moſt conduce to the ſervice of the nation."

[t] The firſt penſion taken off was 1200l. a year to the preſbyterian miniſters of Ulſter granted by patent from king Charles II. for their loyalty and good ſervices to the crown. Among the reſt was a penſion of 500l. to the counteſs of Dorcheſter, king James IId's miſtreſs; another of 1600l. during the life of the earl of Rocheſter, to George Rodney Bridges; to the duke of St. Albans one of 800l. and to the lord St. Albans another of 1642l. moſt of the others had been granted to papiſts, probably in conſideration of ſome demands upon the grants of their eſtates. Among the penſions was reckoned that of the half-pay officers of 3814l. who were to be otherwiſe provided for. The whole of the penſions voted unneceſſary, amounted to juſt 17634l. and one half-penny a year.

[u] At the ſame time was preſented alſo a bill, to encourage the linen-manufacture, with an addreſs to the queen: Upon which bill the ſpeaker added, "That they had alſo framed and agreed to heads of a 'bill for the improvement of the linen-manufacture,' which they conceived might in time become uſeful to that kingdom, if liberty ſhould be given them to tranſport the linen manufactures thereof directly to the plantations, but would otherwiſe be deſtructive to the ſame. That, to obtain ſuch liberty, they had framed an humble addreſs to her majeſty, and relied on her great goodneſs to, and care of, her diſtreſſed people of that kingdom, that her majeſty would be pleaſed graciouſly to interpoſe in their favour with the parliament of England, that ſuch freedom might be allowed them, as one of the encouragements they had been induced to believe they ſhould have on their going into the linen trade, by the addreſs of the lords and commons of England." Which addreſs they prayed his grace to lay before her majeſty. Thereupon the lord lieutenant aſſured them, "That he would take care to tranſmit theſe two bills, which were ſo much for the intereſt of the nation, and recommend them in the moſt effectual manner, according to their deſire, and do all that was in his power to prevent the growth of popery."

Beſides

The greateſt part of Ulſter was poſſeſſed by the Scots, who adhered ſtiffly to their firſt education in Scotland; and they were ſo united in that way, that it was believed they could not find a ſufficient number of men, who would qualify themſelves, purſuant to this clauſe, to maintain the order and juſtice of the country. Yet, upon this occaſion, the Iriſh parliament proceeded with great caution and wiſdom: They reckoned, that this act, ſo far as it related to papiſts, would have a certain and great effect for their common ſecurity; and that, when it was once paſſed, it would never be repealed; whereas, if great inconveniencies did ariſe to the proteſtant diſſenters upon this new clauſe, it would be an eaſier thing to obtain a repeal of it in a ſubſequent parliament, either of England or Ireland. The act was therefore paſſed, and thoſe, who thought they had managed the matter with a maſter-piece of cunning, were outwitted by an Iriſh parliament. However this artifice, and ſome other things in the duke of Ormond's conduct, put them into ſuch an ill humour, that the ſupply was clogged and leſſened by many clauſes added to it.

On the 26th of November, the Iriſh houſe of commons voted a book, printed and publiſhed by Brocas and Maloane, entitled, 'The Memoirs of the late King James II. &c.' ſeditious, and ordered it to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, and Brocas the printer, Maloane the bookſeller, and one Euſtace, (who brought theſe memoirs from England, and gave them to Maloane to print) to be proſecuted. It is remarkable, that, when the motion was made for burning the book, and proſecuting the printer, a member repreſented the great danger the proteſtants were in, in ſome parts of Ireland, particularly the county of Limerick, where the Iriſh were beginning to form themſelves into bodies, and to plunder the proteſtants of their arms and money; adding, that the diſaffected there held a correſpondence with thoſe in England, and were not out of hopes of reſtoring the pretended prince of Wales. Whereupon the houſe reſolved, 'That it appeared to them, that the papiſts of that kingdom ſtill retained hopes of the coming in of the perſon, who went by the name of the prince of Wales, in the life-time of the late king James, and now by the name of James III.' But the ſame day Mr. ſecretary Southwell, by command of the lord-lieutenant, acquainted the houſe, that it was his grace's pleaſure, that they ſhould adjourn till the 11th of January following, which was accordingly done[w]. By this ſudden adjournment, when the houſe was exerting itſelf with great zeal againſt popery, the ſeſſion ended in ſo much heat, that it was thought the parliament would meet no more, if the duke of Ormond (who was ſeverely reflected upon) was continued in the government.

Thus the parts of the government that were thought the moſt eaſily managed, Scotland and Ireland, had of late been put into ſo much diſorder, that it might prove no eaſy work to ſet them again in order. The government was every where going, as it were, out of joint: its nerves and ſtrength ſeemed to be much ſlackened. The truſting and employing, not only violent tories, but even known jacobites, as it brought a weakneſs on the management, ſo it raiſed a jealouſy, that could not be eaſily cured. Stories were confidently vented, and by ſome eaſily believed, that the queen was convinced of the wrong done her pretended brother, and that ſhe was willing to put affairs into the hands of perſons, who favoured his ſucceſſion. It was alſo obſerved, that our court kept too cold civilities with the houſe of Hanover, and did nothing that was tender or cordial looking that way: Nor were any employed, who had expreſſed a particular zeal for their intereſts. Theſe things gave great jealouſy; and all that was ſaid in excuſe for truſting ſuch perſons, was, that it was fit once to try if good uſage could ſoften them, and bring them entirely into the queen's intereſts; and aſſurances were given, that if, upon a trial, the effect hoped for did not follow, they ſhould be again diſmiſſed.

It is time now to turn to the operations of the war. The affairs at ſea this year were ill-deſigned, and worſe executed. The making prince George our lord high-admiral proved, in many inſtances, very unhappy to the nation: Men of bad deſigns impoſed on him, he underſtood thoſe matters very little, and they ſheltered themſelves under his name, to which a great ſubmiſſion was paid; but the complaints roſe the higher for that. Our main fleet was ready to go out in May, but the Dutch fleet was not yet come over; ſo Rooke was ſent out to alarm the coaſt of France; he lingered long in port, pretending ill health; upon that Churchill was ſent to command the fleet; but Rooke's health returned happily for him, or he thought fit to lay aſide that pretence, and went to ſea, where he continued a month; but in ſuch a ſtation, as if his deſign had been to keep far from meeting the French fleet, which ſailed out at that time; and to do the enemy no harm, not ſo much as to diſturb their quiet, by coming near their coaſt: at laſt he returned, without having attempted any thing.

In March 1702-3, vice-admiral Graydon, a man brutal in his way, and not well affected to the preſent ſtate of affairs, was ſent to the Weſt-Indies with a ſquadron of men of war, conſiſting of the Reſolution, the Mountague, Nonſuch, and Blackwall, and ſeveral tranſports, with brigadier Columbine's regiment, ſome ſtore-ſhips and merchant-men. The deſign was to gather all the forces, that were ſcattered throughout the plantations, and with that ſtrength to take Placentia, and drive the French out of the Newfoundland trade. But the ſecret of this was ſo ill kept, that it was commonly talked of before he ſailed; and the French had timely notice of it, and ſent a greater force to defend the place, than he could bring together to attack it. He ſet ſail from Plymouth, on the 13th of March, and, five days after, met with four French men of war under monſieur du Caſſe, ſailing towards Breſt, and viſibly foul, and in no condition to make any reſiſtance. Captain Cleland, who commanded the Mountague, engaged the ſternmoſt for ſome time; but, upon his firſt firing, the vice-admiral made a ſignal to call him off, 'being under orders not to loſe any time in this paſſage by chacing or ſpeaking with any ſhips whatſoever, the contrary winds having kept him in Plymouth much longer than was intended, and the ſervice, upon which he was bound, very much requiring his preſence, and the regiment, that was with him.' Upon this the French men of war got ſafe into Breſt. They were afterwards known to be monſieur du Caſſe's ſquadron, which had eſcaped Benbow, about ſeven months before, and was now bringing home treaſure from Carthagena and other parts of the Weſt-Indies, reported to be four millions of pieces of eight. But, though by this means a rich booty was loſt, yet ſo careful was the prince of Denmark's council to excuſe every thing done by a man of war of their own party, that they ordered an advertiſement to be inſerted in the Gazette, to juſtify Graydon; in which it was declared, that in purſuance of his orders, he had not engaged the French ſquadron. The orders were indeed ſtrangely given; but the admirals had never thought themſelves ſo limited by them, but that, upon great occaſions, they might ſtretch beyond their private inſtructions, eſpecially where the advantage was viſible, as it was in this caſe; for, ſince they were out of the way of new orders, and new occaſions might happen, which could not be known when their orders were given, the nature of the ſervice ſeemed to give them a greater liberty, than was fit to be allowed in the land-ſervice. When the vice-admiral came to the plantations, he acted in ſo ſavage a manner, as if he had been ſent rather to terrify than to protect them. When he had drawn the forces together, that were in the plantations, he went to attack Placentia; but he found it ſo well defended, that he did not think fit ſo much as to make any attempt upon it. Thus this expedition ended very inglorioufly, and many complaints of Graydon's conduct were ſent after him.

After ſir George Rooke's fruitleſs cruize, it was reſolved to ſend a ſtrong fleet into the Mediterranean. This fleet was not ready till the end of June, and the orders were to come out of the Streights by the end of September. Every thing was ſo ill laid in this expedition, as if it had been intended that nothing ſhould be done by it, beſides the convoying our merchant ſhips, which did not require the fourth part of ſuch a force. Sir Cloudeſly Shovel was to command, who, when he ſaw his inſtructions, repreſented to the miniſtry, that nothing could be expected from this voyage. However, he was ordered to go, and he obeyed his orders. He ſailed from St. Helen's the 1ſt of July, with a fleet of thirty-five Engliſh, and ſeventeen Dutch men of war. He had under him the vice-admirals, Fairborne of the red, and Lake of the blue, and rear admiral Byng, of the red. The Dutch were commanded by admiral Allemonde, with two other flags. They had a great number of merchant-ſhips of both nations under their convoy. The fleet appearing off Liſbon-Rock, the 24th of July, diſpelled the fears of the Portugueſe, of being inſulted by a French ſquadron. Sir Cloudeſly Shovel ſent ſir Stafford Fairborne to Liſbon, with compliments to the king of Portugal and the queen-dowager of England, by whom he was received with great marks of reſpect and eſteem. After the fleet got through the Streights, on the 12th of Auguſt, and water began to be wanted, the admiral having ſtretched over from Cape de Gat, to Cape Hone, in Barbary, ſent a boat, with a flag of truce, to acquaint the Moors with his deſign of watering there; but they anſwered his meſſage with a muſket ſhot, killed one of the boat's-crew, and mortally wounded the lieutenant of the Tartar, who commanded the boat, and died two days after. The want of water daily increaſing, it was reſolved in a council of war to put into Altea on the coaſt of Valentia in Spain. The Eagle, commanded by the lord Archibald Hamilton, and the Hampton Court, were ſent before: But the governor fired upon them with two guns planted on a tower, which, however, were ſoon diſmounted by theſe two men of war. In the mean time, the whole fleet came in ſight of the place, on the 31ſt of Auguſt, and the Flamborough was ſent cloſe to the ſhore to cover the deſcent of the regiments of marines, who, to the number of two thouſand five hundred men, landed under brigadier Seymour without any manner of confuſion, and were drawn up in order upon the ſhore, before half the fleet was come to their anchors. Theſe land-forces formed a camp near the place, and a meſſage was ſent to the governor, that they did not come as enemies, but friends; to which he anſwered, 'That he had a great eſteem for the Engliſh; but, however, he was ſorry, he was not in a condition to oppoſe their landing: That he would write to the viceroy of Valentia, and if his orders were ſuch, the admiral muſt not take it ill, if he ſhould fire upon his men.' At the ſame time the admirals Shovel and Allemonde, cauſed, in their names a ſhort manifeſto to be publiſhed and diſperſed among the Spaniards, containing in ſubſtance, 'That, purſuant to the orders of her majeſty of Great Britain and the States General, they did not deſign to give the leaſt diſturbance to the good ſubjects of Spain, but to protect ſuch of them, who, remembering their ancient obligations to the houſe of Auſtria, ſhould ſwear allegiance to their lawful monarch, the archduke Charles, and endeavour to throw off the yoke of France. And, as they would give their aſſiſtance to theſe of the Spaniſh nation, that ſhould regard their duty and true intereſt; ſo they ſhould deſtroy the perſons, houſes, and goods of ſuch, as ſhould oppoſe the efforts, which ſhould be made for the deliverance of that valiant and glorious nation from the tyranny and oppreſſion of France.' This manifeſto had no other effect but that the Spaniards, ſeeing no injury was offered them, brought plenty of all refreſhments and proviſions, for which they were paid in ready money. They profeſſed a great hatred to the French, appeared very well diſpoſed to the houſe of Auſtria, and drank to the proſperity of the archduke. The fleet being watered, ſailed, on the 3d of September, for Leghorn, where they arrived on the 19th. Ten days before, captain Jumper, with the Lenox, Ipſwich, Hampſhire, and Dover, ſailed off Formontera, with the Turkey fleet under his convoy. As one deſign of this expedition was to endeavour to give ſome relief to the Cevennois, who, the laſt year, had raiſed an inſurrection in France, it will be proper to inſert here a brief account of that affair.

The Cevennois, or inhabitants of the Cevennes, a mountainous country in the ſouth part of Languedoc in France, were moſtly of the reformed religion, before the general perſecution in the year 1685, to the violence of which they were obliged to yield; but moſt of them had ſince thrown off the yoke of popery, and returned to their former faith, by means of ſome zealous miniſters; who, notwithſtanding the danger, to which they expoſed themſelves, had conſtantly preached amongſt them. Their numbers, and the advantageous ſituation of their country, giving the court of France more jealouſy than of all the other proteſtants in the kingdom, care was taken to curb and oppoſe them more than any of the reſt, and, by continual vexations, to put it out of their power to recover their liberty. Monſieur de Baſville, intendant of Languedoc, and count Broglio, commander of the troops in that province, left no means untried to ruin them, by their extortions and military executions. The proteſtants aſſembling often in the woods to perform their religious exerciſes, thoſe two perſecutors poſted troops in ſeveral places, with orders to fire upon all ſuch as they ſhould find in thoſe aſſemblies, and to burn the houſes of thoſe, whom they could not ſeize. By this means a great part of the Cevennois were entirely ruined, and whole villages laid waſte. The abbot of Cheilat, ſub-delegate of the intendant Baſvile, was likewiſe very ſevere againſt thoſe, who attempted to eſcape out of the kingdom for religion, having invented a rack to torment them, which was a beam ſlit in two with vices at each end. Every morning he uſed to ſend for his priſoners, in order to examine them; and, if they refuſed to confeſs what he deſired, he cauſed their legs to be put into the ſlit of the beam, and ſqueezed them till the bones cracked, and tied their toes with ſtrings, and turned them with wheels till they were out of joint. But monſieur Eſprit, one of the preachers among the proteſtants, having heard of theſe cruelties, marched at the head of about ſixty young men to the abbot's houſe, and demanded the priſoners. Upon this ordering the guard to fire upon them, by which two of them were killed, and others wounded, they forced the guard, broke open the priſon, releaſed the priſoners, and, having wounded the abbot in the thigh, as he was making his eſcape out at a window, allowed him a quarter of an hour to prepare for death, then ſhot him dead, and ſet fire to his houſe. This done, they formed a deſign of greater importance, and going through the towns and villages, brandiſhing their ſwords, cried out, 'liberty, liberty;' and, in a little time, drew a great many other young men after them, and formed a body of three or four hundred. The intendant, being informed of what had happened to the abbot of Cheilat, immediately ſent orders for the ſeizing of the rioters; but, the troops, that were commanded upon that ſervice, meeting with oppoſition, the intendant thought this a favourable opportunity to inrich himſelf, by converting to his own uſe the pay of the troops, and quartering them at diſcretion upon the villages, where the murder had been committed; and, to carry on this ſcheme for his own profit the longer, he neglected to acquaint the French court with this inſurrection. The malecontents, having by this means gained time to ſtrengthen themſelves, increaſed to the number of two thouſand, who divided themſelves into four bodies, and became ſo formidable, that they began to make excurſions into the plain, burnt churches, and put to the ſword the popiſh prieſts, and all their former perſecutors, leaving the reſt unmoleſted. Upon this the court of France diſpatched monſieur Julian, infamous for his apoſtacy from the proteſtant religion, with eight regiments, to reduce the malecontents; but, theſe forces not being able to ſtem a torrent, which daily increaſed, marſhal de Montrevel was ſent into Languedoc with an army of ten or twelve thouſand men, and directions to uſe all the methods he ſhould think moſt effectual to quell the inſurrection. The marſhal had not been long in Languedoc, before he publiſhed a declaration, whereby he committed all prieſts, eccleſiaſtics, and churches, to the care of the new converts and communities; and declared, that, if any accident ſhould befall them, the communities ſhould be anſwerable for them, and that they ſhould be burnt and entirely deſtroyed. This impolitic declaration, together with ſeveral ſhocking cruelties exerciſed by that commander, exaſperated the malecontents, and increaſed their numbers, ſo that the French king's troops, after having been ſeveral times defeated, were obliged to keep within the walled towns. The repeated informations of the progreſs of the Cevennois, made the ſovereigns in alliance againſt France attentive to that inſurrection; and the general concern, which the Engliſh nation expreſſed for a people, who fought for the proteſtant cauſe, together with the ſollicitations of the marquis de Miremont, and other eminent French refugees in their favour *, moved the queen, and prince George, to propoſe the relieving of them in council. The earl of Nottingham repreſented the dangerous conſequence of aſſiſting rebels againſt their natural prince; but the reſult of ſeveral conſultations was, that, ſince all ways to relieve the Cevennois were ſhut up by land, the fleet, that was to go into the Mediterranean, under the command of admiral Shovel, ſhould endeavour to carry them a ſupply of arms, ammunition, and money: Which reſolution was no ſooner known, than univerſally applauded. And indeed, though it be neither lawful nor ſafe for princes to encourage inſurrections in one another's dominions; yet this maxim cannot take place in time of war, when any way, by which the enemy can be annoyed, is allowable; nor, in particular, with regard to the French king, who at this very juncture, had armed part of the empire againſt the empire itſelf, and countenanced a deſign of an inſurrection in Scotland, and other ill practices in England, which, in the month of May, were diſcovered, by the ſeizing in Kent of two or three perſons coming from France, and having about them ſeveral letters directed to papiſts and diſaffected perſons.

* Colonel Cavalier in his memoirs of the wars of the Cevennes, p. 172. tells us, that the marquis wrote them a letter, wherein he obſerved, "That the queen being informed of their deplorable condition, was reſolved to ſend them ſome ſuccours, and that he would come himſelf to help them; deſiring them in the mean time to behave themſelves with prudence till his arrival." Upon this they ſent him an account of the ſtate of their affairs, and in a ſhort time after they received a ſecond letter, which confirmed what he had written before; and afterwards ſent them an expreſs, called Fletar, to know what meaſure he could take to come and ſuccour them. Having conferred together, they ſent back the expreſs with all neceſſary inſtructions, who arrived ſafe in England, and gave the queen an exact account of his journey; and they were aſſured by a third letter of ſpeedy relief, which proved very prejudicial to them afterwards: for it was then they were beginning to get ground, and their remiſſneſs gave their enemies time to ſtop their progreſs: I do not pretend, ſays colonel Cavalier, to blame the marquis's ſlowneſs; for I believe it was not his fault, he being much inclined to come and ſuccour us, but, being unexperienced in ſuch affairs, and under a neceſſity of taking advice, it was very difficult for him to know what to reſolve upon. He had perſons about him, who acted with more regard to their own intereſt than the public good. They talked of nothing in the court of France but the great preparations England was making for our aſſiſtance, as if I ſhould deſire a man to take care of himſelf, that I had a mind to kill, and in the mean time bid him not be afraid; that I would do him no hurt. For all the projects of monſieur Miremont were as well known in the court of France as in England; and all this by means of the perſons, whom the marquis had choſen to be his adviſers. This generally happens to princes, who communicate their ſecrets to ſeveral perſons. For the court of France, being well informed of every thing, took ſuch effectual meaſures, that it was impoſſible for us afterwards

The better to ſucceed in the enterprize of relieving the Cevennois, who were alſo called Camiſars, ſeveral French refugees were ſent by land into France, to acquaint them, both with the queen's good intentions, and with the ſignals, which the Engliſh ſhips would make, that they might anſwer them by other ſignals, and concur in the endeavours that ſhould be uſed towards their relief. The only perſon, who had the good fortune, either to penetrate into, or return from the Cevennes, was Mr. David Flatan, who was ſent by the marquis de Miremont. The others were taken at the paſſage of Pont St. Eſprit, and others broke alive upon the wheel, or made gally-ſlaves. Beſides the perſons ſent by land to the Cevennois, there were three other French refugees, Mr. Portales, captain la Billiere, and Mr. Tempie, commiſſioned to go on board the Engliſh fleet, to aſſiſt in this undertaking, and be witneſſes of all that paſſed. The firſt of theſe gentlemen, being ſent for to a council of war of all the Engliſh and Dutch flag-officers, held on board the Triumph, on the 29th of Auguſt, when the fleet was at Altea, wherein, among other things, it was debated, how to put that enterprize in execution, ſir Cloudeſly Shovel told him, "That the ſeaſon being ſo far advanced, and the gulphs of Narbonne and Lyons ſo dangerous, they did not think it prudence to hazard her majeſty's fleet in a coaſt unknown, and which had ever been ſo dreadful to the Engliſh ſeamen, that in order to avoid it, they often choſe to go an hundred leagues out of their way: That he was very ſorry he could not perform himſelf ſo great a ſervice to the brave Cevennois; but that, purſuant to the reſult of their conſultation, he would order two men of war to go upon that attempt, with a good quantity of arms, ammunition, and money; and that, if they had the good fortune to ſpeak with their friends, and to deliver them thoſe things, it would be eaſy for them to concert meaſures with the Cevennois for their farther ſupply and relief." Accordingly, the day Shovel ſailed from Altea, he diſpatched the Pembroke, captain Harris, and the Tartar, captain Cooper, to enter the gulph of Narbonne, having the three refugee gentlemen on board, and two French pilots beſides. The next day they took a French tartane, by the maſter of which they underſtood, that marſhal de Montrevel, having intelligence of their deſign, had already taken the neceſſary meaſures to diſappoint it. The Pembroke and Tartar entered the gulph of Narbonne, and, being come between porte Cette and Pequai, they made the ſignals, as directed from court under the earl of Nottingham's own hand; but, not being anſwered from the ſhore, they did not think it ſafe to continue in that dangerous ſea any longer, and ſo made the beſt of their way to the general rendezvous at Leghorn road, where they arrived, the 23d of September, four days after the fleet [y].

Count Lamberg, the imperial embaſſador at Rome, came on board the admiral in the road of Leghorn, on the 28th of September, and acquainted him with the archduke of Auſtria's having been declared and proclaimed king of Spain at Vienna, by the name of Charles III. on the 12th of that month, N. S. Upon this every ſhip in the Engliſh ſquadron fired fifteen guns, and his catholic majeſty's health was drank. Count Lamberg having ſent a gentleman, with one of ſir Cloudeſly Shovel's ſecretaries, to notify the archduke's acceſſion to the Spaniſh throne to the Dutch admiral Allemonde, was ſomewhat ſurprized, that the imperial miniſter ſhould not pay him a viſit on that account, as he had done the Engliſh admiral. However he ordered all his ſhips to fire alſo fifteen guns ſome hours after, and then count Lamberg went to ſee him on board.

The arrival of the fleet at Leghorn ſeemed to be of great conſequence, and the allies began to take courage; but they were ſoon diſappointed of their hopes, when they underſtood that, by ſir Cloudeſly's orders, he could only ſtay a few days there. Nor was it eaſy to imagine, what the deſign of ſo great an expedition could be, or why ſo much money was thrown away on ſuch a project, which made us deſpiſed by our enemies, while it provoked our friends, who might juſtly think they could not depend upon ſuch an ally, who managed ſo great a force with ſo wretched a conduct, as neither to hurt their enemies, nor protect their friends by it. The fleet, purſuant to orders, ſailed from Leghorn, the 2d of October. On the 6th, the Pembroke, Exeter, Tartar, Flamborough, and one fireſhip, were detached to go to Tunis and Tripoli, to renew the peace with thoſe governments, and thence to proceed to Scandaroon to join captain Jumper. On the 18th, rear-admiral Byng was ſent with another ſquadron to Algiers, to renew the peace with that regency; and, on the 12th, the fleet met with a dreadful ſtorm, but did not ſuffer much damage, by reaſon it did not laſt long. Ten days after, ſir Cloudeſly, with the remainder of the fleet, came into Altea-bay, where ſeveral Spaniards openly declared for Charles III. king of Spain, and offered themſelves to ſerve on board the fleet, which was accepted. Having, on the 27th, paſſed the Streights mouth, the admiral ordered ſir Thomas Hardy, with the Bedford, Somerſet, and Lizard, to Tangier; and, on the 30th, the Dutch parted from the Engliſh, making the beſt of their way home. The ſame day, ſir Cloudeſly ſent five ſhips under the command of ſir Andrew Lake to Liſbon, and thence to Oporto, Vienna, &c. to take under his convoy thoſe merchant-ſhips, which were bound for England: and, having a fair wind, and good weather in his paſſage, arrived in the Downs on the 17th of November. The Orford, Warſpight, and Lichfield, which parted from him ſix days before, met ſoon after with a French man of war of fifty-two guns and five hundred men, coming from Newfoundland, whom they engaged and took, after an obſtinate fight of nine hours.

Theſe fruitleſs as well as expenſive ſea-expeditions were not the only ſubject of complaint, with regard to the fleet. There were many other great complaints, particularly with reſpect to the victualling; many ſeamen were loſt, who, as was ſaid, were poiſoned by ill food; and, though the victuallers were moſt complained of before the fleet went out, yet there was not ſuch care taken to look into it, as a matter of that conſequence deſerved: The merchants did alſo complain, that they were ill ſerved with convoys, and ſo little care had been taken of the Newcaſtle fleet, that the price of coals roſe very high: It was alſo ſaid, that there was not a due care had of our ſeamen, that were taken by the privateers; many of them died by reaſon of their ill uſage, while others, to deliver themſelves from that went into the French ſervice. Thus all our marine affairs were much out of order, and theſe diſorders were charged on thoſe, who had the conduct of them; every thing was unproſperous, and that will always be laid heavily on thoſe, who are in the management of affairs: It is certain, that in the beginning of this reign, all thoſe, who hated the late king and his government, or wards to have any correſpondence with foreign countries, ſo that all our hopes of the fair promiſes, the marquis made us from the queen, vaniſhed after a delay of eighteen months. I believe it was not his fault, as I ſaid before; for, had he been able to fly with ten thouſand men to the place we were in, I am ſure he would have given no quarter to his relation's troop. The truth is, I believe France had then emiſſaries in England, as it uſually has, which put a ſtop to the project of monſieur Miremont, and prevented the queen and her allies from making uſe of ſo favourable an occaſion to ruin France, which might have been effected in leſs than two years; for, being maſters of the ſea, they might eaſily have ſent us ſuccours, at leaſt ſome arms and money. For, had they ſent us but twenty thouſand pounds ſterling, we would ſoon have made up a body of fifty thouſand men. But, as I ſaid before, they looked on this war as a ſudden blaze, which ſoon vaniſhes away, and therefore neglected to ſend us any relief. It is wonderful how we could reſiſt for ſo long a time twenty thouſand men, and two marſhals of France. If the reader will ſeriouſly conſider the advantage the allies had by our war, he will ſoon be perſuaded, that, if the twenty thouſand men, who were ſent directly againſt us, had been employed, either in Italy, Germany, or Spain, they would have put a ſtop to the progreſs of the allies, eſpecially againſt his royal highneſs the duke of Savoy, or in Spain againſt the Portugueſe."

had been diſmiſſed the ſervice by him, were ſought out, and invited into employments; ſo it was not to be expected, that they could be faithful or cordial in the war againſt France. It is time now to turn to the operations at land.

When the ſeſſion of parliament was at an end, the court was wholly taken up with the preparations for the campaign. Juſt as the duke of Marlborough was going abroad, he had a great domeſtic affliction, the loſs of his only ſon, the marquis of Blandford, a graceful perſon, and a very promiſing youth. He died, February 20, 1702-3, at Cambridge, of the ſmall-pox. This, as may be imagined, touched his father very deeply, and delayed his paſſing the ſeas ſome days longer than he had intended. Upon his arrival on the other ſide, the Dutch brought their armies into the field, and it was reſolved to begin the campaign with the ſiege of Bonne. In the mean time all men's eyes were turned towards Bavaria. The court of Vienna had given it out all the winter, that they would bring ſuch a force upon the elector, as would quickly put an end to the war, and ſeize his whole country. But the ſlowneſs of that court appeared on this, as it had done on all other occaſions; for, though they brought two armies into the field, they were not able to deal with the Bavarian forces. On the contrary, the French having promiſed the elector of Bavaria, in whom they repoſed great confidence, ſuch powerful reinforcements, as would effectually break all the meaſures of the Imperial court; marſhal Villars, who lay with an army of thirty thouſand men at Straſburg, had orders to join the elector. He paſſed the Rhine, and inveſted Fort Kehl, over againſt Straſburg [z], which was defended by a numerous garriſon, but not well provided with ammunition and proviſion; ſo that, when, on the 9th of March, the French were preparing for a general ſtorm, the ſieur Enſberg, the governor, deſired to capitulate, and the place was ſurrendered upon honourable terms. In purſuance of the articles, the garriſon, conſiſting of two thouſand four hundred men, were conducted to Philipſburg.

Theſe proceedings alarming the councils of war at Vienna, count Schlick was ordered to enter Bavaria, on the ſide of Saltzſburg with one army, and count Stirum, on the ſide of Newmark, with another. Stirum, having defeated a party of Bavarians, marched on to Newmark [a], where the Bavarian governor, with a garriſon of fourteen hundred men, made a ſhew of ſuſtaining a ſiege; but, the citizens ſeeing count Stirum's batteries ready to play upon them, they mutinied againſt the governor, and obliged him to ſurrender. Upon this, the city of Amberg [b] ſent their deputies to count Stirum, offering whatever he could reaſonably exact from them, provided he would forbear attacking their city. But that general refuſed to accept the regency's offer; and, as ſoon as he had ordered the town to be ſummoned in the emperor's name, he cauſed the place to be inveſted, which ſurrendered after a very ſhort reſiſtance.

On the other hand, count Schlick, having drawn together an army of twenty thouſand men in the Upper Auſtria, broke into the Bavarian lines by way of Saltzburg, defeated the militia that guarded them, and made himſelf maſter of Riedt, and ſeveral other ſmall places. To put a ſtop to theſe proceedings, the elector of Bavaria aſſembled his army near Brenau, and (to deceive count Schlick) reported that he was going to beſiege Paſſau. General Schlick, conſidering the importance of that place, advanced with the greateſt part of his infantry to cover it, leaving his cavalry and all his artillery behind him. The elector, being informed of theſe motions, paſſed over Scarding bridge with twelve thouſand men, and advanced towards the village Iſenbern, where the regiments of Schlick and Hanover were poſted. He attacked them, and drove them to their main body, where they ranged themſelves together in order of battle, reſolving to receive the elector, who, taking the advantage of his ſuperiority, renewed the charge, and, after a bloody engagement, forced them to quit the field of battle, and purſued them as far as the country would permit. Immediately after this, the elector being informed, that the head-quarters of the Saxon troops, with the artillery, were not above two leagues farther, he directly marched towards them and attacked them ſo vigorouſly that they quitted their cannon, and at length were entirely defeated. In this action, the Imperialiſts loſt ſeventeen or eighteen ſtandards, four pieces of heavy cannon, four mortars, and all their ammunition and baggage. The Bavarians, in a few days after, took Newburg on the Inn, by capitulation, and the garriſon was conducted to Paſſau.

Notwithſtanding theſe diſadvantages, general Schlick was reſolved to penetrate into Bavaria; and, having overcome ſome of the enemy's troops that guarded the woods and paſſes near Paſſau, he made himſelf maſter of Wiltzhoven, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the country adjacent. Count Stirum was alſo in motion, and took Vryſtadt, Newſcaſſel, and ſeveral other ſmall places in the Upper Palatinate. The elector obſerving the progreſs of that general, marched with a deſign to make himſelf maſter of Ratiſbon. Upon that, the count encamped between Newmark and Amberg, reſolving to give the elector battle the firſt opportunity. In order to this, he ſent the young prince of Brandenburgh Anſpach with eight hundred horſe, to open the paſs of Wiltz, which was guarded by the Bavarians. He very courageouſly effected the deſign, and diſpoſſeſſed them of a very important poſt; but, being willing to purſue them, he was attacked by the elector in perſon near Burghenfeldt, with a body of four thouſand men, where, after making a glorious reſiſtance for ſome hours, he was at laſt unfortunately wounded by a muſket-ſhot, of which he died the next day, much lamented for his great bravery, and other extraordinary qualifications. The Imperialiſts hereupon thought fit to retreat, which was performed in very good order.

Though the elector of Bavaria gave the moſt ſolemn aſſurances, that he would not moleſt the city and dyet of Ratiſbon [c], yet contrary to all expectations, on the 6th of April, having taken up his quarters in the caſtle of Weiks, very near that city, and poſted his army on both ſides the river Danau, he gave notice by his miniſter to the director of Mentz, that he would have the bridge over the Danube, and the gate, which leads to it, delivered up to him, provided count Stirum's declaration, that he would conform himſelf to the concluſion of the dyet, in not attempting to paſs through the town, did not arrive in twenty-four hours. The next morning the dyet aſſembled, but not immediately complying with his demands, he poſted his army near St. Emeran's gate, where he began to raiſe a battery. The burghers took up arms, planted their cannon upon the ramparts, and put themſelves in a poſture of defence. But, the Bavarians advancing as far as the moat of the town, in order to bombard the place, the cardinal and the other miniſters, thinking it not prudent to ſtay till the utmoſt extremity, deſired, that they might treat with the elector about the bridge the next morning; and, at the ſame time, the burghers were expreſsly forbid to fire a gun upon the Bavarians, ſo that all things were quiet that night. At the time appointed, the magiſtracy ſent ſome of their own number to wait on the elector, but were informed, that he not only demanded poſſeſſion of the bridge, but that two battalions of his men ſhould be admitted into the city, and that he allowed them but three hours to conſider of it. This cauſed an extraordinary debate; but they, imagining that the city was not in a condition to make a long defence, and that they could not obtain any ſeaſonable relief, at laſt agreed, that the bridge and gate ſhould be delivered up to the Bavarians, which was done, on the 8th of April, at night. In return, the elector ſigned an inſtrument, whereby he obliged himſelf effectually to withdraw his battalions, as ſoon as the emperor's ratification of the concluſion of the dyet for the neutrality of the city, and his general's declaration in that matter, ſhould arrive: and, in the mean time, to leave all things in the ſame condition as he found them; and that the public miniſters with their families, ſhould enjoy all poſſible freedom and ſecurity. Having thus ſecured that poſt, he decamped with his army, and marched to oppoſe general Schlick, who, being informed thereof, quitted Wiltthoven, and retired to the woods, expecting a reinforcement of three thouſand Hungarians, who were arrived in the upper Auſtria.

The empire being thus in a declining condition, the French king ſent poſitive orders to the marſhal de Villars to break through the prince Lewis of Baden's lines at Stolhoffen, and [z] Kehl is an important fort in Germany, upon the eaſt-ſide of the Rhine, over againſt Straſburg. It was ſurrendered by the French to the Imperialiſts, by virtue of the treaty of Ryſwick in 1697, and retook by the French this preſent campaign.

[a] Newmark is a city of Germany, in the circle of Bavaria, and territory of Nortgow. It ſtands on the river Saltz, near the confines of Franconia, ſubject to the elector of Bavaria, but taken by the Imperialiſts this preſent campaign. It ſtands twenty-one miles ſouth-eaſt of Nurenburg, and thirty-three north-weſt of Ratiſbon.

[b] Amberg is a fine city of Germany, in the circle and upper palatinate of Bavaria (or Nortgow) ſubject to the elector of Bavaria, but taken by the Imperialiſts this campaign. It ſtands on the river Wills, thirty-two miles eaſt of Aurenburg, and twenty-eight north of Ratiſbon.

[c] Ratiſbon is a very large, rich, and ſtrong city of Germany, in the circle and dukedom of Bavaria. A bithopric under the archbiſhop of Saltzburg; is free and Imperial, famous for the general dyets of the empire; although it was ſeized by the elector of Bavaria this campaign, he loſt it (as well as his own dominions) in 1704, ſoon after the action of Schellenberg near Donawert. It has a very fair ſtone bridge over the Danube, one thouſand and ninety-one feet long, and thirty-two feet broad, ſupported by pillars, and adorned with three towers. Here is alſo a magnificent old cathedral, and ſtately caſtle, where the Imperial dyets are commonly held.

Bonne

join the elector of Bavaria at all events; and count Tallard was likewiſe commanded to reinforce him with his flying camp. Prince Lewis (the beſt part of whoſe army had been called away to the war in Bavaria) foreſeeing the danger he was in, wrote a letter to the States-General, wherein he informed them, that he had neither men nor cannon ſufficient to withſtand ſo numerous an army, or to oppoſe ſo large an artillery, as Villars and Tallard were bringing againſt him. The States, upon this intelligence, immediately ſent him a reinforcement of eight regiments, under the command of major-general Goor; who, marching with all poſſible expedition, reached the lines at the ſame time that Villars appeared before them.

The French attacked the prince with an army more than double his number; but his men, chiefly the Dutch battalions, received them with ſo much courage, that the French were obliged to retreat with great loſs, and bent their march towards Offingen.

Villars, notwithſtanding this unſucceſsful attempt, upon repeated orders reſolved not to abandon the elector, who, after all his advantages, was like to be overpowered with numbers, if not timely relieved. The Black Foreſt was thought impracticable in that wet ſeaſon. This was too much truſted to, ſo that the paſſes were ill guarded; and therefore Villars overcame all difficulties, and at laſt joined the elector near Dutling. Upon this junction count Stirum decamped, in order to march to prince Lewis of Baden; but, being attacked near Schwemmingen, he retired under the cannon of Norlingen.

Whilſt the French ſucceeded thus in Germany, the affairs of the confederates upon the lower Rhine, and in Flanders, were in a more proſperous ſituation. Rhinburg, which had been blocked up by count Lettum, general of the Pruſſian forces, ſurrendered. After this, count Lettum blocked up Guelders; and the duke of Marlborough cauſed Bonne [d] to be inveſted by the Pruſſian and Lunenburg cavalry, under lieutenant-general Bouleau. The next day, general Fagel arrived with the foot; after him, the duke of Marlborough and baron Obdam; and the day following, lieutenant-general Coehorn. The generals, having held a council of war, ordered the town to be attacked in three places; one was againſt the fort on the other ſide of the Rhine, and the other two againſt the city and the outworks, that ſecured it. The firſt of theſe attacks was commanded by general Coehorn; the ſecond by the hereditary prince of Heſſe-Caſſel; and the third by lieutenant-general Fagel. Twelve regiments were ordered to each of theſe attacks, who took their poſts accordingly. On the 3d of May, the trenches were opened in all the three attacks, and the beſiegers continued their approaches with extraordinary diligence and inconſiderable loſs. On the 8th, the batteries being ready, the cannon and mortars played vigorouſly againſt the town and fort; and the ſame day the chain, which held the flying bridge (by means of which the fort communicated with the town) was broke by a cannon ſhot, and the bridge carried away, notwithſtanding the enemy uſed their utmoſt endeavours to ſave it with the loſs of ſeveral men killed and wounded. But, in the evening, a very unhappy accident happened in major-general Dedem's attack, where an hundred and fifty bombs, and as many grenadoes, took fire and were deſtroyed, together with a lieutenant and five workmen. However the batteries at that attack, as well as thoſe at the other two, began to play, on the 9th, in the morning; and, the beſiegers having intelligence that the garriſon of that fort was not numerous, and the battery, which played upon it, making a very wide breach, they reſolved to ſtorm it in the evening, which was executed by four hundred grenadiers, ſupported by four battalions. During this attack, the enemy ſet fire to all the barracks and other buildings, that they might retire into the city by favour of the ſmoke; but moſt of them were ſo cloſely purſued into the ravelin, that they had not time to effect their deſign. Some, who were taken priſoners upon this occaſion, reported, that fifty men remained in a redoubt within the fort; whereupon the beſiegers immediately ſcaled the ramparts, and took that redoubt ſword in hand after a ſhort reſiſtance; moſt of thoſe, who defended it, being killed on the ſpot, and ſeveral made priſoners, as they were endeavouring to eſcape in a boat. The commander of the fort and three other officers were alſo taken priſoners, while on our ſide there were but three ſoldiers killed and five wounded.

The confederates having thus made themſelves maſters of the fort, they ſoon after cauſed a new battery to be erected againſt the town of ſeventy pieces of heavy cannon and eighteen mortars, which began to play, on the 12th, in order to make two breaches, with a deſign to aſſault the place.

On the 13th about noon, the beſieged, with about a thouſand foot, ſupported by all their horſe and dragoons, made a ſally upon general Dedem's attack, who at firſt were put into diſorder; but, after ſome reſiſtance, the enemy were repulſed with the loſs of about an hundred men killed, and as many wounded, beſides a major and three captains taken priſoners; whereas the loſs on the ſide of the confederates did not amount to above half that number. All things being now ready for aſſaulting the firſt counterſcarp on the prince of Heſſe's ſide, in order to made a lodgment, the attack was begun the ſame evening; and the prince, being there in perſon, animated the ſoldiers with ſo much courage and reſolution, that, in leſs than an hour's time, they drove the enemy from their works, and made their lodgment. In this action major-general Tettau, who commanded, was wounded, with ſeven or eight inferior officers, and one hundred and fifty ſoldiers killed and wounded, together with the engineer, who commanded in the works. The next day, May the 14th, the beſiegers made ſuch a terrible fire from their artillery, that, at three in the afternoon, the marquis d'Alegre, the governor, cauſed a parley to be beat, and at ſix the hoſtages were exchanged. The next day, the duke of Marlborough having agreed to the capitulation, it was ſigned and exchanged on the 16th, and three days after the garriſon marched out, and were conducted to Luxemburgh.

Whilſt the greateſt part of the confederate army was employed at Bonne, the French king, reckoning that city would make a longer reſiſtance, ſent orders to the marſhals Boufflers and Villeroy to undertake the ſiege of the town and caſtle of Liege. But the marquis d'Alegre having acquainted thoſe generals, that he could not defend Bonne many days longer, they made a motion towards Maeſtricht, pretending to ſurprize the confederate troops, that were aſſembled there, and to bombard the town. So that, on the 5th of May, they advanced on a ſudden into the neighbourhood of Tongeren with an army of forty thouſand men. The confederates, who were marching with a deſign to have poſted themſelves in that place, were, upon this motion, obliged to retreat with ſpeed under the cannon of Maeſtricht. In the mean time, the enemy fell upon Tongeren [e], where the battalions of Elliot and Portmore were quartered; who, having made a reſiſtance of twenty-eight hours with extraordinary bravery, were forced at laſt to ſurrender at diſcretion. After this, the enemy advanced forwards, with a deſign to have forced the confederate cavalry to repaſs the Maeſe at Nimeguen, and the foot to retire under the outworks of Maeſtricht, and there to have played upon them with their bombs; but, contrary to their expectations, they found the confederate army drawn up in order of battle, under the command of monſieur Overkirk, advantageouſly poſted, and ready to receive them, though they were much ſuperior in number. The two marſhals being fruſtrated in their deſigns, and having made ſeveral motions to no purpoſe, they thought it not proper to attack the confederates, and ſo marched back the ſame way they came to Tongeren, leaving to monſieur Overkirk all the honour of that day.

Soon after the ſurrender of Bonne, the duke of Marlborough returned to the confederate army in the Netherlands, conſiſting of a hundred and thirty ſquadrons, and fifty-nine battalions, and ſet forwards towards Liege, with a deſign, not only to ſecure that place, but to force the enemy to decamp from Tongeren, where they ſeemed to be very advantageouſly poſted. This gave a new face to the affairs of the French army, and altered the plan of their deſigns; for the allies having then a powerful army, being reinforced with the troops, that had formed the ſiege of Bonne, made ſeveral

[d] Bonne is an ancient and very ſtrong city of Germany, in the circle of the lower Rhine, and archbiſhopric of Cologn, anciently Imperial, and now ſubject to this prince, and his uſual ſeat: Taken from the French in the year 1689 but, in the beginning of the preſent war, it ſtood by its elector for the French intereſt; and was reduced by the confederate army this campaign, under the command of the duke of Marlborough. It ſtands on the river Rhine, fourteen miles almoſt South of Cologn, twenty-four ſouth-eaſt of Juliers, fifty-five almoſt north-eaſt of Triers, and ſixty north-weſt of Mentz.

[e] Tongeren is a town of the Low-Countries, in the biſhopric of Liege, and county of Lortz, ſubject to this prince, and poſſeſſed by the confederates in 1702. The French, (after a ſharp engagement) took it this campaign; but ſoon after abandoned it. It was here that the duke of Marlborough joined the army of the States, May 13, 1706, being juſt ten days before the glorious victory of Ramillies; to which the confederates owe the reduction of the Netherlands. It ſtands on the river Jecker, eight miles almoſt weſt of Maeſtricht, and thirteen north-weſt of Liege.

motions, in order to oblige Villeroy to a battle, who conſtantly declined it: So that, on the 25th of May, the duke of Marlborough having paſſed the river Jecker, advanced to Hautin, where the enemy intended to have foraged that morning; but, upon notice of the confederates approach, they marched with great precipitation to Boekwern, not thinking fit to ſtand the hazard of a battle. They likewiſe abandoned Tongeren, after they had blown up the walls and the tower. The duke purſued them with all poſſible diligence, and advanced within half a league of their camp; and although the Jecker parted the two armies, and the enemy had ſecured all the bridges and paſſes of the river, yet they imagined themſelves not ſecure enough, but retreated to Hannuye, ſo that the allies marched to Thys, and there incamped. The French drew up in order of battle, and ſent away their baggage, as if they intended to have come to an engagement; but their courage failed them, and they immediately retired before the confederates.

The duke of Marlborough, finding it impoſſible to bring the French to a battle, took a reſolution to force them in their intrenchments; in order to which baron Spaar was appointed to command ſome troops, that were to act near Steken; and general Coehorn, with another detachment, paſſed over the Scheld, to make an attack near Liefkenſhock; and general Obdam, with the reſt of the army, ſtaid on this ſide the Scheld, to make an attempt on the lines before Antwerp. The French had at that time two flying camps; one commanded by the marquis of Bedmar, and another about Bruges by count de la Motte. Baron Spaar, on the 27th of June, in the morning, perceiving that the count obſerved him diligently, to deceive him, feigned a march towards Bruges; but, returning, advanced directly to the lines, and attacked them in the country of Waes near Steken; where, after a very bloody and obſtinate diſpute, he forced them ſword in hand. Upon this occaſion, twelve hundred men of Baron Spaar's detachment were killed and wounded, among whom were ſeveral officers of diſtinction, particularly two brigadier-generals wounded, and monſieur de Vaſſy, governor of Sas-Van-Ghent, killed. Baron Spaar had alſo a ſlight wound, and his purſe, which had only one piſtole in it, ſaved his thigh. About the ſame time, general Coehorn attacked the enemy's lines at the point of Callo, which were, after a ſhort reſiſtance, forced; the redoubt on the point of St. Anthony was alſo attacked, which the enemy ſeemed at firſt reſolved to defend; but at laſt they ſurrendered at diſcretion.

The forcing of the French lines occaſioned no ſmall joy at the Hague, and in the Confederate army, who imagined, that Antwerp would ſoon fall into their hands. For, on the 28th of June, at two in the morning, the troops commanded by General Obdam broke up, and marched towards Eckeren [f], which was intended for their head-quarters, with a deſign to ſhew themſelves that day before the lines of Antwerp, to alarm the enemy on that ſide, and hinder them from ſending any detachment over the bridge of Antwerp into Flanders. But their expectations ſoon vaniſhed, upon receiving an account from General Obdam from Breda, wherein he acquainted the States-General, that the French had ſurrounded the body of the forces under his command, and, having marched from Lillo to Eckeren, had put them to a total rout; and that himſelf had made his eſcape to Breda with only thirty horſe, and could give no further account of their army. This threw the States into a very great conſternation; they met immediately, and after they had ſate in conſultation till one in the morning, diſpatched away Monſieur Geldermanſen, with two deputies more, with money and inſtructions, to prevent, as much as might be, the ill conſequences of this ſuppoſed diſaſter. But theſe commiſſioners, in their way towards the frontiers, met with a courier diſpatched by monſieur Hop, treaſurer-general to the States, and their deputy in that army, with a letter to the States, which they opened; and, finding in it a quite contrary account, they immediately returned to the Hague. It ſeems, after Obdam's flight, the Dutch rallied again, and maintained their ground with ſuch firmneſs, that the French retired little to their honour; for, though they were much ſuperior in number, yet they let the Dutch recover out of their firſt ſurprize, and keep their ground, though forſaken by their general.

Hop's account was, the next day, confirmed by another letter from count Slangenburg to the States-General; both which agreed, in the main, with a relation printed by the French themſelves at Namur. But though it is certain, that the loſs was pretty equal on both ſides, and amounted to about three thouſand men killed and wounded on each; yet the French king was by his flatterers perſuaded, that his troops had gained the victory; upon which he cauſed Te Deum to be ſung in the cathedral church of Paris. The pretence, which the French had for their triumph, was the flight of general Obdam; to excuſe which, he wrote a letter to the States from Lillo, wherein he acknowledged, "That he made too haſty a judgment upon the imminent danger the whole army was in; and that the enemy, preſſing on with an irreſiſtible ſuperiority, within piſtol-ſhot of the place where he was preſent, and where no ſuccour could come up to inable him to keep his ground, induced him to retire; adding, that he would have reaſſumed the command of the army, and that the generals and other officers made no ſcruple to obey his orders; but that, finding himſelf leſſened in the general eſteem, and looked upon as unworthy to command the forces of the States, he had begged leave of their deputies to go to the Hague for a few days, in order to clear himſelf before their high mightineſſes, from the imputations he lay under." Accordingly, general Obdam arrived at the Hague; and ſhortly after, by command of the States-General, he delivered to them in writing his apology for himſelf, which was much to the ſame purpoſe with his letter, and turned upon this diſtinction, "That he did not what he would have done, but the beſt he could do." On the 12th of Auguſt, ſeveral officers of that army, which was now commanded by Slangenburg, wrote a letter to Obdam, importing, "That underſtanding there was a report in Holland, that ſince the accident, that befel him of being intercepted from the army at the battle of Eckeren, they had ſcrupled to ſerve under his orders, which was far from their thoughts; they therefore took a reſolution to aſſure him, that they ſhould be extremely glad to ſee him at the head of the army again." On the other hand, marſhal Bouffler's conduct, in this action, was likewiſe ſo much cenſured, that it was thought this finiſhed his diſgrace, for he was no more put at the head of the French armies. Nor was the duke of Marlborough without ſome ſhare of cenſure on this occaſion; ſince, it was pretended, that he ought to have ſent a force to ſupport Obdam, or have made an attempt upon Villeroy's army, when it was weakened by the detachment ſent with Boufflers. But whoever was in the fault, the States thought proper to cover the diſgrace with rewards and thanks to the officers and ſoldiers, as well as to general Slangenburg; but, by reaſon of a miſunderſtanding, that aroſe on this occaſion, between the duke of Marlborough and that general, Slangenburg was diſmiſſed, ſome time after, from his attendance on the camp.

The allies, being willing to repair the diſadvantages they ſuſtained in the action at Eckeren, joined all their forces together, with a deſign to come to an engagement with Villeroy, who, incamping near St. Job, gave out, that he reſolved to ſtay there for the duke of Marlborough. The duke and general Overkirk, in expectation of this, marched with the army under their command to Hoogſtraat, about half a league from the enemy's camp, who, to all appearance, made great preparation for a vigorous action. Slangenburg, decamping from Lillo, marched all night, and arrived early in the morning between Eckeren and Capelle to attack them on that ſide; and the duke of Marlborough, with his army, advanced in a great plain over-againſt the enemy, and cauſed four pieces of cannon to be diſcharged for a ſignal to Slangenburg to begin the attack. But, as he advanced, marſhal Villeroy declined the engagement, and, having ſet fire to his camp, ordered his army to retire within their lines. The duke, thus finding it impoſſible to bring the French to an engagement, marched with a conſiderable guard to view the enemy's lines; in which motion a detachment of the Engliſh royal regiment of dragoons happened to fall in with one of the enemy's out-guards of forty horſe, who, after one diſcharge, retired, and were chaced by the Engliſh to the very barrier of their intrenchments; which afforded a very ſeaſonable opportunity to the confederate-generals to have a perfect view of the enemy's lines. From that day the duke of Marlborough laid a ſcheme to force the French lines; and accordingly, after having inveſted Huy [g], he held a grand [f] Eckeren is a village in the Netherlands, in Spaniſh Brabant, in the county of Ryem, at which there was a ſharp and bloody battle between the French and the confederate troops under general Obdam in 1703. It lies ſix miles and a half almoſt eaſt of Lille, four miles north of Antwerp, twenty-three miles ſouth ſouth-weſt of Breda, and ſixteen ſouth ſouth-eaſt of Bergen-Op-Zoom.

[g] Huy is a conſiderable town in the Low Countries, with four churches and a caſtle. It was garriſoned by the French in 1702, and taken by the confederate army under the duke of Marlborough this campaign. It was retaken by the French in 1705, and again repoſſeſſed by the confederates that ſame year, in whoſe hands it now continues. It ſtands on the river Maeſe, fourteen miles almoſt ſouth of Liege, and ſeventeen almoſt north-eaſt of Namur.

Limburg

council of war, where the queſtion in debate was, What would be moſt proper to be done, after Huy ſhould be in their poſſeſſion? The ſiege of Limburg being propoſed, the duke of Marlborough, and ſome other generals, were of opinion, that attacking the enemy's lines between the Mehaigne and the Leuwe might be an enterprize, that would contribute much more to the glory and advantage of the confederate arms. But this propoſal, though ſupported by very ſtrong reaſons, was oppoſed by the deputies of the States and the Dutch generals, who would not conſent to hazard their troops in an action, which, they ſaid, was at beſt very dubious, and, if attended with ſucceſs, would yield no further advantage, than to find the enemy retired into their fortified towns; whereas, on the contrary, ſhould the French get the victory, the United Provinces would remain expoſed to their incurſions. Upon this the project for attacking their lines was laid aſide, and a reſolution taken to proceed to the ſiege of Limburg, as ſoon as Huy ſhould ſurrender. Huy was taken three days after, and Limburg [h] was accordingly inveſted, which the duke of Marlborough took with no loſs, but that of ſo much time as was neceſſary to bring up a train of artillery. For, having made a wide breach, the confederates intended a general ſtorm the next day, which the enemy perceiving, ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war to the number of one thouſand four hundred men. Guelders, which had been blocked up by the Pruſſians, ſurrendered alſo, on the 17th of December.

After the taking theſe places, the duke of Marlborough held daily conſultations, and uſed all poſſible ſtratagems to bring them to a deciſive battle; but they were contented to ſtand upon the defenſive. Thus the Lower Rhine was ſecured, and all that country, called the Coudras, was entirely reduced: This was all that our troops, in conjunction with the Dutch, could do in Flanders: We had the ſuperior army, but what by reaſon of the cautious maxims of the States, what by reaſon of the factions among them, which were riſing very high, between thoſe, who had been of the late king's party, and were now for having a captain-general, and thoſe of the Loveſtein party, who were for governing all by a deputation from the States, no great deſign could be undertaken by an army ſo much diſtracted.

In the upper Rhine matters went much worſe. Villars, after his junction with the elector of Bavaria, lay for ſome time on the Danube, while the elector marched into Tirol, and poſſeſſed himſelf of Inſpruck, the capital of that country. The emperor's forces were ſo broken into ſmall armies, that he had not one good army any where. He had none in Tirol, and all that the prince of Baden could do, was to watch Villars's motion; but he did not venture on attacking him, during this ſeparation. Many blamed his conduct: Some called his courage, and others his fidelity in queſtion; while many excuſed him, ſince his army was both weak, and ill furniſhed in all reſpects. The duke of Vendome had orders to march from the Milaneſe to Tirol, there to join the elector of Bavaria: Upon which junction, the ruin of the houſe of Auſtria would have probably followed: But the boors in Tirol roſe, and attacked the elector with ſo much reſolution, that he was forced to retire out of the country with conſiderable loſs, and was driven out before the duke of Vendome could join him, ſo that he came too late. Vendome ſeemed to have a deſign on Trent, but the boors were now ſo animated with their ſucceſſes, and were ſo conducted and ſupported by officers and troops ſent them by the emperor, that he was forced to return back without being able to effect any thing.

Nothing paſſed this ſummer in Italy: The imperialiſts were too weak, and too ill ſupplied from Germany, to be able to act offenſively: And the miſcarriage of the deſign upon Tirol loſt the French ſo much time, that they undertook nothing, unleſs it were the ſiege of Oſtiglia, in which they failed. The ſtrong fortreſs of Barſello [i], after a long blockade, was forced to capitulate, and, by that means, the French poſſeſſed themſelves of the duke of Modena's country.

The elector of Bavaria having been thus forced to quit his acquiſitions in Tirol, except Kuffſtein, retired into his own country, upon information that general Raventlau had entered it by the way of Paſſau. Irritated at theſe diſgraces, the elector ſent orders to general Santini to make himſelf abſolute maſter of Ratiſbon, which, in great meaſure, was in his poſſeſſion before. After this, to make himſelf amends for his ill ſucceſs in Tirol, he reſolved to ſeize the imperial city of Auſburg [k], but was prevented by prince Lewis of Baden, who, upon information of the elector's deſign, marched with the utmoſt ſpeed, and incamped near the city. Upon which the Bavarians divided themſelves into two bodies, the elector and marſhal Villars marching towards Donawert, and count d'Arco, general of the elector's forces, retreating over the Lech to Friedburg; which place was ſoon after ſurrendered to the imperialiſts.

While theſe things were in agitation, Prince Lewis of Baden ordered count Stirum to paſs the Danube, and endeavour to oblige the elector to quit an advantageous poſt, which he poſſeſſed upon the left. The elector and marſhal Villars, having intelligence of count Stirum's motions, reſolved to attack him; and, to that end, ſent to the marquis d'Uſſon, who was left in the camp at Lavingen, to come forth on a certain ſignal, and fall upon the imperialiſts in the rear, whilſt they charged them both in front and flank. The preliminaries to the action being thus adjuſted, the elector and the marſhal paſſed the Danube at Donawert, and, diſcharging ſix guns, were anſwered with two from the marquis. Count Stirum, who knew the meaning of the ſignal, inſtantly marched and attacked the marquis before the elector and marſhal ſhould come up. And, obſerving that the marquis's horſe were ſeparated from the foot, he advanced with ſome ſelect ſquadrons, and charged the enemy ſo well, that they were entirely broken and defeated, having loſt twenty ſtandards, and ſeveral hundreds ſlain. The marquis d'Uſſon, finding his cavalry totally defeated, marched with his foot with great precipitation to his camp at Lavingen, ſo that all his men were in danger of being either killed or taken priſoners, had not the elector and marſhal come up ſeaſonably, and charged the imperialiſts at the ſame time. General Scuylemberg, commander of the Saxons, ſtood the firſt ſhock with admirable bravery and reſolution; but, a regiment of Bareith giving ground, and the enemy being much ſuperior in number, count Stirum retreated in good order to Nordlingen. The fight continued from ſix in the morning till four in the afternoon, when the French and Bavarians, being no leſs weary of an obſtinate reſiſtance, gave over the combat, and let the imperialiſts march off without much moleſtation, who had loſt in the battle, beſides their cannon and baggage, above twelve thouſand men.

The Imperialiſts, being thus employed in driving the elector of Bavaria out of his dominions, and watching the motions of Villars, count Tallard and the duke of Burgundy projected the ſiege of Old Briſac [l], wherein Vauban, the famous engineer, aſſiſted. Upon the 22d of Auguſt, N. S. at night, the line of circumvallation being finiſhed, the trenches were opened, and the beſieged made a very vigorous defence, though with the loſs of a conſiderable number of men. But, the beſiegers being provided with a train of an hundred pieces of cannon and thirty mortars, with plenty of all other materials, and the confederates not having a ſufficient number of men to attempt the relief of the place, the governor thought fit to ſurrender it after a ſiege of fourteen or fifteen days. For which ſlender defence the governor was condemned by a council of war to be beheaded, and all the other officers, who ſigned the capitulation, were puniſhed.

The duke of Burgundy, having left a numerous garriſon to ſecure this conqueſt, returned triumphantly to Verſailles; and, the emperor's affairs being in a declining condition ſince count Stirum's defeat, Tallard was ordered to beſiege Landau.

[h] Limburg is a ſtrong, but no very large city of the Low Countries, the marquiſate of the dukedom and territory of Limburg, taken by the confederates this campaign, on the behalf of king Charles III. It is ſituated upon a rock, among ſhady woods on the river Weſdret, ſixteen miles ſouth-weſt of Aix la Chapelle, nineteen almoſt eaſt of Liege, forty-three almoſt ſouth-weſt of Cologne, fifty-four north of Luxemburg, and ſeventy almoſt eaſt of Bruſſels.

[i] Barſello is a fortreſs of very good ſtrength, in the duchy of Reggio, and properly ſubject to the duke of Modena. It received a German garriſon in 1701, and ſtands at the conflux of the Lenza and the Po, twenty-eight miles weſt of Mirandola, twenty-eight ſouth-weſt of Mantua, and thirteen north of Reggio.

[k] Auſburg is a large, and one of the moſt celebrated cities of Germany, adorned with magnificent churches, palaces, magazines admirably well provided, and ſeveral excellent hoſpitals. It is famous for ſeveral imperial dyets that are uſually held in it; and it was here, that the preſent king of the Romans was choſen and crowned, Anno 1689. The elector of Bavaria in vain attempted the taking of it, in Auguſt 1703; but made himſelf maſter of it, the latter end of the ſame year. Though he was forced to abandon it, after the glorious battle of Hockſtet, in Auguſt 1704. It ſtands on the river Lech by the borders of Bavaria.

[l] Briſac is a very conſiderable city and caſtle of Germany, and eſteemed one of the ſtrongeſt places in Europe; whether its ſituation upon a high hill be conſidered, or what art has contributed to render it regular. The fortification is a French league in compaſs, the baſtions are filled with earth, faced with brick, and ſecured by a large broad ditch full of water: And, it will require (in time of war) eight or ten thouſand men to defend it. It ſtands on the river Rhine, twenty-ſix miles north of Baſil, and thirty ſouth of Straſburg.

The confederates, knowing of what importance the preſervation of that place would be to the common cauſe, ordered the hereditary prince of Heſſe-Caſſel to attempt the raiſing of the ſiege. He ſet forwards from the Netherlands, and having joined the count of Naſſau Weilburg, general of the Palatine forces, near Spires, within four leagues of Landau, they concerted meaſures for relieving the place. The French, having intelligence of their proceedings, ordered monſieur Pracontal, with a body of ten thouſand men, to follow the prince with all poſſible expedition; and he was ſo diligent in his march, that he joined marſhal Tallard before the confederates had any notice of it. All things being prepared to attack the French in their lines, count Naſſau came riding to the prince of Heſſe's quarters, and told him, that the enemy was very near, marching directly to attack him, and deſired him to command the right wing to their arms. This was very ſurprizing news to the prince, becauſe the count had conſtantly aſſured him, that Tallard was not in a condition to come out of his lines. However he mounted immediately, and, obſerving that the Palatine quarter maſter general had ranged the army in a very diſadvantageous place, where they lay expoſed in flank to the enemy, he diſpatched his aid-de-camp to the count, to deſire him to march ſlowly, that he might join him with his right wing. But, before the meſſenger could return, count Naſſau had engaged the enemy, and at firſt had the advantage; but the enemy, renewing the charge, fell on with ſo much fury on the foot, that they were forced to retire in great diſorder, before the right wing, commanded by the prince of Heſſe, could come up to their relief. By this means, the left wing being in great confuſion, the enemy poured all their force upon the right wing, which was defended for ſome time with a great deal of bravery. But, the defeat of the left having opened a way for the enemy to attack the Heſſian foot in front and flank, they were forced to retreat, after an obſtinate and bloody reſiſtance, which continued from one in the afternoon till night. The prince of Heſſe, during the whole action, performed all that could be expected from a brave and experienced commander, having three horſes killed under him, and ſlew a French officer with his own hand. In this action ſeveral perſons of diſtinction fell on both ſides, particularly monſieur Pracontal, who commanded the French, beſides ſome thouſands of private men. But that, which was the greateſt conſequence of this victory, was the enemy's returning to the camp before Landau, where the count de Frize, governor of the place, deſpairing of any farther relief, ſurrendered that important fortreſs upon the ſame conditions that were granted the year before to monſieur de Melac, the French governor. The enemy valued themſelves very much upon the ſucceſs both of the battle and the ſiege; and count Tallard could not have concluded the campaign with more glory on the French ſide, and with greater diſgrace to the allies, whoſe officers were many of them drinking and celebrating the emperor's birthday at Spires, when the enemy unexpectedly ſurprized them, which unfortunately occaſioned the loſs of the battle, and the ſurrender of the town.

There was nothing more this year very remarkable in Germany, but the taking of Auſburg by the elector of Bavaria, which was inveſted on the 6th of December. During the ſiege, a letter, directed to general Bribrack, the governor, was intercepted. The elector, finding by the contents of it, that the governor was adviſed to take ſuch meaſures, as he ſhould think moſt expedient for the preſervation of the garriſon, and the city from being deſtroyed, but that there was no probability of his being relieved, ſent the letter by the ſame meſſenger from whom he had taken it; and ordered him to let the governor know, that if he did not immediately deliver up the place, he would lay it in aſhes, and put all the garriſon to the ſword. Whereupon a capitulation was agreed on, and they were allowed to march out with four pieces of cannon, and other marks of honour, to be conducted to Nordlingen.

The emperor's misfortunes were not occaſioned alone by the junction of the French and Bavarians, but were heightened by an inſurrection in Hungary, where cardinal Calonitz and Eſterhaſi had the government intruſted chiefly with them. Calonitz was ſo cruel, and the other ſo ravenous, that the Hungarians took advantage of this diſtraction in the emperor's affairs, to run together in great bodies, and in many places, ſetting prince Ragotzki at their head. They demanded, that their grievances ſhould be redreſſed, and their privileges reſtored. They were animated in this by the practices of the French and the elector of Bavaria's agents. Some ſmall aſſiſtance was ſent them by the way of Poland. They were encouraged to enter upon no treaty, but to unite and fortify themſelves; aſſurances being given them, that no peace ſhould be concluded, unleſs they were fully reſtored to all their antient liberties.

The court of Vienna was greatly alarmed at this, fearing it might be ſecretly ſet on by the Turks, though that court gave all poſſible aſſurances, that they would maintain the peace of Carlowitz moſt religiouſly, and that they would in no ſort encourage or aſſiſt the malecontents. A revolution happening in the Ottoman empire, in which a new ſultan was ſet up, raiſed freſh apprehenſions of a breach on that ſide; but the ſultan renewed the aſſurances of maintaining the peace ſo ſolemnly, that all thoſe fears were ſoon diſſipated. There was a great faction at the emperor's court, and among his miniſters; and it did not appear, that he had ſtrength of genius enough to govern them. Count Mansfield was much ſuſpected of being in the intereſts of France. The prince of Baden and prince Eugene both agreed in charging his conduct, though they differed almoſt in every thing elſe; yet Mansfield was ſo poſſeſſed of the emperor's favour and confidence that it was not eaſy to get him aſide. At laſt, he was advanced to an high poſt in the emperor's houſehold, and prince Eugene was made preſident of the council of war.

During theſe proceedings, the French king had diſcovered the duke of Savoy's inclinations to the confederacy. The duke began to ſee his own danger, if the two crowns of France and Spain ſhould come to be united. He ſaw alſo, that, if the French king drove the Imperialiſts out of Italy, and became maſter of the Milaneſe, he muſt lie expoſed to his mercy. His alliance with France was only for one year, which he had renewed from year to year; ſo he offered now to enter into the grand alliance. His leaving the allies, as he did in the former war, ſhewed, that he maintained the character of his family, of changing ſides, as often as he could expect better terms by the new turn; yet his intereſt lay ſo viſibly now on the ſide of the grand alliance, that it was very reaſonable to believe, he was reſolved to adhere firmly to it. And, therefore, all his demands were granted, as will hereafter appear.

The duke, having thus ſecretly agreed to enter into the alliance, did not declare it, but continued ſtill to deny it to the French, that, when the duke of Vendoſme ſhould ſend back his troops at the end of the campaign, he might more ſafely own it. But his deſigns are ſaid to be diſcovered by an intercepted letter. The French had reaſon to ſuſpect a ſecret negotiation, but could not penetrate into it, ſo they took an effectual, though a very fraudulent method to diſcover it, which was told biſhop Burnet ſoon after by the earl of Pembroke. They got the elector of Bavaria to write to him, with all ſeeming ſincerity, and with great ſecrecy, for he ſent it to him by a ſubject of his own, ſo well diſguiſed and directed, that the duke of Savoy was impoſed on by this management. In this letter, the elector complained bitterly of the inſolence and perfidiouſneſs of the French, into whoſe hands he had put himſelf: He ſaid, he ſaw his error now, when it was too late to ſee how he could correct it; yet, if the duke of Savoy, who was almoſt in as bad a ſtate as himſelf, would join with him, ſo that they might act by concert, they might yet not only recover themſelves, but procure a happy peace to all the reſt of Europe. The duke of Savoy, miſtruſting nothing, wrote him a frank anſwer, in which he owned his own deſigns, and encouraged the elector to go on, and offered all offices of friendſhip on his behalf, with the reſt of the allies: The French, who knew by what ways the Savoyard was to return, ſeized him, without ſo much as acquainting the elector with the diſcovery they had made. Upon this, the French king ordered the duke of Vendoſme to ſeize and diſarm the troops of Savoy, (being twenty-two thouſand men) that were in his army; to demand withal the fortreſſes of Vercil, Verjur, and Suſa, and other places; and to inſiſt, that the duke of Savoy ſhould reduce the number of his troops to the eſtabliſhment ſtipulated in the treaty of 1696, that his moſt Chriſtian majeſty might ſecure the communication of his territories with thoſe belonging to the crown of Spain in Italy, and reſtrain the duke of Savoy from giving him any diſturbance. The duke, provoked at theſe demands and inſults, immediately commanded ſeveral French officers, who happened then to be in Turin, and even the French embaſſador himſelf, to be put under confinement. That miniſter, ſurprized at this order, arrogantly told the captain of the guard, who was ſent to ſeize him, "That the duke being in the king his maſter's pay, his majeſty might as lawfully, and of right, not only ſeize his forces, but alſo the perſon of the duke himſelf, for his treachery. That his maſter would alſo be revenged, and not only harraſs him with a foreign war, but raiſe inteſtine broils in the heart of his dominions." Theſe haughty expreſſions being reported by the officer to the duke, duke, he went with him into his anti-chamber, which was crouded with nobility and gentry, and made him repeat theſe inſulting words two or three times. The whole court reſented the affront to that degree, that they unanimouſly promiſed to live and die with their ſovereign. On the other hand, the French king ordered the duke of Vendoſme to invade the frontiers of Savoy, and to ſend the following letter to the duke:

SIR,

"SINCE neither religion, honour, intereſt, alliances, nor even your own hand-writing, are of any force between us, I ſend my couſin, the duke of Vendoſme, at the head of my armies, to make known to you my intentions. He will allow you but four and twenty hours to reſolve what you have to do."

The duke of Savoy remained unmoved by this menacing letter, which he ſoon after anſwered by a manifeſto againſt France. In the mean time he ſent the count de Tarini to Vienna, with the treaty concluded between him and count d'Averſberg, (who was come to Turin incognito for that purpoſe) and, having acknowledged the archduke as king of Spain by the name of Charles III. gave notice of all his proceedings to the queen of Great-Britain and the States of the United-Provinces; and ſoon after ſent envoys into England and Holland, to ſollicit the aſſiſtance of thoſe two main ſupports of the confederacy. Queen Anne, well knowing of what importance the duke might prove towards the reducing the exorbitant power of France, immediately aſſured him of her friendſhip and protection; and, ſoon after, ſent Mr. Hill to Turin, to concert meaſures with him againſt the common enemy. The States, to ſecond the queen's good intentions in favour of the duke, diſpatched Vandermeer to him; and both theſe miniſters ſet out together on their embaſſy.

Count Staremberg, being ſenſible of the diſadvantages, which the duke of Savoy muſt neceſſarily be under at this time, ſent him a detachment of fifteen hundred horſe, commanded by Viſconti: who, notwithſtanding all the diligence and ſecrecy he could uſe in his march, was attacked by a body of the French, under the duke of Vendoſme, in the mountains of St. Sebaſtian; and, after a ſharp engagement, eſcaped with the loſs of his baggage, about a hundred and fifty men, and ſeveral horſes. Soon after Staremberg himſelf (according to the poſitive orders he had received from the Imperial court, to attempt a junction with the duke of Savoy) began his march for Piedmont, with an army of fifteen thouſand men from the Secchia through the enemy's country. This march is, by military men, ſaid to be the beſt laid, and the beſt executed, of any in the whole war: He marched from the Modeneſe, in the worſt ſeaſon of the year, through ways, that, by reaſon of the rains that had fallen, ſeemed impracticable, having, in many places, the French both before and behind him: He broke through all, and, in concluſion, joined the duke of Savoy at Canelli, by which means the duke was ſafe in Piedmont. The French king, perceiving that the breach between him and the duke of Savoy was irreconcileable, reſolved to declare war againſt him, which was accordingly publiſhed on the 4th of December.

Since the beginning of the war, all the confederates had ſollicited the king of Portugal to enter into the grand alliance, as his own intereſt led him, it being evident, that, as ſoon as Spain was once united to the crown of France, he could not hope to continue long in Portugal. The Almirante of Caſtile was believed to be in the intereſts of the houſe of Auſtria; and therefore, to ſend him out of the way, he was appointed to go embaſſador to France. He ſeemed to undertake it, and made the neceſſary preparations; but he ſaw this embaſſy was intended for an exile, and that it put him in the power of his enemies. After he had therefore raiſed what was neceſſary to defray his expences, he ſecretly changed his courſe, and eſcaped with the wealth he had in his hands, to Liſbon, where he entered into ſecret negociations with the king of Portugal and the emperor; and gave great aſſurances of the good diſpoſitions, in which both the people and grandees of Spain were, who were grown weary of their new maſters. The riſk, which he himſelf ran, ſeemed a very full credential. He affirmed, that the new king was deſpiſed, and the French about him univerſally hated; and that the Spaniards would not bear the being made a province, either to France or to the emperor. He therefore propoſed that the emperor and the king of the Romans ſhould renounce all their pretenſions, and transfer them to the archduke, and declare him king of Spain; and that he ſhould be immediately ſent thither; for he aſſured them, that the Spaniards would not revolt from the king, who was in poſſeſſion, till they ſaw another king, who claimed his right; and, in that caſe, they would think they had a right to adhere to the king they liked beſt. The king of Portugal likewiſe demanded an enlargement of his frontiers, and ſome new acceſſions to his crown, which were reaſonable, but could not be ſtipulated but by a king of Spain.

In the treaty, which the emperor had made with king William and the States-General, one article was, that they ſhould be at liberty to poſſeſs themſelves of the dominions, which the crown of Spain had in the Weſt-Indies; and he veſted in them the right, which their arms ſhould give them in theſe acquiſitions. Upon which the king had deſigned to ſend a great fleet, with a land-army, into the bay of Mexico, to ſeize ſome important places there, with a deſign of reſtoring them to the crown of Spain, upon advantageous articles for a free trade, as ſoon as the Spaniards ſhould receive a king of the houſe of Auſtria. This deſign was now laid aſide, and the reaſon, which the miniſters gave for it, was that the Almirante had aſſured them, that, if we poſſeſſed ourſelves of any of the places in the Weſt-Indies, the whole nation would, by that means, become entirely French; they would never believe our promiſes of reſtoring them; and, ſeeing they had no naval power of their own to recover them, they would go into the French intereſt very cordially, as the only way left to recover theſe places. An entire credit was given to the Almirante; upon which queen Anne and the States-General agreed to ſend over a great fleet, with a land-army of twelve thouſand men, together with a great ſupply of money and arms, to Portugal; that king undertaking to have an army of twenty-eight thouſand men ready to join them. In this treaty between the emperor, the queen of Great-Britain, the king of Portugal, and the States-General (which was ſigned at Liſbon, and brought to London on the 24th of May, and of which the ratifications paſſed the great-ſeal on the 14th of July, an incident happened, that had almoſt ſpoiled the whole. The king of Portugal inſiſted on demanding the flag, and the other reſpects to be paid by the Engliſh admiral, when he was in his ports. The earl of Nottingham declared, that it was a diſhonour to England to ſtrike even in another king's ports. This was not demanded of the fleet which was ſent to bring over queen Katherine; ſo that, though Methuen, the Engliſh embaſſador, had agreed to this article, he preſſed the queen not to ratify it. Methuen, in his own juſtification ſaid, that he had conſented to the article, becauſe he ſaw it was inſiſted on ſo much, that no treaty could be concluded, unleſs that point was yielded. The low ſtate of affairs in Portugul in the year 1662, when the protection of England was all they had in view for their preſervation, made ſuch a difference between that and the preſent time, that the one was not to be ſet up for a precedent to govern the other. Beſides, even then, the matter was much conteſted in their councils, though the extremities to which they were reduced, made them yield it. The lord Godolphin looked on this as too inconſiderable to be inſiſted upon; all the affairs of Europe ſeemed to turn upon this treaty, and ſo important a matter ought not to be retarded a day for ſuch punctilios, as a ſalute or ſtriking the flag; and it ſeemed reaſonable, that every ſovereign ſhould claim this acknowledgment, unleſs where it was otherwiſe ſtipulated by expreſs treaties. The laying ſo much weight on ſuch matters greatly heightened jealouſies; and it was ſaid, that the earl of Nottingham and the tories ſeemed to lay hold on every thing, that could obſtruct the progreſs of the war, while the round proceeding of the lord Godolphin reconciled many to him. The queen confirmed the treaty, upon which the court of Vienna was deſired to do their part. But that court proceeded with its ordinary ſlowneſs. The mildeſt cenſure paſſed on theſe delays was, that they proceeded from an unreaſonable affectation of magnificence in the ceremony, which could not be performed ſoon nor eaſily in a poor but haughty court.

It was done at laſt, but ſo late in the year, that the new declared king of Spain could not reach Holland before the end of October[m].

[m] In his journey from Vienna to the Hague, when he came to Duſſeldorp, he was met by the duke of Marlborough, who, in the name of the queen, congratulated him on his acceſſion to the Spaniſh crown. The king, having had notice of the duke's coming, put on a fine rich ſword, with which he preſented his grace in a very obliging manner; for, while they were both in diſcourſe, his majeſty took it from his ſide, and, giving it into the duke's hand with a graceful air, ſaid in French, 'I am not aſhamed to ſay, I am but a poor prince. Je n'ay que la Cape & l'Epée, I have only my cloke, and my ſword; the latter may be of uſe to your grace, and I hope you will not think it the worſe for my wearing it one day.' The king arrived at the Hague the 3d of November.

Doctor

A ſquadron of our fleet under ſir George Rooke (who was appointed to conduct him to Liſbon) was lying there to bring him over, ſuch as uſed to convoy king William, when he croſſed the ſeas. But the miniſters of the king of Spain thought it was not ſtrong enough, pretending that they had advertiſements, that the French had a ſtronger ſquadron in Dunkirk, which might be ſent out to intercept him, ſo that an additional ſtrength was ſent. This loſt ſome time and a fair wind. It had like to have been more fatal, for, about the end of November, the weather grew very boiſterous, and broke out, on the 27th, in the moſt violent ſtorm, both by ſea and land, that had ever been known in the memory of man. The city of London was ſo ſhaken with it, that people were generally afraid of being buried in the ruins of their houſes, ſome of which fell and cruſhed their maſters to death [n]. Great hurt was done in the ſouthern parts of England, little happening in the north, where the ſtorm was not ſo violent. The beſt part of our navy was at that time upon the ſea, which filled all people with great apprehenſions of an irreparable loſs. And indeed, if the ſtorm had not been at its height at full flood and in a ſpring tide, the loſs might have proved fatal to the nation. It was ſo conſiderable, that fourteen or fifteen men of war were caſt away, in which one thouſand five hundred ſeamen periſhed. Few merchantmen were loſt; ſuch as were driven to ſea were ſafe; ſome few only were overſet. Our ſquadron, which was then in the Maeſe, ſuffered but little, and the ſhips were ſoon refitted, and ready to ſail [o]. The parliament being then ſitting, the commons, on this diſmal occaſion, preſented an addreſs to the queen, "expreſſing the great ſenſe the houſe had of the calamity fallen upon the kingdom by the late violent ſtorm, and that they could not ſee any diminution of her majeſty's navy, without making proviſion to repair the ſame: Wherefore they beſought her majeſty, that ſhe would immediately give directions for repairing this loſs, and for building ſuch capital ſhips as her majeſty ſhould think fit; and to aſſure her majeſty, that, at their next meeting, the houſe would effectually make good that expence; and would give diſpatch in raiſing the ſupplies already voted, for making good her majeſty's treaties with the king of Portugal, and all her majeſty's other allies, and would conſider of effectual ways for promoting of trade, for managing her majeſty's navy royal, and for encouraging the ſeamen." The queen's anſwer was ſuitable to the addreſs, and two or three days after was iſſued a proclamation for a general faſt, which was obſerved throughout England on the 19th of January enſuing, with great ſigns of devotion and ſincerity; the terror, the tempeſt had left on the people's minds, contributing much to their affectionate diſcharge of that religious duty.

About the end of December, the king of Spain landed at Portſmouth. The dukes of Somerſet and Marlborough were ſent by the queen to receive him, and bring him to an interview, which was to be at Windſor. Prince George went and met him on the way, and the king was treated with great magnificence. The court was very ſplendid and much thronged. The queen's behaviour towards him was very noble and obliging. The young king charmed all who were preſent. He had a gravity beyond his age tempered with much modeſty. His behaviour was in all points ſo exact, that there was not a circumſtance in his whole deportment, that was liable to cenſure. He paid an extraordinary reſpect to the queen, and yet maintained a due greatneſs in it. He had an art of ſeeming well pleaſed with every thing, without ſo much as ſmiling once all the while he was at court, which was only three days. He ſpoke but little, and all he ſaid was judicious and obliging. All poſſible haſte was made in fitting out the fleet, ſo that he ſet ſail in the beginning of January, and for five days he had a fair wind with good weather; but then the wind changed, and he was driven back to Portſmouth, where he lay above three weeks, and then he had a very proſperous navigation. The forces, which were ordered to go over to his aſſiſtance, were by this time got ready to attend on him, ſo that he ſailed, on the 4th of January, with a great fleet, both of men of war and tranſport ſhips. The fleet was command by ſir George Rooke, and the land forces by the duke of Schomberg, lately made knight of the garter. When they came within ſixty leagues of cape Finiſterre, a violent ſtorm enſued, which ſo damaged the ſhips, that ſir George was forced to return to Spithead. He could not ſail again till the 13th of February, when the wind was ſo favourable, that in ten days the king of Spain happily arrived at Liſbon, where he was received with all the outward expreſſions of joy and welcome, and at an expence, in a vain magnificence, which that court could not well bear; but a national vanity prevailed to carry this too far, by which other things, that were more neceſſary, were neglected. That court was then very melancholy; for the young infanta, whom the king of Spain was to have married, as had been agreed, died a few days before his arrival.

In Poland the ſcene was now more embroiled than ever. There was ſome appearance of peace this ſummer, but it went off in the winter. The old fierce cardinal aſſembled a dyet at Warſaw, wherein it was declared, that their king had broken all their laws. Upon which they, by a formal ſentence, depoſed him, and declared the throne vacant. This was done in concert with the king of Sweden, who lay with his army at ſome diſtance from them in the neighbourhood of Dantzick, which alarmed the citizens extremely. It was believed, that the dyet deſigned to chuſe Sobieſki, the eldeſt ſon of the late king, who then lived at Breſlaw in Sileſia, and, being in the emperor's dominions, he thought himſelf ſafer than he proved to be. The king of Poland retired into Saxony in ſome haſte, which made many conclude, that he reſolved to abandon Poland; but he laid another deſign; which was executed to his mind, though in the ſequel it proved not much to his advantage. Sobieſki and his brother were in a correſpondence with the party in Poland, that oppoſed king Auguſtus; upon which they ought to have looked to their own ſecurity with more precaution. But they ſeemed to apprehend nothing, where they then were, and ſo diverted themſelves at hunting and otherwiſe in their uſual manner. Upon this, ſome perſons, ſent by the king of Poland, took them both priſoners, and brought them to Dreſden, where they were ſafely kept; and all the remonſtrances, which the emperor could make upon ſuch an act of hoſtility, had no effect. This for ſome time broke their meaſures at Warſaw; many forſook them, while the king of Sweden ſeemed implacable in his oppoſition to king Auguſtus, whoſe chief confidence was in the Czar. It was ſuſpected, that the French had a management in this matter; ſince it was certain, that, by the war in Poland, a great part of that force was diverted, which might otherwiſe have been engaged in the common cauſe of the grand alliance.

[n] Dr. Richard Kidder, biſhop of Bath and Wells, and his wife were killed by the fall of part of the epiſcopal palace at Wells. In like manner was killed at Horſeley in Suſſex, the biſhop of London's ſiſter, the lady Penelope Nicholas. The damage in the city of London only was computed at near two millions; and at Briſtol, at about two hundred thouſand pounds.

[o] Sir Cloudeſly Shovel, juſt returned from the Mediterranean, was at anchor in the Gunfleet with two ſecond rate, and ſix third rate men of war, four of which drove from their anchors, and were in the utmoſt danger. One of them, the Aſſociation, on board of which ſir Stafford Fairborne had his flag flying, got into Gottenburgh on the 11th of December. It fared much worſe with the ſhips in the Downs, where rear-admiral Beaumont, whoſe flag was flying in the Mary, periſhed with his own and ſeveral other ſhips.

The liſt of all that were loſt there and elſewhere is as follows:

Vanguard, a ſecond rate, ninety guns, ſix hundred and forty men, loſt in Chatham harbour, no men nor guns aboard.
Northumberland, captain Greenway, a third rate, four hundred and forty-ſix men, ſeventy guns, loſt on the Goodwin-Sands, no men ſaved.
Sterling-Caſtle, captain Johnſon, a third rate, four hundred and forty-ſix men, ſeventy guns, loſt on the Goodwin-Sands, ſixty-three men ſaved, with the captain, three lieutenants, and chaplain.
Reſtoration, captain Emms, a third rate, four hundred and forty ſix men, ſeventy guns, loſt on the Goodwin-Sands, no men ſaved.
Revolution, captain Liſle, a third rate, four hundred and forty-ſix men, ſeventy guns, loſt on the coaſt of Suſſex, all the men ſaved.
Mary, rear-admiral Beaumont, captain Edward Hopſon, a fourth rate, three hundred and forty-ſix men, ſixty-four guns, loſt on the Goodwin-Sands, captain and purſer aſhore, and but one man more ſaved.
York, captain Smith, a fourth rate, three hundred and thirty-two men, ſixty guns, loſt at Harwich, all the men ſaved but four.
Newcaſtle, captain Carter, a fourth rate, two hundred and ſeventy-four men, fifty-four guns, loſt at Spithead, the carpenter and twenty-three men more ſaved.
Reſerve, captain Anderſon, a fourth rate, two hundred and twenty-ſix men, forty-eight guns, loſt at Yarmouth, the captain, ſurgeon, and twenty-one more ſaved.
Litchfield Prize, captain Chamberlain, a fifth rate, a hundred and fifty-five men, thirty-two guns, loſt on the coaſt of Suſſex, all the men ſaved.
Arundel, captain Deering, a fifth rate, a hundred and forty-five men, thirty-two guns, loſt at Briſtol, all the men ſaved.
Mortar bomb-ſhip, captain Raymond, a ſixth rate, fifty-five men, twelve guns, loſt on the Goodwin-Sands, all the men drowned.
Suffolk, hoſpital, captain Watkins, a ſixth rate, eighty men, ten guns, loſt at Briſtol, all the men ſaved.
Eagle, advice boat, captain Boſtock, a ſixth rate, fifty-four men, ten guns, loſt on the coaſt of Suſſex, all the men ſaved.
Veſuvius, fire-ſhip, captain Paddon, a ſixth rate, forty-five men, eight guns, loſt at Spithead, all the men ſaved.
Canterbury ſtore-ſhip, captain Blake, a ſixth rate, forty men, eight guns, loſt at Briſtol, thirteen men ſaved.

Flanders, returned to England, the 30th of October. The queen and prince, having been at the Bath ſeven weeks, came back to Windſor, the 9th of the ſame month.

Thus ſtood affairs both at home and abroad, when a new ſeſſion of parliament was opened by the queen, with the following ſpeech:

" My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I HAVE called you together as ſoon as I thought you could conveniently come out of your countries, that no time might be loſt in making our preparations for carrying on the preſent war, in which I do not doubt of your chearful concurrence, ſince you cannot but be ſenſible, that on the ſucceſs of it depends our own ſafety and happineſs, and that of all Europe.

" I hope I have improved the confidence you repoſed in me, laſt year, to your ſatisfaction, and the advantage of us and our allies, by the treaty with the king of Portugal, and the declaration of the duke of Savoy, which, in great meaſure, may be imputed to the chearfulneſs, with which you ſupported me in this war, and the aſſurance, with which you truſted me in the conduct of it. And we cannot ſufficiently acknowledge the goodneſs of Almighty God, who is pleaſed to afford us ſo fair a proſpect, as we now have, of bringing it to a glorious and ſpeedy concluſion.

" I muſt therefore deſire you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, to grant me ſuch ſupplies, as ſhall be requiſite to defray the neceſſary charge of the war in the next year, with regard not only to all our former engagements, but particularly to our alliance lately made with the king of Portugal, for recovering the monarchy of Spain from the houſe of Auſtria; which treaty, being in itſelf of the higheſt importance imaginable, and requiring all poſſible diſpatch in the execution of it, has neceſſarily occaſioned a great expence, even in this preſent year; though not ſo much as it will require, and for which, I hope, we ſhall be amply recompenſed in the next.

" The ſubſidies, which will now be immediately required for the aſſiſtance of the duke of Savoy, will likewiſe occaſion a farther neceſſary charge.

" I muſt take notice to you, that no particular proviſion was made in the laſt ſeſſion, either for the charge of our preſent expedition to Portugal, or for that of the augmentation of the troops deſired by the States-General; yet the funds given by parliament have held out ſo well, and the produce of the prizes has proved ſo conſiderable, that you will find the public will not be in debt by reaſon of either of theſe additional ſervices.

" I may further obſerve to you, that, though the funds for the civil government are diminiſhed by the war, I have, in conjunction with the States General, contributed out of my own revenue towards ſome public ſervices, and particularly the ſupport of the circle of Swabia, whoſe firm adherence to the intereſt of the allies, under the greateſt preſſures, did very well deſerve our ſeaſonable aſſiſtance. And I ſhall ſtill be careful not to engage myſelf in any unneceſſary expence of my own, that I may have the more to ſpare towards the eaſe of my ſubjects.

" My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I heartily wiſh ſome eaſy and leſs chargeable method could be found out for the ſpeedy and effectual manning of the fleet.

" I muſt alſo recommend to you, to make ſome regulation for preventing the exceſſive price of coals. I have examined this matter, and taken particular care to appoint convoys for that ſervice; but the price has not been in the leaſt abated, notwithſtanding a very conſiderable quantity has been imported ſince that time. This gives great ground of ſuſpicion, there may be a combination of ſome perſons to enrich themſelves by a general oppeſſion of others, and particularly the poor. It will deſerve your conſideration, how to remedy this great inconvenience.

" And, in all your affairs, I muſt recommend as much diſpatch, as the nature of them will admit. This is neceſſary to make our preparations early; on which, in great meaſure, depends the good ſucceſs of all our enterprizes. I want words to expreſs to you my earneſt deſires of ſeeing all my ſubjects in perfect peace and union among themſelves. I have nothing ſo much at heart, as their general welfare and happineſs. Let me therefore deſire you all, that you would carefully avoid any heats or diviſions, that may diſappoint me of that ſatisfaction, and give encouragement to the common enemies of our church and ſtate."

The concluſion of the queen's ſpeech, wherein ſhe ſo ſtrongly recommended peace and union to all her people, was underſtood as an intimation of her deſire, that there ſhould be no further proceeding in the bill againſt occaſional conformity. Addreſſes, full of reſpect, were made to the queen, in return to her ſpeech. The commons, indeed, to the queen's earneſt deſire of union, ſaid only, they would carefully avoid any heats or diviſions, that might give encouragement to the common enemies of the church and ſtate: But the lords, in their addreſſes, expreſſed themſelves more fully, and aſſured her majeſty, in the moſt ſolemn manner, that, purſuant to her moſt earneſt deſire, they would not only avoid, but oppoſe whatever might tend to create any diſquiet or diſſenſion among her ſubjects. However, nothing could lay the heat of a party, which was wrought on by ſome who had deſigns that were to be denied or diſguiſed, till a proper time for owning them ſhould appear. And therefore, notwithſtanding the queen (who had been informed that the occaſional bill had alarmed a great part of her ſubjects, who were otherwiſe well-affected to her government, and no leſs able than zealous to aſſiſt her in carrying on the war) had endeavoured, by the warmeſt expreſſions, to diſſuade the parliament from this meaſure, yet that bill was again revived[p]. As this had been foreſeen by the moderate party,) Dr. Davenant (who now ſeemed to have forſaken his party, by the encouragement, and with the approbation of the lord Hallifax, publiſhed a book, entitled, 'Eſſays upon peace at home and war abroad,' wherein he inforced what her majeſty had lately recommended from the throne; and endeavoured to bring all ſorts of men to lay aſide their heats and animoſities, and to unite in their own defence, againſt the common danger, with deſign to diſſuade the bringing in of the occaſional bill. At the ſame time Sir Humphry Mackworth publiſhed a ſmall treatiſe, 'in defence of the proceedings of the commons in relation to the conformity bill;' which pamphlet, however, contained little beſides the arguments uſed a year before on the ſame ſubject. At length, about a fortnight after the meeting of the parliament, a motion was made in the houſe of commons, for bringing in 'a bill againſt occaſional conformity.' Great oppoſition was made to it; the court was againſt it; but it was carried by a great majority, that ſuch a bill ſhould be brought in. A new draught was accordingly formed. Though it was the ſame in ſubſtance, with the preamble, which was in the former bill, yet in ſeveral things it differed. The preamble againſt 'perſecution for conſcience only,' was now left out. The former bill began with mentioning the 'act of indulgence,' ſaying, That 'that act ought inviolably to be obſerved;' whereas, this takes not the leaſt notice of it. This bill began with mentioning the corporation and teſt-acts, which it ſays, 'manifeſtly intended that all perſons to be admitted into ſuch offices and employments, ſhould be, and always remain conformable to the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed; which acts, it ſays, have been notoriouſly eluded,' &c. And

[p] It is obſervable, that though the queen had been prevailed with to expreſs a deſire, that the parliament would avoid meaſures tending to create diviſions (meaning the occaſional conformity-bill) yet it appears, by the following letter, how much ſhe leaned to the tories, and even to thoſe meaſures ſhe would have diſſuaded them from, and which ſhe only thought unſeaſonable at that time.

Friday Morning.

" I give my dear Mrs. Freeman many thanks for her long letter, and am truly ſenſible of the ſincere kindneſs you expreſs in it; and in return, to eaſe your mind, I muſt tell you, 'Mr. Bromley will be diſappointed, for the prince does not intend to go to the houſe, when the bill of occaſional conformity is brought in;' but, at the ſame time, that I think him very much in the right not to vote in it, I ſhall not have the worſe opinion of any of the lords that are for it; for, though 'I ſhould have been very glad, it had not been brought into the houſe of commons,' becauſe I would not have had any pretence for quarrelling; I cannot help thinking, 'now it is as good as paſt there, it will be better for the ſervice to have it paſs the houſe of lords too.' I muſt own to you, that I never cared to mention any thing on this ſubject to you, becauſe I knew you would not be of my mind; but, ſince you have given me this occaſion, I cannot forbear ſaying, that 'I ſee nothing like perſecution in this bill. You may think it is a notion lord Nottingham has put into my head, but upon my word it is my own thought.' I am in hopes I ſhall have one look before you go to St. Albans, and therefore will ſay no more now, but will anſwer your letter more at large ſome other time; and only promiſe, my dear Mrs. Freeman, faithfully, I will read the book ſhe ſent me, and beg ſhe would never let differences of opinion hinder us from living together, as we uſed to do. Nothing ſhall ever alter your poor, unfortunate, faithful Morley, who will live and die, with all truth and tenderneſs, yours."

in the 'enacting part,' whereas the former bill allowed but four beſides the family where a conventicle was held, this allowed nine, and inflicted no puniſhment, unleſs there were ten or more, beſides the family. The 'penalty' in the former bill was one hundred and five pounds for every day that the perſons concerned continued afterwards in office: But now it was brought down to a forfeiture of fifty pounds. There were alſo ſome other differences. Theſe were artifices, by which it was hoped, upon ſuch ſoftenings, to carry the bill on any terms; and when that point was gained, it would be eaſy afterwards to carry other bills of greater ſeverity. There was now ſuch a diviſion upon this matter, that it was fairly debated in the houſe of commons; whereas before it went there with ſuch a torrent, that no oppoſition to it could be hearkned to. Thoſe, who oppoſed the bill, went chiefly upon the ground, that the bill put the diſſenters in a worſe condition than they were in before; and that it was a breach upon the toleration, which ought not to be made, ſince they had not deſerved it by any ill behaviour of their's, by which it could be pretended, that they had forfeited any of their benefits deſigned by that act. That things of this kind could have no effect, but to imbroil the nation with new diſtractions, and to diſguſt perſons well-affected to the queen, and her government. That it was neceſſary to continue the happy quiet that the nation now enjoyed, eſpecially in this time of war, in which even the ſevereſt of perſecutions made their ſtops, for fear of irritating ill humours too much. The old topics of hypocriſy, and of the danger the church was in, were brought up again on behalf of the bill, which paſſed the commons on the 7th of December, by a great majority, and was ſent up to the houſe of lords, where it occaſioned a debate of many hours, whether the bill ſhould be entertained or read a ſecond time, or thrown out. The prince of Denmark appeared no more for it, nor did he come to the houſe upon this occaſion. Some who had voted for it in the former ſeſſion, kept out of the houſe; and others owned, that they ſaw farther into the deſign of the bill, and ſo voted againſt it. The biſhops were almoſt equally divided: There were two more againſt it than for it. Biſhop Burnet diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſpeech againſt the bill. He gave the lords an account how the teſt-act had been carried, and mentioned the many practices of the papiſts, in order to ſet the church againſt the diſſenters, and the diſſenters againſt the church by turns, as it might ſerve their ends. He ventured to ſay, that a man might lawfully communicate with a church, which he thought had a worſhip, and a doctrine uncorrupted, and yet communicate more frequently with a church, which he thought more perfect; and that he himſelf had communicated with the churches of Geneva and Holland, and yet at the ſame time communicated with the church of England: So that, though the diſſenters were in a miſtake as to their opinion, which was the more perfect church, yet, allowing them a tolerarion in that error, this practice might be juſtified. Several of the temporal lords ſpoke alſo againſt the bill, particularly the lord Haverſham, the duke of Devonſhire, the earl of Pembroke, the lord Mohun, the lord Ferrars, and the lord Wharton. The laſt of theſe, to ſhew the unſeaſonableneſs of any thing, that led to perſecuting their proteſtant brethren, took notice of the diſtracted ſtate of Scotland, and of the inſolence of the papiſts in Ireland; adding, that the houſe ought rather to imitate the parliament of Ireland in their zeal againſt popery, than to frame laws to increaſe diviſions here. Nor did the lord Mohun ſtick to ſay, "That if they paſſed this bill, they had as good tack the pretended prince of Wales to it." Upon the whole matter, it was carried by a majority of twelve not to give it a ſecond reading, but to reject it. The clergy over England, who were generally inflamed in this matter, could hardly forgive the queen and the prince the coldneſs, which they expreſſed on this occaſion. The lord Godolphin did ſo poſitively declare, he thought the bill unſeaſonable, and had done all he could to hinder its being brought in, that, though he (as well as the duke of Marlborough) not only voted for a ſecond reading, but alſo entered their diſſent againſt the rejecting it; the party were exaſperated againſt him, and ſet up the earl of Rocheſter, as the only man to be depended on, and who deſerved to be the prime miniſter.

Notwithſtanding theſe diviſions, the commons gave all the ſupplies that were neceſſary for carrying on the war. Some indeed tried to tack the bill againſt occaſional conformity to the bill of ſupply; but they had not ſtrength to carry it. On the 19th of November, Mr. ſecretary Hedges laid before the houſe the copies of ſuch treaties, as were not laid before them the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, among which was, 'the defenſive and offenſive treaty with Portugal.' Theſe treaties having been examined in a committee of the whole houſe, it was reſolved, on the 27th, "That the forty thouſand men, which were raiſed to act in conjunction with the forces of the allies, and the additional troops, conſiſting of ten thouſand men, ſhould be continued for the year 1704. That the proportion of land-forces, to act in conjunction with the forces of Portugal, ſhould be eight thouſand men, conſiſting of one thouſand horſe and dragoons, and ſeven thouſand foot. And, that the ſum of one million eight hundred one thouſand and ſix pounds, fifteen ſhillings, be granted for maintaining theſe forces, and the guards and garriſons of this kingdom, the payment of invalids, and diſcharging the ſubſidies payable to her majeſty's allies." Two days before the commons reſolved, "That forty thouſand men, including five thouſand marines, be employed for ſea ſervice for the year 1704; and that a ſum of four pounds a man per month, for thirteen months, be allowed for maintaining the forty thouſand men, including the ordnance for ſea ſervice." The laſt day of that month, Mr. ſecretary Hedges acquainted the houſe, "That their addreſs, relating to the continuance of the ſtop of all correſpondence with France and Spain, having been preſented to the queen, her majeſty was pleaſed to anſwer, 'That ſhe thought the continuance of the ſtop of all poſts, letters, trade, and all other correſpondence with the enemies, ſo neceſſary for the public good, that ſhe would forthwith give orders to her miniſter at the Hague, to inſiſt upon it with the States-General, as the commons deſired." The ſame day, the commons voted an addreſs to her majeſty, aſſuring her, that they would provide for the making good ſuch alliances, as ſhe had made, or ſhould make with the duke of Savoy.

The ſeaſonable diſcovery about this time of the ill deſigns of the Jacobites and French emiſſaries in Scotland, juſtified the lord Wharton's taking notice, in his ſpeech againſt the occaſional conformity-bill, of the diſtracted ſtate of that kingdom. The court of St. Germain's perceiving the diviſions in Scotland, and the great oppoſition made in the parliament of that kingdom, had been encouraged to ſet all their agents there at work, in order to engage both the chief of the nobility, and the ſeveral tribes in the Highlands, to be ready to appear for them. Simon Frazer of Beaufort, lord Lovat, had gone through the Highlands the year before, and from thence went to France, where he pretended, that he had authority from the Highlanders to undertake to bring together a body of twelve thouſand men, if they might be aſſiſted by ſome force, together with officers, arms, ammunition, and money from France. After he had delivered this meſſage to the queen at St. Germain's ſhe recommended him to the French miniſters, of whom he had ſome audiences. He propoſed, that five thouſand men ſhould be ſent from Dunkirk, to land near Dundee, with arms for twenty thouſand men; and that five hundred ſhould be ſent from Breſt, to ſeize on Fort William, which commanded the great paſs in the Highlands. The French hearkened to all this, but would not venture much upon ſlight grounds, and therefore ſent him back, with ſome others, in whom they confided more, to ſee how much they might depend on, and what the ſtrength of the Highlanders was. They were alſo ordered to try, whether any of the great nobility of that kingdom would engage in the deſign. When theſe came over, Frazer got himſelf ſecretly introduced to the duke of Queenſberry, to whom he diſcovered all that had been already tranſacted; and undertook to diſcover the whole correſpondence between St. Germain's and the Jacobites. He named alſo many of the lords, who oppoſed the duke moſt in parliament, and ſaid, that they were already deeply engaged. The duke hearkened very willingly to all this, and gave him a paſs to go through the Highlands again, where he found ſome were ſtill very forward, but others were more reſerved. At his return, he reſolved to go back to France, and promiſed to make a more entire diſcovery. He put one letter into the duke of Queenſberry's hands, from the queen at St. Germain's, directed on the back; but by another hand, to the marquis of Athol. The letter was writ in ſuch general terms, that it might have been directed to any of the great nobility; and probably he, who was truſted with it, had power given him to direct it to any, to whom he found it would be moſt acceptable; for there was nothing in the letter, that was particular to any one perſon or family; it only mentioned the promiſes and aſſurances ſent to her by that lord. This Frazer had been accuſed of a rape, committed on a ſiſter of the marquis of Athol's, for which he was convicted and outlawed; ſo that it might be ſuppoſed, that he, to be revenged on the marquis, who proſecuted him for that crime, might put his name on the back of the letter. It is certain, that the others, who were more more truſted than Frazer, and were ſent over with him, avoided his company, ſo that he was not made acquainted with that proceeding. He came up to London in winter, and had ſome meetings with the practiſing Jacobites about the town, to whom he diſcovered his negociation. He continued ſtill to perſuade the duke of Queenſberry of his fidelity to him. His name was not told to the queen; for when the duke wrote to her an account of the diſcovery, he added, that, unleſs ſhe commanded it, he had promiſed not to name the perſon, for he was to go back to St. Germain's to compleat the diſcovery. The queen did not aſk his name, but had more regard to what he ſaid, becauſe, in the main, it agreed with the intelligence, that her miniſters had from their ſpies at Paris. The duke of Queenſberry procured a paſs for him to go to Holland, but by another name, for he opened no part of this matter to the earl of Nottingham, who gave the paſs. The Jacobites in London ſuſpected Frazer's correſpondence with the duke of Queenſberry, and gave advertiſement to the marquis of Athol, and by this means the whole matter broke out. About this time ſir John Maclean, a papiſt, and head of that tribe or clan in the Highlands, and weſtern iſles of Scotland, came over from France in a little boat, and landed ſecretly at Folkſtone in Kent. He brought his lady with him, though ſhe had been delivered of a child but eleven days before. He was taken, and ſent up to London; and it ſeemed, by all circumſtances, that he came over upon ſome important deſign. He pretended, at firſt, that he came only to go through England into Scotland, to take the benefit of the queen's general pardon there. But when he was told, that the pardon in Scotland was not a good warrant to come into England, and that it was high-treaſon to come from France without a paſs, he was not willing to expoſe himſelf to the ſeverity of the law, and was prevailed upon to give an account of all that he knew concerning the negociations between France and Scotland. Some others were at the ſame time taken up upon his information, and ſome upon ſuſpicion. Amongſt thoſe, there was one Keith, whoſe uncle was truſted by the court of St. Germain's, and whom they had ſent over with Frazer, to bring them an account of the temper the Scots were in, upon which they might depend. Keith had been long at that court; he had free acceſs both to that queen and the pretended prince of Wales, and hoped they would have made him under ſecretary for Scotland. For ſome time he denied, that he knew any thing; but afterwards he confeſſed, that he was made acquainted with Frazer's tranſactions, and he undertook to deal with his uncle, to come and diſcover all he knew, and pretended there was no other deſign among them, but to lay matters ſo, that the prince of Wales ſhould reign after the queen. Ferguſon offered himſelf to make great diſcoveries; he ſaid, that Frazer was employed by the duke of Queenſberry, to decoy ſome into a plot, which he had framed, and intended to diſcover as ſoon as he had drawn many into the guilt. He affirmed, that there was no plot among the Jacobites, who were glad to ſee one of the race of the Stuarts upon the throne; and they deſigned, when the ſtate of the war might diſpoſe the queen to a treaty with France, to get ſuch terms given her, as king Stephen and king Henry VI. had, to reign during her life. When biſhop Burnet heard this, he recollected what the marquis of Athol had ſaid to him, ſoon after the queen's acceſſion to the crown; when, upon the biſhop's ſaying, that he hoped none in Scotland thought of the prince of Wales; the marquis anſwered, he knew of none, that thought of him, as long as the queen lived. The biſhop replied, That if any thought of him after that, he was ſure the queen would live no longer, than till they thought their deſigns for him were well laid. But the marquis ſeemed to have no apprehenſions of that. The biſhop immediately told the queen this, without naming the perſon; and ſhe anſwered him very quick, There was no manner of doubt of that. But, though the biſhop could not but reflect often on that diſcourſe, yet, ſince it was ſaid to him in confidence, he never ſpoke of it to any one perſon, during all the enquiry that was now on foot. Ferguſon, ever ſince he had left the place, which had been given him at the revolution, had been the boldeſt and moſt active man of the Jacobite party. He pretended, that he was now for high-church, but many believed him a papiſt. There was matter of treaſon ſworn both againſt him and Keith, but there was only one witneſs to it.

At the ſame time Lindſey was taken up, who had been under ſecretary, firſt to the earl of Melfort, and then to the earl of Middleton. He had carried over from France the letters and orders, that gave riſe to the earl of Dundee's breaking out the year after the revolution; and he had been much truſted at St. Germain's. He had a ſmall eſtate in Scotland, and he pretended, that he took the benefit of the queen's pardon, and had gone to Scotland to ſave his eſtate; and, being ſecured by this pardon, he thought he might come from Scotland into England; but he could pretend no colour for his coming to England; and, therefore, it was not doubted, but that he came hither to manage their correſpondence and intrigues. He pretended, that he knew of no deſigns againſt the queen and her government; and that the court of St. Germain's, and the earl of Middleton in particular, had no deſign againſt her. But, when he was ſhewed Frazer's commiſſion to be a colonel, ſigned by the pretended king, and counterſigned Middleton, he ſeemed amazed at it: He did not pretend it was a forgery, but he ſaid, that things of that kind were never communicated to him.

At the ſame time, that theſe were taken up, others were ſeized on the coaſt of Suſſex. One of theſe, Boucher, was a chief officer in the duke of Berwick's family, who was then going to Spain; but it was ſuſpected, that this was a blind to cover his going to Scotland.

During the height of the debates about the 'bill againſt occaſional conformity,' the earl of Scarborough produced a letter from his brother, acquainting him, that ſeveral ſuſpected perſons, retainers to the duke of Berwick, were come over, and ſeized. Upon this the earl of Nottingham, ſecretary of ſtate, told the houſe, "That this matter was already before the queen, and would, in a few days, be laid before both houſes." Nevertheleſs, the majority of lords, either out of zeal for the ſafety of the queen's perſon and government, or becauſe they did not think it prudent to leave the enquiry into ſo important an affair in the hands of a perſon, whoſe affection to the revolution ſettlement had been queſtioned, reſolved to appoint a committee of ſeven of their own members to examine into it, and ordered, that ſir John Maclean be brought to their houſe the next day. The lord ſteward having, on that day, acquainted the houſe, by her majeſty's command, "That the examination, relating to ſir John Maclean, was a matter of that nicety and great importance, that ſhe thought it would be inconvenient to take it out of the method of examination it was now in, and that her majeſty would in a ſhort time, communicate it to the houſe," their Lordſhips acquieſced, and ordered the lords, with the white ſtaves, to attend the queen, to deſire her, that ſir John Maclean might be committed to ſuch ſafe cuſtody, as that no perſon be permitted to ſpeak to him without her leave, and that he neither write nor receive any letters or papers from any perſon, without the like permiſſion from her majeſty: which was complied with.

On the 17th of December, the qneen came to the houſe of peers, and having paſſed the 'act for a land-tax for the year 1704,' made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein ſhe acquainted them, "That ſhe had unqueſtionable informations of very ill practices and deſigns carried on in Scotland by emiſſaries from France, which might have proved extremely dangerous to the peace of theſe kingdoms; as they would ſee, by the particulars, which ſhould be laid before them, as ſoon as the examinations could be fully perfected and made public without prejudice: And that, in the mean time, ſhe doubted not, but, by this ſeaſonable diſcovery, ſhe ſhould be able to give ſuch directions for their ſecurity as would effectually prevent any ill conſequences from theſe pernicious deſigns."

The day following, the lords proceeded by balloting ro the choice of their ſelect committee; which fell on the dukes of Somerſet and Devonſhire, the earls of Sunderland and Scarborough, and the lords Sommers, Townſhend, and Wharton. Then the lords, in an addreſs, thanked the queen for communicating to them her informations, of the practices of her enemies in Scotland; and the ſame day, the like addreſs was preſented alſo by the commons.

The commons, being in an ill humour againſt the lords, were glad to find occaſions to vent it. They thought the lords appointing a 'ſelect committee,' to examine the perſons ſuſpected, to be an incroachment on the royal prerogative, or, at leaſt, a reflection on ſome of the miniſters, and therefore they preſented the following addreſs to the queen:

Moſt Gracious Sovereign,

"WE your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons of England in parliament aſſembled, beg leave humbly to lay before your majeſty the great and juſt concern we are under, to ſee any violation of your royal prerogative.

"Your faithful commons believe the adminiſtration of the the government beſt ſecured, when it is left to your majeſty, as the law has intruſted it; and have ſo firm a dependence upon your majeſty's affection to your people, and your great wiſdom, that they can never apprehend ſo little danger from any conſpiracy, as when the examination thereof is under your majeſty's direction.

" We are therefore ſurprized to find, that, when ſeveral perſons, ſuſpected of treaſonable practices againſt your majeſty, were taken into cuſtody by your meſſengers, in order to be examined, the lords, ' in violation to the known laws of the land,' have wreſted them out of your majeſty's hands; and, without your majeſty's leave or knowledge, in a moſt extraordinary manner, taken the examination of them ſolely to themſelves, whereby a due enquiry into the evil practices and deſigns againſt your majeſty's perſon and government may, in great meaſure, be obſtructed.

" Your loyal commons do therefore moſt earneſtly deſire your majeſty to ſuffer no diminution of that prerogative, which, during your majeſty's reign, they are confident, will always be exerted for the good of your people.

" And we humbly beg leave to aſſure your majeſty, that, as we are reſolved, by timely and effectual ſupplies, to inable your majeſty to carry on the war, which you have ſo glorioufly begun; ſo we will, to the utmoſt of our power, ſupport your majeſty in the exerciſe of your juſt prerogative at home, and the aſſerting of it againſt all invaſions whatſoever."

In anſwer to which the queen ſaid, " That ſhe had the ſatisfaction to find, that the matter, which might have occaſioned this addreſs, was now at an end: That ſhe returned them many thanks for the concern they expreſſed for her prerogative, and for their repeated aſſurances of making the ſupplies effectual, which would be greatly for the honour and advantage of the kingdom: And that ſhe would be careful not to give way to any invaſions of the prerogative of the crown, or of the rights and liberties of the people."

The addreſs of the commons againſt the lords was a proceeding without a precedent: The parliamentary method was, when one houſe was offended with any thing done in the other, conferences were demanded, in which matters were freely debated. But to begin an appeal to the throne was new, and might be managed by an ill-deſigning prince, ſo as to end in the ſubverſion of the whole conſtitution. And it was an amazing thing, to ſee an houſe of commons affirm, in ſo public a manner, and ſo poſitively, that the lords taking criminals into their own cuſtody, in order to an examination, was without warrant or precedent, when there were ſo many inſtances freſh in every man's memory, eſpecially ſince the time of the popiſh plot, of precedents in both houſes, that went much farther, of which a full ſearch had been made, and a long liſt of them read in the houſe of lords. That did not a little confound thoſe among them, who were believed to be in a ſecret correſpondence with the houſe of commons; they were forced to confeſs, that they ſaw the lords had clear precedents to juſtify them in what they had done, of which they were in great doubt before.

It ſeemed ſurprizing to many, that the commons, whoſe proper province it is to take care of the liberties of the ſubject ſhould now appear ſuch zealous aſſertors of the ' royal prerogative,' in oppoſition to the houſe of lords, who are the natural defenders of it. But this was entirely owing to a party-pique; the tories, or high-church party, who were the ſtrongeſt in the houſe of commons, laying hold of all opportunities, both to ingratiate themſelves with the queen, and to oppoſe the whigs, who had the majority in the houſe of lords. Beſides, the tories received no ſmall encouragement from ſome perſons in high ſtations, who were ready enough to countenance thoſe, who endeavoured to ſtifle the Scots conſpiracy, which made the whig lords the more eager to examine into it.

The houſe of lords highly reſented the reflection caſt upon them by the commons in this addreſs; and therefore, to vindicate their honour, and aſſert their privileges, they declared, " That, by the known laws and cuſtoms of parliaments, they had an undoubted right, whenever they conceived it to be for the ſafety of her majeſty and the kingdom, to take examinations of perſons charged with criminal matters, whether they be in cuſtody or not: and to order, that perſons to be examined be taken into cuſtody of her majeſty's ſworn officer attending their houſe." And, four days after, they reſolved, " That the addreſs of the commons is unparliamentary, groundleſs, without precedent, and highly injurious to the houſe of peers, tending to interrupt the good correſpondence between the two houſes, and create an ill opinion in her majeſty of the houſe of peers, and of dangerous conſequence to the liberties of the people, the conſtitution of the kingdom, and privileges of parliament." This done, they preſented, the next day, a ' repreſentation' to the queen, in which they complained of the ill uſage they had met with from the houſe of commons: They uſed none of thoſe hard words, that were in the addreſs made againſt them by the houſe of commons, yet they juſtified every ſtep they had taken, as founded on the law and practice of parliament, and no way contrary to the duty and reſpect they owed to the queen. The behaviour of the commons was ſuch, on this occaſion, as if they had no mind, that plots ſhould be narrowly looked into. No houſe of parliament, and, indeed, no court of judicature, did examine any perſon, without taking him into their own cuſtody during ſuch examination; and, if a perſon's being in cuſtody muſt reſtrain an houſe of parliament from examining him, here was a maxim laid down, by which bad miniſters might cover themſelves from an enquiry into their ill practices, only by taking the perſons, who could make diſcoveries, into cuſtody. The lords alſo ſet forth the ill conſequences, that might follow upon one houſe of parliament carrying their complaints of another to the throne, without taking firſt the proper method of conferences. This repreſentation was drawn with the utmoſt force, as well as beauty and decency of ſtile, and was reckoned one of the beſt pieces of its kind, that were in all the records of parliament [q].

The queen in her anſwer declared, " That ſhe was ſorry for any miſunderſtandings, that happen between the two

[q] It was in theſe words:

May it pleaſe your moſt excellent Majeſty,

" We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, find ourſelves under an unhappy neceſſity of making this our humble application to the throne, upon an occaſion of an addreſs preſented to your majeſty by the houſe of commons, the 23d day of December laſt, and ſince that time publiſhed to the whole nation in print; by which the houſe of lords is charged with the violation of your royal prerogative, and of the known laws of the land, with wreſting perſons ſuſpected of treaſonable practices, and taking into cuſtody by meſſengers, out of your majeſty's hands without your leave or knowledge, and in a moſt extraordinary manner taking the examination of them ſolely to themſelves, whereby a due inquiry into the evil practices and deſigns againſt your majeſty's perſon and government might in great meaſure be obſtructed. And they conclude their addreſs by moſt earneſtly deſiring your majeſty to ſuffer no diminution of your prerogative, and promiſe to ſupport you in the aſſerting it againſt all invaſions whatſoever. It is not poſſible for us to remain ſilent under this heavy charge ſo unjuſtly, and without the leaſt ground or colour, endeavoured to be fixed upon the whole body of the peers, which, tending directly to create an ill opinion of us in your majeſty, puts us under an inevitable neceſſity of vindicating both the legality and dutiful manner of our proceeding.

" The expreſſions in the addreſs of the houſe of commons are ſo very harſh and indecent, that we may truly affirm the like never were uſed of the houſe of peers in any age, not even by that aſſembly, which, under the name of the houſe of commons, took upon them, not only to aboliſh the houſe of lords, but to deſtroy the monarchy. We ſhall carefully avoid making returns of that kind: We conſider too much what we owe to ourſelves, and we know too well the profound reſpect due to your royal perſon, to let any provocation tranſport us ſo, as to uſe words unfit to be offered by us to our ſovereign.

" The matter of this addreſs in no leſs injurious to us than the terms. There was not the leaſt occaſion for a juſt objection to any part of our conduct in that buſineſs, to which the addreſs relates. The proceeding was ſtrictly juſtifiable by the known laws and cuſtoms of parliament: It was carried on with the utmoſt reſpect to your majeſty, and with true zeal for the ſafety of your perſon and government. All, that was done, was agreed to by the concurrent opinion of the houſe, without the leaſt objection from any of our members, who have the honour of ſerving your majeſty in your great offices and employments.

" We humbly repreſent to your majeſty, that, by the known laws and cuſtom of parliaments, the houſe of peers has an undoubted right, in caſes where they conceive it to be for the good and ſafety of your majeſty and the kingdom, to take examinations of perſons charged with criminal matters, whether ſuch perſons be then in cuſtody or not; and alſo to order the perſons ſo to be examined to be taken into cuſtody of your majeſty's ſworn officers attending the houſe, during ſuch exrmination, or to commit them to any other ſafe cuſtody, that they ſhall think proper, and to reſtrain others, if they ſee cauſe, from having acceſs to, or communication with them. The houſe of lords has exerciſed this right from time to time, as occaſions have required, without objection. Our records are filled with precedents, which warrant our claim in every part of it; and we preſume to affirm to your majeſty, that the drawing this right into queſtion, at any time, cannot but be of dangerous conſequence to the liberties and ſafety of the people, and to the conſtitution of the government, attending to avoid, or render in great meaſure ineffectual, the inquiries of parliaments, which are ſo abſolutely neceſſary, eſpecially where many and great perſons are engaged in dangerous deſigns againſt the government, or where ill miniſters abuſe their favour towards the oppreſſing or inſlaving of the people. Your majeſty's wiſdom and goodneſs make us ſecure at preſent againſt all influences of that kind; and we unanimouſly and heartily pray we may long enjoy the bleſſing of your reign. But it houſes of parliament, which were ſo inconvenient for the public ſervice, and ſo uneaſy to her, that ſhe could not but take notice with ſatisfaction of the aſſurance their lordſhips gave her, that they would carefully avoid all occaſion of them. She thanked them for the concern they expreſſed for the rights of the crown and for her prerogative, which ſhe ſhould never exert ſo willingly, as for the good of her ſubjects, and the protection of their liberties."

Boucher, when he was examined, would confeſs nothing; he ſaid, he was weary of living ſo long out of his country; and that, having made ſome attempt to obtain a paſs, when that was denied him, he choſe rather than to live always abroad, to come and caſt himſelf upon the queen's mercy; it did not ſeem reaſonable to believe this; ſo the lords made an addreſs to the queen, that he might have no hopes of pardon, till he was more ſincere in his diſcoveries; and they prayed that he might be proſecuted on the ſtatute: He confeſſed his crime, and was condemned, but continuing ſtill denying that he knew any thing; few could believe this; yet there being no ſpecial matter laid againſt him, his caſe was to be pitied; he proved, that he had ſaved the lives of many priſoners, during the war of Ireland; and that, during the war in Flanders, he had been very careful of all Engliſh priſoners. When all this was laid before the lords, they did not think fit to carry the matter farther; ſo he was reprieved, and that matter ſlept. He died at laſt in Newgate, without making any diſcovery, at leaſt, that ever came to public knowledge.

[1703-4.] About the end of January, the earl of Nottingham acquainted the houſe of lords, "That the queen commanded him to lay before them the papers, which contained all the matters hitherto diſcovered of the conſpiracy in Scotland; but that there was one thing, which he was alſo commanded to let their lordſhips know, was not yet proper to be communicated to the houſe; becauſe the making it public might prevent a farther diſcovery of matters of greater importance; but that their lordſhips ſhould be acquainted with this alſo, as ſoon as it could be done without prejudice to the public ſervice." Upon this the lords reſolved to addreſs her majeſty, "That the whole matter, and all papers relating to the Scots plot, might be laid before them, with all convenient diſpatch, that this houſe might not want an opportunity before the end of this ſeſſion, of enquiring into, and diſcovering the wicked deſigns and conſpiracies of her enemies." To this addreſs the queen anſwered, "That having ſo lately acquainted them, that ſhe had communicated to them all the particulars relating to the deſign againſt Scotland, which could yet be made public without prejudice to the ſervice, her majeſty did not expect to be preſſed upon that matter before it was ſcarcely poſſible, that the ſtate of it could be altered; and that her majeſty made no doubt, but, before the end of the ſeſſion, there would be a proper time to communicate that which could not now be made public without great inconveniency." Two days after, the earl of Nottingham delivered to the lords ſeveral other papers relating to the Scots conſpiracy, which being ſealed up as the former were, it was ordered, that all the papers ſhould be opened, on Tueſday the 8th of February, and all the lords ſummoned to attend.

By this time, all poſſible endeavours had been uſed to ſtifle if it happens in future time, that ill men ſhould gain too great a degree of favour with our princes, how eaſily will it be for them to ſtifle or defeat all parliamentary inquiries into their crimes? For if the being in priſon, or in the hands of a meſſenger, will protect men from being examined in the houſe of lords, or from being put into the cuſtody of the proper officers of the houſe, during the examination, and debarred from converſing with others; it will certainly be always in the power of favourites to cauſe thoſe, who can be witneſſes againſt them, as well as the accomplices of their deſigns, to be taken into cuſtody. And, if perſons in cuſtody are out of the reach of the houſe of lords, who are the hereditary counſellors of the crown, and in whom a judicial power is lodged by the conſtitution, it is not to be imagined, that the commons can pretend to a greater power of examining, committing, or reſtraining them.

"No houſe of commons till now has given countenance to this dangerous opinion, which does ſo directly tend to the rendering ill miniſters ſafe from the examination of parliaments. And we are perſuaded no houſe of commons hereafter will aſſert ſuch a notion, becauſe they are not wont eaſily to part with a power they have aſſumed; and it is certain, that they have ſeveral times taken upon them to exerciſe an authority like that, which they have ſo ſeverely reflected on in their addreſs.

"This conſideration gave us the greater aſtoniſhment to find our proceeding repreſented in the ſtrange terms of wreſting priſoners out of your majeſty's hands, and taking the examination of them ſolely to ourſelves. We believe, the ordering perſons to be examined in that high court, where your majeſty is always preſent in conſideration of law, and in that great council, where you may be preſent in your royal perſon, as often as you pleaſe, will never be thought an excluſion of your majeſty from the examinations, if that was intended to be inſinuated, by ſaying, we had taken the examination ſolely to ourſelves.

"Having thus laid before your majeſty what it is we claim, and muſt inſiſt on, as the indiſputable right of the houſe of peers, which was never thought in the time of your royal anceſtors to be prejudicial to the juſt prerogatives of the crown, and which is manifeſtly neceſſary for the ſecuring the liberties of your people, whereof we are aſſured your majeſty will have an equal care; we humbly beg leave to lay before you a ſhort ſtate of the particular matter of fact relating to theſe priſoners, not doubting, but, when the whole proceeding is known to your majeſty, it will be approved, not only as lawful, but every way reſpectful to your majeſty.

"On Tueſday, the 14th of December, the houſe of lords was informed, that ſeveral perſons had been ſeized by the cuſtom-houſe officers on the coaſt of Suſſex, as they came from France; and that amongſt them there was one Boucher, who was capable of making conſiderable diſcoveries, having been in arms in the French ſervice for many years, and gentleman of the horſe and aid-de-camp to the late duke of Berwick, who ſtands attainted of high treaſon, and who had been ſecretly in England ſeveral times before: That it was probable, if he was ſtrictly examined, he might be brought to confeſs, ſince he ſaw his life in apparent danger; but that he was a bold man, and likely to attempt an eſcape on that very account, if he was not carefully looked after. And the houſe was alſo told, that there was a general remiſſneſs both in the taking, ſearching, and looking to ſuch priſoners, which did afterwards appear very evident in the examinations, that were taken. Upon this information the earl of Nottingham, your majeſty's principal ſecretary of ſtate, acquainted the houſe, that he had not heard of Boucher's name particularly, but he ſent meſſengers to bring one Ogilby, and the other priſoners, who had been apprehended by the cuſtom-houſe officers, to town; and that he believed the meſſengers would do their duty, 'but he would not be anſwerable for them.'

"After this account of the priſoners, and of what had been done in order to ſecure them, the houſe thought themſelves obliged in duty to your majeſty, and for the public ſafety, at a time when the kingdom is engaged in an open war with France, and that there are too juſt grounds to apprehend the dangerous practices of French emiſſaries, to make an humble addreſs to your majeſty, that particular care might be taken for ſecuring the perſon of Boucher, and of thoſe, who were taken with him; and that none might be ſuffered to ſpeak with them till they were examined.

"The next day your majeſty's gracious anſwer to this addreſs was reported to the houſe, that care had been taken to ſecure the priſoners; and that your majeſty would give orders, that nobody ſhould ſpeak with them till they were examined. Thereupon the lords entered into a farther conſideration of the importance of this matter, and, conceiving nothing to be more likely to bring priſoners, who had forfeited their lives, to a full diſcovery of the truth, than to find themſelves under the enquiry of a parliament, they thought it would be of public ſervice for them to take examinations of theſe perſons; and accordingly an order was made, that no perſon ſhould ſpeak with the priſoners till they had appeared at the bar of the houſe.

"On the 16th day, the earl of Nottingham informing the houſe of lords, that the priſoners were brought to town, the uſher of the black rod was ordered to take them into his cuſtody, in order to their examination, and to keep them ſeparate and in cloſe cuſtody, as your majeſty had before directed. And, it being thought moſt proper, from the nature of the thing, that the examination ſhould be by a committee of lords, rather than by the whole houſe, it was reſolved accordingly.

"We beg leave to mention to your majeſty a matter of fact, which ſatisfied the lords, that their reſolution to take the examinations of Boucher, and the perſons apprehended with him, was neither unknown nor diſagreeable to your majeſty.

"On the ſame day, when that was ordered, being the 15th of December, the lords reſolved to examine ſir John Maclean, a very dangerous perſon, as was repreſented to the houſe, who then ſtood committed in the hands of a meſſenger; and for that purpoſe ordered him to be brought to the houſe the next day, having, as they then thought, very good grounds to believe it might prove of great ſervice to your majeſty. Sir John Maclean was brought to the houſe according to the order; but your majeſty being pleaſed ſo far to take notice of this order, as to ſignify to the houſe by the lord ſteward, that ſir John Maclean had been in part examined already, and that your majeſty thought it not proper to have that buſineſs taken out of the way of examination it was then in, but that your majeſty would in a ſhort time communicate it to the houſe; the lords immediately acquieſced in your majeſty's opinion, and ſent back ſir John Maclean to the place from whence he was brought. It was with this diſpoſition of mind the lords acted in this whole matter; and, if your majeſty, who no doubt had the ſame notice of both orders, had thought any other method of the examination of Boucher, and the perſons taken with him, more proper than of the lords, they had reaſon to conclude your majeſty would have intimated it at the ſame time, and moſt certainly the houſe would have had a like deference for your royal judgment in that inſtance alſo.

"The lords committees appointed to examine the priſoners proceeded with all poſſible diſpatch, and made their report to the houſe, on the 21ſt of December. Upon conſideration of the report, the houſe found it requiſite to commit Boucher to the priſon of Newgate for high treaſon; and the lords committees having ſubmitted to the judgment of the houſe, whether ſeveral parts of the examinations referred to in their report, ſhould be laid open to the houſe, or put into any other way of being farther enquired into or proſecuted; the houſe, out of a full aſſurance they had, that, when the matter of fact ſhould be laid before your majeſty, you would certainly give ſuch orders thereupon, as were every way ſuitable to your royal prudence and tender care of the public ſafety, did unanimouſly reſolve, without ſo much as ſuffering thoſe parts of the report to be laid open to the houſe, that an humble addreſs ſhould be made from the houſe to your majeſty by the lord-ſteward and the duke of Somerſet (two of the lords committees, to whom the examination had been referred) laying before your majeſty the whole report, with all matters relating thereto, and humbly deſiring your majeſty to give orders, that Boucher ſhould be proſecuted by Mr. attorney-general for high-treaſon; and that, as to the commitment, proſecution, or diſcharge of the other priſoners, mentioned in the report, you would be pleaſed to give ſuch directions as ſhould ſeem moſt proper to your royal wiſdom. Thus as the whole affair was entered out of our zeal for your majeſty's preſervation, and the ſafety of the kingdom, and was carried on and concluded with all poſſible reſpect to you; ſo we had the comfort to reſt aſſured, that our behaviour was no leſs graciouſly accepted by your majeſty, from the anſwer you were pleaſed to make the ſame day to our laſt addreſs on this ſubject, and which was reported to us, on the 22d of December, by the duke of Somerſet, whereby your majeſty was pleaſed to ſignify to the houſe with your accuſtomed goodneſs, that you would give order for every thing, as the lords had deſired.

"Madam, This is a true and juſt account of our proceedings, which have been ſo ſtrangely miſrepreſented, and to which no exception can poſſibly be taken by any perſons rightly informed. For, as we had your royal approbation of all that was done, ſo the houſe of commons could have had no pretence of the plot, and to prepoſſeſs the queen and the public, that the whole was a contrivance of the duke of Queenſberry, in order to ruin the dukes of Hamilton and Athol. The duke of Athol drew up a plauſible memorial for that purpoſe, which he read in the Scotch council in the preſence of the queen [r]. By this memorial it manifeſtly appeared, that the duke of Athol, though one of the principal perſons ſuſpected, had either the peruſal or information from the ſecretary of ſtate, of the contents of the letters, declarations and examinations relating to the Scots conſpiracy, before they were communicated to the houſe of lords; a convincing circumſtance, that the accuſed were more countenanced than the accuſers: So that it was no difficult matter for them to put a ſlur upon the plot. There were two other circumſtances which ſeemed to reflect on the earl of Nottingham; his giving ear to the information of Ferguſon, whom the ſuſpected perſons made uſe of, to clear them of the treaſon they were in danger of being charged with; and his diſcharging an officer in king James's army, who had been ſeized by the governor of Berwick. This being complained objection, if they had taken the uſual parliamentary methods of deſiring to be informed of what we had done, and of the grounds of our proceedings, before they had approached your majeſty with ſuch a repreſentation of them.

"Their carrying ſuch an unprecedented addreſs to your majeſty, in ſo haſty a manner, gives us almoſt as great trouble as the hard uſage we find by it.

"The ancient, known, and indeed only effectual method of preſerving a good correſpondence between the two houſes of parliament, has been by conferences. If at any time either houſe conceived they had a reaſonable ground to object againſt the proceedings of the other, conferences have been deſired, and the matter in debate between them fairly diſcuſſed, and thereby miſtakes have been cleared for the moſt part, and a good underſtanding cultivated, and a mutual reſpect preſerved, which is always highly requiſite in the nature of our conſtitution, but more eſpecially in this time of war and danger.

"Had the houſe of commons thought fit to have purſued this method upon this occaſion, we ſhould have been able to have given them entire ſatisfaction, not only of the lawfulneſs of all we had done, but of the juſt and weighty grounds, upon which we took the examinations of theſe perſons into our own hands; or, at leaſt, if they could have convinced us of any miſtake, we ſhould have given them any reaſonable ſatisfaction.

"But, without making any ſuch previous ſtep, the houſe of commons have made an appeal directly to the throne againſt the houſe of lords, and charged them, though moſt unjuſtly, with attempts of the higheſt nature. Nothing like this was ever done before; and, out of our hearty concern for the preſervation of our happy conſtitution, we hope the ſame thing will never be done again. We know your royal heart is unmoveably fixed on preſerving the liberties of your people, and tranſmitting them entire to poſterity. But if in after-times the houſes of parliament ſhould be appealing againſt one another to the crown (for, if ſuch a courſe be juſtifiable in the houſe of commons, the ſame method may be taken by the lords) as your majeſty is now ſenſible, how great difficulties it neceſſarily brings upon a good prince; ſo it is eaſy to foreſee (and we cannot think of it without terror) how fatal the conſequences may be in the reign of an ill deſigning prince, and what advantages may be taken from it for utterly ſubverting the beſt ordered form of government in the world. There are examples abroad, where proceedings of this kind have ended in the overthrow of the liberties of the people, which makes us the more apprehend the beginning of them among ourſelves. Your majeſty's great judgment cannot but readily diſcern, whither it does naturally tend for one houſe of parliament to be exciting and earneſtly deſiring the ſovereign to exert a real or ſuppoſed prerogative againſt the other houſe. It is not eaſy to imagine, what the commons could expect of your majeſty from ſuch an application. The lords have never entertained a thought of uſing this dangerous method, whatever occaſions may have been given within the compaſs of late years. And we promiſe your majeſty, we will always endeavour to preſerve a good underſtanding with the houſe of commons, and ſhall never think it too dear to procure that union at any rate, unleſs that of delivering up thoſe rights and powers, which are lodged in us by the law, and without which the conſtitution cannot ſubſiſt.

"We ſhall never be guilty of the preſumption of preſcribing to your majeſty, when or againſt whom, you ſhould exert your prerogative; but we will be always ready to aſſiſt you in the ſupport of all the juſt rights of the crown, as well as in the maintaining the liberties of the ſubject, which we know are no leſs dear to your majeſty.

"It may with modeſty and truth be affirmed, that the lords have in all times been the ſureſt and moſt natural bulwark of the prerogatives of the crown, they being (as your royal grandfather, of ever bleſſed memory, was pleaſed to expreſs it) an excellent ſcreen and bank between the prince and the people, to aſſiſt each againſt any incroachment of the other.

"We will never contribute, by any act of ours, to the diminution of the rights of the crown, nor, as far as we are able, will ſuffer it in others. We cannot act otherwiſe without hurting ourſelves in the higheſt degree, being thoroughly convinced, that the preſervation of the legal prerogative is not only the ſureſt way to ſecure our own privileges, but of abſolute neceſſity for the happy and rightful adminiſtration of the government. And we hope, the houſe of commons will, in all times to come, ſpeak and act with that regard to the prerogative, which they ſeem to have taken up lately.

"There remains one particular more, which we will only name to your majeſty, becauſe we reſt ſatisfied, it cannot have any weight here, that is, the inſinuation in the addreſs, as if the examination of theſe priſoners by the lords was in order to obſtruct the inquiry into the deſigns againſt your majeſty's perſon and government; or at leaſt, that it was likely to produce ſuch an effect. Our dutiful zeal for your majeſty's government, and our warm concern to diſcover all deſigns, and oppoſe all practices againſt it, are too well known to the world, that any ſuggeſtions of that ſort ſhould make the leaſt impreſſion to our diſadvantage; and, we are very ſure, it was no ſuſpicion of that nature, which gave the true riſe to this very ſharp addreſs. It is eaſy to determine, whether a hearty and forward undertaking to ſearch into the deſigns of your enemies, and the ſeeking occaſions to object to and interrupt ſuch endeavours, be moſt likely to obſtruct the diſcovery of the pernicious practices of traitors.

Moſt Gracious Sovereign,

"We moſt humbly aſk pardon for preſuming to give your majeſty the trouble of this long repreſentation, which has proceeded from the paſſionate concern we have to ſtand, not only acquitted, but entirely approved in the judgment of ſo excellent a queen, and ſo juſtly beloved of all her ſubjects.

"We depend upon your juſtice, as well as your goodneſs, that nothing can do us prejudice, from whatſoever hand it comes, in your royal opinion, while we continue to act in that ſtation, where we are placed by the form of the Engliſh government, according to the laws and cuſtoms of parliament, with all imaginable reſpect and duty to yourſelf, and all poſſible zeal for the ſafety and happineſs of your kingdom.

"Give us leave to conclude this our humble addreſs with this firm promiſe, that no danger, no reproaches, nor any artifices whatſoever, ſhall deter or divert us from uſing our utmoſt endeavours from time to time in diſcovering and oppoſing all contrivances and attempts, againſt your royal perſon and government, and the proteſtant ſucceſſion, as by law eſtabliſhed."

[r] The ſubſtance of this memorial was as follows: "That, on the 25th of November laſt, there was a diſcovery made to his grace, that one captain Simon Frazer, who was a declared rebel, outlawed in Scotland for a moſt barbarous rape, and other crimes, had been in London about a fortnight before; and that he had come from St. Germain's in May or June laſt; and, after having ſtaid ſome time in London, had gone to Scotland, and there had met with the duke of Queenſberry at Edinburgh, at the time of the ſitting of the parliament; and, having got from the duke of Queenſberry a protection and paſs, he, with them, travelled to ſeveral places in Scotland, particularly Argyleſhire, where he produced the ſaid paſs, as alſo a commiſſion and inſtructions ſigned by king James, and in this manner he ſeduced and trepanned ſeveral of her majeſty's ſubjects. That after this, and about the end of September, he returned to London, where he again met privately with the duke of Queenſberry, who procured a paſs to the ſaid Frazer, and three of his accomplices from the earl of Nottingham, under falſe names. Upon which Frazer went to Holland in his way to St. Germain's, in order to give an account of his negotiations in Britain. That Mr. Robert Ferguſon was the firſt, who, by a gentleman he ſent to his grace, informed the duke of Athol of captain Frazer's having been at London, and gone to St. Germain's with ill deſigns againſt her majeſty; and that the duke of Queenſberry intended by him and his accomplices to ruin him, the duke of Athol, and ſeveral perſons of quality in Scotland. That on the 27th of November, the earl of Nottingham acquainted his grace, that the duke of Queenſberry having, by a note, deſired a paſs for four perſons (viz. captain Smeaton or Campbel,—Monro,—Dickſon, and—Forbes) he had given the ſaid paſs. That thereupon the duke of Athol waited on her majeſty, and acquainted her with what information he had got; and afterwards further informed the earl of Nottingham, that the duke of Queenſberry had delivered the ſaid paſs to Colin Campbel of Glenderoul, an officer in the army in Scotland; and that he delivered it to Thomas Clarke, an apothecary in Watling-ſtreet, at whoſe houſe Frazer had lodged, and who delivered it to him at Graveſend. That the deliveries of the ſaid paſs were confirmed by the examinations of Thomas Clarke and Colin Campbel. That on the 30th of November, his grace acquainted the earl of Nottingham, how the accomplices of captain Frazer were to direct the letters from hence to him beyond ſea, and how Frazer directed his letters to his correſpondents here: Upon which ſeveral pacquets of letters were intercepted, which diſcovered Frazer's correſpondents, particularly Colin Campbel, Mr. Keith, John Murray, and captain Macleod, an officer in the guards in Scotland. That, it appeared, that one Corbouſien, a merchant in London, had given a bill of one hundred and fifty guineas to captain Frazer, and that Frazer had written to the duke of Queenſberry, under cover to Colin Campbel; and that there was alſo a letter intercepted from Frazer to the earl of Leven. That, on the 6th of December Mr. Keith acquainted his grace, that, the firſt time he met captain Frazer in London, 'he deſired him to try if the duke of Athol would pardon the injury he had done his family, he being penitent,' as he pretended. That, his grace having inquired of Keith, why he did not acquaint his grace with it ſooner, he anſwered, 'That he knew it would be to no purpoſe for him to undertake ſuch a meſſage from captain Frazer, whoſe deſign he believed was to trepan his grace.' And that Mr. Keith acquainted the earls of Seafield and Nottingham with what he had told his grace. That, by the means of Colin Campbel and Mr. Clarke, were found ſeveral papers belonging to Frazer, and left by him before he went from London, particularly, a commiſſion for his being a colonel, ſigned by the pretended king James. That by the declarations of Colin Campbel and ſir John Maclean, and others, and by Frazer's letters, it appears, that, beſides the deſign of an invaſion, there was another wicked contrivance, to bring ſeveral of her majeſty's good ſubjects and ſervants into a plot, in order to ruin them and their families. Wherefore his grace humbly begged her majeſty would be pleaſed to order the duke of Queenſberry to give his reaſons; 1. Why he met with, employed, and gave two hundred guineas to captain Frazer in Scotland, with whom, as being an intercommuned rebel, it was treaſon, by the law of that kingdom, to converſe. 2. How the duke of Queenſberry came to give a paſs or protection to a rebel, whoſe buſineſs in the Highlands of Scotland was to tempt her majeſty's ſubjects into a rebellion. 3. For what purpoſe the duke of Queenſberry ſent captain Frazer, and three perſons with him, ſo carefully and privately to France, and what ſervices he expected her majeſty would reap by their going thither, ſince it appeared by the letters and declarations, that Frazer's main deſign was to engage the French king to proſecute his deſign of an invaſion." In a ſubſequent addition to this memorial, the duke of Athol obſerved, in his own vindication, Firſt, "That he ſaw by Frazer's letters, and the declarations of Colin Campbel of Glenderoul, and captain Macleod, and by what a lord had publicly ſaid, that there had been a deſign to accuſe his grace, and ſeveral others, of correſponding with St. Germain's." Secondly, "That the ſaid declarations were made by thoſe, who were guilty of correſponding with Frazer, and who were employed by the duke of Queenſberry in his ſecret affairs with him." Thirdly, "That what theſe perſons alledged was only upon a hear-ſay from Frazer, viz. that his grace deſigned to ſend Glengary and captain James Murray to St. Germain's, neither of which two perſons his grace ever ſpoke to. Concluding, that his grace, as well as the duke of Hamilton, were mentioned by ſir John Maclean, the laſt perſon, who came over from St. Germain's, and ſaid, he had inſtructions to ſound or try both their graces: But that this was rather a vindication; for ſince they were to be ſounded, they were not engaged, or had correſpondence there. By all which the world might judge of the reſt of the malicious calumnies of his grace's enemies, and how eaſy a matter it would be for his grace to refute them, when public, eſpecially the inconſiſtent ſtory of a letter ſaid to have been ſent from St. Germain's to his grace."

This

of in the houſe of commons, a long debate enſued, which ended at laſt in a reſolve, "That the earl of Nottingham, one of her majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, for his great ability and diligence in the execution of his office, for his unqueſtionable fidelity to the queen and her government, and for his ſteady adhering to the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed, had highly merited the truſt her majeſty had repoſed in him." The commons, at the ſame time, ordered, that the ſpeaker ſhould lay this reſolution before her majeſty, when the ſaid addreſs ſhould be preſented to her: Which being done accordingly, the queen was pleaſed to ſay, "That ſhe was glad to find they were well ſatisfied with the earl of Nottingham, who was truſted by her in ſo conſiderable a poſt."

The examinations of the priſoners being alſo ſent to the houſe of commons, they heard them read, but paſſed no judgment upon them, nor did they offer any advice to the queen upon this occaſion; they only ſent them back to the queen, with thanks for communicating them, and for her wiſdom and care of the nation. It was thought ſtrange, to ſee a buſineſs of this nature treated ſo ſlightly, by a body that had looked, in former times, more carefully to things of this kind; eſpecially, ſince it had appeared, in many inſtances, how dexterous the French were in raiſing diſtractions in their enemy's country: it was evident, that a negotiation was begun, and had been now carried on for ſome time, for an army that was to be ſent from France to Scotland; upon this, which was the main of the diſcovery, it was very amazing to ſee, that the commons neither offered the queen any advice, nor gave her a vote of credit, for any extraordinary expence, in which the progreſs of that matter might engage her; a credit ſo given might have had a great effect towards defeating the deſign, when it appeared how well the queen was furniſhed to reſiſt it: This coldneſs, in the houſe of commons, gave great and juſt ground of ſuſpicion, that thoſe who had the chief credit there, did not act heartily, in order to the defeating all ſuch plots, but were willing to let them go on, without check or oppoſition.

But the lords, on the day appointed, reſolved to take the plot into conſideration, and examine the whole matter fully. They began with reading the papers laid before them, the moſt material of which was drawn up by the earl of Nottingham, intitled, 'an account of the conſpiracy in Scotland.' It was an abſtract of all the examinations the council had taken [s]. Some took great exceptions at it, as drawn on deſign to make the affair appear more inconſiderable than they believed it to be. The ſubſtance of the whole was, that there went many meſſages between the courts of St. Germain's and Verſailles, with relation to the affairs of Scotland; the court of Verſailles was willing to ſend an army to Scotland, but they deſired to be well aſſured of the aſſiſtance they might expect there; in order to which, ſome were ſent over, according to what France had told the duke of Queenſberry; ſome of the papers were writ in gibberiſh, ſo the lords moved, that a reward ſhould be offered, to any who ſhould decypher theſe. When the lords aſked the earl of Nottingham, if every thing was laid before them, he anſwered, That there was only one particular kept from them; becauſe they were in hopes of a diſcovery, that was like to be of more conſequence than all the reſt: So, after the delay of a few days, to ſee the iſſue of it, which was Keith's endeavours to perſuade his uncle (who knew every ſtep that had been made, in the whole progreſs of this affair) to come in and diſcover it, when they were told there was no more hope of that, the lords ordered the committee, which had examined Boucher, to examine into all theſe diſcoveries. Upon this the commons, who expreſſed a great uneaſineſs at every ſtep the lords made in that matter, went with a new addreſs to the queen, inſiſting on their former complaints, againſt the proceedings of the lords, as a wreſting the matter out of the queen's hands, and the taking it wholly into their own; and they prayed the queen to reſume her prerogative, thus violated by the lords, whoſe proceedings they affirmed to be without a precedent.

The ſeven lords went on with their examinations, and, after ſome days, they made a report to the houſe; Maclean's confeſſion was the main thing; it was full and particular; he named the perſons that ſate in the council at St. Germain's; he ſaid, the command was offered to the duke of Berwick, which he declined to accept, till trial was made whether duke Hamilton would accept of it, who, he thought, was the proper perſon; he told likewiſe, what directions had been ſent to hinder the ſettling the ſucceſſion in Scotland; none of which particulars were in the paper, that the earl of Notting-

[s] This paper more at large was: "That the earl of Nottingham had information of ſome deſigns of an inſurrection in Scotland, to be ſupported with money, arms, and men from France, with which he acquainted the queen, who, having received the like informations from the duke of Queenſberry, commanded him to communicate theſe matters to his grace, that, by comparing them together, her majeſty might the better judge of them. This the earl did, and the duke ſaid, that the accounts, which he had read, were much of the ſame kind; and added, that his informer was come from France, but his name he was obliged to conceal, and was ſo forward and zealous in doing ſervice to her majeſty, that he was willing to go again into France, and to ſend from time to time, or even to bring intelligence of the further progreſs of the French deſigns, with which he was ſure he ſhould be truſted, as he had been formerly. That his grace ſaid, he accordingly deſigned to ſend him; which the earl of Nottingham approved, and acquainted the queen with this converſation with the duke of Queenſberry. That, on the 10th of November 1703, the earl of Nottingham had an account, that ſir John Maclean, with others, were in cuſtody at Folkſtone, as coming out of France without leave; and that the ſame day he received a letter, as did alſo the earl of Cromarty, from ſir John Maclean, intimating, that at his landing he had ſurrendered himſelf, and deſired he might be brought before the earl, to give an account of his coming. That, ſir John being accordingly ſent for in cuſtody, and examined, he ſaid, 'That he had long deſired to come home, and had often aſked leave by his friends, without ſucceſs; but now, hearing of the indemnity granted by the queen to her Scottiſh ſubjects, he gladly laid hold of it, being weary of the hardſhips he endured in France, where he could not ſubſiſt with his allowance. That he never had any poſt, either in court or army; and he reſolved to live quiet at home, in hopes of ſome favour from her majeſty, in conſideration of the ſufferings of his family for their loyalty.' But being told, that, though this was a very ſpecious repreſentation of his caſe, yet it was impoſſible to believe, that this was all, or the true deſign of his coming, ſince he had delayed coming many months after he knew of the indemnity; ſir John Maclean, upon this, pretended ſickneſs, and that he now came in ſo much haſte, that he brought his wife, who had lain-in but eleven days; adding, 'that an Engliſh fiſher-boat had been diſcharged by order of the court of France (a thing never done before) without ranſom or exchange, on purpoſe to bring him to England. That, this increaſing the earl's ſuſpicion, ſir John Maclean was told, that, however indemnified he might be in Scotland, he was ſtill liable to the act of parliament in England, which made it treaſon to come hither from France: And that he muſt expect the rigour of the law, being ſo juſtly, from the above-mentioned circumſtances, to be ſuſpected of ill deſigns. That thereupon he ſaid, 'He would tell the earl all he knew, upon aſſurance of his pardon, and being treated like a gentleman, ſo as not to be required to appear in public, as an evidence againſt any perſon;' of which, by the queen's orders, he being aſſured, he then told the earl of Nottingham, 'That, in July 1702, the lord Lovat came to France, and told ſir John Maclean, that he had matters of great importance to communicate to the queen at St. Germain's, but required a promiſe from her not to reveal any thing of what he ſhould ſay to any of her miniſters. That, this being granted, ſir John Maclean carried him to the queen, as he did afterwards by her direction, to monſieur Torcy, to whom, as before to the queen, he ſaid, that he was come from the Highlands of Scotland, where he had diſcourſed with many heads of clans, particularly Stewart of Apin, ſir Edwin Cameron, ſir Daniel Macdonal, and others, from whom he brought aſſurances, that they would riſe in arms with ten thouſand men, if they were aſſiſted from France, with money, arms, and troops to ſupport them. That monſieur Torcy, after communicating this to the French king, aſſured him, that his maſter would furniſh them with money and arms, and alſo men, ſo ſoon as his affairs would admit of the laſt. And the number agreed on was five thouſand, which were to be tranſported from Dunkirk, and landed at Dundee; from whence the march was ſhort and eaſy to the foot of the Highlands; to which, if need were, they might retreat, and, in the mean time, make a ſtand, and oppoſe any of the queen's forces, that might be ſent againſt them, and give time to the Highland clans to aſſemble and come to them, and form and increaſe the army, to be ſuperior to all the queen's forces in Scotland. That, to facilitate this deſign, five hundred men were to be ſent from Breſt, to ſeize the fort of Inverlochy, which could not reſiſt cannon, being commanded by hills near it; and that this would give ſecurity to ſhips coming into the river, and be a means to convey ſupplies of all kinds, as there ſhould be occaſion. That the execution of this project was delayed, partly becauſe the French king could not ſpare his troops, partly becauſe his fleet was not in a condition to oppoſe the Engliſh; partly becauſe he did not entirely rely on the lord Lovat's information and aſſurances; and partly, that he might ſee the event of the Scottiſh parliament, by which he might judge of the diſpoſition of the Scots, as well as by ſome further inquiry, which he intended to make. That therefore Lovat was ſent back in May laſt, which captain Frazer and captain John Murray, who had long been in the French ſervice, with orders to come back, as ſoon as the Scots parliament was ended, with an account of the inclinations of the people, and what numbers might be relied upon to join with the French. That, beſides theſe, one James Murray was alſo ſent to Scotland, with orders to ſpeak with duke Hamilton (to whom one Bell was ſent before with like directions, and died in Holland) and to engage him in the intereſt of France, for the ſupport of the prince of Wales. That there had been other meſſages ſent to him, but the queen told ſir John Maclean, ſhe had no anſwer, and therefore ordered ſir John to ſound his grace, and, if he found him diſpoſed to her ſervice, then, and not otherwiſe, to communicate to him this project; which he was alſo to do to the duke of Athol and earl Mareſchal. And that Stephenſon, a banker, formerly ſent to duke Hamilton, was, at his return, put into the Baſtile; which was thought to be occaſioned by the duke's not truſting him, and to prevent a diſcovery, there being ſo many factions at St. Germains, that nothing was kept a ſecret. That afterwards, upon a further examination, Sir John Maclean recollected the names of the perſons, and the men they could bring into the field, which Lovat, alias Frazer, reckoned upon, when he gave account to the court of France of the Scots readineſs to riſe, if the French would ſupport them. That, the queen having commanded the earl of Nottingham to acquaint the duke of Queenſberry with what ſir John Maclean had diſcovered, his grace thereupon told the earl, that this Frazer was the perſon, who diſcloſed to him ſome matters of this nature, with which he had acquainted the queen, but that he had not told her majeſty his name, being under a ſolemn engagement to conceal it. That this Frazer was brought to him by the late duke of Argyle and the earl of Leven, who were privy to all his proceedings with them. That Frazer was gone to France, and had promiſed to ſend an account of all the French deſigns, and would come back, whenever any thing of moment happened, or that his grace ſhould require him. Whereupon the duke of Queenſberry was deſired to call him back, for he was more likely to do harm than good, by an intelligence, that could be expected from ſo ill a man."

This account contained, in the next place, the duke of Athol's proceedings with the earl of Nottingham, with the ſubſtance of Campbel's, Clarke's, Keith's, and Ferguſon's examinations.

On

ham had brought to the houſe of his confeſſion. It was farther obſerved, that all the reſt, whoſe examinations amounted to little, were obliged to write their own confeſſions, or, at leaſt, to ſign them: But Maclean had not done this; for, after he had delivered his confeſſion by word of mouth to the earl of Nottingham, that lord wrote it all from his report, and read it to him the next day; upon which he acknowledged, it contained a full account of all he had ſaid. Maclean's diſcovery to the lords was a clear ſeries of all the counſels and meſſages, and it gave a full view of the debates and opinions in the council at St. Germain's, all which was omitted in that, which was taken by the earl of Nottingham, and his paper concerning it was both ſhort and dark; there was an appearance of truth, in all that Maclean told, and a regular progreſs was ſet forth in it.

Upon theſe obſervations thoſe lords, who were not ſatisfied with the earl of Nottingham's paper, intended to have paſſed a cenſure upon it, as imperfect. It was ſaid, in the debate that followed this motion, either Maclean was aſked, who was to command the army to be ſent into Scotland, or he was not. If he was aſked the queſtion, and had anſwered it, then the earl of Nottingham had not ſerved the queen, or uſed the parliament well, ſince he had not put it in the paper. If it was not aſked, here was great remiſſneſs in a miniſter, when it was confeſſed, that the ſending over an army was in conſultation, not to aſk who was to command the army. Upon this occaſion, the earl of Torrington made ſome reflections, which had too deep a venom in them. He ſaid, That the earl of Nottingham did prove, that he had often read over the paper, in which he had ſet down Maclean's confeſſion, in his hearing, and had aſked him, if all he had confeſſed to him was not fully ſet down in that paper; to which he always anſwered, That every thing he ſaid was contained in it. Upon this the earl obſerved, that, Sir John Maclean having, perhaps, told his whole ſtory to the earl of Nottingham, and finding afterwards, that he had writ ſuch a defective account of it, he had reaſon to conclude (for he believed, had he been in his condition, he ſhould have concluded ſo himſelf) that the earl of Nottingham had no mind, that he ſhould mention any thing, but what he had writ down, and that he deſired, that the reſt might be ſuppreſſed. That he could not judge of others but by himſelf: If his life had been in danger, and if he were interrogated by a miniſter of ſtate, who could do him either much good or much hurt, and if he had made a full diſcovery to him, but had obſerved, that this miniſter, in taking his confeſſion in writing, had omitted many things, he ſhould have underſtood that as an intimation, that he was to ſpeak of theſe things no more; and ſo he believed he ſhould have ſaid it was all, though, at the ſame time, he knew it was not all that he had ſaid. It was hereupon moved that ſir John Maclean might be ſent for and interrogated, but the party was not ſtrong enough to carry any thing of that kind; and, by a previous vote, it was carried by a majority of eleven voices, to put no queſtion concerning the earl of Nottingham's papers [t].

The lords were highly offended with Ferguſon's papers, and paſſed a ſevere vote againſt thoſe lords who had received ſuch ſcandalous papers, and had not ordered him to be proſecuted, which they directed the attorney-general to do. But Ferguſon never received the leaſt puniſhment.

It was apparent, that there was a train of dangerous negociations, that paſſed between Scotland and St. Germain's, though the lords could not penetrate to the bottom of them. And the deſign of Keith's bringing in his uncle, who knew every ſtep that had been made, and the whole progreſs of the affair, to diſcover the whole ſcheme of it, was managed ſo remiſsly, that it was generally concluded, that it was not in earneſt deſired it ſhould ſucceed. During the debates, one very extraordinary thing happened; the earl of Nottingham affirmed, upon three or four occaſions, that ſome things had been ordered in the cabinet council, which the dukes of Somerſet and Devonſhire, who were likewiſe of that council, did not agree with him in. After all theſe examinations and debates, the lords concluded the whole matter with voting, That there had been dangerous plots between ſome in Scotland and the courts of France and St. Germain's; and that the encouragement of this plotting came from the not ſettling the ſucceſſion to the crown of Scotland in the houſe of Hanover. Theſe votes they laid before the queen in an addreſs, and promiſed, when the ſucceſſion was thus ſettled, they would endeavour to promote the union of the two kingdoms, upon juſt and reaſonable terms. To their addreſs the queen anſwered, "That ſhe had ſome time ſince declared her intentions, of endeavouring the ſettlement of the proteſtant ſucceſſion in Scotland to her ſervants of that kingdom, as the moſt effectual means for ſecuring their quiet and our own, and the readieſt way to the entire union betwixt both kingdoms, in the perfecting of which, it was very deſirable no time ſhould be loſt"

The lords, after this concluſion of the affair, made a long and vigorous addreſs, or ſecond repreſentation in anſwer to that which the commons had made againſt them; wherein they obſerved, how uneaſy the commons had been at the progreſs of their enquiry into the Scots conſpiracy, and had taken methods to obſtruct it all they could; which did not ſhew that zeal for the queen's ſafety, and the preſervation of the nation, to which all men pretended. They annexed to this addreſs a liſt of many precedents, to ſhew what good warrants they had for every ſtep they had made; that they had not taken the examination to themſelves, ſo as to exclude others, who had the ſame right, and might have done it as well as they, if they had pleaſed; and that their proceeding had been regular and parliamentary, as well as full of zeal and duty to the queen. They made ſevere obſervations on ſome of the proceedings in the houſe of commons, particularly on their not ordering writs to be iſſued out for ſome boroughs to proceed to new elections, when they, upon pretence of corruption, had voted an election void; which had been practiſed of late, when it was viſible, that the election would not fall on the perſon they favoured. They charged this as a denial of juſtice, and of the right that ſuch boroughs had to be repreſented in parliament, and as an arbitrary and illegal way of proceeding. This addreſs was drawn with great force and beauty by the lord Sommers, who likewiſe penned the other addreſſes, which made a great impreſſion on the body of the nation; for the difference, that was between theſe addreſſes, and thoſe publiſhed by the commons was ſo viſible, that it did not admit of any compariſon, and was confeſſed even by thoſe, who were the moſt partial to the commons. In anſwer to this laſt addreſs, the queen ſaid, "That ſhe hoped none of her ſubjects had any deſire to leſſen the prerogative, ſince ſhe had no thoughts of making uſe of it, but for their protection and advantage, And that ſhe looked upon it as a great misfortune, when any miſunderſtanding happened between both houſes of parliament, which could not be without ſo much prejudice to the public, that ſhe ſhould never omit any thing in her power to prevent the occaſions of them."

Theſe differences between the two houſes were ſtill heightened by the lords interpoſing in an affair, the cognizance of which the commons pretended to belong ſolely to themſelves. There had been great complaints long made, and theſe had increaſed within a few years, of great partiality and injuſtice in the election of parliament-men, both by ſheriffs in counties, and by the returning officers in boroughs. In Ayleſbury in Buckinghamſhire the return was made by four conſtables; and it was believed, that they had made a bargain with ſome of the candidates, and then managed the matter ſo, as to be ſure, that the majority ſhould be for the perſon, to whom they had engaged themſelves. They canvaſſed about the town, to know how the voters were ſet, and they reſolved to find ſome pretence for diſabling thoſe, who were engaged to vote for other perſons than their friends, that they might be ſure to have the majority in their own hands.

And, when theſe matters came to be examined by the houſe of commons, they gave the election always for him, who was reckoned of the party of the majority in a manner ſo barefaced, that they were ſcarce out of countenance, when they were charged for injuſtice in judging elections. It was not eaſy to find a remedy againſt ſuch a crying abuſe, of which all ſides in their turns, as they happened to be depreſſed, had made great complaints; but, when they came to be the majority, ſeemed to forget all, that they had before exclaimed againſt. Some few excuſed this on the topic of retaliation, alledging, that they dealt with others as they dealt with them or their friends. At laſt an action was brought againſt William White, and the other conſtables of Ayleſbury, by one Matthew Aſhby, who had been always admitted to vote in former elections, but was denied it in the laſt election. This action was tried at the aſſizes, and it was found there by the jury, that the conſtables had denied him a right, of which he was undoubtedly in poſſeſſion, ſo that they were caſt with [t] On the 24th of March, the lords, after ſome debate, came to a reſolution, "That, ſir John Maclean having made an ingenuous confeſſion to the lords committees, her majeſty ſhould be addreſſed to give him as full and compleat a pardon, as may conſiſt with the ſafety of her majeſty and the people, and to provide for his ſubſiſtence." And then the order of the lords, for the cloſe confinement of ſir John Maclean in the Tower of London, was diſcharged. Upon this recommendation ſir John Maclean received a conſiderable penſion from the crown, though, in his heart, in the queen's time, and openly after her death, he continued in the intereſt of the pretender, and died in the rebellion againſt king George I, in 1715.

Another

damages. But it was moved in the Queen's Bench to quash all the proceedings in that matter, since no action did lie, or ever had been brought upon that account. The judges Powel, Gould, and Powis were of opinion, that no hurt was done to Ashby; that the judging of elections belonged to the house of commons: That, as this action was the first of its kind, so, if it was allowed, it would occasion an infinite number of suits, and put all the officers, concerned in that matter, under great difficulties. Chief justice Holt alone differed from the rest. He thought this a matter of the greatest importance, both to the whole nation in general, and to every man in his own particular. He made a great difference between an election of a member, and a right to vote in it. That the house of commons were the only judges of the former, whether it was rightly managed or not, without bribery, fraud, or violence; but the right of voting in an election was an original right founded on a freehold of forty shillings a year in the county, or on burgage-land, or prescription, or by charter, in a borough. These were all legal titles, and, as such, were triable in a court of law. Acts of parliament were made concerning them, and, by reason of these, every thing relating to those acts was triable in a court of law. He spoke long and learnedly, and with some vehemence, upon the subject; but he was one against three, and therefore the order of the Queen's Bench was given in favour of the constables. The matter was upon that brought before the house of lords by a writ of error; the case was very fully argued at the bar, and the judges were ordered to deliver their opinion upon it, which they did very copiously. Chief Justice Trevor insisted much on the authority, that the house of commons had to judge of all those elections. From that he inferred, that the commons only could judge, who were the electors. Petitions were often grounded on this, that in a poll some were admitted to a vote, who had no right to it, and that others were denied it, who had a right; so that in some cases the commons were the proper judges of this right, and, if they had it in some cases, they must have it in all. From this he inferred, that every thing relating to this matter was triable by them, and by them only. If two independent jurisdictions might have the same cause brought before them, they might give contrary judgments in it; and this must breed great distraction in the execution of those judgments.

To all this it was answered, that a single man, who was wronged in this matter, had no other remedy but by bringing it into a court of law; for the house of commons could not examine the right of every voter: If the man, for whom he would have voted, was returned, he could not be heard to complain to the house of commons, though in his own particular he was denied a vote, since he could not make any exceptions to the return, and therefore must bear his wrong without a remedy, if he could not bring it into a court of law. A right of voting in an election was the greatest of all the rights of an Englishman, since by that he was represented in parliament. The house of commons could give no relief to a man wronged in this point, nor any damages; they could only set aside one, and admit of another return. But this was no redress to him, who suffered the wrong; it made him the less considered in his borough, and that might be a real damage to him in his trade. Since this was a right inherent in a man, it seemed reasonable, that it should be brought, where all other rights were tried, into a court of law. The abuse was new, and was daily growing, and it was already swelled to a great height. When new disorders happen, new actions must lie, otherwise there is a failure in justice, which all laws abhor. Practices of this sort were enormous and crying; and if the rule made in the Queen's Bench was affirmed, it would very much encrease these disorders by this indemnity, that seemed to be given to officers, who took the poll.

After a long debate, it was carried by a great majority to set aside the order of the Queen's Bench, and to give judgment according to the verdict given at the assizes. This gave great offence to the commons, who, looking on these proceedings as encroachments on their privileges, after having inspected the lords journals, resolved, "1. That, according to the known laws and usage in parliament, it is the sole right of the commons of England, in parliament assembled (except in cases otherwise provided for by act of parliament) to examine and determine all matters relating to the right of election of their own members. 2. That neither the qualification of any elector, or the right of any person elected, is cognizable or determinable elsewhere than before the commons. 3. That the examining and determining the qualification or right of any elector, or any person elected to serve in parliament, in any court of law, or elsewhere, than before the commons, will expose all mayors, bailiffs, and other officers, who are obliged to take the poll, and make a return thereupon, to multiplicity of actions, vexatious suits, and insupportable expences, and will subject them to different and independent jurisdictions, and inconsistent determinations in the same case, without relief. 4. That Matthew Ashby, having, in contempt of the jurisdiction of this house, commenced and prosecuted an action at common law against William White and others, the constables of Aylesbury, for not receiving his vote at an election of burgesses to serve in parliament for that borough, is guilty of a breach of the privileges of this house. 5. That whoever shall presume to commence or prosecute any action, indictment, or information, which shall bring the rights of the electors, or persons elected to serve in parliament, to the determination of any other jurisdiction than that of the house of commons (except in cases specially provided for by act of parliament) such person or persons, and all attornies, sollicitors, counsellors, and serjeants at law, soliciting, prosecuting, or pleading in any such case, are guilty of a high breach of the privilege of this house." And they ordered these resolutions to be fixed upon Westminster-Hall Gate, signed by the clerk. However, they did not think fit to send for Ashby, who had sued, or rather, in whose name the suit was carried on, but let the matter fall as to him, under a shew of moderation and pity, and rested it upon the general votes. On the other hand, the lords appointed a committee to draw up the state of the case upon the writ of error, wherein Ashby was plaintiff, and William White and others defendants; which committee having made their report, their lordships resolved, "1. That, by the known laws of this kingdom, every freeholder, or other person having a right to give his vote at the election of members to serve in parliament, and being wilfully denied or hindered so to do by the officer, who ought to receive the same, may maintain an action in the queen's courts against such officer, to assert his right, and recover damage for the injury. 2. That the asserting, 'That a person having a right to give his vote at an election, and being hindered so to do by the officer, who ought to take the same, is without remedy for such wrong, by the ordinary course of law,' is destructive of the property of the subjects, against the freedom of elections, and manifestly tends to encourage corruption and partiality in officers, who are to make returns to parliament, and to subject freeholders, and other electors, to their arbitrary will and pleasure. 3. That the declaring Matthew Ashby guilty of a breach of privilege of the house of commons, for prosecuting an action against the constables of Aylesbury, for not receiving his vote at an election, after he had, in the known and proper methods of law, obtained a judgment in parliament for recovery of his damages, is an unprecedented attempt upon the judicature of parliament, and is, in effect, to subject the law of England to the votes of the house of commons. And, 4. That the deterring electors from prosecuting actions in the ordinary course of law, when they are deprived of their right of voting, and terrifying attornies, sollicitors, counsellors, and serjeants at law, from soliciting, prosecuting, and pleading in such cases, 'by voting their so doing to be a breach of privilege of the house of commons,' is a manifest assuming a power to controul the law, and hinder the course of justice, and subject the property of Englishmen to the arbitrary votes of the house of commons." The lords likewise ordered the lord-keeper to send a copy of the case, and of their resolutions, to all the sheriffs of England, to be communicated to all the boroughs in their counties. The commons were highly provoked with this, but they could not hinder it. The thing was popular, and the lords got great credit by the judgment given by them, which let the people of England see, how they might be redressed for the future, if they should meet with the injustice, the partiality, and other ill practices, that had appeared of late in elections, even beyond the examples of former times[u].

The anniversary of the queen's birth-day falling this year

[u] Another affair also gave the house of commons an occasion to vent their ill humour against the lords. On the 20th of January, Charles Bathurst, Esq; presented a petition to the house of commons, touching an order made by the lords, the 12th of February 1702-3, with relation to "an order of the court of Exchequer made the 15th of July, in the 13th year of king William, concerning an inquisition and survey of the boundaries of the honour of Richmond and lordship of Middleham; and praying such relief on the subject-matter of the petition, as the house should think meet." The commons, having examined by some of their members proceedings in relation to this affair, after a long debate, on the 27th of January, resolved, "That the

on a Sunday, the ſolemnizing of it was deferred till the next day, when ſhe ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons by Mr. ſecretary Hedges, importing, "That her majeſty, having taken into her ſerious conſideration the mean and inſufficient maintenance belonging to the clergy in divers parts of this kingdom, to give them ſome eaſe, had been pleaſed to remit the arrears of the tenths to the poor clergy; and, for an augmentation of their maintenance, her majeſty declared, that ſhe would make a grant of her whole revenue ariſing out of the 'firſt-fruits' and 'tenths,' as far as it ſhould become free from incumbrances, to be applied to this purpoſe: And, if the houſe of commons could find any proper method, by which her majeſty's good intentions to the poor clergy might be made more effectual, it would be a great advantage to the public, and acceptable to her majeſty."

The firſt-fruits and tenths was an impoſition begun by the popes in the time of the holy wars, and it was raiſed as a fund to ſupport thoſe expeditions. But, when taxes are once raiſed by ſuch an arbitrary power, as the popes then aſſumed, and after there has been a ſubmiſſion, and the payments have been ſettled into a cuſtom, they are always continued, even after the pretence, upon which they were at firſt raiſed, ſubſiſts no more. Thus this became a ſtanding branch of the papal revenue, till Henry VIII. ſeemed reſolved to take it away. It was firſt aboliſhed for a year, probably to draw in the clergy to conſent the more willingly to a change, that delivered them from ſuch heavy impoſitions. But, in the ſucceeding ſeſſion of parliament, this revenue was again ſettled as part of the income of the crown for ever. It is true, it was the more eaſily borne, becauſe the rates were ſtill at the old value, which in ſome places was not the tenth, and in moſt not above the fifth part of the true value; and the clergy had been often threatened with a new valuation, in which the rates ſhould be rigorouſly ſet to their full extent. The tenths amounted to about eleven thouſand pounds a year; and the firſt-fruits, which were more caſual, roſe one year with another to five thouſand pounds, ſo that the whole amounted to between ſixteen and ſeventeen thouſand pounds a year. This was not brought into the treaſury, as the other branches of the revenue were; but the biſhops, who had been the pope's collectors, were now the king's; and perſons in favour obtained aſſignations on them for life, or for a term of years. This had never been applied to any good uſe, but was ſtill obtained by favourites for themſelves and their friends; and, in Charles II's time, it was diſtributed chiefly among his women and natural children. It ſeemed ſtrange, that, while the clergy had much credit at court, they had never repreſented this as ſacrilege, unleſs it was applied to ſome religious purpoſe; and, that during archbiſhop Laud's favour with king Charles I. or at the reſtoration of king Charles II. no endeavours had been uſed to appropriate this to better uſes. When biſhop Burnet wrote the 'hiſtory of the reformation,' he conſidered this matter ſo particularly, that he ſaw there was a fund for providing better ſubſiſtence for the poor clergy, there being ſome hundred of cures, which had not of certain proviſion twenty pounds a year, and ſome thouſands, that had not fifty. He therefore repreſented this caſe afterward to queen Mary, in ſuch a light, that ſhe was fully reſolved, if ever ſhe lived to ſee peace and ſettlement, to have cleared this branch of the revenue of all the aſſignations, that were upon it, and to have applied it to the augmentation of ſmall benefices. The biſhops afterwards laid the matter before king William, when there was a proſpect of peace, hoping, that this might have gained the king the hearts of the clergy, or at leaſt have put a ſtop to a groundleſs clamour raiſed againſt him, that he was an enemy to the clergy, which began then to have a very ill effect on all his affairs. The king entertained this ſo well, that he ordered the biſhop to ſpeak to the miniſters about it, who all approved of it; more particularly, the lords Sommers and Hallifax: But the earl of Sunderland obtained an aſſignation upon two dioceſes for two thouſand pounds a year for two lives; ſo that nothing was to be expected after that. The biſhop laid the matter very fully before the princeſs of Denmark, during king William's life, and had often ſpoken of it to the lord Godolphin. This time was perhaps choſen to pacify the angry clergy, who were diſſatisfied with the court, and began now to talk of the danger the church was in, as much as they had done during the former reign. When the queen's meſſage was brought to the houſe of commons, ſome of the whigs, particularly ſir John Holland and ſir Joſeph Jekyll, moved, that the clergy might be entirely freed from that tax, ſince they bore as heavy a ſhare of other taxes; and that another fund might be raiſed of the ſame value, out of which ſmall benefices might be augmented. But this was violently oppoſed by ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, and other tories, who ſaid, that the clergy ought to be kept ſtill in a dependance on the crown.

Upon the queen's meſſage, a bill was brought in, inabling her to alienate this branch of the revenue, and to create a corporation by charter, to apply it to the uſe, for which ſhe now gave it. They added to this a repeal of the ſtatute of Mortmain, ſo far as that it might be free to all men, either by deed or by their laſt wills, to give what they thought fit towards the augmenting of benefices. It was ſuggeſted, that this addition was made in hope, that it would be rejected by the lords, and that the ſcandal of loſing the bill might lie upon them. It occaſioned a great debate in the houſe of lords: It was ſaid, that this law was made and kept up, even during the time of popery; and it ſeemed not reaſonable to open a door to practices upon dying men. It was anſwered, That we had not the arts of affrighting men by the terrors of purgatory, or by fables of apparitions. Where theſe were practiſed, it was very reaſonable to reſtrain prieſts from thoſe artifices, by which they had ſo enriched their church, that, without ſome ſuch effectual checks, they would have ſwallowed up the whole wealth of the world, as they had indeed in England, during popery, made themſelves maſters of a full third part of the nation. The biſhops were ſo zealous and unanimous for the bill, that it was carried and paſſed into a law. The queen was pleaſed to let it be known, that the firſt motion of this matter came from biſhop Burnet. Such a project would have been much magnified at another time; and thoſe, who had promoted it, would have been looked upon as the trueſt friends of the church. But this did not ſeem to make any great impreſſion at that time; nor to have much effect in ſoftening the tempers of peeviſh men. Only it produced a ſet of addreſſes from all the clergy of England, full of thanks and juſt acknowledgments.

The houſe of commons ſhewed a very unuſual neglect of all that related to the fleet, which uſed to be one of their chief cares. It was ſurmiſed, they ſaw that, if they opened that door, diſcoveries would be made of errors, which could neither be juſtified nor palliated; and that theſe diſcoveries muſt come home chiefly to their favourites; for which reaſon they avoided all examinations, that would probably draw ſome cenſure on them. But the lords were not ſo tender; they made an enquiry into the condition of the navy, and ordered, "That, by reaſon of the great want of men, the obſervation they had made to put into an addreſs, where they ſaid (ſix thouſand) the allowed complement for the whole number of ſhips, neceſſary for the defence of the kingdom, could not be depended upon; they thought it a duty incumbent on them to make an humble application to her majeſty, deſiring, that ſhe would be pleaſed to give ſpeedy and effectual orders, that ſuch a number of ſhips, proper for the home-ſervice, might be forthwith got ready and manned." This addreſs being an oblique reflection on prince George, high-admiral of England, the queen anſwered, "That ſhe was glad they found no great number of ſeamen wanting at this ſeaſon of the year; and ſhe hoped ſuch effectual meaſures were already taken, that no ſervice ſhould be diſappointed either at home or abroad, which was neceſſary for the ſecurity and advantage of the kingdom, or the protection and encouragement of trade." However the lords carried on their inquiries into the affairs of the navy, and came to this reſolutio: "That vice-admiral Graydon, with a ſquadron of her majeſty's ſhips of war under his convoy, meeting with four French ſhips in his paſſage to the Weſt-Indies, and letting them eſcape without attacking them, according to his duty, from the pretence of his inſtructions, had been a prejudice to the queen's ſervice, and a great diſhonour to the nation." The next day they likewiſe reſolved, "That vice-admiral Graydon's diſorderly proceedings in preſſing men in Jamaica, the houſe of lords taking cognizance of, and proceeding upon the petition of Thomas lord Wharton, complaining of an order of the court of Exchequer, bearing date the 15th of July 1701, for filing the record of a ſurvey of the honour of Richmond and of Middleham in the county of York, is without precedent, and unwarrantable, and tends to the ſubjecting the rights and properties of all the commons of England to an illegal and arbitrary power: And that it is the undoubted right of all the ſubjects of England, to make ſuch uſe of the ſaid record, as they might by law have done before the ſaid proceedings of the houſe of lords." In anſwer to this, the lords, on the 27th of March, reſolved and declared, "That the houſe of commons taking upon them by their votes, to condemn a judgment of the houſe of lords given in a cauſe depending before this houſe in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, upon the petition of Thomas lord Wharton, and to declare what the law is, in contradiction to the proceedings of the houſe of lords, is without precedent, unwarrantable, and an uſurpation of a judicature, in which they have no ſort of pretence:" ordering at the ſame time, that this reſolution ſhould be forthwith printed and publiſhed.

and ſevere uſage of maſters of merchantmen and tranſport veſſels under his convoy there, had been a great diſcouragement to the inhabitants of that iſland, and prejudicial to her majeſty's ſervice. And, ſecondly, that admiral Graydon, having behaved himſelf ſo ill in this expedition to the Weſt-Indies, might be employed no more in her majeſty's ſervice." They alſo reſolved, "That an addreſs be preſented to the queen to remove admiral Graydon from all places of truſt in the government, for impreſſing ſervants in the Weſt-Indies on board of his ſquadron, to the ruin and deſtruction, and againſt the laws of thoſe iſlands; and that her majeſty would be pleaſed to order her attorney-general to proſecute him at law for the ſame."

The lords proceeded likewiſe in their examinations of the clamour made of the waſte of the public treaſure in the laſt reign, and of the earl of Orford's accounts, which amounted to ſeventeen millions, and upon which ſome obſervations had been made by the commiſſioners of the public accounts, and found them all to be falſe in fact, or ill grounded, and of no importance. The only particular, which ſeemed to give a juſt colour to exception, was very ſtrictly examined. The earl had victualled the fleet, while they lay all winter at Cadiz: The purſers receipts, for the quantity that was laid into every ſhip, were produced, but they had no receipts of the Spaniards, from whom they had bought the proviſions; but they had entered the prices of them in their own books, and theſe were given in upon oath. This matter had been much canvaſſed in king William's time, and it ſtood thus: The earl, when he had been ordered to lie before Cadiz, wrote to the board of victualling to ſend over a perſon to provide the fleet. They anſwered, that their credit was then ſo low, that they could not undertake it; and therefore he was deſired to do it upon his own credit. It appeared, that no fleet nor ſingle ſhip had ever been victualled ſo cheap, as the fleet was then by him. It was not the cuſtom in Spain to give receipts; but if any fraud had been intended, it would have been eaſy to have got the Spaniards, after they had their money, to have ſigned any receipts, that could have been offered them, for ſwelling the accounts; for that practice in their dealings with their own court was well known there. Upon theſe reaſons, the lords of the treaſury had paſſed his accounts, and were of opinion, that he had done great ſervice to the government in that whole tranſaction. The houſe of lords now confirmed this, and ordered an account of that whole matter to be printed.

The commons made no progreſs in any diſcoveries of ill practices in the earl of Ranelagh's office, but concluded that matter with an addreſs to the queen, that ſhe would order a proſecution. This was an artifice to make the nation ſtill think, that great diſcoveries of corruption might be made, if carefully looked after. It was expected, after ſuch an outcry, as they had made, and after the expence the nation was put to for this commiſſion for examining of the public accounts, and the extraordinary powers, that were lodged with the commiſſioners, that at leaſt ſome important diſcoveries ſhould have been made by them. The commons ſent up a bill to the lords for continuing the commiſſion for another year. It was obſerved, that an alteration was made of the perſons; ſome, who expected better places, having got their names to be left out. The lords excepted to Mr. Bierly (who was named to be one of the commiſſioners) becauſe he had been a colonel, and had not yet cleared the accounts of his own regiment; for which reaſon they ſtruck out his name, and named another, and added two more, who were not members of the houſe of commons. The reaſon of this was, becauſe the members of that houſe would not appear before them to explain ſome particulars, and only ſent their clerk to inform them; and, when the lords ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons, to deſire them to order their members to attend on their committees, all the return they had was, that they would ſend an anſwer by meſſengers of their own; but this was evaſive, for they ſent no ſuch meſſage. The lords therefore thought it neceſſary, in order to their being better informed, to put ſome in the commiſſion for the future, who ſhould be bound to attend upon them, as often as they ſhould be called for. The commons rejected theſe amendments, and pretended, that this was of the nature of a money-bill; and that therefore the lords could make no alterations in it. The meſſage, which the commons ſent the lords upon this head, came ſo near the end of the ſeſſion, that the lords could not return an anſwer to it, with the reaſons, for which they inſiſted on their amendments; ſo the bill fell. The charge of this commiſſion amounted to eight thouſand pounds a year. The commiſſioners made much noiſe, and brought many perſons before them to be examined, and gave great diſturbance to all the public offices, by their being obliged to attend on them, and, to copy out all their books for their peruſal; and yet, in a courſe of many years, they had not made any one diſcovery. Thus a full ſtop was put to this way of proceeding.

One of the moſt conſiderable acts paſſed this ſeſſion, was for 'raiſing recruits for the land forces and marines,' which impowered the juſtices of peace, or any three of them, to take up ſuch idle perſons, as had no calling nor means of ſubſiſtence, and to deliver them to the officers of the army, upon paying them the levy money, that was allowed for making recruits. The method of raiſing theſe hitherto by drinking and other bad practices, as they were juſtly odious, ſo they were now ſo well known, that they were no more of any effect; ſo that the army could not be recruited but by the help of this act; which, if well managed, might prove of great advantage to the nation, ſince by this means they would be delivered from many vicious and idle perſons, who were a burthen to their country. And indeed of late years there was ſuch an encreaſe of the poor, that their maintenance was become in moſt places a very heavy load, and amounted to the full half of the public taxes. The party in both houſes, who had been all along cold and backward in the war, oppoſed this act with unuſual vehemence, pretending zeal for the public liberty and the freedom of the perſons, to which, by the conſtitution, they ſaid every Engliſhman had a right; which they thought could not be given away but by a legal judgment, and for ſome crime. They thought this put a power into the hands of juſtices of peace, which might be ſtretched and abuſed to ſerve bad purpoſes. Thus men who ſeemed engaged to an intereſt, that was deſtructive to all liberty, could yet make uſe of that ſpecious pretence, to ſerve their purpoſe. The chief objection made to this act in the houſe of lords was, that the juſtices of peace had been put in and out in ſo ſtrange a manner, ever ſince ſir Nathan Wright had the great ſeal, that they did not deſerve, that ſo large a power ſhould be committed to them. Many gentlemen of good eſtates and ancient families had been of late put out of the commiſſion for no other viſible reaſon, but becauſe they had entered heartily into the revolution, and had continued zealous for king William. This ſeemed done on deſign to mark them, and ſo leſſen the intereſt they had in the elections of members of parliament; and at the ſame time men of no worth, nor eſtate, and known to be ill affected to the queen's title and to the proteſtant ſucceſſion, were put in, to the great encouragement of ill-deſigning men. All was managed by ſecret accuſations, and characters, that were partially given. The lord-keeper was a zealot to the party, and was become very exceptionable in all reſpects. Money, as was ſaid, did every thing with him; only in his court, he was never charged with any thing but great ſlowneſs, by which the chancery was become one of the heavieſt grievances of the nation. An addreſs was preſented by the lords to the queen complaining of the commiſſions of peace, in which the lords delivered their opinion that ſuch as would not ſerve, or act under the late king, were not fit to ſerve her majeſty.

Beſides the bill that paſſed for the recruiting of the land-forces, there was likewiſe another brought into the houſe of commons for the ſame purpoſe, by obliging the ſeveral pariſhes or corporations in England to furniſh a certain number of men. But, this being a copy of what is practiſed in France, and other deſpotic governments, it was rejected.

[1704] On the 3d of April, the queen came to the houſe of peers, and, having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral acts, made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Cannot put an end to this ſeſſion, without returning you thanks for the willingneſs, which you have all expreſſed to ſupport and aſſiſt me in continuing the preſent war.

"And I muſt thank you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, very particularly, for the great forwardneſs and zeal, which you have ſhewn, both in the early diſpatch of the ſupplies, and in making them ſo effectual for carrying on the public expence, without any additional burthen upon the country. It ſhall be my care to improve this to the beſt advantage.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"At the opening of this ſeſſion, I did earneſtly expreſs my deſires of ſeeing you in perfect unity among yourſelves, as the moſt effectual means imaginable to diſappoint the ambition bition of our enemies, and reduce them to an honourable and laſting peace. And though this has not met with all the ſucceſs, which I wiſhed and expected, yet being fully convinced, that nothing is ſo neceſſary to our common welfare, I am not diſcouraged from perſiſting in the ſame earneſt deſires, that you would go down into your ſeveral countries ſo diſpoſed to moderation and unity, as becomes all thoſe, who are joined together in the ſame religion and intereſt.

"This, I am perſuaded, will make you ſenſible, that nothing, next to the bleſſing of God, can ſo much contribute to our ſucceſs abroad, and our ſafety at home."

The queen having ended her ſpeech, the parliament was prorogued to the 4th of July following.

Thus ended this ſeſſion of parliament after much heat and contention between the two houſes; and though the queen in her ſpeech recommended to them union and moderation, yet thoſe words, which had hitherto carried ſo good a ſound, that all ſides pretended to them, were now become ſo odious to violent men, that even in ſermons, eſpecially at Oxford, they were arraigned as importing ſomewhat, that was unkind to the church, and that favoured the diſſenters. The houſe of commons had, during this ſeſſion, loſt much of their reputation, not only with fair and impartial judges, but even with thoſe, who were moſt inclined to favour them. It is true, the body of the freeholders began to be uneaſy under the taxes, and to cry out for a peace; and moſt of the conſiderable gentry of England, who had moſt to loſe, ſeemed not to apprehend the dangers the nation was in, if it ſhould fall under the power of France, and into the hands of the pretender; or elſe they were ſo fatally blinded, as not to ſee, that theſe muſt be the conſequences of thoſe meaſures, into which they were engaged.

The convocation ſitting again this winter with the parliament, they were divided as before. The lower houſe continued their former practices, but little oppoſition was made to them, as little regard was had of them. They began, December 8, with ſending up a paper to the archbiſhop and biſhops, ſignifying, that, being called together to conſult about ſuch matters as concerned the ſafety, honour, and advantage of the church, they thought themſelves obliged, above all things, to have a regard to the ſoundneſs of its doctrine, and to labour ſome effectual proviſion againſt its being corrupted and depraved: And therefore they reminded their lordſhips of the daring licentiouſneſs of the preſs, thro' which there had, for ſome years paſt, ſeveral books been printed, publiſhed, and diſperſed, in which, not only the worſhip and diſcipline of the church, but the known fundamentals of our holy religion, had been impugned, &c. They added, that they had other things lying before them, relating to the diſcipline of the church, which they conceived to be fit matter to be enquired into by a convocation: As clandeſtine marriages, and the ſcandal ſaid to be given by neglect or non-obſervance of the eccleſiaſtical laws and canons in regard to commutations: But that, theſe things requiring time, they laid this complaint againſt heretical and atheiſtical books before them by itſelf. And they begged their lordſhips would take the matter into their ſerious conſideration, not doubting, but that, through their great wiſdom and intereſt with thoſe in whom a ſufficient power is lodged, to effect ſo good a work, ſome ſpeedy remedy might be found, and a ſtop put to ſo growing an evil.

The ſame day alſo, they, by another paper, laid before their lordſhips the inconveniences to which they were liable, for want of a more effectual method for recovering rates made for the repair of churches and chapels. They deſired it might be conſidered, how far it was proper for the two houſes of convocation to join in preparing ſuch a bill to be offered in parliament, as might enforce the raiſing ſuch rates in the moſt effectual manner, conſiſtent with the ancient liberties of holy church, and the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction.

In February 1703-4, the lower-houſe ſent up a repreſentation to the biſhops, intimating, that having, by a meſſage brought by their prolocutor from his grace, been encouraged to hope, that againſt their meeting, on February 4, ſufficient power might have been procured for the joint diſpatch of ſynodical buſineſs, they had employed ſeveral members in preparing heads of matters fit to be offered to their lordſhips conſideration. In this repreſentation they mentioned ſome abuſes in the eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, and in the conſiſtorial courts: But took no care to inſiſt upon thoſe greater abuſes of pluralities, non-reſidence, neglect of cures, and the irregularities of the lives of the clergy, which were too viſible[w].

When the houſe of commons thanked the queen for the grant of the firſt-fruits and tenths for the augmentation of ſmall livings, the convocation preſented the like addreſs, and the lower-houſe ſent their prolocutor with ſome of their members, to wait upon the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, by him to return their thanks to that honourable houſe, for their eſpouſing the intereſt of the clergy, and promiſing to purſue ſuch methods, as might beſt conduce to the ſupport, honour, intereſt, and ſecurity of the church of England, as now by law eſtabliſhed: And theſe thanks of theirs, as the ſpeaker aſſured them by a letter in return, were received with the reſpect and affection juſtly due to that reverend and learned body of the clergy.

On March 10, 1703-4, The lower-houſe ſent up a paper to the upper, aſſerting their right to be ſummoned, as often as a new parliament was called, and that according to the tenor of the clauſe Præmunientes, as well as by virtue of the royal writ, and archiepiſcopal mandate: And complaining that this had been omitted in many dioceſes; and that even the royal writ itſelf, and his grace's mandate purſuant to it, had not been executed at all this convocation, in the dioceſe of Bangor. They alſo aſſerted their right to have a prolocutor choſen and admitted, at firſt, and as often as that office ſhould be vacant by death or promotion; and to aſſume an actuary, and have a convenient place for debates; and to diſpoſe of the intermediate time, as they thought good[x].

The archbiſhop, in a ſhort ſpeech, told the inferior clergy,

[w] As this repreſentation will be mentioned again in the next convocation, it may be proper to inſert the ſubſtance of it. The lower-houſe repreſented, that a general neglect of divers canons and conſtitutions, now in force, tends to introduce ſuch cuſtoms, as may in time, be interpreted to amount to a preſcription: And complained, that matter of great offence had been adminiſtered to pious Chriſtians, and many evil conſequences might ariſe from the practice of ſuch miniſters, as read not the common-prayer 'diſtinctly, reverently, and entirely,' (as by the rubric, and by the fourteenth canon they are obliged to do) without either diminiſhing in regard of preaching, or in any other reſpect, or adding any thing in the matter and form thereof.

They alſo complained, That the unjuſtifiable uſe of the form of public baptiſm, in private houſes, had leſſened the reverence due to that office; and had occaſioned thoſe undue practices of mutilating the public form, and baptizing without the ſign of the croſs, or Godfathers and Godmothers: That churchwardens were remiſs in not making due proviſion for the adminiſtration of the ſacrament of the Lord's Supper: That decency and order were not duly obſerved in ſeveral churches, and that ſeveral were irreverent and diſorderly, covering their heads in time of divine ſervice, &c. That due care was not taken about holy orders; and here the things particularly complained of, were, the little caution uſed by ſome in granting, and by others in allowing of letters teſtimonial; the not inſiſting on true, certain, and ſufficient titles; the want of a ſtrict and diligent examination of ſuch as offered themſelves to be ordained; and an unneceſſary ordination of perſons without degrees, or education, &c. That frequent abuſes happened by clandeſtine marriages, &c. That excommunicated perſons were not denounced as the ſixty fifth canon preſcribed; for want of which, the awe of excommunication had been diminiſhed: That there were great abuſes about commutations of penance: That perſons were ſuffered to inſtruct youth without due licences; and ignorant and diſaffected perſons encouraged to erect ſeminaries, to the prejudice of the two univerſities, and in which ſuch principles are inſtilled into youth, as tend to perpetuate ſchiſm, and ſubvert the eſtabliſhed conſtitution: That perſons were admitted to be chancellors or officials, and exerciſe eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, without taking any degree in any univerſity: That the preſentments of churchwardens were commonly defective, and yet they went unpuniſhed: That the practice of regiſters was corrupt: That the ſeal of juriſdiction has been kept by other perſons beſides the judges themſelves, and their lawful ſubſtitutes: That inconveniencies have ariſen for want of regiſtering teſtaments: That exceſſive fees were exacted for collations and inſtitutions: That fees were unneceſſarily demanded at viſitations, &c. That groſs errors were committed in ſome late editions of the Bible and the Liturgy: And that the ſtage was guilty of great immorality and profaneneſs. The articles of this repreſentation were twenty-one in number.

[x] Several treatiſes were publiſhed upon this controverſy, the chief of which was, "The State of the Church and Clergy of England in their Council, Synods, &c." by Dr. Wake. In the preface, he laments his being obliged to engage in ſuch a controverſy; paſſes a cenſure on his own former work, and freely complains of Dr. A. for his wrathful and uncharitable ſpirit; his obſcurity, and his confidence; and ſays, that there was ſcarce a leaf in his book that would bear a rigorous ſcrutiny, and but few that would ſtand the moſt favourable examination. In his firſt chapter, he conſiders the ſeveral kinds of aſſemblies of the clergy of England, in a parliamentary convention, a provincial convocation, in diocеſan ſynods, and provincial councils. In the ſecond, he ſets himſelf by arguments to prove the real difference both in law and fact, between a parliamentary convention of the clergy, ſummoned by the præmunitory clauſe; and provincial convocations, ſummoned by the king's writs to the two archbiſhops. He ſhews, that they have different rights, powers and privileges as ſuch. In the third he ſhews, That the biſhops and clergy have a right to be aſſembled in convocation, at any, and all times, whenever the affairs of the church require their conſultation, or any benefit may thence accrue to religion: But have no obligation to attend upon the parliament, much leſs be forced to continue their attendance during every ſeſſion, when they have either nothing to do, or nothing to countervail the trouble and charge of ſuch an attendance. In the fourth he ſhews, That the convocation has not, as a proper provincial council, any right to meet once a year, by virtue of the ancient canons. In the Vth, VIth, VIIth, and VIIIth chapters, he proves, that, neither in the time of Edward I. nor of any of the ſucceeding reigns to the time of Henry VIII. did the two convocations attend upon the parliament, nor was it accounted their duty or privilege ſo to do. In chap. IX, he ſhews that no right can in this caſe be proved from cuſtom. In the tenth, he conſiders the right of the convocation to treat of canons and conſtitutions, without the aſſent or licence of the prince. And at the end there is a large appendix, of inſtruments and records, very few of which were ever publiſhed before.

that orders were given for making out copies of their repreſentation, both for the preſent and abſent biſhops, and that a proper uſe ſhould be made of it, eſpecially at viſitations. When the lower-houſe was with the archbiſhop, on April the 3d, the day the parliament was prorogued, he ſpoke more largely to them of their repreſentation, as he had promiſed them. He owned to them their right to complain of real abuſes and grievances in the church, but obſerved, that ſome of their complaints did not come properly under the power of the canons, or the authority purely eccleſiaſtical: And that thoſe of them, that were properly eccleſiaſtical, were laid down as particulars preparative to a royal licence: And that the abuſes complained of had not commenced within a few years laſt paſt, or been paſſed over every where with ſupineneſs and diſregard: And that many of the abuſes they referred to, were mentioned in king William's injunctions, and his own circular letter in purſuance of them, Anno 1695. He told them withal, that, ſince the time of our public deliverance from the open attempts of popery, there have never been more frequent and careful viſitations of biſhops in perſon, never more precautions and ſtrict examinations before giving orders in moſt dioceſes, never more ſolemn and orderly confirmations, even in very many places, where a biſhop had not been ſince the reformation. He alſo ſaid, they had promoted the good deſign of ſetting up ſchools of inſtruction for the poor, been concerned for the propagating the goſpel in foreign parts, in preſſing the frequent catechizing of youth, and helping forward the converſion of diſſenters of all ſorts, by ſound arguments and gentle methods, and exerting themſelves in behalf of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, which is neceſſary to the preſerving the queen, and the faith of which ſhe is defender. And yet he owned, there was reaſon for all poſſible care and diligence in reſtifying abuſes; and that the biſhops needed their aſſiſtance. With this ſpeech ended the ſeſſion of the convocation, at the ſame time with that of the parliament.

It is here obſerved (by Burnet) that the univerſities, eſpecially Oxford, had been very unhappily ſucceſsful in propagating anti-revolutional principles in thoſe, who were ſent to be bred among them; ſo that few eſcaped the taint of it, and the generality of the clergy were not only wrong-principled but ill-tempered. They exclaimed againſt all moderation as endangering the church, though it was viſible, that the church was in no ſort of danger, either from the number or intereſt of the proteſtant diſſenters, who, by reaſon of the toleration, were now ſo quieted, that nothing could keep up any heat in thoſe matters, but the bad humour which the clergy were poſſeſſed with, and which they infuſed into all thoſe, with whom they had any credit. At the ſame time, the great and viſible danger of popery, which, upon a miſcarriage in the war, would have broke in like an irreſiſtible deluge, was neither perceived nor apprehended.

Whilſt the parliament was ſitting, the States-General having repreſented to the queen, of how great advantage the duke of Marlborough's coming to the Hague would be to the confederacy, by concerting there with them the meaſures proper to be taken at that juncture, and having deſired her majeſty to give his grace leave to paſs the ſea for a few days, the duke went over in January to the Hague, where he received the compliments of all the public miniſters, the general officers, and other perſons of quality. He had ſeveral conferences with the deputies of the States-General, in which there was a ſcheme formed for the operations of the next campaign. It was reſolved, that, inſtead of a fruitleſs campaign in the Netherlands, they would have only a ſmall army there to lie on the defenſive, which was to be commanded by monſieur Auverquerque; but that, ſince the Rhine was open by the taking of Bonne all up to the Moſelle, their main army, which was to be commanded by the duke of Marlborough, ſhould act there. More was not underſtood to be deſigned, except by thoſe few, who were let into the ſecret. Upon this, all the preparations for the campaign were ordered to be carried up the Rhine, that all things might be in a readineſs, when he ſhould come over to take the field. The true ſecret was in few hands, and the French had no intimation of it, and conſequently had no apprehenſions about it. Theſe matters being ſettled, the duke left the Hague and returned to London.

The earl of Nottingham was animated by the party to preſs the queen to diſmiſs the dukes of Somerſet and Devonſhire from the cabinet-council, or at leaſt, that they might be called thither no more. He moved it often, but, finding no inclination in the queen to comply with his motion, he carried the ſeals to her, and told her, that he could not ſerve any longer in councils, to which thoſe lords were admitted. The queen deſired him to conſider better of it, but he returned next day fixed in his firſt reſolution, to which he adhered the more ſteadily, becauſe the queen had ſent to the earl of Jerſey for the lord-chamberlain's ſtaff, and to ſir Edward Seymour for the comptroller's. The earl of Jerſey was a weak man, but crafty and well-practiſed in the arts of a court. His lady was a papiſt, and it was believed, that, while he was embaſſador in France, he was ſecretly reconciled to the court of St. Germain's, for after that he ſeemed to be in their intereſts. It was one of the reproaches of king William's reign, that this earl had ſo much credit with him; and the king was ſo ſenſible of it, that, if he had lived a little longer, he would have diſmiſſed him. He was conſidered as the perſon, who was now in the cloſeſt correſpondence with the court of France; and, though he was in himſelf a very inconſiderable man, yet he was applied to by all thoſe, who wiſhed well to the court of St. Germain's. His ſtaff of lord-chamberlain was given to the earl of Kent, who was the firſt earl of England, and had a great eſtate. Mr. Manſel, the heir of a very conſiderable family in Wales, was made comptroller of the houſehold; and, after a month's delay, Mr. Harley, the ſpeaker, was declared ſecretary of ſtate, and Mr. Henry St. John was appointed ſecretary at war in the room of Blaithwayte.

The late differences between the lords and commons had raiſed ſo great a ferment in the nation, that the parliament had not long been prorogued, before a paper was printed and diſperſed, intitled, 'Legion's humble addreſs to the lords,' wherein the proceedings of the commons, with relation to the Ayleſbury buſineſs, and the examination of the Scots plot, were reflected on with great freedom. The firſt were taxed 'as arbitrary and illegal, contrary to the liberties of Engliſhmen, deſtructive of the rights of election, and an invaſion of the nation's judicature.' And, as to the other, it was ſuggeſted, "that the complimenting her majeſty with the title of 'a queen ſitting on the throne of her anceſtors by right of ſucceſſion' from her father, when, at the ſame time, they knew her right depended upon the validity of 'parliament-limitation,' and was built on the foot of the late 'revolution,' and the act of ſettlement, was a barbarous treachery to the whole nation, an inſolent affront to her majeſty, an inſinuation of the title of the pretended prince of Wales, and a villainous attempt to deſtroy the preſent ſettlement of the ſucceſſion, and was conſequently high treaſon by their own act of parliament: And that to addreſs her majeſty to extend her prerogative, and thereby to embroil her with the privilege of the peers, was the moſt aggravated piece of treachery, that ever houſe of commons was or could be guilty of; the ſame being an affront to her majeſty, a malicious deſign on her perſon, by perſuading her to enter on that very thing, the exorbitant practice whereof was the ruin of her father and grandfather; an unprecedented attempt upon the liberties of the people, and a meddling with what they have no power or right to touch. Their lordſhips were likewiſe applauded for their zeal, courage, and fidelity, in vindicating their own undoubted rights invaded by the houſe of commons, in their diligent care for the ſafety of her majeſty's perſon, in ſearching after the deeply-laid contrivances of her enemies in the late plot, and in their aſſerting the liberties and rights of the people of England againſt the invaſion and uſurpation of the houſe of commons. And, as the lords were looked upon as the ſanctuary and ſafety of this nation, ſo, in the name of the injured freeholders and commons of England, their lordſhips were aſſured, that they would firmly adhere to, and faithfully defend their lordſhips in the further purſuit of theſe juſt and glorious ends." Though there was a great deal of truth in this paper, yet, being repreſented by the Glouceſterſhire juſtices, at the inſtigation of Mr. Howe, to the queen as of dangerous conſequence, a proclamation was publiſhed, promiſing a reward of one hundred pounds for the diſcovery of the author, and fifty pounds for apprehending the printer, which had no effect. Six days after, the queen, with prince George, went from St. James's to Windſor, where they paſſed moſt part of the ſummer.

All this while the Scots plot made a great noiſe, and, accounts of it ſoon reaching France, Frazer was immediately ſhut up in the Baſtile. On the other hand, Lindſay, who would diſcover nothing before the committee of lords, was tried upon the act made againſt correſponding with France, and ſentenced to die. Being carried to Tyburn, he was told by the ſheriff, that he muſt expect no mercy, unleſs he acknowledged his crime, and diſcovered what he knew of the conſpiracy. But, as it was believed, upon a ſecret intimation, that he was to be reprieved, he ſtill continued obſtinate and mute, and was carried back to Newgate, where he continued priſoner for ſome years, and then, being baniſhed the kingdom, he died in Holland in a very miſerable condition. The truth is, whether, as ſome were of opinion, the miniſtry found the queen inclined to favour the friends of the court of St. Germain's; or whether they themſelves were unwilling to irritate the Scots at this critical juncture; it is moſt certain, that, even after the removal of the earl of Nottingham, the further diſcovery of the plot was proſecuted with great tenderneſs or negligence, as appeared from the following inſtance. Towards the end of June 1704, captain Francis Lacan, late of the lord Galway's regiment of foot in Piedmont, and who, in king James's time, had been an enſign in Dumbarton's regiment, came over from Holland, and upon oath delivered an information in writing to Mr. ſecretary Harley, importing in ſubſtance, "That ſir George Maxwell, captain Levingſton, captain Hayes, and ſeveral other Scots officers, who came from the court of St. Germain's to Holland, near a year and a half before, after having held ſeveral private conſultations in divers ſuſpicious places in the neighbourhood of the Hague; and ſir George having in vain endeavoured to get a paſs from Mr. Stanhope, the queen's envoy, they all embarked for Scotland, to the number of fifteen or ſixteen gentlemen, with three ladies, the ſame day that captain Lacan ſailed from the Brill for England, with the retinue of an envoy from the duke of Savoy." Mr. ſecretary Harley having communicated this information to the lord-treaſurer, orders were immediately diſpatched to Scotland to ſeize ſir George Maxwell and his followers; which was accordingly done juſt upon their landing. But though, by what had already appeared before the committee of the lords and other concurring evidences, it was plain, that they came with a deſign to raiſe commotions in Scotland, yet they were ſoon after ſet at liberty; and ſir George Maxwell was not only permitted to come to London, but highly careſſed by ſome great men. As for captain Lacan, though his information proved ſo true and exact, that his zeal and diligence were at firſt greatly extolled, both by the lord-treaſurer and the ſecretary; and though he did further ſervice to the government, by ſeizing, in St. James's Park, a young Iriſh gentleman, lately a retainer to the court of St. Germain's; yet, after he had attended daily at the ſecretary's office for above three months, and conſumed his ſmall ſubſtance, he was ſent back to Holland, without any other recompence than empty promiſes. Nor was this all, for the Iriſh youth, who to ſave his life, readily diſcovered all he knew, and who among other particulars, acquainted Mr. ſecretary with the conſtant correſpondence of the duke of Hamilton with the court of St. Germain's, was likewiſe ſent to Holland with Lacan upon ſome idle buſineſs, for fear, as it is probable, that he ſhould relate how eaſily he had eſcaped, or what little ſtreſs was laid on his diſcoveries. At the ſame time came over from France without a paſs, one of the daughters of ſir Theophilus Oglethorpe, and, conſequently, lay at the mercy of the government, but was never brought into trouble on that account.

The duke of Queenſberry's management of the plot was ſo liable to exception, that it was not thought fit to employ him any longer in the adminiſtration of Scotland; and it ſeems, he had likewiſe brought himſelf under the queen's diſpleaſure; for it had been propoſed by ſome of his friends in the houſe of lords, to deſire the queen to communicate to them a letter, which the duke had wrote to her of ſuch a date. This looked like an examination of the queen herſelf, to whom it ought to have been left, to ſend what letters ſhe thought fit to the houſe, and they ought not to call for any one in particular. The matter of this letter made him liable to a very ſevere cenſure in Scotland; for, in plain words, he charged the majority of the parliament, as determined in their proceedings by an influence from St. Germain's. This expoſed him in Scotland to the fury of a parliament; for, how true ſoever this might be, ſuch a repreſentation of a parliament to the queen, eſpecially in matters, which could not be proved, was by the laws of that kingdom, 'leaſing-making,' and a capital crime.

The chief deſign of the court, in the ſeſſion of parliament this ſummer, was to get the ſucceſſion of the crown to be declared, and a ſupply to be given for the army, which was run into a great arrear. In the debates of the former ſeſſion, thoſe, who oppoſed every thing, more particularly the declaring the ſucceſſion, had inſiſted chiefly on motions to bring their own conſtitution to ſuch a ſettlement, that they might ſuffer no prejudice by their king's living in England. Mr. James Johnſton, who had been ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland under king William, was now taken into the adminiſtration, and made lord-regiſter in the room of ſir James Murray of Philiphaugh. He propoſed, in concert with the marquis of Tweedale and ſome others in Scotland, that the queen ſhould empower her commiſſioner to conſent to a revival of the whole ſettlement made by king Charles I. in the year 1641. By that the king named a privy-council, and his miniſters of ſtate in parliament, who had a power to accept of, or to except to the nomination, without being bound to give the reaſon for excepting to it. In the intervals of parliament, the king was to give all employments with the conſent of the privy council. This was the main point of that ſettlement, which was looked upon by the wiſeſt men of that time as a full ſecurity to all their laws and liberties. It did indeed diveſt the crown of a great part of the prerogative, and it brought the parliament into ſome equality with the crown. The queen, upon the repreſentation made to her by her miniſters, offered this as a limitation upon the ſucceſſion, as England had done; and, for doing this, the marquis of Tweedale was named her commiſſioner. The queen alſo ſignified her pleaſure very poſitively to all, who were employed by her, that ſhe expected they ſhould concur in ſettling the ſucceſſion, as they deſired the continuance of her favour. Both the duke of Marlborough and the lord treaſurer Godolphin expreſſed themſelves very fully and poſitively to the ſame purpoſe. Yet it was artfully ſurmiſed and ſpread about by the jacobites, and too eaſily believed by jealous and cautious people, that the court was not ſincere in this matter, or at beſt indifferent as to the ſucceſs. Some went further, and ſaid, that thoſe, who were in a particular confidence at court, ſecretly oppoſed it, and entered into a management or deſign to obſtruct it. There did not appear any good ground for this ſuggeſtion; yet there was matter enough for jealouſy to work on, and this was carefully improved by the jacobites, in order to defeat the deſign; and they were put in hopes, in caſe of a rupture, to have a conſiderable force ſent to ſupport them from Dunkirk.

The duke of Queenſberry being now laid aſide, his colleague, the earl of Cromarty, remained ſole ſecretary of ſtate. The earl of Leven was inſtalled governor of Edinburgh-caſtle in the room of the earl of March, and the earl of Glaſgow removed from the place of treaſurer-deputy, but his place was not filled.

On the 6th of July, the parliament being met, the queen's commiſſioner, appointing the marquis of Tweedale to repreſent her royal perſon, was recorded; and, five days after, the lord commiſſioner preſented to them the following letter from her majeſty.

ANNE, R.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"NOTHING has troubled us more, ſince our acceſſion to the crown of theſe realms than the unſettled ſtate of affairs in that our ancient kingdom.

"We hoped, that the foundations of differences and animoſities, that, to our great regret, we diſcovered among you, did not lie ſo deep, but that, by the methods we have proceeded in, they might have been removed.

"But, inſtead of ſucceſs in our endeavours, the rent is become wider. Nay, diviſions have proceeded to ſuch a height, as to prove matter of encouragement to our enemies beyond ſea to employ their emiſſaries among you, in order to debauch our good ſubjects from their allegiance, and to render that our ancient kingdom a ſcene of blood and diſorder, merely, as they ſpeak, to make you ſerve as a diverſion.

"But we are willing to hope, that none of our ſubjects, but ſuch as were obnoxious to the laws for their crimes, or men of low and deſperate fortunes, or that are otherwiſe inconſiderable, have given ear to ſuch pernicious contrivances. And we have no reaſon to doubt of the aſſurances given us by thoſe now entruſted with our authority, that they will uſe their utmoſt endeavours to convince our people of the advantage and neceſſity of the preſent meaſures. For we have always been inclined to believe, that the late miſtakes did not proceed from any want of duty and reſpect to us, but only from different opinions as to meaſures of government.

"This being the caſe, we are reſolved, for the full contentment and ſatisfaction of our people, to grant whatever can, in reaſon, be demanded for rectifying of abuſes, and quieting the minds of all our good ſubjects.

"In order to this, we have named the marquis of Tweedale our high-commiſſioner, he being a perſon, of whoſe capacity and probity, or qualifications and diſpoſitions to ſerve us and the country, neither we nor you can have any doubt. And we have fully empowered him to give you unqueſtionable queſtionable proofs of our reſolution to maintain the government, both in church and ſtate, as by law eſtabliſhed, in that our kingdom; and to conſent to ſuch laws, as ſhall be found wanting for the further ſecurity of both, and preventing all encroachments on the ſame for the future.

"Thus, having done our part, we are perſuaded, that you will not fail to do yours, but will lay hold on this opportunity to ſhew the world the ſincerity of the profeſſions made to us, and that it was the true love of your country, and the ſenſe of your duty to it; and therefore not the want of duty to us (for we ſhall always reckon theſe two inconſiſtent) that was at the bottom of the late miſunderſtanding.

"The main thing, that we recommend to you, and which we recommend to you with all the earneſtneſs we are capable of, is the 'ſettling the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line,' as that which is abſolutely neceſſary for your own peace and happineſs, as well as our quiet and ſecurity in all our dominions, and for the reputation of our affairs abroad; and conſequently, for the ſtrengthening the proteſtant intereſt every where.

"This has been our fixed judgment and reſolution ever ſince we came to the crown; and, though hitherto opportunities have not anſwered our intentions, matters are now come to that paſs, by the undoubted evidence of the deſigns of our enemies, that a longer delay of ſettling the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line may have very dangerous conſequences; and a diſappointment of it would infallibly make that our kingdom the ſeat of war, and expoſe it to devaſtation and ruin.

"As to the terms and conditions of government, with regard to the ſucceſſor, we have empowered our commiſſioner to give the royal aſſent to whatever can, in reaſon, be demanded, and is in our power to grant, for ſecuring the ſovereignty and liberties of that our ancient kingdom.

"We are now in a war, which makes it neceſſary to provide for the defence of the kingdom; the time of the funds, that were lately given for maintenance of the land-forces, being expired, and the ſaid funds exhauſted, proviſion ought alſo to be made for ſupplying the magazines with arms and ammunition, and repairing the forts and caſtles, and for the charge of the frigates, that prove ſo uſeful for guarding the coaſts.

"We earneſtly recommend to you whatever may contribute to the advancement of true piety, and diſcouragement of vice and immorality; and, we doubt not, but you will take care to encourage trade, and improve the product and manufactories of the nation, in all which, and every thing elſe, that can be for the good and happineſs of our people, you ſhall have our hearty and ready concurrence. We ſhall only add, that unanimity and moderation in all your proceedings will be of great uſe for bringing to a happy iſſue the important affairs, that we have laid before you, and will be alſo moſt acceptable to us. So we bid you heartily farewell."

Given at our court at Windſor-Caſtle, the 25th day of June 1704, and of our reign the third year.

The queen's letter was ſeconded by the ſpeeches of the high-commiſſioner and lord-chancellor, all tending to the ſettling the ſucceſſion, which was the firſt debate [y]. A great party was now wrought on, when they underſtood that the ſettlement of 1641 was to be offered them. For the wiſeſt patriots in that kingdom had always magnified that conſtitution, as the beſt contrived ſcheme that could be deſired: So they went in, with great zeal, to the accepting of it. But thoſe, who, in the former ſeſſion, had rejected all the motions of treating with England with ſome ſcorn, and had made this their conſtant topic, that they muſt, in the firſt place, ſecure their own conſtitution at home, and then they might truſt the reſt to time, and to ſuch accidents, as time might bring forth; now when they ſaw that every thing, that could be deſired, was offered with relation to their own government; they (being reſolved to oppoſe any declaration of the ſucceſſion, what terms ſoever might be granted to obtain it) turned the argument wholly another way; to ſhew the neceſſity of a previous treaty with England. They were upon that told, that the queen was ready to grant them every thing, that was reaſonable, with relation to their own conſtitution, yet, without the concurrence of the parliament of England, ſhe could grant nothing, in which England was concerned; for they were for demanding a ſhare of the plantation trade, and that their ſhips might be comprehended within the act of navigation.

Purſuant to the ſcheme of a treaty before the ſucceſſion, the duke of Hamilton preſented a reſolve, "That this parliament would not proceed to name a ſucceſſor to the crown, until the Scots had a previous treaty with England, in relation to commerce and other concerns." The courtiers, not expecting the cavaliers would have begun ſo early to oppoſe the ſucceſſion, were not a little ſurprized and perplexed at this 'reſolve,' and all they could do for the preſent was to procure a vote, that it ſhould lie on the table till the next meeting four days after. The duke of Hamilton having then moved the reſuming of the conſideration of his reſolve, it occaſioned a warm debate, in which Fletcher of Salton, in a particular manner, repreſented the hardſhips and miſeries, which the Scots had ſuffered ſince the union of the two crowns under one ſovereign, and the impoſſibility of bettering their condition, unleſs they took care to prevent any deſign, that tended to continue the ſame. Upon this, the earl of Rothes preſented another 'reſolve,' "That this parliament would immediately proceed to make ſuch limitations and conditions of government, as might be judged proper for rectifying the conſtitution, and to vindicate and ſecure the ſovereignty and independency of the nation; and then the parliament would take into conſideration the other reſolve offered by the duke of Hamilton for a treaty, previous to the nomination of a ſucceſſor to the crown." This occaſioned a new debate, wherein the court-party earneſtly urged the ſettling the ſucceſſion, before the houſe proceeded to any other buſineſs; and, on the other hand the cavaliers made very ſharp reflections on the proceedings of the parliament of England, with relation to the plot, which had great influence on many members wholly unacquainted with that affair. However, the court-party, thinking they were ſtrong enough to give the earl of Rothes's motion the preference to the duke of Hamilton's reſolve, inſiſted to have the queſtion ſtated, which of the two ſhould come firſt under the conſideration of the houſe? Upon which, great heats aroſe, and ſir James Falconer of Pheſdo ſpoke to this purpoſe, "That he was very glad to ſee ſuch an emulation in the houſe, upon account of the nation's intereſt and ſecurity: That he thought both the reſolves under their conſideration ſo good and neceſſary, that it was pity they ſhould claſh with one another; he therefore moved, that it be reſolved, that this parliament will not proceed to the nomination of a ſucceſſor, until there was a previous treaty with England, for regulating the commerce and other affairs with that nation: And, that this parliament will proceed to make ſuch limitations and conditions of government, as may ſecure the religion, liberty, and independency of this nation, before they proceed to the nomination of a ſucceſſor to the crown." This joint reſolve being put to the vote, it was carried by a majority of fifty-five voices. Of theſe, about thirty were in immediate dependence on the court, and were determined according to directions given them. However, they went no farther in this vote for a treaty with England; for they could not agree among themſelves who ſhould be the commiſſioners, and thoſe, who oppoſed the declaring the ſucceſſion, were concerned for no more, when that affair was laid aſide. It was therefore poſtponed, as a matter about which they took no farther care.

The cavaliers were extremely elated by this victory; and the duke of Athol, lord privy ſeal, and one of their leaders, moved, "That her majeſty having been pleaſed to ſignify by her commiſſioner, that the examination of the plot ſhould be laid before the parliament, his grace would be pleaſed to write to her majeſty, to ſend down the perſons, who were witneſſes, and all the papers relating to that plot, as ſoon as poſſible, that the affair might be thoroughly examined; and thoſe, who were unjuſtly accuſed, might be vindicated, and the guilty puniſhed." Whereupon the lord chancellor declared, by order of the lord commiſſioner, that his grace had written, and would write again to the queen, for all the evidences relating to the plot. Two days after, the duke of Hamilton moved, "That the parliament would proceed to make ſuch limitations and conditions of government, for the rectifying of the conſtitution, as might ſecure the religion, liberty, and independency of this nation; and that they would name the commiſſioners to treat with England, for regulating the commerce, and other concerns with the nation, previous [y] The earl of Cromarty made alſo a ſtrange ſpeech (which was printed) running into a diſtinction among divines, between the 'revealed and ſecret' will of God, ſhewing, that no ſuch diſtinction could be applied to the queen; ſhe had but one will, and that was revealed: But, notwithſtanding this ſpeech, it was ſtill ſuſpected, that at leaſt her miniſters had a ſecret will in this caſe.

This

to all other buſineſs, except an act for two months ceſs, firſt of all to be granted for the preſent ſubſiſtence of her majeſty's forces." Upon this, the earl of Marchmont made a long ſpeech, importing, "That, ſince the houſe had reſolved not to fall immediately upon ſettling the ſucceſſion, it was reaſonable, that an act ſhould be made to exclude all popiſh ſucceſſors." To which the duke of Hamilton anſwered, "That he ſhould be one of the firſt, who ſhould draw his ſword againſt a popiſh ſucceſſor, though he did not think this a proper time, either to ſettle the ſucceſſion, or to conſider of the earl of Marchmont's propoſal." After ſome debate, the conſideration of the duke of Hamilton's motion was adjourned for two days, when it was moved, 'That the act preſented by the lord juſtice Clark, and declared by him to be for fourteen months ſupply, payable in two years, might likewiſe be conſidered. After a debate, it was put to the vote, Whether to give a ceſs for two, or for fourteen months? And, it was carried by ſixteen voices, that it ſhould be for two months only. The act of ſupply was, four days after, taken again into conſideration; but there was tacked to it a great part of the bill for the ſecurity of the nation, which (as hath been related) paſſed the former ſeſſion of parliament, but was refuſed by the throne. After ſome debate, the following reſolve was offered by the lord Roſs, "That the parliament will proceed to grant two months ſupply for ſubſiſting her majeſty's forces; and, as ſoon as the act of ſecurity, now read, has got the royal aſſent, will give four months more." And then a ſecond reſolve was preſented by the earl of Roxburgh, "That there be a firſt reading marked on the act of ſecurity; and that both this act, and that for the ſupply, lie, without being further proceeded on, until her majeſty's commiſſioner receive inſtructions as to the 'act of ſecurity,' it being then free for the parliament to proceed to the acts jointly or ſeparately, as they ſhould think fit." After reaſoning on both theſe reſolves, the queſtion was ſtated, Whether to approve the lord Roſs's or the earl of Roxburgh's? It was carried for the lord Roſs's; and the 'act of ſecurity' being read, a firſt reading was ordered to be marked thereon. Theſe things were carried with great heat and vehemence; for (as was before obſerved) a national humour of being independent on England fermented ſo ſtrongly among all ſorts of people without doors, that thoſe, who went not into every hot motion that was made, were conſidered as the betrayers of their country: And they were ſo expoſed to a popular fury, that ſome of thoſe, who ſtudied to ſtop the torrent, were thought to be in danger of their lives. The preſbyterians were ſo overawed with theſe proceedings, that, though they wiſhed well to the ſettling the ſucceſſion, they durſt not openly declare it. The dukes of Hamilton and Athol led all theſe violent motions, and the whole nation was ſtrangely inflamed.

The miniſters were in great perplexity how to act, with regard to the ſupply bill, and the tack, that was joined to it. If it was denied, the army could be no longer kept up; they had run ſo far in arrear, that, conſidering the poverty of the country, that could not be carried on much longer. Some ſuggeſted, that it ſhould be propoſed to the Engliſh miniſtry to advance the ſubſiſtence money, till better meaſures could be taken; but none of the Scots miniſters would agree to that. An army is reckoned to belong to thoſe, who pay; and therefore an army, paid from England, would be called an Engliſh army. Nor was it poſſible to manage ſuch a thing ſecretly. It was well known that there was no money in the Scots treaſury to pay them; ſo that, if money were once brought into the treaſury how ſecretly ſoever, all men muſt conclude, that it came from England. And men's minds were then ſo full of the conceit of independency, that, if a ſuſpicion aroſe of any ſuch practice, probably it would have occaſioned tumults. Even the army itſelf was ſo inflamed with this temper, that it was believed, that neither officers nor ſoldiers would have taken their pay, if they had believed it came from England. The affair was therefore reduced to this dilemma, that either the army muſt be diſbanded, or the bill muſt paſs. It is true, the army was a very ſmall one, not above three thouſand; but it was ſo ordered, that it was double or treble officered; ſo that it could have been eaſily increaſed to a much greater number, if there had been occaſion for it. The officers had ſerved long, and were men of a good character. Since therefore there were alarms of an invaſion, which both ſides looked for, and the intelligence, which the court had from from France, aſſured them it was intended; the miniſters thought the inconveniencies ariſing from the tack might be remedied afterwards; but that the breaking of the army was ſuch a pernicious thing, and might end ſo fatally, that it was not to be ventured on. Therefore, by common conſent, a letter was wrote to the queen, which was ſigned by all the miniſters in Scotland, in which they laid the whole matter before her, and every thing ſtated and balanced; concluding with their humble advice to paſs the bill. This was very heavy on the lord Godolphin, on whoſe counſel the queen chiefly relied. He ſaw, that the ill conſequences of breaking the army, and laying that kingdom open to an invaſion, would fall on him, if he ſhould, in contradiction to the advice given by the miniſtry of Scotland, have adviſed the queen to reject the bill. This was under conſideration in the end of July, when affairs abroad were in a great uncertainty; for though the victory at Schellemburg was a good ſtep, yet the great deciſion was not then come. He thought therefore, conſidering the ſtate of affairs, and the accidents, which might happen, that it was the ſafeſt thing for the queen to comply with the advice of thoſe to whom ſhe truſted the affairs of that kingdom. The queen ſent orders to paſs the bill, which being done, the commiſſioner made the following ſpeech on the occaſion.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"AT your ſitting down, her majeſty, in her gracious letter, recommended to you two things, which ſhe thought moſt neceſſary for your own quiet and ſecurity, as well as for that of her government; the ſettling of the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line, and the providing for the ſubſiſtence of the forces, the funds laſt given for that end being then exhauſted. The firſt of theſe you have not thought fit for your intereſt to do at this time. I heartily wiſh you may meet with an opportunity for it more for your advantage at another. The other all of you ſeemed moſt ready and willing to go into, as witneſs the ſeveral motions and reſolves made thereanent; but, withal, ſhewed ſtrong inclinations for an 'act of ſecurity,' as abſolutely neceſſary. I told you then, as I had done at firſt, that I had been fully impowered and inſtructed, not only as to that, but many other things for your good; but, upon the alteration of circumſtances, had not now the liberty to make uſe of thoſe powers even as to that, till I had acquainted her majeſty, and knew her mind, which I would do, and uſe my utmoſt intereſt to procure it favourable; which was the true reaſon of your long adjournment, and not what was inſinuated by ſome, who ought to have known me better, the character I have in the world being, as I hope, above ſo mean a reflection.

"And now, my lords and gentlemen, I can tell you, that, from her majeſty's innate goodneſs and gracious diſpoſition towards you, it hath been more eaſy for me and ſome other of her ſervants to prevail with her, than perhaps was by others expected; ſo that you have an 'act of ſecurity' ſufficient for the ends propoſed. And it is hoped, at the ſame time, you will perfect that of ſupply, which you yourſelves ſeem convinced to be abſolutely neceſſary at this time, and without which neither the forces can be kept on foot, nor any frigate maintained for guarding our coaſts and ſecuring our trade; both which now lying before you, I hope you will go preſently about, that, when finiſhed, they may have the royal aſſent, which I am ready to give. And therefore you may have time to proceed to other buſineſs relating to trade, or your other concerns, wherein I ſhall be willing to comply with your deſires, ſo they be within the bounds of my inſtructions."

Thus this 'act of ſecurity' was paſſed after the battle of Blenheim was over, but ſeveral days before the news of it reached England. When the act paſſed, copies of it were ſent to England, where it was ſoon printed by thoſe, who were uneaſy at the lord Godolphin's holding the white ſtaff, and reſolved to make uſe of this againſt him; for the whole blame of paſſing it was caſt upon him [z]. It was not poſſible to prove, that he had adviſed the queen to it, and therefore ſome took it by another handle, and reſolved to [z] This act was in ſubſtance much the ſame with that to which the duke of Queenſberry had refuſed the royal aſſent. By the act it was provided, that, if the queen ſhould die without iſſue, a parliament ſhould preſently meet, and they were to declare the ſucceſſor to the crown, who ſhould not be the ſame perſon, that was poſſeſſed of the crown of England, unleſs before that time there ſhould be a ſettlement made in parliament, of the rights and liberties of the nation, independent on Engliſh councils. By another clauſe in the act, it was made lawful to arm the ſubjects, and to train them and put them in a poſture of defence. This was chiefly preſſed, in behalf of the beſt affected in the kingdom, who were not armed; for the Highlanders, who were the worſt affected, were well armed; ſo, to balance that, it was moved, that leave ſhould be given to arm the reſt.

urge it againſt him, that he had not perſuaded the queen to reject it, though that ſeemed a great ſtretch; for, he being a ſtranger to Scotland, it might have been liable to more objection, if he had preſumed to adviſe the queen to refuſe a bill paſſed in the parliament of that kingdom, which all the miniſtry there adviſed her to paſs. Severe cenſures were paſſed upon this act. It was ſaid, that the two kingdoms were now divided by law, and that the Scots were putting themſelves in a poſture to defend it; and all ſaw by whoſe advices this was done. One thing, which contributed to keep up an ill humour in the parliament of Scotland, was more juſtly imputed to him. The queen had promiſed to ſend down to them all the examinations relating to the plot. If theſe had been ſent down, probably in the firſt heat the matter might have been carried far againſt the duke of Queenſberry. But he, who ſtayed all the while in London, got it to be repreſented to the queen, that the ſending down theſe examinations, with the perſons concerned in them, would run the ſeſſion into ſo much heat, and into ſuch a length, that it would divert them quite from conſidering the ſucceſſion, and it might produce a tragical ſcene. Upon theſe ſuggeſtions, the queen altered her reſolution of ſending them down; and though repeated applications were made to her, both by the parliament and her miniſters, to have them ſent, yet no anſwer was made to theſe, nor was ſo much as an excuſe made for not ſending them. The duke of Queenſberry, having gained this point, got all his friends to join with the party, that oppoſed the new miniſtry. This both defeated all their projects, and ſoftened the ſpirits of thoſe, who were ſo ſet againſt him, that in their firſt fury no ſtop could have been put to their proceedings. But now the party, that had deſigned to ruin him, was ſo much wrought on by the aſſiſtance, that his friends gave them in this ſeſſion, that they reſolved to preſerve him.

The parliament having granted a ſix months ceſs for the pay of the army, they were entering upon debates about the plot, and the proceedings of the Engliſh houſe of lords in that affair, as an undue intermeddling with their concerns, and an encroachment upon the ſovereignty and independence of their nation, when the high commiſſioner told them, that he was not allowed to give them any more time, but that they ſhould ſoon have another opportunity of doing what ſtill remained to be done; for no diſappointment, her majeſty had met with, could alter, in the leaſt, her favourable diſpoſitions towards that her ancient kingdom. After which, the parliament was prorogued to the 7th of October. However, before they ſeparated, they drew up an addreſs to the queen, deſiring, that the evidence and papers, relating to the plot, might be laid before them againſt the next ſeſſion.

This was the ſtate of that nation, which was aggravated very odiouſly all over England. It was confidently, though, as was afterwards known, very falſely reported, that great quantities of arms were brought over, and diſperſed through the whole kingdom. And it being well known, how poor the nation was at that time, it was ſaid, thoſe arms were paid for by other hands, in imitation of what it was believed cardinal Richelieu did in the year 1638. Another thing was given out very maliciouſly by the lord Godolphin's enemies, that he had given directions under-hand, to hinder the declaring the ſucceſſion; and that the ſecret of this was truſted to Mr. Johnſton, who, they ſaid, talked openly one way, and acted ſecretly another, though there never appeared any colour of truth in thoſe reports. Great uſe was to be made of the affairs of Scotland, becauſe there was no ground of complaint of any thing in the adminiſtration at home. All the duke of Marlborough's enemies ſaw, that his chief ſtrength lay in the credit which the lord Godolphin was in at home, while he was ſo ſucceſsful abroad; ſo that, it being impoſſible to attack him in ſuch a courſe of glory, they laid their aims againſt the lord-treaſurer. The tories reſolved to attack him, and that diſpoſed the whigs to preſerve him; and this was ſo managed by them that it gave a great turn to all the councils at home.

Immediately after the adjournment of the parliament, the courtiers repaired to London, where the marquis of Tweedale was made chancellor of Scotland; the earls of Seafield and Roxburgh, ſecretaries of ſtate: the earl of Rothes, lord-privy ſeal; the earl of Cromarty, juſtice general; Mr. Bailie of Jervis-wood, treaſurer-deputy; and the earl of Selkirk, lord Belhaven, and ſir John Hume, lords of the treaſury; ſir William Hamilton was alſo made juſtice Clerk; but he lived not to enjoy that office many months, and was ſucceeded by Adam Cockburn of Ormiſtown. A new commiſſion was, at the ſame time, ſent down to Edinburgh, by which moſt of the cavaliers, and all the duke of Queenſberry's friends, were laid aſide, and it was made up entirely of Scots revolutioners. And thus the adminiſtration of affairs in Scotland was lodged in the hands of a body of men, who concurred with the meaſures at that time purſued by the court of England. It is now time to turn to the operations of the war.

The affairs of the empire were in the beginning of this campaign in a very deſperate condition. The emperor was reduced to the laſt extremities. The elector of Bavaria was maſter of the Danube as far as Paſſau, and the malecontents in Hungary were making a formidable progreſs. The emperor was not in a condition to maintain a defenſive war long on both ſides, nor was he able to make any oppoſition at all againſt them, ſhould they once come to act by concert. Thus his affairs had a very gloomy appearance, and utter ruin was to be apprehended. Vienna was in apparent danger of being beſieged on both ſides, and it was not capable of making a long defence; ſo that the houſe of Auſtria ſeemed loſt beyond all proſpect of a recovery. Prince Eugene wiſely propoſed, that the emperor ſhould implore the protection of the queen of great Britain, which was agreed to, and count Wratiſlaw managed the affair at the court of England with great application and ſecrecy [a]. The duke of Marlborough ſaw the neceſſity of undertaking the emperor's relief, and reſolved to uſe all poſſible endeavours to put it in execution. When he went into Holland in the winter, he propoſed it to the penſionary, and other perſons of the greateſt confidence. They approved it, but it was not adviſeable to propoſe it to the States; ſince at that time many would not have thought their country ſafe, if their army ſhould be ſent ſo far from them; and nothing could be long a ſecret, which was propoſed to ſuch an aſſembly, whereas the main hope of ſucceeding in this deſign lay in the ſecrecy, with which it was conducted. Therefore, under the pretext of carrying on the war to the Moſelle, every thing was prepared, that was neceſſary for executing the true deſign.

The duke of Marlborough, with his brother general Churchill, lieutenant general Lumley, the earl of Orkney, and other general officers, embarked for Holland, and, in three days, arrived at the Hague. Two days after his coming, he was attended by a ſolemn deputation of the States, in order to confer with him. The conference laſted ſix hours. The chief ſubject of debate was about ſending a good army towards the Moſelle. This was all that was pro-

[a] However for form ſake, and to prepare the way for the reception of a reſolution, that had been already taken, Wratiſlaw preſented the following memorial to the queen, on the ſecond of April:

"That he had ſeveral times repreſented to her majeſty's miniſters, by word of mouth, the preſſing neceſſities of the empire, by the breaking in of a conſiderable army of French into Bavaria; which (together with the inſurrection in Hungary) had reduced the Imperial hereditary countries to an incredible perplexity and ſiconfuon; ſo that it was to be feared, that an entire revolution and deſolation of all Germany would follow, if ſome ſpeedy aſſiſtance were not applied, proportionable to the great dangers they were threatened with. He was indeed extremely well ſatisfied with the zeal, which her majeſty's miniſters had for the common cauſe, and with the attention they gave to his repreſentations. But nothing being as yet reſolved on, though the ſeaſon was far advanced; and the final reſolution on the ſeveral ſchemes, which had been preſented, being deferred till the arrival of the duke of Marlborough at the Hague; he thought himſelf obliged, before his grace's departure, to do his utmoſt endeavour, by repreſenting in writing the danger, wherein the emperor and empire were at preſent involved. That her majeſty out of the ſame zeal for preſerving the liberties of Europe, for which ſhe was ſo much famed, would be pleaſed to order the duke of Marlborough, her captain-general, ſeriouſly to conſult with the States General, concerning the ſpeedieſt method for aſſiſting the empire; or, at leaſt, to conduct part of the troops in her majeſty's pay beyond the ſea, to preſerve Germany from a total ſubverſion; it not being juſt in itſelf, nor any ways advantageous to the common cauſe, that her majeſty's troops ſhould continue on the frontiers of Holland, which were not in the leaſt threatened by the enemy, and were defended by great rivers and ſtrong places; whilſt the empire was deſtroyed by the French troops with fire and ſword." In concluſion, count Wratiſlaw declared, "That the repreſentations he had made were grounded on the alliance concluded between the emperor, England, and Holland; purſuant to which, he hoped, her majeſty would give ſuch orders, as were neceſſary for the aſſiſtance of Germany, by the want of which he foreſaw the miſchiefs, that would ariſe to the common cauſe, eſpecially if the orders of the States General to recall their troops from the empire ſhould take place, at a time, when France endeavoured to ſend a powerful aſſiſtance to their army in Bavaria."

To this memorial the queen was pleaſed to return an anſwer, importing, "That ſhe had given directions to the duke of Marlborough, to take the moſt effectual methods with the States General of the United Provinces, her good allies and confederates, to ſend a ſpeedy relief to his Imperial majeſty and the empire, and to preſs the States to take the neceſſary meaſures to reſcue Germany from the imminent danger, to which it was now expoſed." Lamberti III.

It is ſaid the duke of Marlborough communicated his project at firſt only to the queen, prince George, and the treaſurer, and in Holland only to the penſionary and deputy Geldermallen.

poſed in public, and to this the States of Zealand, and two other provinces, ſtrongly objected. They would not agree, that the duke ſhould have an unlimited command to lead the army where he pleaſed, and thought it a very dangerous project to march the troops at ſo great a diſtance. The Zealand deputies oppoſed it ſo ſtrenuouſly, that the duke was obliged to tell them plainly, that he had the queen's poſitive orders to march with the troops in her pay, towards the Moſelle. Accordingly, having taken his leave of the States, the duke ſet out from Holland, and, in five days, arrived at Maeſtricht, where his army was encamped. About the ſame time, the States regulated the poſts of their general officers. Monſieur Auverquerque, their field marſhal, was appointed to command their forces on the Maeſe, having under him the counts de Tilly and Noyelles; Slangenburg thoſe on the Moſelle; Saliſch in Brabant; and Spaar and Fagel in Flanders.

From Maeſtricht the duke of Marlborough marched to Bedburg, and his camp being near Cologne, he was waited on by the canons of that chapter, the prince of Saxzeits, biſhop of Roab, the prince of Heſſe, count Briançon, the duke of Savoy's envoy to the queen of England, and other princes and Generals.

The French in Flanders began by this time to be alarmed, though they were far from ſuſpecting the duke's real deſign. His marching towards Coblentz, and the great preparations, which were making in that place, made them believe, that he deſigned to open the campaign with the ſiege of Traerbach, and endeavour to advance along the Moſelle into France. Upon this ſuppoſition they detached five thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe towards that river, and gave out, that they intended the ſiege of Huy, vainly imagining, that, by this report, they might ſtop the progreſs of the Engliſh general. But the duke, well knowing that the forces, which were left in Flanders under Auverquerque, were ſufficient to fruſtrate any attempt, which the French could make on that ſide, continued his march, and advanced from Bedburg to Kerpenord, the next day to Kalſecken, where he received an expreſs from prince Lewis of Baden, with ſome intercepted letters, by which it appeared, that the French intended to force their paſſage through the Black Foreſt, and, after joining the Bavarians, to march directly to Vienna. About the ſame time, the duke received advice from the Netherlands, that the court of France had ſent poſitive orders to Villeroy, to march towards the Moſelle with five and thirty battalions, and ſix and forty ſquadrons, being ſtill firmly perſuaded, that the duke would act on that ſide. Upon this the duke gave immediate orders for his forces to march with all expedition; and whilſt the army was on a full march, he went to take a view of the fortifications of Bonne, where, having given his directions to the governor of that place, he returned in the evening to the army. Here he received certain advice, that the recruits for the French army in Bavaria, with farther reinforcements, had joined the elector three days before at Villingen. But the duke, notwithſtanding this junction of the enemies, was, on account of the number of the troops, which the French left behind them, and by the marſhal's marching back with the reſt of his army towards the Rhine, confirmed in his opinion, that the enemies were as yet wholly ignorant of his deſign. He therefore continued his march with unwearied diligence, and advanced to the camp of Neudorff near Coblentz, where, beſides Mr. Davenant, the queen's agent at Franckfort, and monſieur d' Amelo, envoy extraordinary from the States General, count Wratiſlaw, in his return from London, waited on him, to ſettle all things for his farther march, and his conjunction with the Imperial army. Then the duke paſſed the Neckar near Ladenburg, where he reſted three days. Having by this time, gained the advance of ſome days of the French army, he wrote to the States from Ladenburg, to let them know that he had the queen's order to march to the relief of the empire, with which he hoped they would agree, and allow his carrying their troops to ſhare in the honour of that expedition. He had their anſwer as quick as the courier could bring it, by which they approved of the deſign, and of his carrying their troops with him. So he had now the whole army at his own diſpoſal.

The French imagining that he would advance to the Upper Rhine, Villeroy marched thither with all poſſible ſpeed; and at the ſame time, a detachment of ſeven battalions and twenty-one ſquadrons, from the confederate army in Flanders, under the duke of Wirtemberg, followed the duke of Marlborough, who marched from Ladenburg to Mildenheim, where, the next day, prince Eugene paid him a viſit. The conſultations between the prince and the duke laſted ſeveral hours; and it was agreed upon, that the two armies ſhould join, and the duke and prince Lewis of Baden ſhould command each day alternately, and that prince Eugene ſhould go upon the Rhine, to command a ſeparate army. The troops being drawn up in order of battle, the duke accompanied prince Eugene to a review, when the prince ſeemed wonderfully pleaſed to find them in ſuch excellent order after ſo long a march [b]. The next day, prince Lewis of Baden arrived in the camp at Great Heppach, where a conference was held in the evening. The day following, the troops marched from Great Heppach, and prince Lewis went to his army on the Danube, and prince Eugene rid poſt for Philipſburg, to command the army on the Rhine; and, on the 22d, joined prince Lewis of Baden at Waſterſtet. On the 24th the army marched from thence to Elchingen; the next day to Gingen. On the 30th the army marched from thence to Landthauſſen on the right, and Balmertſhoffen on the left, and paſſed ſo near the enemy's camp, that lieutenant general Bulau was ſent out the night before with a detachment of two thouſand horſe and dragoons, to ſecure the avenues, by which they might might have diſturbed the march of the allies, who, by this means, proceeded without any oppoſition. On the 1ſt of July, they continued their march in ſight of the enemy's intrenchments at Dillingen, and incamped the right at Amerdighen, and the left at Ondringen.

While they lay in this camp, the duke received advice, that the elector of Bavaria had ſent the beſt of his infantry to reinforce count d'Arco, who was poſted at Schellenberg, a riſing ground on the Danube, near Donawert, where, for ſeveral days, he had cauſed ſome thouſands of men to work upon intrenchments, as being a poſt of vaſt importance. The duke reſolved to march and attack the enemy; and the neceſſary directions being given to the army, on the 2d of July, early in the morning, he advanced with a detachment of thirty ſquadrons of Engliſh and Dutch, a conſiderable number of foot commanded by lieutenant general Goor, three battalions of imperial grenadiers under prince Lewis of Baden, and the reſt of the army followed with all poſſible diligence. But the march being long, and the ways very bad, they could not reach the river Wermitz, which run by Donawert, till about noon, and it was three hours before the bridges were finiſhed, for the troops and cannon to paſs over. About five o'clock in the afternoon, they came before Schellenberg, and the duke of Marlborough moved up with the horſe as near the enemy's intrenchments, as was neceſſary to take a view of them. In the mean time the artillery began to fire upon the enemy who anſwered briſkly from their batteries for about an hour; when the Engliſh and Dutch foot, ſupported by the horſe and dragoons, began the attack with prodigious reſolution, before the imperialiſts could arrive; but, having the greateſt part of the enemy's forces to contend with, they were at firſt obliged to give ground. Soon after the imperialiſts came up very ſeaſonably, and, being led on in good order by prince Lewis of Baden, advanced to the enemy's works without once firing, threw their faſcines into the ditch, and paſſed over with inconſiderable loſs. The enemy's horſe charged them vigorouſly, but were repulſed; and then, the imperial cavalry entering their intrenchments, and the Engliſh and Dutch breaking in about the ſame time, the confederates made a dreadful ſlaughter of the enemy. Lieutenant general Goor, who commanded the firſt detachment of foot, and major general Beinheim, both in the Dutch ſervice, loſt their lives very much lamented. The horſe and dragoons ſhared the glory of the day with the infantry; and all the confederate troops behaved themſelves with incredible bravery and reſolution. But, as the attack was begun by a battalion of the Engliſh foot-guards, and the regiments of Orkney and Ingoldſby, they ſuffered very much. The enemy's forces conſiſted of thirty two thouſand men, all choice troops, commanded in chief by count d'Arco, and under him by two Bavarian and two French lieutenant generals. As ſoon as the confederates had poſſeſſed the intrenchments, the enemy ran away in great confuſion to Donawert and the Danube; but, being cloſely purſued by the horſe and dragoons, a great many followed the example of their generals, who ſaved themſelves by ſwimming over that river. The loſs of the enemy was computed to be about ſix thouſand men. The confederates made themſelves maſters of ſixteen pieces of cannon, thirteen colours, with all their tents and baggage. The duke of Marlborough gained great honour in this action, giving directions with extraordinary preſence of mind, and expoſing his perſon to the greateſt danger. Prince Lewis of Baden was wounded, having performed the part of a brave experienced general; as was alſo the hereditary prince of Heſſe-Caſſel, who, throughout the whole action, gave ſignal proofs of an undaunted courage. Count Stirum was mortally wounded. General Thungen, count Horn, lieutenant general Wood, major general Paland, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction, were likewiſe wounded. The next day, the Bavarian garriſon quitted Donawert [c], upon the approach of the confederates, and broke down the bridges; but had not time to deſtroy their ammunition and proviſions, as they had intended.

[b] Prince Eugene ſaid to the duke: "I never ſaw better horſes, arms, and cloathing, but all theſe things may be purchaſed with money; what ſtrikes me moſt, is the courage which appears in the countenance of the ſoldiers of which I never ſaw the like in any troops." Lamberti, III. 80.

The elector of Bavaria was no ſooner informed of the defeat of his troops at Schellenberg, than he quitted his ſtrong camp between Dillingen and Lavengen, and came to the other ſide of the Danube, over againſt Donawert, in his march to the river Lech, to prevent the confederates cutting off his retreat to his country.

On the 5th of July, the duke of Marlborough paſſed the Danube near Donawert; and, on the 17th, count de Friſe, with a detachment of four thouſand men and twelve pieces of cannon, marched over the river Lech, and took poſt in the country of Bavaria. The whole army marched at the ſame time, and encamped with the right at Hamber, and the left at Ginderkingen. Upon the firſt notice of the allies having begun to paſs the Lech, the garriſon of Newburg marched out, and retired to Ingoldſtadt. Whereupon, a detachment of dragoons was immediately ſent out by the duke of Marlborough, to take poſſeſſion of that place; and prince Lewis of Baden ordered general Herberville, who commanded a ſeparate body of between three and four thouſand men on the other ſide of the Danube, to remain there, for the ſecurity of that important place, and for the drawing of proviſions out of Franconia, for the ſubſiſtence of the confederate troops, while they continued in Bavaria. On the 10th, the whole army paſſed the Lech; and, on the 13th, count Vecklen, general of the Palatine horſe arrived from prince Eugene of Savoy with an account, that the marſhals Villeroy and Tallard had paſſed the Rhine above fort Kehl, in order to ſuccour the elector of Bavaria; for which reaſon he deſired a reinforcement of horſe, to enable him the better to obſerve the enemy's motions. Upon which, prince Maximilian of Hanover was detached with thirty ſquadrons of imperial horſe, with orders to join prince Eugene with all poſſible diligence.

The enemy having left a garriſon at Rain [d], the confederate generals reſolved to attack it; and, in order thereto, the army decamped from Ginderkingen, paſſed the Lech, and came with the right to Stauda, and the left to Bercheim. The garriſon at firſt ſeemed reſolved to defend the place to the laſt extremity; but, the beſiegers playing upon the town with twenty-ſeven pieces of cannon, their approaches were carried on ſo ſucceſsfully, that in two days the governor deſired to capitulate; and, the articles being agreed on, the garriſon marched out the next day, to the number of about four hundred foot, commanded by the count de Mercy, brigadier general, and were conducted by a party of horſe to the elector of Bavaria's camp near Augſburg. There were found in the place twenty-four braſs cannon, a conſiderable quantity of proviſions, and ſome ammunition. The allies, encouraged by the ſucceſs of their arms, were willing to puſh their advantages; and, on the 18th, marched to attack the poſt of Aicha, which had a garriſon of eight or nine hundred Bavarians; who, refuſing to ſubmit, were part of them put to the ſword, the reſt made priſoners of war, and the town permitted to be plundered by the ſoldiers. The confederate army having refreſhed themſelves two days at Aicha, marched from thence on the 21ſt, and the next day poſſeſſed themſelves of Friburg.

The duke of Marlborough, having now the elector of Bavaria at ſo great a diſadvantage, entered upon a treaty with him, and offered him what terms he could deſire, either for himſelf or his brother, even to the paying him the whole charge of the war, upon condition that he would immediately break with the French, and ſend his army into Italy to join with the imperialiſts there. The elector's ſubjects, who were now at mercy, preſſed him vehemently to accept of theſe terms; and he ſeemed inclined to hearken to them, and meſſengers went often between the two armies. But this was done only to gain time, for he ſent courier after courier with moſt preſſing inſtances to haſten the advance of the French army. When he ſaw, that he could gain no more time, the matter went ſo far, that articles were ordered to be made ready for ſigning, which, in concluſion, he refuſed to do. This refuſal was highly reſented by the duke of Marlborough and prince Lewis of Baden, who immediately ſent out the count de la Tour, general of the imperial horſe, and the count of Eaſt Frieſeland, lieutenant-general in the Dutch ſervice, with thirty ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, to plunder and burn the country of Bavaria as far as Munich, the capital city, hoping, that either a generous compaſſion for his ſubjects, or the want of ſubſiſtence, would conquer the elector's obſtinacy. In the mean time, the inhabitants of theſe parts were in the greateſt conſternation, and ſent deputies to the duke of Marlborough, offering to pay large contributions to prevent military execution. But the duke replied, "That the forces of the queen of Great Britain were not come into Bavaria to get money, but to bring their prince to reaſon." The two generals therefore put their commiſſion in execution with the utmoſt ſeverity, while the elector of Bavaria and the marſhal de Marſin, having evacuated Ratiſbon, were obliged to confine themſelves within their ſtrong camp and entrenchments at Augſburg, in expectation of another army from France under marſhal Tallard, which, notwithſtanding all the vigilance and precaution of prince Eugene, arrived before the end of July at Biberach near Ulm, to the number of about twenty-two thouſand men. Upon this, the elector marched with his army from Augſburg, and took that opportunity to join the French.

The confederate army, under the duke of Marlborough, having intelligence of theſe proceedings, decamped on the 4th of Auguſt from Friburg, and marched that night to Kippach.

The next morning they decamped from thence, and marched to Hokenwert, where they continued two days. During that time, the duke of Marlborough, prince Eugene, and prince Lewis of Baden held a council of war; wherein it was agreed, the prince Lewis ſhould beſiege Ingoldſtadt, whilſt the other two were to obſerve the elector of Bavaria. On the 8th, the army under the duke of Marlborough marched from Hokenwert to St. Sanditzel; and, on the 9th, from thence to Axheim; and, at the ſame time, prince Lewis went another way, and bent his march directly to Newburg, in order to inveſt Ingoldſtadt. The ſame day, the duke of Marlborough received advice, that the enemy had paſſed part of their army over the Danube, at Lewingen: Whereupon he ordered general Churchill to march with a ſtrong detachment over that river at Schonevelt; to reinforce, prince Eugene, who lay encamped near Donawert. The 10th, they marched to Schonevelt; and, the day following, intelligence was brought, that the enemy's troops had all got over the Danube; ſo that the duke of Marlborough immediately ordered his army to march by break of day, and paſs that river likewiſe; which was performed accordingly, and, at night, the whole army, being rejoined, encamped at Munſter. On the 12th, very early in the morning, the generals of the allies went to view the enemy's army, taking with them all the piquet guard, which conſiſted of twenty-eight ſquadrons. The duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene went up to the top of a tower called Thiffingen, that they might the better obſerve the poſture of the enemy; and they took notice, that their advanced ſquadrons, which were in motion towards the allies, ſtopped ſhort, after they had perceived them. They were poſſeſſed of a very advantageous poſt, on a hill near Hochſtet [e], their right flank being covered by the Danube, and the village of Blenheim [f], and the left by the village of Lutzengen; and they had a rivulet before them, whoſe banks were very high, and the bottom marſhy. However, after ſome conſultation, it was thought proper to fall upon the enemy, before they had time to fortify themſelves in that poſt. The duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene ſaw the danger of being forced to lie idle in their own camp, till their forage ſhould be conſumed, and their proviſions ſpent. They had alſo intercepted letters from marſhal Villeroy to the elector of Bavaria, by which it appeared, that he had orders to march into Wirtemberg, to deſtroy that country, and to cut off the communication with the Rhine, which muſt have been fatal to the allies. The neceſſary diſpoſitions were therefore made for the next morning's action. Many of the general officers came and repreſented to the duke of Marlborough the difficulties of the deſign; he anſwered, That he ſaw theſe well, but the thing was abſolutely neceſſary; ſo they were ſent to give orders every where, which were received all over the army with an alacrity, that gave a happy preſage of the ſucceſs which followed.

On the 13th of Auguſt, a day, which decided the elector's fate by the loſs of all his country, early in the morning, the whole confederate army marched from Munſter, leaving their tents ſtanding; and the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene, having poſted themſelves on a riſing ground, ſummoned all the general officers, to give them the neceſſary directions, in order to attack the enemy; upon which, the army advanced to the plain, and were drawn up in order of battle. About nine o'clock, the enemy fired ſome cannon upon our troops, as they were marching to form the line, who were anſwered from our batteries with good ſucceſs; and both armies continued cannonading each other till near one; during which time, the duke of Marlborough ordered a little rivulet, and moraſs in the front of the enemy to be ſounded; and, where it was found impaſſable, orders were given to the horſe of the ſecond line of the allies to provide themſelves, each ſquadron with twenty faſcines, to facilitate the paſſage. Theſe preparations being made, the duke of Marlborough gave orders for a general attack, which was begun about one o'clock. Prince Eugene and the imperial general officers were on the right: General Churchill, the lord Cutts, lieutenant-general Lumley, the lord Orkney, and lieutenant general Ingoldſby, with the reſt of the Engliſh and Dutch generals, were on the left; and the duke of Marlborough in the center commanded the whole. Major general Wilks made the firſt onſet with five Engliſh battalions of Howe, Ingoldſby, Marlborough, Rowe, and North and Grey, and four battalions of Heſſians, ſupported by the lord Cutts, and major general St. Paul, with eleven other battalions, and fifteen ſquadrons of horſe, under the command of major general Wood. The five Engliſh battalions, led on by brigadier Rowe, who charged on foot at the head of his own regiment with unparalleled intrepidity, aſſaulted the village of Blenheim, advancing to the very muzzles of the enemies muſkets, and ſome of the officers exchanging thruſts of ſwords with the French through the paliſadoes. But, being expoſed to a fire much ſuperior to their own, they were ſoon obliged to retire, leaving behind them one third part of their men either killed or mortally wounded, the brigadier who commanded them, being among the laſt. In this retreat, they were purſued by thirteen ſquadrons of the 'French Gendarmerie' and carabineers who would have entirely cut them to pieces, had not the Heſſian infantry ſtopped their career, by the great fire they made upon them. The French being repulſed, and forced to fly in their turn, were chaced by five ſquadrons of Engliſh horſe, who, by this time, had paſſed the rivulet; but, whilſt the enemy rallied themſelves, ſome freſh brigades, ſuperior in number, came to their aſſiſtance, charged the aſſailants with great vigour, and obliged many of them to repaſs the rivulet with great precipitation. Here again the Heſſian foot performed ſignal ſervice, putting the French to the rout by their continual fire, and regaining the colours, which they had taken from Rowe's regiment.

While Rowe's brigade rallied themſelves, that of Ferguſon, commanded by himſelf, attacked the village of Blenheim on the left, but with no better ſucceſs; and, though both returned three or four times to the charge with equal vigour, yet they were both ſtill repulſed with like diſadvantage, ſo that it was found impoſſible to force the enemy in that poſt, without entirely ſacrificing the confederate infantry.

The Engliſh foot having thus begun the engagement on the left, the horſe of the ſame wing paſſed the rivulet, with great bravery, over-againſt the center or main battalia of the enemy; as did likewiſe that of the right wing, having made ſeveral paſſages with divers pieces of wood. After which, they drew up in order of battle, the French and Bavarians giving them all the time, that could be deſired for that purpoſe, keeping themſelves very quiet on the hills, which they were poſſeſſed of, without deſcending into the meadows towards the rivulet, ſo that even the ſecond line of the horſe had time to form themſelves: And to this capital fault of the French, the confederates were thought to have owed principally their victory. This neglect is ſaid to have proceeded from an ill-timed haughtineſs and preſumption of marſhal de Tallard, who being informed, that the allies were laying bridges on the rivulet, uſed this expreſſion, "If they have not bridges enough, I will lend them ſome;" and when they told him that our troops were actually coming over the rivulet, he is reported to have ſaid, "Let them paſs; the more comes over, the more we ſhall have to kill and make priſoners." But, on the other hand, it is alledged by ſome, that he had given poſitive orders not to let the enemy paſs the rivulet, but to charge them as they paſſed, which orders were not executed[g].

At length the duke's cavalry moving towards the hill, that of marſhal de Tallard came down, and charged them with a great deal of fury; the French infantry, which were poſted at Blenheim, making at the ſame time a terrible fire from behind ſome hedges on their flank, which were advanced too near that village, ſo that the firſt line was put into ſuch diſorder, that part of them retired beyond the rivulet. Upon this, the duke gave orders to lieutenant-general Bulaw, commander in chief of the troops of Lunenburgh, to bring up his own regiment of dragoons and two of the troops of Zell, which charged the enemy's horſe with ſo much vigour, that they broke them, and drove them beyond the ſecond rivulet called Meul Weyer, and from thence to the very hedges of the village of Blenheim. This gave time to thoſe who had given ground, to repaſs the rivulet, and to form a ſecond line behind thoſe regiments of dragoons, and ſome others, that had joined them, ſo that thoſe dragoons remained in the firſt line during the reſt of the action.

The cavalry of the confederates left wing, having by this ſucceſs gained the advantage of forming themſelves entirely in order of battle, advanced leiſurely to the top of the hill, and ſeveral times charged the enemy's horſe, who were always routed, but who, nevertheleſs, rallied every time, though at a conſiderable diſtance, and thereby gave the allies an opportunity of gaining ground. As the duke of Marlborough, who was now in perſon among them, was preparing a freſh attack, marſhal de Tallard cauſed ten of his battalions to advance, to fill up the intervals of his cavalry, in order to make a laſt effort; which, the duke perceiving, cauſed three battalions of the troops of Zell to come up and ſuſtain the [g] Monſieur de Feuquieres in his memoirs obſerves, that the loſs of that battle was owing to the inattention of the French generals to thoſe maxims of war, which ought to guide men, when they conſider, whether they have ſufficient reaſons either to give or receive battle, or whether they can derive, from the particular diſpoſition of their troops, any reaſonable hopes of defeating the enemy. In examining this ſubject, the marquis points out firſt the errors, that were committed with reference to the general ſtate of the war in Germany previous to the battle, and then thoſe errors, which appeared in the particular diſpoſition of the French army. With regard to the firſt point, he aſſerts, that it was abſolutely improper at that time, to truſt the deciſion of the war in Germany to the event of a ſingle battle; and this truth was the leſs doubtful, becauſe it appeared that the Engliſh and Dutch had almoſt abandoned the war in Flanders in that campaign, to make a deciſive effort in Germany, without which the emperor could no longer have ſupported himſelf, nor could they have drawn any ſupplies of men from Germany. The French ought therefore to have avoided this battle, ſince they could have maintained their ſituation, if they had only compelled the Engliſh and Dutch, either to withdraw from that country, or entirely to diſcontinue the war in Flanders. The elector of Bavaria was maſter of the whole courſe of the Danube, almoſt from its ſource to the frontiers of Auſtria, into which he could penetrate when he pleaſed; and therefore the emperor, whoſe attention was then employed by the malecontents in Hungary, was likewiſe obliged to have a watchful eye on Auſtria and Tirol, as well for the preſervation of theſe provinces, as the ſecurity of a free communication with his army in Italy.

The bridges, which the elector of Bavaria had on the Danube, opened to him a free communication with the Upper-Palatinate. The emperor conſequently muſt be always apprehenſive, that he would pour a body of troops into Bohemia, where the people were exceedingly exaſperated at the ſeverity of the imperial government, and where their fears were the only motives to their ſubmiſſion: which made it likewiſe neceſſary for the emperor to maintain a body of troops to cover Bohemia and Moravia. Nuremberg, an imperial city and almoſt in the heart of the empire, being the moſt conſiderable city in all the circle of Franconia, it was incumbent on the emperor to preſerve it in the intereſt of the confederates, leſt the elector of Bavaria ſhould make himſelf maſter of it, as he had already ſeized Ulm and Augſberg. Nuremberg therefore could not be preſerved by the protection of the confederate army, which conſequently could not withdraw to any great diſtance from that city, whoſe preſervation was of the more importance to the emperor, ſince the loſs of it would deprive him of all communication with his dominions on the Rhine, except through the country on the other ſide of the Mein, which the ſituation of Nuremberg would have rendered altogether impracticable. It was likewiſe evident that the confederate army could not treat to any conſiderable diſtance from a city, where all their ammunition and proviſions were depoſited. The allies indeed by forcing the paſs at Schellenberg, and taking Donawert, had obtained a bridge over the Danube and ſeparated the fortified places of the French on the Upper-Danube, from thoſe on the Lower. But, as their proviſions were ſtill lodged either in Nuremberg or Norlingen, they durſt not venture to quit Franconia and Suabia, to advance into Bavaria. This obvious reflection was alone ſufficient to convince horſe. Then the prince of Heſſe Caſſel, general of the horſe, and the lieutenant generals, Lumley, Bulaw, Hompeſch, and Ingoldſby, returned with their troops to the charge; but the ſuperior fire of the enemy's infantry put their firſt line into ſome diſorder, ſo that it ſhrunk back, and remained, for ſome time, at about ſixty paces diſtant from the enemy, neither party advancing againſt the other. At length, the confederates puſhed forwards with ſo much bravery and ſucceſs, that, having broke and routed the enemy's horſe, the ten battalions, who found themſelves abandoned by them, were cut to pieces, none eſcaping but a very few ſoldiers, who threw themſelves on the ground, as dead, to ſave their lives.

Marſhal de Tallard rallied his broken cavalry behind ſome tents, which were ſtill ſtanding in his camp; and, ſeeing things in this deſperate condition, reſolved to draw off his dragoons and infantry out of the village of Blenheim. He thereupon ſent one of his aid-de-camps to marſhal de Marſin, who, with the elector of Bavaria, commanded on the left, to deſire him, "to face the enemy with ſome troops on the right of the village of Oberklau, to keep them in play, and favour the retreat of the infantry, that was in Blenheim." But marſhal de Marſin repreſented to the meſſenger, "That he had too much buſineſs in the front of the village, where he was poſted, and where he had to deal with the duke of Marlborough, who was come to the aſſiſtance of prince Eugene, as well as in the reſt of the line, to ſpare any troops; ſince he was ſo far from being victorious, that all he could do was to maintain his ground."

In the mean time, Ingoldſby made the other generals of the ſame attack ſenſible, how eaſily they might entirely defeat the French cavalry, by charging them on the right flank. This advice being put into execution with a great deal of vigour, the enemy were ſoon thrown into diſorder, and put to flight, part of them endeavouring to gain the bridge, which they had over the Danube between Blenheim and Hochſtet; and the other part, among whom were the gens d'armes, were cloſely purſued by the Lunenburgh dragoons, and thoſe, who eſcaped the ſlaughter, threw themſelves into the Danube, where moſt of them were drowned. Thoſe, who fled towards Hochſtet, rallied once more, making a ſhew to ſuccour the reſt; but the ſame regiment of Bothmar faced them, and kept them in awe for ſome time, till it was joined by ſome other regiments, when the enemy made the beſt of their way to ſave themſelves by flight.

The marſhal de Tallard was ſurrounded by the fugitives, and taken near a mill, behind the village of Sonderen, not far from the Danube, by monſieur de Boinenburg, a lieutenant colonel of the troops of Heſſe, aid-de-camp to the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel. The marquis de Montperoux, general of horſe; de Seppevile, de Silly, and de la Valiere, major generals; monſieur de la Meſſiliere, St. Pouange, de Legondais, and ſeveral other officers of note, were likewiſe made priſoners in this defeat.

While theſe things paſſed at the village of Blenheim and in the center, the duke of Marlborough cauſed the village of Oberklau, which was marſhal de Merſin's quarters, to be attacked by the brigade of Berenſdorff, conſiſting of ten battalions. The prince of Holſtein-Beck, who commanded them as major general, paſſed the rivulet at the head of two battalions, with undaunted reſolution. But as the imperial cavalry, which was to have ſupported him, were wanting in their duty, and kept muſket-ſhot from him, he was ſcarce got over, when ſeven or eight of the enemy's battalions fell upon him with great fury, before he could form his two battalions; ſo that one of them, that of Goor, was almoſt entirely cut to pieces, and the prince himſelf deſperately wounded and taken priſoner. But, notwithſtanding this firſt ſhock, theſe battalions were no ſooner ſupported by ſome Daniſh and Hanoverian cavalry, than they charged a ſecond time, but with no better ſucceſs; till, upon the third charge, the duke of Marlborough having himſelf brought up ſome ſquadrons, which were ſupported by others of the body of reſerve, made them advance with ſome battalions beyond the rivulet; upon which the enemy began to retire.

As ſoon as the duke had performed this conſiderable ſervice, he repaired to the center, where, finding the action decided in favour of the confederates, he cauſed part of his victorious cavalry to halt, to obſerve the motions of that part of the enemy, which, by this time, was drawn up beyond the moraſs of Hochſtet. During this halt the elector of Bavaria, whom prince Eugene could make no impreſſion upon for ſome time, but whoſe bravery at laſt put that elector's troops to the rout, was perceived making his retreat from the village of Lutzingen. Upon which, orders were diſpatched to the baron de Hompeſch (who with ſeveral ſquadrons was purſuing the fugitives towards Morſelingen, and who had already overtaken and forced two of their battalions to lay down their arms) to face about, and march to join thoſe who halted, as well to prevent the elector's falling upon Hompeſch's rear, as to form a body, in order to charge that prince, who marched in great haſte, but in pretty good order, with his ſquadron on the left and his battalions on the vince the French generals, that their inducements to engage the enemy could not poſſibly have any weight, but that it was rather their intereſt to decline a general action, eſpecially as this cautious conduct would infallibly have obliged the allies to abandon the parts adjacent to the Danube, when they had conſumed all the forage near that river.

Marſhal de Villeroy was poſted with a conſiderable army before the lines of Biel, which prince Eugene had quitted, with the greateſt part of his regular troops, and unperceived by that general. The conjunction of this prince with the duke of Marlborough was generally known; and marſhal de Villeroy might have waked from his inactivity, and forced the lines, which were only guarded by an inconſiderable body of militia; and might afterward, have advanced with his army through the duchy of Wirtemberg, to the Neckar, which would have rendered the allies incapable of preſerving their communication with the Lower-Neckar for the ſecurity of their proviſions, which were conveyed to Norlingen from the Rhine and the Mein. And thus would this ſingle motion have limited the ſupply of the proviſions of the allies to Nuremberg, and conſequently they could never think it ſafe to be remote from that city.

Marſhal de Villeroy might even have compelled the allies to retire, in part, to the Rhine, and leave the elector of Bavaria to act with freedom in the heart of Germany, if that general had forced the lines of Biel, and then marched his army down the Rhine near Philipſburg, and the Lower-Neckar. This march might likewiſe have been effected without the leaſt danger, becauſe, when the lines had once been forced, marſhal de Villeroy might have thrown a bridge over the Rhine, in caſe the allies had approached him with all their forces; and, if they had attempted that motion, they would have abandoned Auſtria, and even the city of Vienna to the elector of Bavaria.

Theſe were the errors committed with reſpect to the general ſtate of the war in Germany: the reſt related to the particular diſpoſition and order of battle, and were as follow:

1. The French and Bavarians encamped their two armies, as if they were to engage ſeparately.

2. They diſpoſed them on the day of battle, in the order of their encampment, and only in the front of the camp.

3. They did not chuſe their field of battle ſo near the rivulet as would have prevented the allies from paſſing it, and not have left them a ſufficient extent of ground to form their troops between the rivulet and the front of the French line.

4. They neglected to advance their right and center upon the allies, when they ſaw they had paſſed the rivulet, and formed themſelves on the front of the French.

5. They had not the precaution to take a ſtrict view of the rivulet, when they arrived at their camp; and were ſo inconſiderate, as not to poſt a body of infantry along the bank for the ſecurity of their camp, and to gain intelligence of the motions of the allies.

6. They were ſo injudicious, as to form their center of battle out of the right and left wings of their two armies, inſtead of providing a formidable center of infantry.

7. They ſhut up the greateſt and beſt part of marſhal de Tallard's infantry in the village of Blenheim, where they were poſted without the leaſt order, and rendered incapable of forming any motion; and they had not even the leaſt precaution to ſecure a communication from one brigade or regiment to another.

8. They did not ſurvey the ground, which extended from their right to the rivulet and the Danube, and they poſted dragoons there inſtead of infantry.

9. When they arrived at their camp, they neglected to detach a body of cavalry, beyond the left of their armies, to obſerve the ſituation of the camp of the allies, which they were unacquainted with to ſuch a degree, as not to know that prince Eugene had joined the duke of Marlborough with his army; and they imagined, that the prince of Baden was engaged with a conſiderable body of troops at the ſiege of Ingoldſtadt.

10. After the firſt diſorder in their grand center of cavalry, and after they had ſhrunk from their ground, till they formed a confuſed line with the infantry, who were embarraſſed in the village of Blenheim, the elector of Bavaria's army did not cloſe on their right, to form an attack in flank upon the enemy, who had advanced beyond the interval of ground, that extended between the two villages. Had they diſpoſed themſelves into this motion, they might either have ſuſtained or drawn off the French infantry from Blenheim, and have given their cavalry, who had been diſordered by the fire of the enemy's foot, an opportunity of rallying in order of battle. But, inſtead of this obvious motion, that whole army was only attentive on their retreat to Ulm; and they abandoned marſhal de Tallard's infantry, while the cavalry of the general's army never attempted to recover their proper order, or make any effort to diſengage their infantry, when they ſaw the elector's army retreat from the field of battle.

11. When marſhal de Tallard was taken priſoner, and the center of the French army entirely thrown into diſorder, not one of the general officers of the marſhal's army made the leaſt endeavour to draw the infantry from Blenheim, while they had an opportunity of affording them that relief, by marching them along the Danube, till they had rejoined their cavalry; but, on the contrary, thoſe who were charged, in particular, with the command of the body of infantry, either entirely abandoned them, even before they were attacked, when they ſaw the cavalry defeated, and plunging themſelves into the Danube, in hopes of ſwimming to the other ſide; or elſe they continued in the village without daring to leave it, and were even ſo deſtitute of thought, as not to attempt any communication between the battalions. In ſhort, they ſeemed to continue there with no other view than to charge themſelves with the deſpicable province of making a brave ſet of battalions lay down their arms with reluctance, and of ſurrendering to the enemy twenty-ſeven battalions and twelve ſquadrons of the beſt troops of France; which was ſo infamous an action, that it would ſcarce be credited by poſterity, eſpecially when it is informed, that, except one brigadier of foot, who was broke, all the other authors or ſpectators of this contemptible timidity were rewarded and advanced to ſtations of dignity.

right. But, before general Hompeſch returned from his chace, the right wing of the confederate army was perceived at ſome diſtance behind the elector; and, appearing to be part of his army marching in ſuch a manner, as might eaſily have flanked them, had the duke immediately charged him, the duke, with great prudence, ſent out a party to view them. During this time, the elector continued marching off with great precipitation, till he reached the moraſs of Morſelingen.

The French horſe being entirely defeated, and the confederates maſters of all the ground, which was between the enemy's left and the village of Blenheim, the twenty-eight battalions and twelve ſquadrons of dragoons, which were in the village, found themſelves cut off from the reſt of their army, and, deſpairing of being able to make their eſcape, after a weak attempt to repulſe the infantry, who ſurrounded them, capitulated about eight in the evening, laid down their arms, delivered their colours and ſtandards, and ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war, on condition, that the officers ſhould not be ſearched.

This defeat coſt the enemy, by their own accounts in ſeveral intercepted letters, forty thouſand men, in which number they included four or five thouſand loſt in their precipitate retreat to the Black Foreſt, either by deſertion, or the purſuit of the Huſſars or peaſants, who made a great ſlaughter of the ſtragglers. This computation does not ſeem improbable, conſidering the number of priſoners taken, which exceeded thirteen thouſand, of whom above one thouſand two hundred were officers; that ten French battalions on their right were cut in pieces, and above thirty ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons forced into the Danube, moſt of whom were drowned: That their left wing ſuffered very much, eſpecially the foot: That beſides ninety-five officers, who were found at Hochſtet, Dillingen and Lavingen; and that the number of the wounded, whom they brought off from Ulm, were above ſeven thouſand men: The confederates gained above one hundred pieces of cannon, twenty-four mortars, one hundred and twenty-nine colours, one hundred and ſeventy-one ſtandards, ſeventeen pair of kettle-drums, three thouſand ſix hundred tents, thirty-four coaches, three hundred laden mules, two bridges of boats, fifteen pontons, twenty-four barrels, and eight caſks of ſilver. But this ſucceſs coſt them four thouſand four hundred and eighty-five men killed, ſeven thouſand five hundred and twenty-five wounded, and two hundred and ſeventy-three left or made priſoners.

The emperor made great acknowledgments to the duke of Marlborough for this ſignal ſervice, and offered to make him a prince of the empire, which the duke ſaid he could not decently accept of, till he knew the queen's pleaſure; and, upon her conſenting to it, he was created a prince of the empire, and about a year after Mindelheim was aſſigned him for his principality.

The ſucceſs of the battle having entirely changed the face of affairs in the empire, and ſaved the houſe of Auſtria from ruin, the duke of Marlborough, being willing to loſe no time, and judging it more advantageous for the common cauſe to join all the confederate forces together, to ſtreighten the enemy as much as poſſible, and oblige them to abandon Germany, and repaſs the Rhine, ſent an expreſs to prince Lewis of Baden to leave the ſiege of Ingoldſtadt, and rejoin the army with the forces under his command; conſidering, that not only that city, but the whole country of Bavaria muſt fall of courſe into the emperor's hands. The duke's and prince Eugene's opinion was confirmed by the example of the city of Augſburg, which the French abandoned, carrying with them four hoſtages, as a ſecurity for two thouſand ſick and wounded men, whom they left in that place. The magiſtrates being aſſembled immediately after, ſent four deputies to the duke of Marlborough to deſire his protection; who anſwered them, that they had nothing to fear from the troops of her Britannic majeſty and the States General, which were only ſent againſt the enemies of the empire and their allies. And thereupon he ordered a detachment to march, and take poſſeſſion of that important place. Soon after marſhal de Tallard, with the priſoners of diſtinction, were ſent towards Hanau and Francfort under a guard of dragoons, and the other priſoners were ſent into the adjacent places.

On the 21ſt of Auguſt, the duke encamped at Sefellingen, within half a league of Ulm; and the next day the governor of Ulm, who apprehended a ſiege, ſent out of the town four hundred and thirty priſoners, which the enemy had taken at Hochſtet, Dillengen, and other places, with a compliment to the duke, that he would be pleaſed to take an opportunity to return an equal number; and, thoſe perſons being Germans, the duke ſent them to prince Eugene. On the 25th, the duke, prince Eugene, and prince Lewis of Baden had a long conference, wherein they concerted the further operations of the campaign; and it was reſolved, that, ſeeing the enemy were returning towards the Rhine, all the confederate forces ſhould likewiſe march that way, except twenty-three battalions and ſome ſquadrons, which ſhould be left under the command of general Thungen to carry on the ſiege of Ulm. In purſuance whereof, the confederate troops began their march from the neighbourhood of Ulm, on the 26th of Auguſt, by different roads, to the general rendezvous of the army which was appointed to be at Bruſchal near Philipſburg. From that day the confederate army was in motion till the 9th of September, when a party of imperial horſe, having met ſome ſquadrons of the enemy, commanded by the duke de Monfort, a major-general, who had been conducting four battalions and a ſum of money into Landau, fell upon them with great vigour, and routed them, killing above one hundred upon the ſpot, taking ſeveral priſoners, and mortally wounding their commander. On the 12th, prince Lewis of Baden marched towards Landau with the troops appointed to beſiege that place; and the duke of Marlborough with prince Eugene came to the camp of Croon Weiſſenburgh, in order to cover the ſiege. The ſame night, the duke received an expreſs from general Thungen, importing, that, having formed the ſiege of Ulm, and received his great artillery, the garriſon beat a parley the 10th, and the next day ſurrendered that place upon honourable terms; which he was willing of grant, that no time might be loſt for the further execution to the projects of this campaign. The imperialiſts found in Ulm two hundred and twenty-two pieces of braſs cannon, twenty-five braſs mortars, one thouſand two hundred barrels of powder, with a conſiderable quantity of proviſions, which was ſeaſonably applied to the carrying on the ſiege of Landau, which prince Lewis of Baden inſiſted on, as neceſſary to ſecure the circles, Suabia in particular, from the excurſions of that garriſon. This was popular in Germany, and, though the duke did not approve it, he did not oppoſe it with all the authority, that his great ſucceſs gave him. This was univerſally blamed, for, while France was in the conſternation, which their late great loſs brought them under, a more vigorous proceeding was like to have greater effects; and, beſides that the imperial army was ill-provided, the great charge of a ſiege was above their ſtrength. Prince Lewis ſuffered much in his reputation for this undertaking: It was that which the French wiſhed for, and therefore it was ſuſpected, that ſome ſecret practice had prevailed on that prince to propoſe it. It is certain, that he was jealous of the glory which the duke of Marlborough had obtained, and in which himſelf had no ſhare; and it was believed, that if he had not gone to beſiege Ingoldſtadt, the battle of Hochſtet had never been fought. He was indeed ſo fierce a bigot in his religion, that he could not bear the ſucceſſes of thoſe, whom he called Heretics, and the exaltation which he thought hereſy might have upon it.[h] While the duke of Marlborough lay covering the ſiege, marſhal de Villeroy with his army came and looked on him; but, as the ſoldiers of the confederates were exalted with their ſucceſs, ſo the French were too much diſpirited with [h] Dr. Hare, in his Second letter to a Tory-member concerning the Management of the War, p. 12. 3d Edit. gives us this account of the duke's own deſigns in this campaign: "Flanders, ſays he, was, at the beginning of the war, a very bad part to attack France in; it was covered with ſo ſtrong a frontier. It was for this reaſon, the duke of Marlborough looked out for another ſcene of action, and did all that could be done on his part towards it; and therefore when he had in the two firſt campaigns driven the French from Nimeguen to Namur, and had ſet the Dutch at eaſe by the reduction of Guelder and Limburg, and cleared the Rhine by taking Bonne, he did not the third year content himſelf with walking up and down in the neighbourhood of Holland, where there was no proſpect of doing any thing to the purpoſe, but marched into the heart of Germany, forced the ſtrong poſt of Schellenburg before the end of June, which is the key of Bavaria; and, had the ammunition and artillery been ready, as the duke had been aſſured it was, he had marched directly to Munich, and, without the hazard of another battle, had in a fortnight's time not only extinguiſhed that fatal war, that threatned nothing leſs than the ruin of the whole empire, but had gained the elector also over to the ſide of the allies, who, could he have been perſuaded to make their intereſt his own, might have done the greateſt ſervice to the common cauſe, both in Germany and Flanders. But when that point was loſt, and the inability of the Germans to make a ſiege had encouraged the elector to break off the treaty he had entered into, and the ſword had decided the fate of his country, what part did the duke of Marlborough take next? Not that of returning to Flanders: No, he improved the reſt of that wonderful campaign to facilitate the operations of the next in a part, where France might be more eaſily attacked. He paſſed the Rhine before the end of Auguſt, and made, or rather ſubmitted to the making the ſiege of Landau by prince Lewis, while he covered it: And, that the unexpected length of the ſiege might not break his deſign, without waiting for the end of it, he advanced with a body of troops to the Saar, ſurpriſed Treves, and poſſeſſed himſelf of other proper poſts for erecting magazines, and opening the next campaign with the ſiege of Saar-Lewis."

their losses to make any attack, or to put any thing to hazard, in order to raise the siege. They retired back, and went into quarters, and trusted to the bad state of the imperial army, who were ill-provided and ill-supplied. The garrison made as vigorous a defence, and drew out the siege to as great a length, as could be expected. Prince Lewis had neither engineers or ammunition, and wanted money to provide them; so that, if the duke had not supplied him, he must have been forced to give it over. The king of the Romans came again, to have the honour of taking the place: But his behaviour there did not serve to raise his character; for he was not often in the places of danger, and was content to look on at a great and safe distance. He was likewise constantly beset with priests, and such a face of superstition and bigotry appeared about him, that it very much damped the hopes, that were given of him. However, on the 23d of November, the besiegers having lodged themselves on the counterscarps both on the right and left, and sufficient breaches being opened, the next morning the necessary dispositions were made for a general assault, and five thousand men were commanded upon that service. The besieged, being therefore reduced to this extremity, were obliged to beat a parley between ten and eleven o'clock, whereupon hostages were exchanged, and the capitulation signed the same day, consisting of twenty-eight articles, which were in effect much the same as those granted by the imperialists to monsieur de Melac two years before, and by the French to the count de Frize the preceding campaign. On the 26th, the besieged marched out of Landau to the number of three thousand four hundred, who survived out of seven thousand men, of whom the garrison consisted at the beginning of the siege. The king of the Romans, having entered the place, found it reduced to a heap of rubbish, and having given the command of it to the count de Frize, who had before maintained that post with great courage and ability, his majesty set out for Vienna, having ordered prince Eugene to settle the affairs of Bavaria, and left to prince Lewis of Baden the disposition of the forces on the Rhine.

The confederates, omitting nothing that might advance the glory, which they had already acquired in Bavaria, resolved to prosecute the siege of Traerbach. To which end, the duke of Marlborough marched towards the Moselle with a considerable army, which he left under the command of the hereditary prince of Hesse-Cassel, as also the direction of the attacks of that place. The castle was invested in the beginning of November, and the approaches were carried with such success, that, on the 21st, the besiegers attempted to storm it. But as they were climbing up the eminences (the rock, on which that fortress is built, proving very steep, and the weather exceedingly stormy) the garrison made so vigorous a defence, that the assailants were obliged to retire with considerable loss. Notwithstanding these discouragements, the prince of Hesse was resolved to carry on the siege with the utmost vigour; and, on the 20th of December obliged the garrison to surrender on honourable conditions. The confederates met with a great deal of difficulty and opposition in all the attack; and the baron de Trogne, the States chief engineer, was shot by the prince of Hesse's side, as he was giving the necessary directions; and they had above a thousand men killed or wounded.

During the siege of Traerbach the duke of Marlborough went to the court of Prussia, to negociate, that eight thousand Prussians might be sent to Italy next campaign, to serve there for the relief of the duke of Savoy, under the command of prince Eugene. He was received at Berlin, and all other places, through which he passed, with the highest respect; and thence he proceeded to the court of Hanover, where he arrived on the first of December, and thence continued his journey to the Hague, where he was congratulated by the deputies of the States General, upon his victories at Schellenberg and Hochstet, and was as much considered and submitted to in Holland, as if he had been their Stadtholder. The credit which he was in among them, was very happy for them, and was, indeed, necessary at that time, for keeping down their factions and animosities, which were rising in every province, and in most of their towns. Only Amsterdam, as it was the most sensible of the common danger, so it was not only quiet within itself, but it contributed not a little to keep all the rest so, which was chiefly maintained by the duke of Marlborough's prudent management; who, having settled all matters relating to the ensuing campaign, embarked for England, and arrived at London the 11th of December.

The occurrences in Brabant and Flanders this campaign were of no considerable importance. As the great bodies were in such violent motion in Bavaria, which was the theatre of the war, little, besides the protection of the country on each side, was intended here. However, on the first of June, monsieur Auverquerque decamped from the neighbourhood of Maestricht, and marched directly towards the enemy, who, being surprized at this motion, and unwilling to hazard a battle, after they were prevented in their design upon Tongeren, marched about, and got into their lines. General Dopff, perceiving them to be in some disorder, advanced with thirty squadrons of horse and dragoons, and forced the French lines with little opposition. But a council of war being called, it was thought not adviseable for him to continue in that post, lest the enemy should fall upon his detachment with a superior force, before the rest of the army could come up; so that he had not continued there above three hours, before he quitted the lines, and rejoined the army. On the first of July, the baron de Trogne was detached with a considerable body of men, who marched towards Liege, and monsieur Auverquerque followed him. On the 5th, the baron being reinforced from Liege and Huy, he advanced to the enemies lines, which he entered at eight in the morning, and took post at Meordorp. Monsieur Auverquerque endeavoured to sustain him; but this enterprize had no better success than the former; for, the rivers Herk and Demer overflowing, and retarding the march of the army, it was judged impossible to come up soon enough to support him, upon which, he retired out of the lines the same evening.

Upon the second of July, a body of nine thousand Dutch troops, commanded by general Spaar, appeared before Bruges, and were warmly received by the cannon of the town. In the evening they raised batteries, and the next morning began to throw bombs, carcasses, and red-hot bullets into the place, which did great execution, several houses being entirely demolished, and others very much shattered. Whereupon the inhabitants, to prevent farther mischief, offered to pay six hundred thousand guilders in six months time, which the Baron accepted, and so retired to Maldeghem. On the 22d, the army, under monsieur Auverquerque, passed the Maese, and advanced to Namur, which they bombarded from the 26th to the 29th, setting on fire their magazines, and doing very great damage to the inhabitants. The loss sustained by the Dutch was very inconsiderable, though the garrison fired furiously all the time from their cannon and mortars. During these hostilities, a detachment of horse and foot was sent up to Dinant, where they took post, and part of them passed over from thence into the country between the Sambre and Maese, which struck such a terror into the neighbouring country, that they exacted from thence great contributions. About the same time, the Dutch forces made themselves masters of fort Isabella, and demolished it.

The elector of Bavaria, who had retired to Brussels after his misfortunes, formed, at the end of the campaign, a project of surprizing general Auverquerque, hoping, by that means, in some measure, to repair the disadvantages, which he had sustained in Bavaria. For this purpose he ordered all his forces, with a great number of waggons, to join at Tirlemont. The French court, being apprehensive of the elector's designs, sent marshal de Villeroy to watch his motions, and to prevent an engagement, unless he had a very fair prospect of a return of better fortune. At his arrival in the army, he was surprized to see monsieur Auverquerque waiting in his camp at Borch-loen, ready to receive them. This obliged him to represent to the elector the difficulties of attacking the confederates; the advantage of their camp; the bravery of their troops, encouraged by the success of their affairs in Germany; and the ill consequences, which the loss of a battle would be attended with. The elector, who was oppressed with disgraces, was determined on nothing but revenge, and insisted upon an engagement. The marshal, after a very warm debate with him on that subject, told him, that he would not march; and to put an end to the dispute produced the king's order. The elector, being thus frustrated in his designs, returned to Brussels, his former seat of pleasure and gallantry.

At sea, this summer, our affairs were carried on much more doubtfully than at land. Sir George Rooke sailed into the Streights, where he reckoned he was strong enough for the Toulon squadron, which was then abroad in the Mediterranean. Soon after that a strong squadron from Brest passed by Lisbon into the Streights. Mr. Methuen, the English embassador in Portugal, apprehending, that if these two squadrons should join to attack Sir George Rooke, it would not be possible for him to fight against so great a force, sent a man of war, which that admiral had left at Lisbon, with some particular orders, which made the captain very unwilling

ing to carry the meſſage; but the embaſſador promiſed to indemnify him. The captain ſailed through the French fleet, and brought this important advertiſement to ſir George Rooke, who told him, that on this occaſion he would paſs by his not obſerving his orders, but that for the future, he would find the ſafeſt courſe was to obey orders. Upon this, ſir George ſtood out of the way of the French towards the mouth of the Streights, and there met ſir Cloudeſly Shovel with a ſquadron of our beſt ſhips, with which being reinforced, he ſailed up the Streights again, being now in a condition to engage the French. He came before Barcelona, where the prince of Heſſe-Darmſtadt aſſured him, there was a ſtrong party ready to declare for king Charles, as it was certain, there was a diſpoſition in many to do it. But ſir George would not ſtay above three days before that city; ſo that the motions within the town, and the diſcoveries which many made of their inclinations, had almoſt proved fatal to them. He anſwered, when preſſed to ſtay a few days more, that his orders were poſitive; and that he muſt ſail towards Nice, which it was believed the French intended to beſiege. But, as he was ſailing that way, he received advice, that the French had made no advances in that deſign; and therefore he turned his courſe weſtward, and came in ſight of the French fleet, ſailing from Breſt to Toulon. The advantage, which he had, was ſo viſible, that it was expected, he would have made towards the enemy, but he did not. What orders he had was not known, for the matter never came under examination. The French got to Toulon, and he ſteered another way. The whole French fleet was then together in that harbour, for though the Toulon ſquadron had been out before, it was then in port. A very happy accident had preſerved a rich fleet of merchant ſhips from Scanderoon, under the convoy of three or four frigates, from falling into their hands. The French fleet lay in their way in the bay of Tunis; and nothing could have ſaved them from being taken, but that, which happened in the critical minute, in which they needed it. A thick fog covered them all the while that they were ſailing by that bay, ſo that they had no apprehenſion of the danger they were in, till they had paſſed it.

Sir George Rooke, as he ſailed back, fell in upon Gibraltar, which, in a council of war, held July 17, about ſeven leagues to the eaſtward of Tetuan, it was reſolved to attack. Four days after, the fleet got into the bay, and one thouſand eight hundred marines, Engliſh and Dutch, with the prince of Heſſe Darmſtadt at their head, were put on ſhore, on the neck of land to the northward of the town, to cut off any communication with the country. The prince, having thus poſted his men, ſent a ſummons to the governor to ſurrender the place for the ſervice of his catholic majeſty; which he refuſing, the admiral, the next day, gave orders, that the ſhips, which had been appointed to cannonade the town, under the command of rear-admiral Byng and rear-admiral Vanderduſſon, as alſo thoſe, which were to batter the South-mole-head, commanded by captain Hicks in the Yarmouth, ſhould range themſelves accordingly. But, the wind blowing contrary, they could not poſſibly get into their places till the day was ſpent. In the mean time, to amuſe the enemy, captain Whitaker was ſent in with ſome boats, who burnt a French privateer of twelve guns at the Old Mole. On the 23d, ſoon after break of day, the ſhips being all placed, the admiral gave the ſignal for beginning the cannonade, which was performed with very great fury, above fifteen thouſand ſhot being made in five or ſix hours time againſt the town, ſo that the enemy were ſoon driven from their guns, eſpecially at the South-mole-head. Whereupon, the admiral conſidering, that by gaining that fortification they ſhould of conſequence reduce the town, ordered captain Whitaker, with all the boats armed, to endeavour to poſſeſs himſelf of it; which was performed with great expedition. But captain Hickes and captain Jumper, who lay next the Mole, had puſhed on ſhore with their pinnaces and ſome other boats, before the reſt could come up. Whereupon the enemy ſprung a mine, which blew up the fortification about the Mole, killed two lieutenants, and about forty men, and wounded about ſixty. However, our men kept poſſeſſion of the great platform, of which they had made themſelves maſters; and, captain Whitaker landing with the reſt of the ſeamen, who had been ordered upon this ſervice, they advanced, and took a redoubt or ſmall baſtion, half way between the Mole and the town, and poſſeſſed themſelves of many of the enemy's cannon; upon which the governor deſired to capitulate, and ſurrendered upon honourable terms. This fact is related by an eminent hiſtorian, with theſe circumſtances, that, after the admiral had bombarded the town to very little purpoſe, and with little hopes of ſucceſs, ſome bold men ventured to go aſhore in a place, where it was not thought poſſible to climb up the rocks; and yet they ſucceeded in it; and, when they had got up, they ſaw that all the women of the town were come out, according to their ſuperſtition, to a chapel there, to implore the Virgin's protection. They ſeized on them, and that contributed not a little to diſpoſe thoſe in the town to ſurrender, which they did on the 24th, and they had leave to ſtay or go as they pleaſed; and, in caſe they ſtaid, they were aſſured of protection in their religion and every thing elſe, for the prince of Heſſe, who was to be their governor, was a papiſt. But they all went away with the ſmall garriſon, that had defended the place. The prince of Heſſe, with the marines, who were on board the fleet, poſſeſſed himſelf of the place; and they were furniſhed out of the ſtores, that went with the fleet, with every thing, that was neceſſary for their ſubſiſtence or defence; and a regular method was laid down of ſupplying them conſtantly from Liſbon.

Sir George Rooke, after he had ſupplied Gibraltar, ſailed again into the Mediterranean, and, in conjunction with the Dutch fleet under vice admiral Callemburg, met off Malaga the count de Thouloufe with the whole French fleet, which was much ſuperior to the Engliſh in number, and had many gallies with them, that were of great uſe. Sir George Rooke called a council of war, in which it was reſolved to engage the enemy; but there was not due care taken to furniſh all the ſhips with a ſufficient quantity of powder, for ſome had waſted a great part of their ſtock of ammunition before Gibraltar; however they had generally twenty-five rounds, and it had ſeldom happened, that ſo much powder was ſpent in an action at ſea. On the 12th of Auguſt, as the two fleets engaged, ſir Cloudeſly Shovel advanced with his ſquadron to a cloſe fight, for it was the maxim of our ſeamen to fight as near as they could; and he had the advantage, and the enemy's van gave way in no little confuſion, as did their rear ſoon after, being no leſs vigorouſly attacked by the Dutch. But the enemies being very ſtrong in the center, and ſome of the Engliſh ſhips being obliged to go out of the line for want of ſhot (occaſioned by the great expence of it at Gibraltar) ſeveral of ſir George Rooke's own ſquadron ſuffered very much. About ſeven in the evening, one of the French admiral's ſeconds advanced out of the line, and began a cloſe fight with the St. George, commanded by ſir John Jennings, but, notwithſtanding the St. George had already ſuffered much, ſhe met with ſuch rough treatment, that ſhe had difficulty enough to rejoin the line, after the loſs of both her captains and many of her men. The engagement continued till night parted them, and, if the French had come to a new engagement next day, it might have been fatal, ſince many of our ſhips were without ſhot, whilſt others had enough and to ſpare. In this long and hot action there was no ſhip on either ſide, that was taken, ſunk, or burnt. The Engliſh made a ſhew the next day of preparing for a ſecond engagement, but the enemy bore off, to the great joy of our fleet. The French ſuffered much in the action, and went into Toulon ſo diſabled, that they could not be put in a condition to go to ſea again in many months. They left the ſea, as the field of battle, to the Engliſh; ſo that the honour of the action remained with us, though the nation was not greatly elated with the news of a drawn battle at ſea with the French: It was long before a certain account of the action was brought to England; but the modeſty, with which the French king wrote of it to the archbiſhop of Paris, put us out of all fears; for, whereas the French ſtile was very boaſting of their ſucceſſes, in this caſe it was only ſaid, that the action was to his advantage. From that cold expreſſion the Engliſh concluded, that the victory was on their ſide. When the full account was ſent home from our fleet, the partialities on both ſides appeared very ſignally. The tories magnified this as a victory; but perſons ſkilled in naval affairs, differed much in their ſentiments, about ſir George Rooke's conduct in that action, ſome not only juſtifying, but extolling it as much as others condemned it [i].

[i] Sir Cloudeſley Shovel's letter on this occaſion was as follows:

"This brings news of my health, and that we are on our way homeward: That which ſends us home ſo ſoon, is a very ſharp engagement we have had with the French: Our number of ſhips that fought in the line of battle were pretty equal: I think they were forty-nine, and we fifty-three; but ſir George Rooke reſerved ſome of the fifty gun ſhips, to obſerve if they attempted any thing with their gallies, of which they had twenty-four. Their ſhips did exceed in bigneſs. I judge they had ſeventeen three deck ſhips, and we had but ſeven. The battle began on Sunday the 13th inſtant, ſoon after ten in the morning, and in the center and rear of the fleet it continued till night parted: but in the van of the fleet, where I commanded, and led by ſir John Leake, we having the weather-gage, gave me an opportunity of coming as near as I pleaſed, which was within piſtol ſhot, before I fired a gun,

Sir George Rooke, after the engagement, ſailed to Gibraltar, where he ſtayed eight days to refit; and, having ſupplied that place with men and proviſions, ſailed from thence, and returned home with the great ſhips, leaving behind him eighteen men of war, under the command of ſir John Leake, both for the defence of the coaſt of Portugal, and to be in readineſs to ſuccour Gibraltar, if there ſhould be occaſion.

The ſucceſs of affairs in Portugal this year was by no means anſwerable to the expectation of the allies.

After ſeveral councils of war held in the preſence of their catholic and Portugueſe majeſties, which paſſed not without ſome diſputes between duke Schomberg and the Portugueſe generals and miniſters; the auxiliary forces of England and Holland began to land, the 16th of March, N. S. Duke Schomberg had warmly inſiſted, that theſe auxiliaries might keep in a body; urging the inconveniencies, that might attend their ſeparation. But the king of Portugal, being unwilling to truſt the defence of the frontier towns to his raw and undiſciplined troops, and there happening ſome coldneſs between the Engliſh general and monſieur Fagel, who commanded the Dutch forces, at their very firſt interview, the Engliſh infantry had their quarters aſſigned in Olivenza, Elvas, Portalegre, and other places in the province of Alentejo; and the Dutch were ſent up the Tagus towards Abrantes. The king of Portugal, by his treaties with England and Holland, had engaged to furniſh horſes to mount the cavalry and dragoons of theſe two nations; but, whilſt the king of Spain, Charles, was detained in Holland and England by contrary winds, the French embaſſador in Portugal, with great induſtry, had bought up the horſes of that kingdom; ſo that, moſt of the horſes which his Portugueſe majeſty's officers afterwards provided for the Engliſh and Dutch auxiliaries, being neither of a ſize nor ſtrength fit for ſervice, ſcarce one third part of the troopers and dragoons were mounted this campaign. Neither was there better proviſion made for ſick ſoldiers, who, after ſo tedious a paſſage, could not but be very numerous, and of whom many died for want of attendance and neceſſaries. Another cauſe of the ill ſucceſs of the campaign was, that, though the king of Portugal himſelf expreſſed the beſt intentions poſſible, he was much governed by his miniſters, who were all in the French intereſt. They had an army, but they had no preparations for taking the field; nor could they bring their troops together, for want of proviſions and carriages. The forms of their government made them very ſlow, and not eaſily acceſſible. They were too proud to confeſs, that they wanted any thing, when they had nothing; and too indolent to exert themſelves, in order to execute what was in their power to do; and the king's ill health furniſhed them with an excuſe for every thing, that was defective and out of order. The prieſts, both in Spain and Portugal, were ſo univerſally in the French intereſt, that even the houſe of Auſtria, which had been formerly ſo much in their favour, was now in diſgrace with them. Their alliance with heretics, and their bringing over an army of them to maintain their pretenſions, had made all their former ſervices be forgotten. The governing body at Rome did certainly engage all their zealots every where to ſupport that intereſt, which was ſo determined on the deſtruction of hereſy. The Engliſh and Dutch generals were likewiſe upon ill terms with the Portugueſe. Duke Schomberg, by his title of captain general of the queen of Great Britain's forces in Portugal, ought certainly to have commanded, at leaſt, all the Engliſh and Dutch auxiliaries: And it had been no bad policy in the king of Portugal to have made him likewiſe commander in chief of all his forces; a poſt, which the duke's father had formerly executed in that kingdom with ſuch ſucceſs, that he reſcued the crown of Portugal from the Spaniards, and fixed it in the family, that wear it at preſent. But though few, if any, of the Portugueſe officers had the neceſſary qualifications to be made generals; yet the king of Portugal would not break the eſtabliſhed rule of that kingdom, whereby the governors of provinces command in chief all the troops within their diſtricts. He had, indeed, made duke Schomberg velt-marſhal-general of the Portugueſe forces; but then his conferring the ſame dignity upon monſieur Fagel, general of the Dutch forces, rather leſſened than honoured the duke, and made Fagel unwilling to obey one, to whoſe level the king of Portugal had raiſed him; ſo that there was little concurrence of councils and deſigns between theſe two generals. To all this may be added, that a French lady, married to the duke of Cadaval, the principal perſon in the court of Portugal, was not a little inſtrumental in retarding the preparations for the campaign.

Upon information, that the auxiliaries, which the king of France had ſent to his grandſon Philip V, conſiſted, for the moſt part, of Iriſh ſoldiers; duke Schomberg, purſuant to the queen's warrant, publiſhed a proclamation, promiſing "her gracious pardon to all ſuch of her ſubjects, who, being now in the ſervice of her enemies, would quit the ſame, to come over to Charles III. king of Spain, or any other of her majeſty's allies; and that ſuch of them, as were qualified to ſerve in her majeſty's forces, ſhould be received and entertained in the ſame quality, as they enjoyed in the ſervice they left: And that ſuch as, by reaſon of their religion, could not ſerve in her majeſty's forces, ſhould be employed in the ſervice of the king of Spain, or of ſuch other of her majeſty's allies, where they ſhould beſt like." Charles III. and the king of Portugal publiſhed likewiſe their reſpective manifeſtoes; the firſt ſetting forth his title to the crown of Spain, and promiſing "his pardon to all ſuch of his ſubjects, as ſhould declare for him within three months time:" The other "juſtifying his Portugueſe majeſty's taking up arms, to reſtore the liberty of the Spaniſh nation oppreſſed by the power of France, and to aſſert the right of his catholic majeſty, Charles III. to that monarchy." Their majeſties had intended to be in a readineſs to enter Spain by the middle of May, but it was the beginning of June before they reached Santarem, where they continued the reſt of the ſpring-campaign.

The poſſeſſor of the crown of Spain, ſtiled by the allies duke of Anjou, though the laſt in proclaiming war, was yet the firſt in maintaining his title by the ſword; and, having invaded Portugal before his enemies were in a condition to oppoſe him, the duke of Berwick, his general, (who began gun, through which means, and God's aſſiſtance, the enemy declined us, and were upon the run in leſs than four hours, by which time we had little wind, and their gallies towed off their lame ſhips and others as they pleaſed; for the admiral of the white and blue, with whom we fought, had ſeven gallies tending upon him. As ſoon as the enemy got out of the reach of our guns, and the battle continuing pretty hot a-ſtern, and ſome of our ſhips in the admiral's ſquadron towing out of the line, which I underſtood afterwards, was for want of ſhot, I ordered all the ſhips of my diviſion to ſlack all their ſails, to cloſe the line in the center; this working had that good effect, that ſeveral of the enemies ſhips a-ſtern, which had kept their line, having their top-ſails and fore-ſails ſet, ſhot up a-breaſt of us, as the rear-admiral of the white and blue, and ſome of his diviſion; and the vice-admiral of the white, and ſome of his diviſion; but they were ſo warmly received, before they got a broad-ſide, that with their boats a-head, and their ſprit-ſails ſet, they towed from us without giving us the opportunity of firing at them.

"The ſhips that ſuffered moſt in my diviſion, were the Lenox, Warſpight, Tilbury, and Swiftſure; the reſt eſcaped pretty well, and I the beſt of all; though I never took greater pains in all my life to be ſoundly beaten; for I ſet all my ſails, and rowed with three boats a-head, to get along-ſide with the admiral of the white and blue; but he out-ſailing me, ſhunned fighting, and lay along-ſide of the little ſhips: notwithſtanding, the engagement was very ſharp, and, I think, the like between two fleets never had been in any time. There is hardly a ſhip, that muſt not ſhift one mail, and ſome muſt ſhift all; a great many have ſuffered much, but none more than ſir George Rooke and captain Jennings in the St. George. God ſend us well home: I believe we have not three ſpare top-maſts, nor three fiſhes in the fleet, and I judge there are ten jury-maſts now up. After the fight, we lay two days in ſight of the enemy, preparing for a ſecond engagement, but the enemy declined and ſtood from us in the night."

Another writer expreſſes himſelf thus: "The ſea-fight, though very bloody, was far from being deciſive, not a ſhip being loſt on either ſide. 'Tis certain the enemy were ſuperior to us both in weight and number; and, however many among us blamed the conduct of the admiral, he came off, when all things are impartially conſidered, much better than could have been expected. Both ſides claimed a victory, which in truth neither of them had; both pretending to ſeek out the other, and to come to a ſecond engagement, for which neither of them cared; and the want of ſufficient ammunition, on our ſide, argued a weakneſs, to ſay no worſe, and ought not eaſily to be pardoned." In a letter from an officer on board the fleet in this engagement, are theſe words: 'All the while we were daring the enemy, we went on the careen, by turns, to ſtop our ſhot-holes; ſo that had they engaged a ſecond time, we muſt have engaged them board and board, and either have carried them, or ſunk by their ſides. In a word, we were obliged to leave them, leſt they ſhould ſuſpect our weakneſs, and force us to be deſperate.'

During the action, were killed and wounded of the Engliſh two thouſand three hundred and fifty-eight; of the Dutch four hundred; ſir Andrew Leake, captain of the Grafton, captain Cow of the Ranelagh, lieutenant Jennings of the St. George, the third lieutenant of the Shrewſbury, and the firſt lieutenant of the Lenox, were all the officers of their rank that were killed; captain Myngs, captain Baker, captain Kirkton, captain Jumper, captain Myghels, lieutenant Ediſbury, and lieutenant Leſtock, were wounded, as were two lieutenants of the Barfleur, and the chaplain, ſeven or eight lieutenants more, three maſters, and about as many boatſwains and carpenters.

On the French ſide were killed the baily of Lorrain, commodore of a ſquadron, and the count de Tholouſe's ſecond; five captains, of which three were knights, a commiſſary of marines, ſix lieutenants, and five ſea enſigns. Among the latter, the marſhal de Chateauregnault's ſon, and the ſieur de Bolem Villers, the count de Tholouſe's gentleman; the count himſelf was wounded in the forehead, ſhoulder, and thigh; the count de Relingnes had his leg ſhot off; the marquis de Herbault, intendant of the fleet; monſieur du Caſſe, commodore of a ſquadron; monſieur de Chateauregnault; the count de Philepaux, the count de Cominges, monſieur de Valincourt, the count de Thouloufe's ſecretary, ſeven captains, eight lieutenants, and about one hundred and fifty other officers were wounded.

to ſhine there, though he had paſſed elſewhere for a man of no very great character) took the town of Sogura by a ſtratagem, and ſo intimidated the governor of Salva-terra, that he delivered up the place without making any defence, and conſented, that himſelf and his garriſon ſhould remain priſoners of war. From Salva-terra the Spaniards advanced farther into the country, and without any reſiſtance made themſelves maſters of Cebreros. Pera Garcia ſtood ſome diſcharges of cannon, and then ſurrendered to count d'Aguilar. The inhabitants of Zebredo abandoned the place at the approach of the Spaniſh troops; and the town of Ihana la Vielia, rejecting the ſummons of don Joſeph Salazar and the marquis de Puyſegur, was ſtormed and carried ſword in hand. About the ſame time, the marquis de Jeoffreville, having entered Portugal on the ſide of Almeida, put ſeveral villages under military execution; the prince Tſercloes de Tilly, having advanced to Aonches, raiſed great contributions round about, whilſt the marquis de Villadarias penetrated into Portugal another way. Theſe uninterrupted ſucceſſes of the Spaniards caſt the Portugueſe into great conſternation; and general Gagel, who was poſted at Caſtel-branco with four Dutch battalions, not thinking himſelf ſafe in that place, retired towards Abrantes with two battalions. The other two he poſted at Sovreira Formoſa, where they were ſoon after attacked by the duke of Berwick, and, after a brave defence, moſt of them taken priſoners, with major-general Welderen. After this ſucceſs, the duke of Berwick paſſed the Tagus, joined another body of Spaniards commanded by prince Tſerclaes de Tilly, and king Philip being arrived in the army, inveſted Portalegre, the inhabitants of which forced the garriſon to ſurrender at diſcretion; and amongſt them an Engliſh regiment of foot commanded by colonel Stanhope. From thence king Philip brought his victorious army before Caſtel-davide, which, though almoſt an open town, yet refuſed to open her gates, the garriſon being encouraged to defend themſelves by the reſolution of the Engliſh regiment of lieutenant-general Stuart, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Huſſey. By this time king Charles and the king of Portugal being come to Santerem, it was reſolved, that the marquis das Minas, governor and general of the arms of the province of Beira, ſhould make an irruption into Spain, and by that diverſion endeavour to draw king Philip's forces from before Caſtel-davide. The marquis having gathered a body of about fifteen thouſand men, marched accordingly towards the Tagus; took by ſtorm a Spaniſh place in Caſtile, called Fuente Grimaldo; defeated a body of French and Spaniards, commanded by don Ronquillo; and made himſelf maſter of Manſeinto. But though king Philip ſent the duke of Berwick with a ſtrong detachment to obſerve the Portugueſe, and it was from thence conjectured, that he would give over the attack of Caſtel-davide; yet the duke of Berwick, finding, that the marquis das Minas did not move forwards, returned ſoon after before Caſtel-davide. Hereupon colonel Huſſey propoſed to the Portugueſe to retire into the caſtle, and defend it to the laſt extremity; but the militia opened the gates to the Spaniards, and ſo the whole garriſon were made priſoners of war. The weather being, by this time, exceedingly hot, king Philip ſent his wearied troops into quarters of refreſhment; and, not thinking it poſſible to preſerve all his conqueſts, ordered his men to abandon them, except Maroan and Salva terra, and to raze the walls of Portalegre, Caſtel-davide, and ſome other towns. About the ſame time the remainder of the Engliſh forces marched from Alentejo in the province of Beira, and the Portugueſe and Dutch into quarters of refreſhment about Pena Major.

Thus affairs went on very unſucceſsfully in Portugal, ſo that it was thought, if the duke of Berwick had followed his advantages, nothing could have hindered his marching to Liſbon. The enemies ſucceſs gave no ſmall uneaſineſs in England, and duke Schomberg, finding his advice had not that weight it deſerved with the Portugueſe, was deſirous to quit a loſing game. Upon which, the queen reſolved to beſtow the command of her forces in Portugal on the earl of Galway; who having accepted of it, more in ſubmiſſion to the queen's command, than out of any great proſpect or hope of ſucceſs, repreſented the neceſſity of augmenting the forces and the train of artillery. All his demands were readily complied with, and four thouſand men ordered to be ſent to Portugal from England and Ireland, the States-General having agreed to ſend thither a proportionable number of their forces. The earl having embarked at Portſmouth on board the Tartar man of war, with ſeveral French engineeers and volunteers, in eight days ſailing, ſafely arrived at Liſbon, where duke Schomberg reſigned to him the command of the Engliſh forces. About a month after, the earl, having reviewed the Portugueſe and auxiliary forces, marched them over the little river Coa, and encamped near Almeida. On the 20th of September, the two kings of Spain and Portugal came to the army with deſign to invade Caſtile; but, when they reached the river Agueda, which they intended to paſs near Caſtel Rodrigo, they found the oppoſite banks ſo well guarded by the Spaniards, commanded by the duke of Berwick, that they did not think it adviſeable to hazard the loſs of their whole army; and ſo, retiring farther into the territories of Portugal, they ſent their troops into winter-quarters. On the other hand, the Spaniards, were ſo weakened by the detachments ſent under the command of the marquis de Villadarias, to attempt the retaking of Gibraltar, that they were contented to defend their own country, and had no thoughts of invading Portugal; ſo that things were quiet on thoſe frontiers all the remaining part of the year.

The Spaniards had drawn all the forces they had in Andaluſia and Eſtremadura together, to retake Gibraltar; and the marquis de Villadarias had with him ſome French troops, with ſome engineers of that nation, who were chiefly relied on, and were ſent from France to carry on the ſiege. This gave ſome diſguſt to the Spaniards, who were ſo abſurd in their pride, that, though they could do nothing for themſelves, and indeed knew not how to ſet about it, yet could not bear to be taught by others, or to ſee themſelves outdone by them. The ſiege was continued for four months, during which time, the prince of Heſſe had many occaſions given him to diſtinguiſh himſelf very eminently, both as to his courage, conduct, and indefatigable application. Convoys came frequently from Liſbon with ſupplies of men and proviſions, which the French were not able to hinder or intercept. Monſieur de Pointis at laſt came with a ſquadron of twenty French ſhips, and lay long in the bay, trying what could be done by ſea, while the place was preſſed by land. Upon that, a much ſtronger ſquadron was ſent from Liſbon, under the command of ſir John Leake and rear-admiral Vander-Daſſon, to relieve the place, and raiſe the ſiege, who arrived in the bay of Gibraltar on the 9th of October. In the mean while, marſhal de Teſſe, who was ſent by the court of France, which was diſſatisfied with the conduct of the marquis de Villadarias, had no better ſucceſs at land than that general; ſo that the enemy was at laſt obliged to raiſe the ſiege.

In Italy the duke of Savoy had a melancholy campaign, loſing place after place; but he ſupported his affairs with great conduct, and ſhewed a firmneſs in his misfortunes, beyond what could have been imagined. Vercelli and Ivrea gave the duke of Vendoſme the trouble of a tedious ſiege: They defended themſelves againſt him as long as poſſible. The duke of Savoy's army was not ſtrong enough to raiſe theſe ſieges; ſo that both places fell at laſt into the enemy's hands. The French had not troops both to carry on the war, and to leave garriſons in thoſe places; for which reaſon they demoliſhed the fortifications. After they had ſucceeded ſo far, they ſat down before Verue in the end of October. The duke of Savoy poſted his army at Creſcentino, over-againſt it, on the other ſide of the Po: He had a bridge of communication; he went often into the place during the ſiege, to ſee and animate his men, and to give the neceſſary orders. The ſick and wounded were carried away, and freſh men put in their ſtead. This ſiege proved the moſt famous of all that had been during the late war: It laſted above five months, the garriſon being often changed, and always well ſupplied. The French army ſuffered much, by continuing the ſiege all the winter; and they were at a vaſt charge in carrying it on. The bridge of communication was, after many unſucceſsful attempts, at laſt cut off; and the duke of Savoy, being thus ſeparated from the place, retired to Chivaz, and left them to defend themſelves as long as they could, which they did beyond what could in reaſon have been expected. He complained much of the emperor's failing to make good his promiſes; but, in a diſcourſe upon that ſubject with her majeſty's envoy, he ſaid, though he was abandoned by his allies, he would not abandon them himſelf.

The people of the Cevennes ſuffered much this ſummer. It was not poſſible to come to them with ſupplies, till matters ſhould go better in Piedmont, of which there was no proſpect. They were adviſed to preſerve themſelves the beſt they could. Marſhal Villars was ſent into the country to manage them with a gentler hand; and the ſevere methods, taken by thoſe formerly employed, being now diſowned, he was ordered to treat with their leaders, and to offer them full liberty to ſerve God in their own way without diſturbance. They generally inclined to hearken to this, for they had now kept kept themſelves in a body much longer than was thought poſſible in their low and helpleſs ſtate. Some of them capitulated, and took ſervice in the French army; but, as ſoon as they came near the armies of the allies, they deſerted, and went over to them; ſo that, by all this practice, the fire was rather covered at preſent than extinguiſhed [k].

The diſorders in Hungary had a deeper root and a greater ſtrength. It was hoped, that the ruin of the elector of Bavaria would have quite diſheartened the malecontents, and have diſpoſed them to accept of reaſonable terms, if the emperor could have been prevailed upon to offer them frankly, and immediately upon their firſt conſternation, after the conqueſt of Bavaria. There were great errors in the government of that kingdom. By a long courſe of oppreſſion and injuſtice, the Hungarians were grown intractable; they ſaw they were both hated and deſpiſed by the Germans. The court of Vienna ſeemed to conſider them as ſo many enemies, who were to be depreſſed in order to their being extirpated; upon any pretence of plots, their perſons were ſeized on, and their eſtates confiſcated. The jeſuits were believed to have a great ſhare in all theſe contrivances and proſecutions; and it was ſaid, that they purchaſed the confiſcated eſtates upon very eaſy terms. The nobility of Hungary ſeemed irreconcileable to the court of Vienna. On the other hand, thoſe of that court, who had thoſe confiſcations aſſigned them, and knew, that the reſtoring theſe would certainly be inſiſted on as a neceſſary article in any treaty that might follow, did all they could to obſtruct ſuch a treaty. It was viſible, that Ragotzki, who was at their head, aimed at the principality of Tranſylvania; and it was natural for the Hungarians to look on his arriving at that dignity, by which he could aſſiſt and protect them, as the beſt ſecurity they could have. On the other hand, the court of Vienna, being poſſeſſed of that principality, would not eaſily part with it. In the midſt of all this ferment, a revolution happened in the Turkiſh empire. A new ſultan was ſet up, ſo that all things were now at a ſtand, till it might be known what was to be expected from him. They were ſoon delivered from this anxiety, for he ſent a Chiaus to the court of Vienna to aſſure them, that he would give no aſſiſtance to the malecontens. That court, being freed from thoſe apprehenſions, reſolved to carry on the war in Hungary as vigorouſly as they could. This was imputed to a ſecret practice from France on ſome of that court; and there were ſo many concerned in the confiſcations, that every propoſition that way was powerfully ſupported. Thus Italy was neglected, and the ſiege of Landau was ill-ſupported, their chief ſtrength being employed in Hungary. Yet, when the miniſters of the allies preſſed the opening a treaty with the malecontents, the emperor ſeemed willing to refer the arbitration of that matter to his allies. But, though it was fit to ſpeak in that ſtyle, yet no ſuch thing was deſigned. A treaty was opened, but when it was known, that Zeiher had the chief management of it, there was no reaſon to expect any good effect. He was born a proteſtant, a ſubject of the Palatinate, and was often employed by the elector Charles Lewis to negotiate affairs at the court of Vienna. He, ſeeing a proſpect of riſing in that court, changed his religion and became a creature of the jeſuits, and adhered ſteadily to all their intereſts. He managed that ſecret practice with the French in the treaty of Ryſwick, by which the proteſtants of the Palatinate ſuffered ſo conſiderable a prejudice. The treaty in Hungary ſtuck at the preliminaries, for indeed neither ſide was then inclined to treat. The malecontents were ſupported by France. They were routed in ſeveral engagements, but theſe were not ſo conſiderable as the court of Vienna gave out in their public news. The malecontents ſuffered much in them, but came ſoon together again, and they ſubſiſted ſo well by the mines, of which they had poſſeſſed themſelves, and the incurſions they made, and the contributions they raiſed from the emperor's ſubjects, that, unleſs the war was carried on more vigorouſly, or a peace offered more ſincerely, that kingdom was long like to be a ſcene of blood and rapine.

So likewiſe was its neighbouring kingdom of Poland. It was hoped, that the talk of a new election was only a loud threatning, to force a peace ſooner; but it proved otherwiſe. A dyet was brought together of thoſe, who were irreconcileable to king Auguſtus; and, after many delays, Staniſlaus Leezinkſki, Palatine of Poſnania, was choſen and proclaimed their king, and he was immediately owned by the king of Sweden. The cardinal primate ſeemed at firſt unwilling to agree to this; but he ſuffered himſelf to be forced into it; and this was believed to be an artifice of his to excuſe himſelf to the court of France, whoſe penſioner he was, and to whom he had engaged to carry the election for the prince of Conti. The war was carried on this year with various ſucceſs on both ſides. King Auguſtus made a quick march to Warſaw, where he ſurprized ſome of Staniſlaus's party, the latter eſcaping narrowly himſelf. But the king of Sweden followed ſo cloſely, that, not being able to fight him, king Auguſtus was obliged to retreat into Saxony, where he continued for ſome months. There he ruined his own dominions, by the great preparations he made to return with a mighty force; but his delays induced many to forſake his party; for it was given out, that he would return no more, and that he was weary of the war, which he had good reaſon to be. Poland, in the mean while, was in a moſt miſerable condition. The king of Sweden ſubſiſted his army in it, and his temper grew daily more fierce and gothic. He was reſolved to make no peace, till Auguſtus was driven out; but, in the mean time, his own country ſuffered greatly. Livonia was deſtroyed by the Muſcovites who had taken Narva, and made ſome progreſs in Sweden. The pope eſpouſed the intereſts of king Auguſtus; for to ſupport a new convert of ſuch importance was thought a point worthy the zeal of that ſee. He therefore cited the cardinal primate to appear at Rome, and to give an account of the ſhare he had in all the war. The pope was now wholly in the French intereſt, and maintained the character, which they pretend to, of a common father, with ſo much partiality, that the emperor himſelf, how tame and ſubmiſſive ſoever to all the impoſitions of that ſee, yet could not but make loud complaints of it. The pope had threatned, that he would thunder out excommunications againſt all thoſe troops, which ſhould continue in his dominions. The emperor was ſo implicit in his faith, and ſo ready in his obedience, that he ordered his troops to retire out of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate; but all the effect this had, was to leave that ſtate entirely in the hands of the [k] Colonel Cavallier, their principal leader, in his 'Memoirs of the wars of the Cevennes,' B. IV. tells us, that the whole country was now reduced to a deſart, an hundred boroughs and villages plundered and burnt, the priſons full of proteſtants, and the ſuccours, which had been promiſed two years before from England, not come, when marſhal de Villars arrived in the province with freſh troops. The firſt thing he did after his arrival was to give notice to Cavallier, that, if he would come to any agreement, and lay down his arms, the marſhal had orders from the king to grant all his juſt demands; but, if Cavallier ſhould refuſe, the proteſtants ſhould expect no favour. At laſt, after a conference between the marſhal and Cavallier, the latter in conjunction with his friends drew up articles in behalf of the proteſtants of the Cevennes, which were ſigned by the marſhal and monſieur de Boſville, intendant of Languedoc, in the king's name, on the one part, and by Cavallier and his lieutenant Billiard, on the other; and were as follow:

'The humble requeſt of the proteſtants, in the province of Languedoc to his majeſty.'

I. That his majeſty be pleaſed to grant us liberty of conſcience in all the province, and to hold religious aſſemblies in ſuch country-places, as they ſhall think convenient, and not in cities or walled towns.

'Granted, provided they do not build churches.'

II. That all ſuch, as are detained in the gallies, only on account of religion, ſince the revocation of the edict of Nantes, be ſet at liberty in ſix weeks after the date thereof.

'Granted.'

III That all, who have left the kingdom on account of religion, ſhall have free liberty to return, and be reſtored to their eſtates and privileges.

'Granted, on condition they take the oath of allegiance to the king.'

IV. That the parliament of Languedoc ſhall be eſtabliſhed on its ancient foot, and reſtored to its privileges.

'The king will adviſe.'

V. That no capitation-tax ſhall be paid by the province, during the ſpace of ten years.

'Refuſed.'

VI. That we ſhall have the cities of Montpellier, Cette, Perpignan, and Aiguemortes, as cautionary towns.

'Refuſed.'

VII. That the inhabitants of the Cevennes, whoſe houſes have been burnt in the wars, ſhall pay no impoſts for the term of ſeven years.

'Granted.'

VIII. That out of a body of two thouſand of thoſe, who were actually with monſieur Cavallier, and ſuch as ſhall be delivered out of the ſeveral priſons, he ſhall raiſe a regiment of dragoons to ſerve in Portugal; and that he ſhall receive his orders from the king.

'Granted, provided the remainder lay down their arms, that the king will permit them to live undiſturbed, in the exerciſe of their religion.'

By virtue of a full power we have received from his majeſty, we have granted the above articles to the new converts of the province of Languedoc.

But whether theſe articles were ever laid before the king, or only before his miniſters, colonel Cavallier was not able to determine; but it is certain, they were very little obſerved in favour of the proteſtants.

The

French, againſt whom the pope did not think fit to fulminate, though he pretended ſtill, that he would maintain a neutrality; and both the Venetians and the great duke adhered to him in that reſolution, and continued neutral during the war.

After this view of the ſtate of affairs abroad, it is time to return to England, where, on the 29th of October, the parliament met at Weſtminſter, according to the laſt prorogation; and the queen, being come to the houſe of peers, made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"THE great and remarkable ſucceſs, with which God bleſſed our arms in this ſummer, has ſtirred up our good ſubjects in all parts of the kingdom, to expreſs their unanimous joy and ſatisfaction; and I aſſure myſelf, you are all come diſpoſed to do every thing, that is neceſſary for the effectual proſecution of the war, nothing being more obvious, than that a timely improvement of our preſent advantages will enable us to procure a laſting foundation of ſecurity for the liberty of Europe. This is my aim. I have no intereſt, nor ever will have but to promote the good and happineſs of all my ſubjects.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I muſt deſire ſuch ſupplies of you, as may be requiſite for carrying on the next year's ſervice both by ſea and land, and for punctually performing our treaties with all our allies, the rather, for that ſome of them have juſt pretenſions depending ever ſince the laſt war; and I need not put you in mind, of what importance it is to preſerve the public credit, both abroad and at home.

"I believe you will find ſome charges neceſſary next year which were not mentioned in the laſt ſeſſion, and ſome extraordinary expences incurred ſince, which were not then provided for.

"I aſſure you, that all the ſupplies you give, with what I am able to ſpare from my own expences, ſhall be carefully applied to the beſt advantage for the public ſervice: And I earneſtly recommend to you a ſpeedy diſpatch, as that, which, under the good providence of God, we muſt chiefly depend upon to diſappoint the earlieſt deſigns of our enemies.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I cannot but tell you how eſſential it is for attaining thoſe great ends abroad, of which we have ſo hopeful a proſpect, that we ſhould be entirely united at home.

"It is plain, our enemies have no encouragement left, but what ariſes from their hopes of our diviſions. It is, therefore, your concern not to give the leaſt countenance to thoſe hopes.

"My inclinations are to be kind and indulgent to you all. I hope you will do nothing to endanger the loſs of this opportunity, which God has put into our hands, of ſecuring ourſelves and all Europe; and that there will be no contention among you, but who ſhall moſt promote the public welfare.

"Such a temper as this, in all your proceedings, cannot fail of ſecuring your reputation both at home and abroad.

"This would make me a happy queen, whoſe utmoſt endeavours would never be wanting to make you a happy and flouriſhing people."

The two houſes immediately voted congratulatory addreſſes; and, the next day, the following one was preſented by the lords.

"WE your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, beg leave to return our humble and hearty thanks to your majeſty for your moſt gracious ſpeech to your parliament.

"The kindneſs and indulgence your majeſty hath expreſſed for all your ſubjects; your care to create a perfect union among us, by forewarning us of the miſchiefs of diviſions; your goodneſs in declaring your own happineſs to depend upon that of your people; your deſire to ſee that happineſs ſettled upon a laſting foundation; your ſtrict regard to treaties; your juſtice to public engagements, abroad as well as at home; and, your noble concern for the ſupport of the liberties of Europe, comprehend all the royal qualities, that can be deſired in a ſovereign; and when they are all ſo manifeſtly united in your royal perſon, we, and the whole nation, ſhould be inexcuſable to God and the whole world, to this age and to poſterity, if we ſhould not endeavour effectually to accompliſh all thoſe great and excellent deſigns, which your majeſty hath ſo wiſely and graciouſly recommended.

"We, for ourſelves, faithfully aſſure your majeſty, that we will do all all in our power to bring this ſeſſion to a happy and ſpeedy concluſion, and to improve, to the utmoſt, the bleſſed opportunity that God hath put into our hands.

"Upon this occaſion of approaching your majeſty, we deſire humbly to congratulate the great and glorious ſucceſs of your majeſty's arms, in conjunction with thoſe of your allies, under the command of the duke of Marlborough. We can never enough admire your wiſdom and courage, in ſending that ſeaſonable and neceſſary aſſiſtance to the empire; and we cannot too much commend the ſecrecy and bravery, with which your orders were executed.

"What remains for us to do, is, to beſeech God, that the like ſucceſs may attend your majeſty's arms, till you ſee the proteſtant religion, and the liberty of Europe, ſettled upon a firm and laſting foundation; and that your majeſty may live many years, to have the pleaſure and glory of beholding thoſe parts of the world happy in the enjoyment of thoſe bleſſings, which your majeſty ſhall have procured for them."

To this the queen anſwered, "I am very ſenſible of the great duty and affection you have expreſſed in the ſeveral particulars of this addreſs; and I return you my hearty thanks for your congratulation of our great ſucceſs, and for the aſſurances of your readineſs to concur in proſecuting it effectually."

The addreſs preſented by the commons, the ſame day, was thus expreſſed:

Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"WE your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes in parliament aſſembled, do beg leave to return to your majeſty our moſt humble and hearty thanks for your majeſty's moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne; and to congratulate your majeſty upon the great and glorious ſucceſs, with which it hath pleaſed God to bleſs your majeſty in the entire defeat of the united force of France and Bavaria, by the arms of your majeſty and your allies, under the command, and by the courage and conduct of the duke of Marlborough; and in the victory obtained by your majeſty's fleet, under the command, and by the courage of ſir George Rooke.

"Your majeſty can never be diſappointed in your expectation from us, your faithful commons, who all come diſpoſed to do every thing neceſſary for the effectual proſecution of the war; and therefore your majeſty may depend upon our providing ſuch ſupplies, and giving ſuch ſpeedy diſpatch to the public buſineſs, as may enable your majeſty to purſue theſe advantages ſo happily obtained over the common enemy, which we can never doubt but your majeſty's wiſdom will improve to the procuring a laſting ſecurity for England, and a firm ſupport for the liberty of Europe.

"We are truly ſenſible, that nothing can be more eſſential for the attaining thoſe great ends, than to be entirely united at home. We ſhall therefore uſe our utmoſt endeavours, by all proper methods, to prevent all diviſions among us, and will have no contention, but who ſhall moſt promote and eſtabliſh the public welfare both in church and ſtate. Thus your majeſty's reign will be made happy, and your memory bleſſed to all poſterity."

The queen "returned them thanks for the aſſurances they gave her of diſpatching the ſupplies, and avoiding all diviſions; both which, as they were extremely acceptable to her, ſo they would be advantageous to themſelves, and beneficial to the public."

The lords' addreſs was univerſally applauded; but that of the commons gave great offence, particularly, becauſe it ſpoke in the ſame terms of the duke of Marlborough's victories and the advantages gained by ſir George Rooke[1]. It

[1] The ducheſs of Marlborough in the 'Account of her conduct' (p. 146.) makes the following obſervation on this occaſion: My lord of Marlborough before he had had ſufficient opportunity of ſhewing the greatneſs of the general, had, for his firſt ſucceſſes in the war, been complimented by this very houſe of commons, as the 'retriever of the glory of the Engliſh nation,' being then reputed a high-churchman. But now, that he was thought to look towards the moderate party, his 'complete victory' at Blenheim was, in the addreſs of congratulation to the queen, ridiculouſly paired with ſir George Rooke's 'drawn battle' with the French at ſea.

was alſo obſerved, that the promiſe, which they made to the queen, 'of uſing their utmoſt endeavours to prevent all diviſions,' was in a manner reſtrained by the addition of 'all proper methods,' which many looked upon as ominous.

However, after the commons had taken the ſervices of the army and navy into conſideration, and, by an unanimous vote, on the 2d of November, deſired the queen 'to beſtow her bounty upon the ſeamen and land forces, who had behaved themſelves ſo gallantly,' they proceeded to the ſupply. The ſeveral ſums they granted for the navy, the army, and other neceſſary expences, amounted to four millions, ſix hundred and ſeventy thouſand, four hundred and eighty-ſix pounds; which they reſolved to levy by a land tax of four ſhillings in the pound, by continuing the duties on malt, by raiſing eight hundred and ſeventy-ſeven thouſand, nine hundred and thirty one pounds, by ſale of annuities, and by ſeveral other ways and means. They made ſo great a diſpatch, that, on the 9th of December, the land tax bill received the royal aſſent, on which occaſion the queen made a ſhort ſpeech to both houſes, wherein, in particular, ſhe returned thanks to the commons for their early diſpatch of ſo great a part of the neceſſary ſupplies, which ſhe looked upon to be a ſure pledge of their affections for her ſervice.

It was generally wiſhed, and indeed expected, in the court, as well as in the city and country, that the 'bill to prevent occaſional conformity,' which was the occaſion of great diviſions and conteſts in the two former ſeſſions of this parliament, would not have been revived again at this juncture, when all parties ought to have ſuſpended their animoſities, and joined in celebrating the ſucceſſes of her majeſty's arms. But, notwithſtanding all the endeavours uſed by the miniſtry to engage the leading men of the high church party to reſtrain their zeal, till they might have an opportunity of gratifying it, without obſtructing the public buſineſs, the parliament had not ſat long, before Mr. William Bromley moved in the houſe of commons for leave to bring in that bill. This motion met with great oppoſition from all the moderate party, among whom appeared many courtiers, particularly Mr. Henry Boyle, chancellor of the Exchequer, who ſpoke ſtrenuouſly againſt it. But, though it was carried in the affirmative, yet the chief of the high church party debated ſeveral days in their private aſſemblies, Whether they ſhould bring in the bill or not? Though many urged ſtrong reaſons for the negative, yet the bill was brought in, but moderated in ſeveral clauſes; for thoſe, who preſſed it, were now reſolved to bring the terms as low as poſſible, in order once to carry a bill upon that head. Upon the firſt reading of it, after a warm debate, the queſtion was carried for a ſecond reading. This vigorous ſtruggle againſt the bill, even in the houſe of commons, made the patrons of it juſtly apprehenſive, that it would never paſs by itſelf through the lords; and therefore, after a long conſultation in their chief meeting, and (as was then whiſpered) by the ſuggeſtion of Mr. ſecretary Harley, in whom they ſtill repoſed great confidence, but who deſigned to decoy them into a ſnare, they reſolved to attempt the tacking of it to the land tax bill. Accordingly, on the ſecond reading of the 'occaſional bill,' Mr. Bromley made a long ſpeech, wherein, among other things, he urged, "That the practice of 'occaſional conformity' was ſuch a ſcandalous hypocriſy, as was no way to be excuſed upon any pretence whatſoever. That it was condemned even by the better ſort of diſſenters themſelves. That the employing perſons of a different religion from that eſtabliſhed by law had never been practiſed by any wiſe government, and was not allowed even in Holland. That the ſacramental teſt was appointed by the wiſdom of the legiſlature to preſerve the eſtabliſhed church; which church ſeemed in as much danger from the diſſenters at this time, as it was from papiſts, when the act was made. That this law, being ſo neceſſary, and having been twice refuſed in the houſe of lords, the only way to have it paſs, was to tack it to a money bill. That it had been an antient practice to tack bills, that were for the good of the ſubject, to money bills, it being reaſonable, that, while grievous taxes were laid upon the ſubject for the ſupport of the crown, the crown ſhould, in return, paſs ſuch laws, as were for the benefit of the people. That the great neceſſity there was for the money bill's paſſing, was rather an argument for than againſt this proceeding. For what danger could there be, that the lords, who pretended to be ſuch great patriots, ſhould rather loſe the neceſſary ſupplies, than paſs an act ſo requiſite for the preſervation of the church. That, however, if they ſhould ſuppoſe them ſo unreaſonable, the matter was not yet ſo bad, for it was only but proroguing the parliament for a few days, and then the commons might paſs the land tax again without the tack." He concluded with moving, "That the 'bill to prevent occaſional conformity' might be tacked to the land tax bill." This motion occaſioned a long and warm debate. The deſign of the party was, that the lords ſhould be put under a great difficulty; ſince if they ſhould untack the bill, and ſeparate one from the other, then the houſe of commons would have inſiſted on a maxim, which was now ſettled among them as a fundamental principle never to be departed from, that the lords cannot alter a money bill, but muſt either paſs it or reject it, as it is ſent to them.—On the other hand, the lords could not agree to any ſuch tack, without departing from that ſolemn reſolution, which was in their books ſigned by moſt of them, never to admit of a tack to a money bill; and, if they yielded now, they taught the houſe of commons the way to impoſe any thing on them at their pleaſure. The party in the commons put their whole ſtrength on the carrying this point. They went farther in their deſign; that, which was truly aimed at by thoſe in the ſecret, was to break the war, and to force a peace. They knew, that a bill with this tack could not paſs in the houſe of peers; for ſome lords even of their own party confeſſed, that they would never paſs it in that manner. By this means money would be ſtopped; and this would throw all matters into great confuſion both at home and abroad, and diſpoſe the allies, as deſpairing of any help from England, to accept of ſuch terms as France would offer them. Thus an artful deſign was formed to break, or at leaſt to ſhake, the whole alliance. The court was very apprehenſive of this, and the lord treaſurer Godolphin oppoſed it with much zeal. The party diſowned the deſign for ſome time, till they had brought up their whole ſtrength, and thought they were ſure of a majority. The debate held long: Thoſe, who oppoſed the tacking, urged, that it was a change of the whole conſtitution, and was in effect turning it into a commonwealth, for it imported the denying, not only to the lords, but to the crown, the free uſe of their negative in the legiſlature. If this was once ſettled, then, as often as the public occaſions made a money bill neceſſary, every thing, which the majority in the commons had a mind to, would be tacked to it. It is true, ſome tacks had been made to money bills in king Charles's time; but even thoſe had ſtill ſome relation to the money which was given. But in this caſe a bill, whoſe operation was only for one year, and which determined as ſoon as the four ſhillings in the pound were paid, was to have a perpetual law tacked to it, which muſt continue in force, after the greateſt part of the act was expired. Beſides theſe arguments, Mr. ſecretary Hedges and the lord Cutts repreſented to the houſe, that the duke of Marlborough had lately concluded a treaty with the king of Pruſſia for eight thouſand of his men, to be employed towards the relief of the duke of Savoy, who was in moſt imminent danger. That theſe troops were actually on their march, upon the credit of a vote of that houſe, That they would make good her majeſty's treaties: And that the obſtructing the money bills, which the tacking would infallibly do, would put an immediate ſtop to the march of thoſe troops, and thereby occaſion the entire ruin of the duke of Savoy. The lord Cutts urged, "That the Engliſh nation was now in the higheſt conſideration abroad: That all Europe was attentive to the reſolutions of this parliament; and that, if any diviſions ſhould happen between the two houſes, it would caſt a damp upon the whole confederacy, and give the French king almoſt as great advantage, as we had gained over him at Blenheim." Mr. Boyle, chancellor of the exchequer, ſpoke on the ſame ſide, and aſked, Whether any wiſe man amongſt them would venture his whole eſtate upon a vote? And anſwering himſelf in the negative, 'Then, added he, ſhall we now venture the ſafety of all England, nay, of all Europe, upon this vote?' ſir John Hollis perceiving, that many members had left the high church party, obſerved, "That for his own part, he had been againſt this bill from the beginning, but he wondered, that thoſe gentlemen, who had all along pretended, that the church of England was on the brink of ruin, unleſs ſuch a bill ſhould paſs, did not purſue the only method, that might ſecure the paſſing of that bill. I put it (added he) to the conſcience of thoſe gentlemen, who are come over to us, whether they were before ſatisfied, as to the reaſonableneſs and neceſſity of this bill, ſince now they deſert their own friends? I wiſh they had voted on our ſide two years ago, for it would have ſaved us a great deal of trouble, the greateſt part of the nation a great deal of uneaſineſs, and themſelves the confuſion of abandoning their party at a pinch."

Sir Thomas Littleton ſpoke on the ſame ſide, and ſaid, "By the tacking of this bill, we mean to throw a neceſſity upon the lords to paſs it. But ſuppoſe the lords think fit to untack what we have tacked, and to acquaint us that they are ready to paſs the money-bill, but will conſider of the other; whoſe fault will the nation account it to be, that the queen's buſineſs is retarded?" In anſwer to all theſe objections, ſome precedents were alledged, and the neceſſity of the bill for the preſervation of the church was urged, which they ſaw was not like to paſs, unleſs ſent to the lords ſo accompanied; which ſome thought was very wittily expreſſed by calling it a portion annexed to the church, as in a marriage; and they ſaid, they did not doubt but thoſe of the court would exert themſelves to get it paſſed, when it was accompanied with two millions as its price. Upon the diviſion, the tack was rejected by a majority of two hundred and fifty-one voices againſt one hundred and thirty-four.

Thus that deſign was loſt by thoſe, who had built all their hopes upon it, and were now highly offended with ſome of their own party, who had, by their oppoſition, wrought themſelves into good places, and forſook that intereſt, to which they owed their advancement. Theſe, to redeem themſelves with their old friends, ſeemed ſtill zealous for the bill, which afterwards went on coldly and ſlowly in the houſe of commons, for they loſt all hopes of carrying it in the houſe of lords, now that the mine they had laid was ſprung. However, it was ſent up on the 14th of December; and, the next day, it was read for the firſt time. If the queen had not been preſent, there would have been no long debate on that head, for it was ſcarce poſſible to ſay much, that had not been formerly ſaid; but to give her majeſty full information, ſince it was ſuppoſed that ſhe had heard that matter only on one ſide, it was reſolved to open the whole in her hearing. The topics moſt inſiſted on were, the quiet, that the nation enjoyed by the toleration, on which head the ſeverities of former reigns were laid open, both in their injuſtice, cruelty, and their being managed only to advance popery, and other bad deſigns. The peaceable behaviour of the diſſenters, and the zeal they expreſſed for the queen and her government, were likewiſe copiouſly ſet forth, while others ſhewed a malignity to it. That, which was chiefly urged, was, that every new law made in the matter altered the ſtate of things from what it was, when the act for toleration firſt paſſed. This gave the diſſenters an alarm: They might from thence juſtly conclude, that one ſtep would be made after another, till the whole effect of that act ſhould be overturned. It did not appear, from the behaviour of any among them, that they were not contented with the toleration they enjoyed, or that they were carrying on deſigns againſt the church. In that caſe it might be very reaſonable to look for a further ſecurity; but nothing tending that way was ſo much as pretended: All went on jealouſies and fears, the common topics of ſedition. On the other hand, to ſupport the bill, all ſtories were brought up to ſhew, how reſtleſs and unquiet that ſort of men had been in former times. The archbiſhop of York declared, "That he was for ſo much of the bill as concerned the church." Whereupon the earl of Peterborough ſaid, "That he was glad to hear that learned prelate make a diſtinction between the 'eccleſiaſtical' and 'political' part of the bill; and he hoped, that all the lords, who, in their conſciences, were ſatisfied, as his grace ſeemed to be, that this bill was framed to ſerve a 'temporal,' as well as 'ſpiritual' end, would vote againſt it." The queſtion being put, whether the bill ſhould be read a ſecond time, it was carried in the negative by a majority of ſeventy-one voices againſt fifty; fifty-one members preſent, and twenty proxies, being for rejecting it; and thirty-three peers in the houſe, and ſeventeen proxies, for giving it a ſecond reading.

By this time the lords were engaged in an affair, which made no leſs noiſe than the 'Conformity-bill,' and was occaſioned by a ſpeech of lord Haverſham; his lordſhip having acquainted the peers, that he had matters of great importance to lay before them, but that he deſired it ſhould be in a full houſe; all the lords in the town and in the neighbourhood were ſummoned to attend three days after, when his lordſhip made a ſpeech, of which theſe are the moſt remarkable paſſages:

"I would be far from detracting or leſſening any man's juſt praiſe, and do really believe that the 'wonderful victory' obtained over the French, under the conduct and command of prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough, if conſidered in all its circumſtances, ſpecially the unuſual ſecreſy, with which the orders were executed, is the greateſt any hiſtory can ſhew us.

"And, though our ſucceſs at ſea was not equal to what it was at land, yet the Engliſh courage and bravery ſhewed itſelf the ſame. I cannot indeed congratulate ſir George Rooke's 'entire victory over the French;' but I can, and do moſt heartily, his 'ſafe deliverance' from them.

"Let our victories be what they will aſhore, while France is thus powerful at ſea, and more ſo daily, not only by her new additions, but by our too eaſy conceſſions, as were thoſe of St. Chriſtopher's, Newfoundland, and Hudſon's-Bay; while our trade is thus neglected, and your lordſhips faithful and provident advice baffled by the dark counſels of no body knows who; England, in my opinion, can never be ſafe.

"Another thing, that I ſhall take notice of, is the 'preſent ſtate of the coin;' and I dare venture to ſay, that, if ſuch vaſt exportations be much longer continued and allowed, we ſhall have very little left at home. France may be beaten, but England muſt be beggared. I know we are not ſo ſenſible of this, becauſe there is a paper-money now current; but, ſhould there ever happen to be a ſtop there, I pray God preſerve us from ſinking all at once.

"The laſt thing, that I ſhall mention to your lordſhips, is in relation to Scotland. I think I need but lay before your lordſhips the true matter of fact to convince you how much it deſerves your conſideration. A little before the laſt ſitting down of the parliament there, it was thought neceſſary to make ſome alteration in that miniſtry; and accordingly ſome were diſplaced to make room for others, taking ſome from each party, who might influence the reſt. Things being thus prepared, and a 'motly miniſtry' ſet up, the parliament met about the 6th of July laſt. And, though the ſucceſſion to the crown in the proteſtant line was the main thing recommended with the greateſt earneſtneſs by the queen in her letter to them, yet was it ſo poſtponed and baffled, that at length it came to nothing; partly, becauſe the miniſtry was ſo weak and divided, that, inſtead of doing every thing, they could do nothing; and partly, from a received opinion, that the ſucceſſion itſelf was never ſincerely and cordially intended, either by the miniſtry there, or by thoſe, that managed the Scots affairs here.

"This is very evident; for, at the opening of the ſeſſion, my lord ſecretary himſelf diſtinguiſhes between a 'ſecret' and 'revealed will.' And not only that, but upon the fourth 'ſederunt' (as they call it) a motion was made for 'a bill of excluſion;' I take it formally to be ſo, though it bears the title of 'an act of ſecurity,' which was read the firſt time on the 7th, and ordered to lie on the table till they heard from England; and, on the 10th, it paſſed into a law. Now can any reaſonable man believe, that thoſe, who promoted a bill of excluſion there, or thoſe, who here adviſed the paſſing of it, could ever be really and cordially for the Engliſh ſucceſſion. I know there is an exception in the act itſelf; but it is ſuch a one, as might have, full as well, been left out. For he, that aſks what, he knows before, will never be granted, only aſks the denial. And yet this is not all, but in this very bill of excluſion, as I call it, all the heretors and boroughs are not only allowed, but ordained (as the word is) to be armed, and to exerciſe their fencible men once every month.

"This being the fact (and, I think, I have ſtated it very truly) ſurely, my lords, it is what deſerves your conſideration; and I ſhall make but one or two obſervations to your lordſhips. There are two matters of all troubles; much diſcontents, and great poverty; and whoever will now look into Scotland, will find them both in that kingdom. It is certain, the nobility and gentry of Scotland are as learned and as brave as any nation in Europe can boaſt of; and theſe are generally diſcontented. And as to the common people, they are very numerous and very ſtout, but very poor. And who is the man, that can anſwer what ſuch a multitude, ſo armed, ſo diſciplined, with ſuch leaders, may do, eſpecially ſince opportunities do ſo much alter men from themſelves? And there will never be wanting all the promiſes and all the aſſiſtance France can give.

"Beſides this, my lords, I take it to be of the laſt danger to England, that there ſhould be the leaſt ſhadow or pretence of a neceſſity to keep up regular and ſtanding troops in this kingdom in time of peace; for I ſhall always be of the ſame opinion, that what has been, may be. In ſhort, my lords, I think every man wiſhes theſe things had not been; and in my opinion, there is no man, but muſt ſay, they ſhould not have been. I ſhall end with an advice of my lord Bacon's. 'Let men, ſays he, beware how they neglect or ſuffer matter of troubles to be prepared; for no man can forbid the ſparks that may ſet all on fire."

The lords were variouſly affected with this ſpeech; which, though generally approved, as to that part of it which related to the Scots affairs, yet was it no leſs unwelcome than unexpected to ſee the preſent miniſtry reflected upon, to whoſe counſels and management the nation owed its proſperity at home, and, in great meaſure, its ſucceſſes abroad. And beſides, beſides, ſome peers thought it derogatory to the duke of Marlborough, that prince Eugene ſhould be named before him in the mention of an action, in which that prince acted but a ſecond part. However, this ſpeech was ſeconded by the earls of Rocheſter and Nottingham; the former particularly lamenting the ill conſequences of the exportation of the coin, and inſiſting on the neceſſity of putting a ſtop to that evil. The lord-treaſurer, who took this to be an oblique reflection on himſelf, ſaid, "That, though it would not be difficult to demonſtrate, that there never was ſo great a plenty of money in England, as at preſent, yet there was a ſure way to increaſe that plenty, and prevent the exportation of coin, and that was by clapping up a peace with France. But then, addded he, I leave it to the conſideration of any wiſe man, whether we ſhall not thereby be ſhortly in danger of loſing, not only all our coin, but all our land to boot."

The Scots buſineſs being the moſt material part of the lord Haverſham's ſpeech, the 29th of November was appointed to conſider of it, upon which day the queen went to the houſe of peers, both to hear the debates about the important point, and to moderate by her preſence any heats, which might ariſe[m]. This, however, had not all the deſired effect; for the earl of Nottingham, having reflected on king William with relation to the treaty of partition, the lord Somers roſe up and ſaid, "That it was unbecoming a member of that houſe to ſully the memory of ſo great a prince; and he doubted not, but a man, who could reflect on king William before his ſucceſſor, would do the ſame by her preſent majeſty, when ſhe was gone." As to the treaty mentioned by the earl of Nottingham, he added, "That there was a noble lord there preſent (meaning the earl of Jerſey) who was the principal agent and plenipotentiary in that treaty, and whoſe duty, as well as intereſt, it was to vindicate both the memory of his late moſt gracious maſter and his own conduct." In the mean time the lord Mohun conſulted with ſeveral peers, whether they ſhould move to ſend the earl of Nottingham to the Tower. But, this being the firſt time the queen did the houſe the honour of coming to hear their debates, they thought fit to decline that motion out of reſpect to her majeſty As to the main buſineſs of the day, the earls of Nottingham and Rocheſter urged the ill conſequences of the 'act of ſecurity' paſſed in Scotland: And it being anſwered, That the ſame was granted, to prevent the danger of a rebellion in that kingdom, it was replied, "That, if the Scots had rebelled, they would have rebelled without arms; whereas, if they had a mind to rebel now, this act had legally ſupplied them with neceſſaries to ſupport their rebellion." The more moderate repreſented, That, like ſkilful phyſicians and wiſe legiſlators, they ought rather to apply preſent remedies to a known evil, than to loſe time in enquiring, whether or no it might have been prevented. It was after much declaiming moved, That the lords might paſs ſome votes upon the Scots act. The tories, who preſſed this, intended to add a ſevere vote againſt all thoſe, who had adviſed it; and it was viſible at whom this was aimed. The whigs diverted this: They ſaid, that the putting a vote againſt an act paſſed in Scotland looked like the claiming ſome ſuperiority over them, which ſeemed very improper at that time; ſince that kingdom was poſſeſſed with a national jealouſy on this head, which would be much increaſed by ſuch a proceeding. More moderate methods were therefore propoſed, in order to the making up of a breach in this iſland, with which it ſeemed to be threatned: and, at laſt, the grand committee of the peers came to theſe reſolutions, "That the beſt method to prevent the inconveniencies, which might happen by the late acts paſſed in Scotland, was by making ſuch laws here for that purpoſe: That the queen be enabled by act of parliament, on the part of England, to name commiſſioners to treat about an union with Scotland, provided, that theſe powers be not put in execution, till commiſſioners ſhould be named on the part of Scotland by the parliament there. That Scotſmen ſhould not enjoy the privileges of Engliſhmen, except ſuch as are ſettled in this kingdom, in Ireland, and the plantations, and ſuch as are or ſhall be in our land or ſea-ſervice, until an union be had, or the ſucceſſion ſettled as in England. That the bringing of cattle from Scotland into England be prevented. That the lord admiral or commiſſioners of the admiralty, for the time being, be required to give orders to her majeſty's ſhips, to take ſuch ſhips, as they ſhall find trading from Scotland to France, or to the ports of any of her majeſty's enemies; and that cruizers be appointed for that end. And that the exportation of Engliſh wool into Scotland be carefully hindered." Theſe reſolutions being approved by the houſe, the judges were ordered to reduce them into bills; one of which, for an entire union, was read a third time, and paſſed the 20th of December, and ſent to the commons for their concurrence.

On the 9th, the lords preſented an addreſs to the queen, importing, "That, having taken into conſideration divers acts of parliament lately paſſed in Scotland, and duly weighed the dangerous and pernicious effects, which were likely to follow from them, they were preparing bills for preventing ſuch great evils; and, in the mean time, they thought themſelves bound to repreſent to her majeſty, as their humble opinion, that it was highly requiſite for the ſafety of this kingdom, that ſpeedy and effectual orders be given for putting of Newcaſtle into a condition of defence, for ſecuring the port of Tinmouth, and for repairing Carliſle and Hull. They alſo beſought her majeſty to cauſe the militia of the four northern counties to be diſciplined, and provided with arms and ammunition; and a competent number of regular troops to be kept upon the northern borders of England, and in the north parts of Ireland: And to direct the laws to be effectually put in execution againſt all papiſts, in reſpect to their arms and perſons, and to order a particular account of what was done, in excution of her commands, to be laid before her majeſty in council without delay." To this addreſs the queen anſwered, "That ſhe ſhould direct a ſurvey to be made of the ſeveral places mentioned in this addreſs, in order to lay it before the parliament: And what forces could be ſpared from their attendance here, ſhould be quartered upon the borders, as they had been the laſt year: And that ſhe would likewiſe give the neceſſary directions upon the other particulars of the addreſs."

The commons likewiſe, having in a grand committee, conſidered the ſtate of the nation with regard to Scotland, reſolved on the 13th of December, "that a bill ſhould be brought in for the effectual ſecuring the kingdom of England from the apparent dangers, that might ariſe from ſeveral acts lately paſſed in the parliament of Scotland."

[1704-5] And on the 11th of January, Mr. Conyers reported from the committee of the whole houſe, to whom it was referred to conſider of heads for that bill, the reſolutions they had come to, and which were as follow: "That it be one head of the bill to enable her majeſty to nominate and appoint commiſſioners for England to treat with commiſſioners from Scotland, for an union between the two kingdoms. 2. That all natives of the kingdom of Scotland, except ſuch as are ſettled, and ſhall continue inhabitants of England, or the dominions thereunto belonging, or at preſent in the ſervice of the army or navy, ſhall be reputed as aliens, unleſs the ſucceſſion to the crown of Scotland be ſettled on the princeſs Sophia of Hanover, and the heirs of her body being proteſtants. 3. That a more effectual proviſion be made to prevent the exportation of wool from England and Ireland into Scotland. 4. That proviſion be made to prevent the importation of Scots linen into England or Ireland, and to permit the exportation of the linen manufactures of Ireland in Engliſh bottoms into her majeſty's plantations in the Weſt-Indies. 5. That immediate proviſion be made to prevent the conveying of horſes, arms, and ammunition, from England into Scotland. 6. That all the proteſtant free-holders of the ſix northern counties of England be permitted to furniſh themſelves with arms." Theſe reſolutions being read twice, all, except the laſt, were agreed to by the houſe, who appointed a committee to prepare and bring in a bill accordingly; and on the 16th of January, upon a ſecond reading of the lords bill to the ſame purpoſe, it was ordered to lie upon the table, becauſe the commons were reſolved to adhere to a notion, which had now taken ſuch root among them, that it could not be ſhaken, that the lords could not put into a bill begun with them any clauſe, containing money-penalties, as they had done into this. This notion was indeed wholly new, for penalties upon tranſgreſſions could not be conſtrued to be a giving of money. The lords were clearly in poſſeſſion of proceeding thus; ſo that the calling it in queſtion was an attempt on the ſhare, which the lords had in the legiſlature. On the 1ſt. of February, the commons read it a third time, and paſſed their own bill relating to Scotland; and the following Chriſtmas was the day prefixed for the Scots to enact the ſucceſſion, or, on failure thereof, then this act was to have effect. A great coldneſs appeared in many of the commons, who uſed to be hot on leſs important occaſions: They ſeemed not to deſire, that the Scots ſhould ſettle the ſucceſſion; and it was viſible, that ſome of them hoped, that the lords would have uſed their bill, as they had uſed that ſent down by the lords. Many of them were leſs concerned in the fate of the bill, becauſe it diverted the cenſure, which they had intended to fix on the lord-treaſurer. But the lords were aware of this, and four days after the bill was ſent up to them, paſſed it without amendment. Thoſe, who wiſhed well to the union, were afraid, that the prohibition, and the declaring the Scots aliens after the day prefixed, would be looked on as threatnings; and they ſaw cauſe to apprehend, that ill-tempered men in Scotland would uſe this as an handle to divert that nation, which was already much ſoured, from hearkening to any motion, that might tend to promote the union, or the declaring the ſucceſſion. It was given out by thoſe, that this was an indignity done their kingdom, and that they ought not ſo much as to treat with a nation, that threatned them in ſuch a manner. The marquis of Tweedale excuſed himſelf from ſerving any longer, upon which the duke of Argyle was appointed lord-high-commiſſioner in his room.

[m] The queen began this winter to come to the houſe of peers upon great occaſions to hear their debates, which, as it was of good uſe for her better information, ſo it was very ſerviceable in bringing the houſe into better order. The firſt time ſhe came, was, when the debate was taken up concerning the Scotch act: She knew the lord treaſurer was aimed at by it, and ſhe diverted the ſtorm by her endeavours, as well as ſhe reſtrained it by her preſence. Burnet vol. II. 405.

The duke of Marlborough, upon his return to England, and firſt coming to the houſe of peers, received the following compliment from the lord-keeper in the name of that houſe:

My lord duke of Marlborough,

"THE happy ſucceſs, that hath attended her majeſty's arms under your grace's command in Germany the laſt campaign, is ſo truly great, ſo truly glorious in all its circumſtances, that few inſtances in the hiſtory of former ages can equal, much leſs excel the luſtre of it.

"Your grace has not overthrown young unſkilful generals, raw and undiſciplined troops; but your grace has conquered the French and Bavarian armies; armies that were fully inſtructed in all the arts of war, ſelect veteran troops, fluſhed with former victories, and commanded by generals of great experience and bravery.

"The glorious victories your grace has obtained at Schellenberg and Hochſtet, are very great, very illuſtrious in themſelves; but they are greater ſtill in their conſequences to her majeſty and her allies. The emperor is thereby relieved; the empire itſelf freed from a dangerous enemy in the very bowels of it; the exorbitant power of France is checked; and, I hope, a happy ſtep made towards reducing of that monarch within his due bounds, and ſecuring the liberties of Europe.

"The honour of theſe glorious victories, great as they are, under the immediate bleſſing of Almighty God, is chiefly, if not alone, owing to your grace's conduct and valour.

"This is the unanimous voice of England, and all her majeſty's allies.

"My lord, this moſt honourable houſe is highly ſenſible of the great and ſignal ſervices your grace has done her majeſty this campaign, and of the immortal honour you have done the Engliſh nation; and have commanded me to give you their thanks for the ſame. And I do accordingly give your grace the thanks of this houſe, for the great honour your grace has done the nation, and for the great and ſignal ſervices you have done her majeſty and this kingdom, the laſt campaign."

The duke's anſwer was as follows:

My Lords,

"I am extremely ſenſible of the great honour your lordſhips are pleaſed to do me. I muſt beg, on this occaſion, to do right to all the officers and ſoldiers I had the honour of having under my command. Next to the bleſſing of God, the good ſucceſs of this campaign is owing to their extraordinary courage. I am ſure it will be a great ſatisfaction, as well as encouragement to the whole army, to find their ſervices ſo favourably accepted."

The ſame day, a committee of the houſe of commons waited on the duke, to give him alſo the thanks of that houſe.

Marſhal de Tallard, with the other French generals, being now at the queen's diſpoſal, ſhe had a fair opportunity of ſhewing her reſentment of the late haughty and contemptuous behaviour of the French towards her royal perſon and dignity. For, to omit other inſults, it is remarkable, that, when the lord Cutts was about ſettling a cartel with their commiſſioners, they would not allow his title of 'Lieutenant-general of the Queen of England's forces,' but only of 'the Engliſh forces;' upon which, the conferences were broke off. For this, and ſome other reaſons, it was reſolved to give the French priſoners ſome ſmall mortification, by letting them lie two nights on board the Catherine and William and Mary yatchs in the river, and by ſuffering no perſon of diſtinction to have acceſs to them. And it is to be obſerved, that the earl of Feverſham having aſked the duke of Marlborough, "Whether he might go and ſee his old friend marſhal de Tallard?" The duke told him, "That he believed the queen would not refuſe him leave, if he aſked it of her." Which the earl took for a ſoft denial, and forbore to make any application to ſee the marſhal, who with the reſt of the French priſoners, landed on the 16th of December at Blackwall, where they were magnificently entertained at dinner by Mr. Jackſon, and, in the afternoon, ſet out in ſeveral coaches for Barnet, in their way to Nottingham and Litchfield, where her majeſty thought fit they ſhould reſide[n]. They were accompanied by general Churchill, and attended by a detachment of the duke of Northumberland's royal regiment of horſe-guards, who were alſo ordered to guard them at Nottingham and Lichfield as priſoners, being allowed all manner of freedom, both in thoſe places and ten miles round about.

On the 3d of January, the ſtandards and colours, taken at Blenheim, were ſet up in Weſtminſter-hall; and three days after, the duke of Marlborough was entertained by the city of London. Two days before, Dr. Delaune, vice-chancellor of Oxford, accompanied by ſeveral of the heads of houſes, the proctors, and other principal members of the univerſity, attended the queen with a printed copy of the ſpeeches and verſes ſpoke in the theatre on new-year's day. They preſented at the ſame time an addreſs to her majeſty, importing, "That the exerciſe, performed in their theatre, was in honour of the great ſucceſs of her majeſty's arms the laſt year in Germany, under the admirable conduct and invincible courage of the duke of Marlborough; and at ſea under the moſt brave and faithful admiral, ſir George Rooke, actions as beneficial as they were glorious, by which the empire was freed from the power of France and treachery of Bavaria, Charles III. poſſeſſed of Gibraltar, a happy preſage of his ſpeedy ſettlement in his kingdoms, commerce in the Mediterranean ſecured, and the greateſt check, that was ever given to the ambitious deſigns of France. Concluding, with their prayers to God, that he would ſtill reward her majeſty's pious care and concern for the eſtabliſhed church, by the continuance of victory to her arms." The queen returned a cold anſwer to this addreſs, deſiring, however, the vice-chancellor to let the univerſity know, "how kindly ſhe took this inſtance of their zeal;" but adding, "that, as they might be aſſured of her protection, ſo ſhe would not doubt of their care to encourage thoſe principles, which would promote the peace and welfare of herſelf and all her ſubjects." The truth was, that the duke of Marlborough's friends were greatly offended with an addreſs, which ſet the actions of the admiral upon the ſame level with thoſe of the captain-general. And, as the univerſity of Oxford ſpoke the ſenſe of the whole high-church party, ſo it was not long before the court, who now eſpouſed the oppoſite intereſt, ſhewed their reſentment of it.

On the 11th of January, the commons took into conſideration the great ſervices performed by the duke of Marlborough the laſt ſummer; and ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, who in a former ſeſſion, had chiefly oppoſed a motion for rewarding the duke, being now ſilenced, as it was thought, by a promiſe of a place for his ſon, it was unanimouſly reſolved to preſent an addreſs to her majeſty, expreſſing "the great ſenſe this houſe had of the glorious victories obtained by the forces of her majeſty and her allies under the command of the duke of Marlborough; and humbly deſiring her majeſty to conſider of ſome proper means to perpetuate the memory of the great ſervices performed by his grace." The queen took a few days to conſider of this addreſs; and, on the 17th, ſent the following meſſage to the Commons, "That ſhe inclined to grant the intereſt of the crown in the honour and manor of Woodſtock and hundred of Wooton, to the duke of Marlborough and his heirs; and, the lieutenancy and rangerſhip of the parks, with the rents and profits of the manors and hundreds, being granted for two lives, her majeſty thought it proper that incumbrance ſhould be cleared." Hereupon the commons ordered a bill to be brought in, 'to enable the queen to grant the honour and manor of Woodſtock, and hundred of Wooton, to the duke of Marlborough and his heirs;' and reſolved to addreſs the queen to advance the money for clearing the forementioned incumbrances. The queen not only complied with this addreſs, but likewiſe ordered the comptroller of her works to build in Woodſtock park a magnificent palace, called Blenheim-Houſe. The plan of this magnificent building was formed by ſir John Vanbrugh, in which extent and ſtability ſeem to be more ſtudied than art and beauty.

By this time ſir George Rooke had been laid aſide; and it was publickly declared, that the lord-high-admiral had appointed ſir Cloudeſly Shovel, admiral of the white ſquadron, to be rear admiral of England, and admiral and commander in chief of her majeſty's fleet. Sir John Leake, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the late ſea-fight, and had been very ſucceſsful in the ſeaſonable relief of Gibraltar, was at the ſame time appointed vice admiral of the white ſqurdron; ſir George Byng, vice admiral of the blue; ſir Thomas Dilks, rear admiral of the red; William Whetſtone, rear admiral of the white; Sir John Jennings, rear admiral of the blue in the room of ſir James Wiſhart, who laid down his commiſſion.

On the 18th of February, baron de Spanheim, embaſſador extraordinary from the king of Pruſſia, having notified to her majeſty the death of the queen of Pruſſia, only daughter to the late elector of Hanover, by the princeſs Sophia, and great grand-daughter of king James I. Some days before this the houſe of commons took into conſideration the treaty lately concluded by the duke of Marlborough, and unanimouſly reſolved, "That an humble addreſs be preſented to her majeſty, returning the thanks of this houſe for concluding the late treaty with the king of Pruſſia, which was ſo ſeaſonable a ſupport to the duke of Savoy, and ſo great an advantage to the common cauſe; and alſo to aſſure her majeſty, that her faithful commons would effectually enable her to make good the treaty with the king of Pruſſia, who, upon ſo many occaſions, had ſignalized his zeal for the proteſtant religion and liberty of Europe."

The commons preſented another addreſs to the queen, "That ſhe would be pleaſed to uſe her intereſt with her allies, that they might the next year furniſh their ſeveral compleat quotas both by ſea and land, according to their reſpective treaties, and to continue her endeavours for an accommodation between the emperor and his ſubjects now in arms in Hungary, in order to the better and more effectual carrying on the preſent moſt neceſſary war." The queen promiſed "to uſe her endeavours to obtain a compliance from the allies with what was deſired; and to make application to the emperor for an accommodation with all imaginable earneſtneſs."

Complaints of the miſmanagement both at the board of the prince of Denmark's council, as lord-high-admiral, and at ſea roſe now very high. The houſe of commons, during the whole continuance of the parliament, never appointed a committee to look into thoſe matters, which had been formerly a main part of their care. They ſaw, that things were ill conducted, but the chief managers of ſea-affairs were men of their party, and that atoned for all faults, and made them unwilling to find them out, or to cenſure them. The truth was, the prince was prevailed on to continue ſtill in the admiralty by thoſe, who ſheltered themſelves under his name, though this brought a great load on the government. The lords proceeded as they had done in the former ſeſſion, examining into all complaints. They named two committees, the one to examine the books of the admiralty, the other to conſider the proceedings at ſea. No progreſs was made in the firſt of theſe; for, though there was a great deal ſuggeſted in private, yet, ſince this ſeemed to be complaining of the prince, none would appear directly againſt him. But the proceedings at ſea afforded matter enough, both for enquiry and cenſure. The moſt important, and that which had the worſt conſequences, was, that, though there were twenty-two ſhips appointed for cruizing, yet they had followed that ſervice ſo remiſsly, and the orders ſent them were ſo languid and ſo little urgent, that three diligent cruizing ſhips could have performed all the ſervices done by that numerous fleet. This was made out in a ſcheme, in which all the days of their being at ſea were reckoned up, which did not exceed what three cruizers might have performed. It did not appear, whether this was only the effect of ſloth or ignorance, or if there lay any deſigned treachery at the bottom. It ſeemed very plain, that there was treachery ſomewhere, at leaſt among the under officers; for, a French privateer being taken, there were found among his papers inſtructions ſent him by his owners, in which he was directed to lie in ſome ſtations, and to avoid others; and it happened, that this agreed ſo exactly with the orders ſent from the admiralty, that it ſeemed it could not be by chance, but that the directions were ſent upon ſight of the orders. On the 5th of February, the lords preſented an addreſs to the queen, concerning the miſmanagements of the navy, ſetting forth in particular, "That, for the laſt three years, the charge of the navy had exceeded what was deſigned by the parliament, the ſum of above three hundred and ſixty-ſix thouſand pounds. That, in the year 1704, one thouſand five hundred and ſixty-ſix ſeamen were wanting to make up the number of thirty-five thouſand, who, with the five thouſand marines, ought to have been employed at ſea, to make up the number of forty thouſand men provided for by parliament. That there were the laſt year ten flags in ſea-pay, viz. three admirals, three vice admirals, and four rear admirals, and that three of theſe were not in their poſts. That Mr. Chuſchill, admiral of the blue, had not been at ſea in any year of this war. That Mr. Graydon, vice admiral of the blue, had been on ſhore all this laſt year: And that ſir James Wiſhart, though a rear-admiral, had been the laſt year captain to the admiral of the fleet. That there were two vice-admirals of the red, and two rear-admirals of the blue, but no vice-admiral of the white; which, to their lordſhips, ſeemed to have been very irregular, and to have been done in favour of Mr. Graydon, to continue him in the ſervice, although this houſe had voted, That his behaviour, in letting the four French ſhips eſcape, was a prejudice to her majeſty's ſervice, and a great diſhonour to the nation; and that his proceedings in Jamaica had been a great diſcouragement to the inhabitants of that iſland, and prejudicial to her majeſty's ſervice; and hereupon, the lords had, on the 29th of March laſt, made an humble addreſs to her majeſty, that Mr. Graydon might not be employed any more in her ſervice; but, having been acquainted, ſince the report made to them from their committee, that Mr. Graydon was diſcharged, they beſought her majeſty, that he might be no more employed in her ſervice." After this, their lordſhips took notice of "the vaſt increaſe of penſions, as appeared by the navy books, particularly, a penſion of three hundred and nineteen pounds to ſir John Munden, though he had not done his duty in the expedition to Corunna; whereas the penſion to admiral Nevil's widow had not been paid for two years paſt; and ſome officers of the fleet had been laid aſide, without any penſion or conſideration, though no miſbehaviour had been laid to their charge." They farther obſerved, "That in the ordinary eſtimate of the navy, there was put down ſeven thouſand pounds for the prince's council, though they were only five in number in 1702, five in 1703, and ſix in 1704; and it did not appear, that more than one thouſand pounds apiece had been paid to them: And that Mr. Churchill's appointments from the navy were, as prince's council, one thouſand pounds; for penſion, five hundred pounds; as admiral of the blue, one thouſand two hundred and ſeventy-ſeven pounds, ten ſhillings: and for table-money (though not at ſea) three hundred and ſixty-five pounds: in the whole, three thouſand one hundred and forty-two pounds, ten ſhillings." They likewiſe repreſented, "That there was not a ſufficient number of proper ſhips for cruizers and convoys;" and they concluded with "reſting aſſured, that her majeſty would conſider of the fitteſt methods, and give the moſt effectual orders for reſtoring and eſtabliſhing the diſcipline of the navy, the encouragement of ſeamen, the guarding of the coaſts, and the protection of trade." To this addreſs the queen made anſwer, "That it contained many obſervations, which ſhe would conſider particularly, and give ſuch directions upon them, as might be moſt for the advantage of the public ſervice."

A deſign was formed in this ſeſſion of parliament, but there was not ſtrength to carry it on at this time. The earl of Rocheſter gave an hint of it in the houſe of lords, by ſaying, that he had a motion of great conſequence to the ſecurity of the nation, which he would not make at this time, but would do it when next they ſhould meet together. He ſaid no more in the houſe, but in private diſcourſe he owned it was for bringing over the electoreſs of Hanover to live in England. It ſeemed not natural to believe, that a party, who had been all along backward at beſt, and cold in every ſtep, which was made in ſettling the ſucceſſion in that family, ſhould become all on the ſudden ſuch converts, as to be zealous for it; and therefore it was not an unreaſonable jealouſy to ſuſpect, that ſomewhat lay hid under it. It was thought, that they either knew or apprehended, that this would not be acceptable to the queen; and they, being highly diſpleaſed with the meaſures ſhe took, went into this deſign both to vex her, and in hopes that a faction might ariſe out of it, which might breed a diſtraction in our councils, and ſome of them might hope thereby to revive the pretender's claim. They reckoned, that ſuch a motion would be popular; and if either the court or the whigs, on whom the court was now beginning to look more favourably, ſhould oppoſe it, this would caſt a load on them, as men, who, after all the zeal they had expreſſed for that ſucceſſion, did now, upon the hopes of favour at court, throw it up: And thoſe, who had hitherto been conſidered as enemies of that houſe, might hope, by this motion, to overcome all the prejudices, which the nation had taken up againſt them; and they might create a merit to themſelves in the minds of that family, by this early zeal, which they reſolved now to expreſs for it. This was ſet on foot among all the party; but the more ſincere among them could not be prevailed on to act ſo falſe a part, though they were told, this was the likelieſt way to advance the pretender's intereſt.

The laſt buſineſs of this ſeſſion, with which this parliament ended, was the caſe of the Ailſbury men. It has been related, what proceedings had been at law upon the election at Ailſbury. The judgment that the lords gave in that matter was executed, and, upon that, five others of the inhabitants brought their action againſt the conſtables, for refuſing their votes. The houſe of commons looked on this as a high contempt of their votes, and a breach of their privileges, to which they added a new, and till then, unheard-of crime, that it was contrary to the declaration they had made. At the ſame time they ſent their meſſage for theſe five men (namely, John Paty, John Oviat, John Paton, junr. Henry Baſſe, and Daniel Horn) and committed them to Newgate, where they lay three months priſoners. They were all the while well ſupplied, and much viſited, and therefore remained without making any application to the houſe of commons. It was not thought adviſable to move in ſuch a matter, till all the money-bills were paſſed; then motions were made, in the interval between the terms upon the ſtatute of 'Habeas Corpus,' but, that ſtatute relating only to commitments by the royal authority, this did not lie within it.

When the term came, a motion was made in the Queen's Bench upon the common law, in behalf of the priſoners for a Habeas Corpus. The lawyers, who moved it, produced the commitment in which their offence was ſet forth, that they had claimed the benefit of the law, in oppoſition to a vote of the houſe of commons to the contrary. They ſaid, the ſubjects were governed by the laws, which they ought and were bound to know, and not by votes of a houſe of parliament, which they were neither bound to know nor to obey [o]. Three of the judges were of opinion, that the court could take no cognizance of the matter, and that the priſoners ought to be remanded; but the chief juſtice Holt was of another mind. He thought a general warrant of commitment for breach of privilege, was of the nature of an execution; and, ſince the ground of commitment was ſpecified in the warrant, he thought it plainly appeared, that the priſoners had been guilty of no offence, and that therefore they ought to be diſcharged. Though Holt's judgment ſeemed clear and ſolid, yet, as he was but one againſt three, the majority prevailed, and the priſoners were remanded to Newgate. [p]

Upon this, Paty and Oviat, two of the priſoners, moved

[o] The pleadings of the lawyers more at large were as follows: Page, Montague, Lechmere, and Denton were council for the priſoners, and, after reading the return of the commitment, Mr. Page ſaid, "That the writ of Habeas Corpus was a writ grounded on common law, and therefore this court can bail all perſons, who by the law of England are bailable. That he did not ſay, but that the houſe of commons hath privileges, which belong to them, and may commit for breach of ſuch privileges: that he now only enquired, if there be any law for the commitment of the priſoners; and therefore the firſt queſtion he made, was, 'If there was a breach of privilege returned?' Adding, that there being no notice in the return, that the houſe of commons has any privilege, he need not argue, whether they have a power, or not, to reſtrain men from ſuing in the queen's court." The lord chief juſtice Holt having told Mr. Page, that the queſtion was, 'If they were not to take notice of their power, though not returned to that court?' Mr. Page anſwered, That, though the court would take notice of any power of the houſe, yet, that not appearing in the return, they could not judge of it, the commitment being by the ſpeaker, and not by the houſe. The lord chief juſtice replying, that the commitment was in purſuance of the order of the houſe, Mr. Page ſubjoined, that then it ſhould be ſhewn to be by the houſe, the ſpeaker being in the chair, which was mentioned in the commitment. But this was over-ruled by the lord chief juſtice, who ſaid, that by the houſe, was to be underſtood the whole houſe ſitting, with the ſpeaker in the chair. Mr. Montague continued the ſame objection to the commitment, adding, that it did not appear, that the priſoners were any ways related to the houſe of commons, either as members or officers: That, as to the lord Shaftſbury's caſe, he was a member: That he agreed every court muſt have power to keep order among themſelves; but that to take a man out of the houſe, who was not of the houſe, nor guilty of any breach of privilege, for aught appeared, by a return, he knew no law for it: That the cauſe aſſigned was, becauſe the priſoners had been guilty of bringing and preſenting an action, which he did not take to be a crime by any known law: That, in the caſe of the conſtable of Ailſbury, there was a judgment at law judicially given, which could not be got over, until ſome act of parliament interpoſed; and the law being ſo, that a man might bring his action, he did not know, what crime a man could be guilty of, who uſed this law: That the words of his commitment went further, that bringing this action 'is contrary to the declaration, in high contempt of the juriſdiction, and in breach of the known privileges:' That they did not know what this word 'declaration' meant, neither did they underſtand what this breach of the juriſdiction was: That as to the words, 'againſt the known privileges of the houſe,' he was at a loſs what action is againſt the privilege of the houſe, becauſe they can have no privilege againſt law, and he was ſure it was not againſt law to bring any action. Then he took notice, that the commitment was during pleaſure, adding, that he had known perſons committed 'per mandatum domini regis' bailed; and therefore by ſtrong reaſon ought they to be bailed if committed by the houſe of commons. Mr. Lechmere inforced what had been alledged by the other two, adding, that one part of the commitment, which ſet forth the reaſons of it, was for bringing an action at law, contrary to the declaration of the houſe of commons, in oppoſition to which declaration, he muſt alledge the declaration of the lords: That, this commitment, being alſo ſaid to be for a contempt of the high juriſdiction of the commons, the lords in the caſe of Aſhby and White had declared againſt it. He then urged, That no other court, ſave that of the lords, and the courts at Weſtminſter, and other inferior courts of England, can execute any juriſdiction touching any actions at law; and that privileges, which are againſt the known laws of England, are in themſelves void. Another objection or exception was, that the continuance of the impriſonment of the priſoners was a new commitment: That the Habeas Corpus is the way, which the queen takes to make diſquiſition about the liberty of her ſubjects: That, though both houſes of parliament are proper judges of their own privileges, yet this court has formerly judged of their privileges; to which purpoſe he inſtanced in the lord Shaftſbury's caſe, wherein notice is taken of a caſe, where an original was filed againſt a member ſitting in the houſe; and that in the caſe of the lord Banbury, though the lords temporal and ſpiritual had declared he was no peer, yet in this court, when he was brought to be tried for murder, and denied the juriſdiction here, inſiſting upon the peerage, this court refuſed to try him, and allowed his plea. That the laws of parliament are the cuſtoms of parliament: That there is no precedent in parliament to commit a man for proſecuting for his freehold or franchiſe; but on the contrary he believed, that in the rolls of precedents there might be found a caſe, where bail had been allowed by this court upon a commitment of the houſe of commons. Mr. Denton excepted to the return of the commitment, alledging, 1. That the warrant did not ſufficiently deſcribe the crime. 2. That it did not appear, that the party committed had notice of the vote or declaration of the houſe of commons, for every man is not bound to take notice of a vote, becauſe it is but a temporary thing. 3. That it not appearing by this return, that the priſoner was a commoner, he might, notwithſtanding any thing that appeared to the contrary, be a lord; and then it muſt be agreed, the commons had no juriſdiction. That, if it had been a general commitment, without ſhewing the offence particularly, and ſaid, for a breach of privilege only, perhaps it had been a good commitment; but here the cauſe was ſet forth, and it appeared by the judgment of the lords in the caſe of Aſhby and White, that was no cauſe at all of commitment. That bailing the priſoners in this court did not meddle with the privileges of the houſe of commons, becauſe, if bailed, yet they are anſwerable to the houſe, and are priſoners in 'cuſtodiâ Legis.' That indeed juſtices of the peace can commit for a riot without bail; but this power ariſes from an expreſs act of parliament for that purpoſe. That the queen herſelf cannot commit, ſo as to bind the power of the law; but this court can, in ſuch caſes, and always have, upon good caſes ſhewn, bailed, notwithſtanding ſuch commitments.

[p] The judges delivered their opinion in the following manner: The youngeſt of them declared, that he thought the priſoners ought to be remanded, alleging, that it was the firſt habeas corpus of the kind, that ever was brought: That, if this return now before the court had been of an Habeas Corpus from an inferior Court, it had been a bad return; but that the houſe of commons was ſuperior, and could not be bound by the forms of Weſtminſter-Hall, having peculiar laws and cuſtoms: That when the earl of Northumberland petitioned the king, where the queſtion was, Whether the power, that he had raiſed, was treaſon, which petition was ordered to be delivered to the juſtices to be conſidered, the lords made proteſtation, that the order thereof belonged to them, and they reſolved it not to be treaſon. That here was a parallel caſe: The houſe of commons had declared the priſoners guilty of a contempt; and how could this court contradict what had been determined by them, who are part of the legiſlature, and cannot be ſuppoſed to break their truſt? Judge Powis was of the ſame opinion as to the remanding of the priſoners, urging, that this caſe was not like that of the lord Shaftſbury. That as to the objection made by the council, that the priſoners were not members, he anſwered, that moſt commitments by the houſe of commons were of other perſons, not members, as for arreſting a member, ſitting in the houſe, &c. otherwiſe they could not vindicate the breach of their privileges. As to what was objected, that this commitment was during pleaſure, he replied, That it was more beneficial to have commitments ſo, that perſons ſo committed might, in the mean time, make application and ſubmit: And that the commitments of the houſe of commons were like the commitments of this court upon contempts, which always were underſtood not to be for any certain time, and therefore during pleaſure. That it was likewiſe objected at the bar, that the commitment was for bringing an action; to which he anſwered, that privilege ſtops; and ſo it is in all actions brought againſt any ſervants of members ſitting in the houſe. And as to the caſe of Aſhby and White, he did not think it to be the ſame with this caſe here. That he ſaw but two things of ſubſtance in this argument: The firſt, that, if this court, being an high court, and the higheſt of all inferior courts, can diſcharge any perſon committed 'per mandatum dominæ reginæ,' ſurely then it may diſcharge one committed by the houſe of commons. To which he anſwered, that he took this to be a fallacy, becauſe the for a 'writ of error,' to bring the matter before the lords. This writ was only to be obtained, by petitioning the queen, that the judgment of the court of the Queen's Bench might be brought before her majeſty in parliament. The commons were alarmed at theſe petitions, and reſolved upon an addreſs to the queen, ſetting forth the undoubted right and privilege of the commons of England in parliament aſſembled, to commit, for breach of privilege; and that the commitments of this houſe are not examinable in any other court whatſoever; and that no ſuch writ of error was ever brought, nor doth any writ of error lie in this caſe: And that as this houſe had expreſſed their duty to her majeſty, in giving diſpatch to all the ſupplies, ſo they had an entire confidence in her majeſty's goodneſs and juſtice, that ſhe would not give leave for the bringing any writ of error in this caſe; which would tend to the overthrowing the undoubted rights and privileges of the commons of England."

Ten judges (two only being of another mind) agreed, that in civil matters, a petition for a writ of error was a petition of right and not of grace. It was therefore thought a very ſtrange thing, which might have moſt pernicious conſequences, for a houſe of commons to deſire the queen, not to grant a petition of right, which was plainly a breach of law, and of her coronation-oath. It was no leſs ſtrange for them to take upon them to affirm, that the writ did not lie, when that was clearly the work of the judicature to declare, whether it lay or not, which was unqueſtionably the right of the lords, who only could determine that. Beſides, their having ſupplied the public occaſion, was a ſtrange conſideration to be offered to the queen, as an argument to perſuade her to act againſt law, as if they had pretended, that they had bribed her to infringe the law, and to deny juſtice; ſince money, given for public ſervice, was given to the country and to themſelves, as properly as to the queen. Her anſwer to this addreſs was to this effect: "That ſhe was much troubled to find the houſe of commons of opinion, that her granting the writs of error, mentioned in their addreſs, was againſt their privileges, of which ſhe would always be as tender, as of her own prerogative: And therefore they might depend, ſhe would not do any thing to give them any juſt occaſion of complaint. But, this matter, relating to the courſe of judicial proceedings, being of the higheſt importance, ſhe thought neceſſary to weigh and conſider very carefully, what might be proper for her to do, in a thing of ſo great concern." This anſwer was thought ſo cold, that no thanks were returned for it; though a well compoſed houſe of commons would certainly have thanked her for that tender regard to law and juſtice. The ſame day the anſwer was reported by Mr. ſecretary Hedges, the commons proceeded to carry their reſentments to greater extremities, and having continued ſitting till the evening, voted, That Mr. Francis Page, Mr. James Montague, Mr. Nicholas Lechmere, and Mr. Alexander Denton, in pleading upon the return of the habeas corpus, on behalf of the five priſoners committed by this houſe, were guilty of a breach of privilege," and ordered them be taken into cuſtody. As they were apprehenſive, leſt the queen ſhould grant writs of error, whereby the five Ailſbury men might be diſcharged from their impriſonment, they alſo ordered them to be removed from Newgate, and taken into the cuſtody of their ſerjeant at arms; which order was executed at midnight, with ſuch circumſtances of ſeverity and terror, as have been ſeldom exerciſed towards the greateſt offenders. Theſe were ſuch ſtrange and unheard-of proceedings, that by them the minds of all people were much alienated from the houſe of commons. But the priſoners were under ſuch management, and ſo well ſupported, that they would not ſubmit, nor aſk pardon of the houſe. It was generally believed, that they were ſupplied and managed by the lord Wharton. They petitioned the houſe of lords for relief, who reſolved to proceed in the matter by ſure and regular ſteps. They firſt came to the following general reſolutions, "1. That neither houſe of parliament has any power, by any vote or declaration, to create to themſelves any new privilege, that is not warranted by the known laws and cuſtoms of parliament. 2. That every freeman of England who apprehends himſelf to be injured, has a right to ſeek redreſs by action at law; and that the commencing and proſecuting an action at common law againſt any perſon (not intitled to privilege of parliament) is no breach of the privilege of parliament. 3. That the houſe of commons, in committing to Newgate Daniel Horne, Henry Baſs, John Paton junior, John Paty, and John Oviat, for commencing and proſecuting an action at the common law, againſt the conſtables of Ailſbury, for not allowing their votes in election of members to ſerve in parliament, upon pretence, that their ſo doing was contrary to a declaration, a contempt of the juriſdiction, and a breach of the privilege of that houſe, have aſſumed to themſelves alone a legiſlative authority, by pretending to attribute the force of a law to their declaration; have claimed a juriſdiction not warranted by the conſtitution, and have aſſumed a new privilege, to which they can have no title by the laws and cuſtoms of parliament, and have thereby, as far as in them lies, ſubjected the rights of Engliſhmen, and the freedom of their perſons, to the arbitrary votes of the houſe of commons. 4. That every Engliſhman, who is impriſoned by any authority whatſoever, has an undoubted right, by his agents or friends, to apply for and obtain a writ of habeas corpus, in order to procure his liberty by due courſe of law. 5. That for the houſe of commons to cenſure and puniſh any perſon for aſſiſting a priſoner to procure a writ of habeas corpus, or by vote, or otherwiſe, to deter men from ſoliciting, proſecuting, or pleading upon ſuch writ of habeas corpus in behalf of ſuch priſoner, is an attempt of dangerous conſequence, a breach of the many good ſtatutes provided for the liberty of the ſubject, and of pernicious example, by denying the neceſſary aſſiſtance to the the king is to act by his miniſtry and by his courts, and not by his abſolute will: That, according to lord Coke, though the king be preſumed to be preſent in this court, yet he doth act by his judges here, otherwiſe he might be a judge and party. And to the objection, "Whether the commons ſhould by a declaration direct who ſhould not be ſued;" that we muſt ſuppoſe they have a general juriſdiction of privileges, and contempts, and rights, as well as other courts: That this commitment was not for a trial, but as upon an abjudication, and as a puniſhment. That, when they came to a point of juriſdiction, they muſt conſider it by uſage: That it is next to impoſſible for the courts of Weſtminſter Hall to judge of the privileges of the houſe of commons, who have not acceſs to their roll, where only the privileges of that houſe are to be ſeen: and therefore it was very unreaſonable to put judges upon the enquiry. That, if this court had a juriſdiction over the commitments of the houſe of commons, they ſhould have it alſo over thoſe of the lords: Concluding, that they were a great court, but that neither their anceſtors nor they ever yet knew it ſo great as this would make it. Judge Powel concurred in this opinion, alledging, that he could not think they could be judges of this return, becauſe the priſoners were committed by another law than this court proceeded by; and that to commit by one law, and diſcharge by another, would introduce diſorder: That as the eccleſiaſtical, admiralty, and martial courts, and the houſe of peers proceed by their own rules, ſo the houſe of commons proceed by their own rules; this court can meddle with their privileges in ſome caſes, but not ſo as to contradict, or oppoſe them. And that he did not know how the houſe of commons could have a power of judging, and not of puniſhing. That this court correct exceſſes of all inferior courts, but of the parliament, which is ſuperior. That, ſuppoſing the lords would intermeddle with freeholds, though, perhaps, they are not leſs valuable than their privileges, yet this court could not prohibit them. That he believed it as cuſtomary to make commitments during pleaſure as otherwiſe. That, if we had a long parliament as formerly, then perhaps it would have been hard. That bondage was ſo much loſt in England, that he believed the council had almoſt forgot how to apply that argument. That he did not know how exceſs of juriſdiction in either houſe can be good. If it happens, it muſt be determined by conference between themſelves. That if it ſhould be ſuppoſed, that both ſhould inſiſt, and the commons ſhould do any thing unreaſonable, ſure then the people of England would not chuſe them again: And, if the lords ſhould inſiſt upon unreaſonable privileges, then the people of England, he believed, would find out a way to chuſe ſuch an houſe, or uſe ſuch methods, as would rectify and oblige to a ſubmiſſion. Theſe three judges having thus declared their ſentiments, "That the priſoners ought to be remanded," the lord chief juſtice Holt delivered his opinion, "That they ought to be diſcharged. I am ſenſible, ſaid he, of the great diſadvantage I lie under, becauſe eleven of the judges are againſt my opinion, The caſe being of moment and concern, I did deſire to confer with them, before I delivered my thoughts. And it is a ſecond diſadvantage, that I have ſo great an eſteem for their ſentiments, that I would willingly reſign my opinion to theirs. But then I lie under another, which is to encounter an opinion and judgment of the houſe of lords. I muſt confeſs, the commons of England are truſted with, and are very zealous for our liberties; and therefore I would think it a misfortune to lie under their diſpleaſure. Yet there is another thing, which lies upon me, which, at all events, I am to take care of, and that is a good conſcience. I am upon my oath to judge impartially and juſtly. I do not think this ſuch an impriſonment, that the freemen and ſubjects of England are to be bound by; and it will affect all the kingdom, if, by any declaration or prohibition made by the houſe of commons, they are reſtrained from bringing a lawful action. Neither of the houſes of parliament, ſeparately or jointly, have any power to diſpoſe of the liberty or property of the ſubject. It muſt be, with the queen added. This is the conſtitution of the Engliſh government. It is ſaid in the return, that the priſoners are guilty of a 'breach of privilege' for bringing an action. I muſt therefore declare my opinion, that commencing a ſuit is no breach of privilege, though it be againſt a member himſelf, ſo he be not affected in his perſon or lands. The ſecond crime mentioned in the commitment and return is 'proſecuting.' What is meant thereby ſeems not to be ſo clear, becauſe 'proſecuting' may be taken ſeveral ways, as entering of a 'continuance,' which cannot be ſaid to be any breach of privilege, the perſon of the member, or his eſtate, not being diſturbed thereby. Indeed, if you diſtrain the perſon of a member, or do any act to reſtrain his liberty, then it is a breach, and puniſhable by the houſe. Again, the houſe of commons ſhould have ſhewn, that they have a privilege; for, if the high conſtable of England ſhould not ſhew his authority, we ſhould not take more notice of him than of the conſtable of St. Martin's. The law of the land muſt take place. A man may legally 'commence' and 'proſecute' an 'action' againſt a man, that is not privileged, though vexatious or wrong, as appears by 2 Ric. III 9. where all the judges were of opinion, that there was no puniſhment for bringing an action, though wrong. If an action is ſued and proſecuted againſt a peer, no action 'de ſcandalis magnatum' will lie, if there was any probable cauſe of action. I do not think, that any inſtance can be ſhewn, that ever privilege did extend ſo far, as to exclude or debar any man from bringing any action, but eſpecially where there is juſt cauſe. This caſe has undergone a great and high judgment above upon the queen's writ of error. My brother Powis ſays, that he does not know, that this is the ſame caſe with that of Aſhby and White.

priſoner, upon a commitment of the houſe of commons, which has ever been allowed upon all commitments by any authority whatſoever. And, 6. That a writ of error is not a writ of 'grace,' but of 'right,' and ought not to be denied to the ſubject when duly applied for (though at the requeſt of either houſe of parliament) the denial thereof being an obſtruction of juſtice, contrary to 'Magna Charta.'"

Theſe reſolutions being delivered to the commons at a conference, they took time to conſider of them till the 7th of March, upon which day, at their deſire, a ſecond conference was held, wherein the commons delivered a long anſwer, in which they ſet forth, that the right of determining elections was lodged only with them; and that therefore they only could judge who had a right to elect; That they only were judges of their own privileges, and that the lords could not intermeddle in them. They quoted very copiouſly the proceedings in the year 1675, upon an appeal brought againſt a member of their houſe; and urged, that their priſoners ought only to apply to them for their liberty; and that no motion had ever been made for a writ of error in ſuch a caſe.

The lords, upon this, deſired a free conference, which was held with the commons on the 9th of March, but that it ended without ſucceſs, was not ſurprizing, conſidering the temper, with which the commons came to it, and which appeared from the votes they made the day before, after they had agreed to the free conference. For, upon information, that their ſerjeant at arms had been ſerved with two writs of habeas corpus, returnable before the lord-keeper, in behalf of Mr. Montague and Mr. Denton, two of the gentlemen, who had been of council for the five priſoners, they came to theſe reſolutions, "That no commoner of England, committed by the houſe of commons for breach of privilege, or contempt of that houſe, ought to be by any writ of habeas corpus made to appear in any other place, or before any other judicature, during that ſeſſion of parliament, wherein ſuch perſon was ſo committed. That the ſerjeant at arms attending that houſe do make no return, nor yield any obedience to the ſaid writs of habeas corpus; and, for ſuch his refuſal, that he have the protection of the houſe of commons. And that the lord-keeper be acquainted with the ſaid reſolutions, to the end that the ſaid writs of habeas corpus might be ſuperſeded, as contrary to law and the privilege of the houſe." Five days after, the commons ordered the report of the free conference, which was made by Mr. Bromley, to be entered upon their journals; and reſolved, "That the proceedings of the houſe, in relation to the Ailſbury men committed by the houſe for breach of privilege, and the other proceedings of that houſe in that matter, were in maintenance of the ancient and undoubted rights and privileges of the commons of England:" And they ordered all the proceedings in relation to the Ailſbury men, the report of the lords journals, and the report of the conferences, and of the free conference, to be printed. The next day, the lords attended the queen with a full repreſentation of the whole thing, wherein having recited the matter of fact relating to this affair, they laid before her, "That the proceedings of the houſe of commons againſt the Ailſbury men were wholly new and unprecedented. That it is the birth-right of every Engliſhman, who apprehends himſelf to be injured, to ſeek for redreſs in her majeſty's courts of juſtice. That if there be any power, that can controul this right, and can preſcribe when he ſhall, and when he ſhall not, be allowed the benefit of the laws, he ceaſes to be a freeman, and his liberty and property are precarious. That the crown lays claim to no ſuch power, and their lordſhips were ſure the law has truſted no ſuch authority with any ſubjects whatſoever." They urged, "That in former times the opinion of the houſe of commons was very different from what it was at preſent," of which their lordſhips gave ſeveral inſtances; and they concluded with an humble requeſt, "That no importunity of the houſe of commons, or any other conſideration whatſoever, might prevail with her majeſty to ſuffer a ſtop to be put to the known courſe of juſtice, but that ſhe would be pleaſed to give effectual orders for the immediate iſſuing of the writs of error."

This repreſentaiton was thought ſo well drawn, that ſome preferred it to thoſe of the former ſeſſions; it contained a long and clear deduction of the whole affair with great decency of ſtyle, but with many heavy reflections on the houſe of commons.

By this time the whole buſineſs of the ſeſſion was brought to a concluſion; for the lords, who had the money-bills would not paſs them till this was ended. The queen, in anſwer to their repreſentation, told them, "That ſhe ſhould have granted the writs of error, they deſired, but that finding an abſolute neceſſity of putting an immediate end to this ſeſſion, ſhe was ſenſible there could have been no further proceedings upon that matter." This anſwer being reported to the houſe of lords, was looked on by them as a clear deciſion in their favour, and therefore they ordered, "That the humble thanks of their houſe be immediately preſented to her majeſty for her moſt gracious anſwer, in which ſhe had expreſſed ſo great a regard to the judgment of their houſe, ſo much compaſſion to the priſoners, and ſuch tenderneſs to the rights of the ſubject."

About an hour after, the queen came to the houſe of lords, and, after paſſing the bills, ended this ſeſſion with the following ſpeech to both houſes:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Cannot put an end to this ſeſſion, without doing you the juſtice to acknowledge, you have fully made good the aſſurances you gave me at the beginning of it, by the great readineſs you have ſhewn in the diſpatch of the public buſineſs. And I make no doubt, but this diſpatch will prove a real advantage to us, and a great diſcouragement to our enemies.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I return you my hearty thanks in particular for the great ſupplies with which you have enabled me to carry on this neceſſary war. I aſſure you, they ſhall be carefully applied to the uſes, for which they have been given; and I perſuade myſelf, I ſhall always have the chearful aſſiſtance of my dutiful and loving ſubjects, in the proſecuting of the preſent war, till our enemies are obliged to ſuch a peace, as ſhall be a laſting advantage and ſecurity to us and our allies.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"We have, by the bleſſing of God, a fair proſpect of this great and deſirable end, if we do not diſappoint it by our own White. But if he will look upon the return, he will be ſoon ſatisfied, that it is. Another part of the return ſays, 'That the proſecution was contrary to the declaration, and in breach, &c.' I do not well know, what is meant by a 'proſecution contrary to a declaration:' But ſuppoſe there was a 'declaration,' I much queſtion, if that 'declaration' will make that a breach of privilege, which was not ſo before. There is no precedent for it; and, if any man can bring ſuch a precedent, it will go a great way with me. Privilege is not unlimited, but eſtabliſhed by the rules of law. If a member 'break the peace,' he muſt find ſureties; or if he commit high-treaſon or felony, ſitting the houſe, he muſt anſwer. If the 'declaration' does claim a privilege, and ſays it is ſo; yet, if it was not ſo before, the people of England are not eſtopped to ſay it is ſo; ſo neither the one houſe nor the other, can enlarge their privileges. They concern the liberties of a people in a high degree; and nothing but an act of parliament can make a man's perſon ſubject to imprisonment, but where originally he was ſo ſubject. The reaſons why judges do not give their opinions to the lords about their privileges is, becauſe it is 'lex parliamenti;' and the lords themſelves being always there, are preſumed to know their privileges beſt themſelves. But, whenever the queſtion is about privilege in Weſtminſter-hall, we muſt judge of it according as it appears to us, and according to the law of the land. Suppoſe in this caſe the houſe of commons had not interpoſed; the plaintiffs had gone on, and the defendants had pleaded the whole matter of the privilege ſpecially, and the plaintiffs had demurred, we then ſhould have judged of it, becauſe it would have been a plea to the juriſdiction of the court. All appears upon record now before the court, and therefore we are to judge of it as much as if it had been pleaded. The parliament law of privilege is 'lex terræ,' as much as any law uſed in Weſtminſter-Hall; and my lord Clarendon gives us an account of privilege in the firſt volume of his hiſtory, p. 310, 311, 312. If it was privilege in the houſe before, then how comes it that Aſhby was not committed, who was the ringleader, but is ſtill at liberty? Another obſervation upon this return is, that they do not ſay 'for a breach,' but 'in breach;' neither do I ſee, how bringing an action at law in one court, is in contempt of another court. This court here can hold plea in any action whatſoever. The houſe above cannot award proceſs there; and then I cannot ſee how a man ſuing here can be guilty thereby of a breach of the privileges of that court. Theſe words are terrible, and would affrighten men, when ſaid, 'In contempt of the privileges of the houſe of commons,' becauſe every man is bound to maintain them in their lawful privileges. No doubt but they can commit in any caſe of privilege, as for a contempt committed in their court: But when the fact is mentioned, and the cauſe is a juſt action at law, no doubt but the proceeding in ſuch action is juſt, and no 'contempt;' ſuch an action being grounded on the common law. As to my lord Shaftſbury's caſe, it was for facts done in the houſe; and the houſe may at any time commit a man for a contempt in the face of the houſe: Whereas the priſoners are committed, not for a breach of privilege or contempt, but becauſe they have brought their actions, which are legal, and ſo adjudged by the lords in the writ of error. To conclude, the caſe of the lord Bunbury is conſiderable with me: He petitioned the houſe of lords to ſit, and alſo to have the king's leave. The lords determined he was not a lord; yet when he was brought upon an indictment by the name of Charles Knowles, Eſq. he here pleaded and inſiſted, that he was a peer, which plea was allowed, and he was not tried." But notwithſtanding the chief juſtice's opinion, the priſoners were remanded.

unreaſonable humour and animoſity, the fatal effects of which we have ſo narrowly eſcaped in this ſeſſion, that it ought to be a ſufficient warning againſt any dangerous experiments for the future.

"I conclude therefore with exhorting you all to peace and union, which are always commendable, but more particularly neceſſary at this time, when, the whole kingdom being ſhortly to proceed to new elections, it ought to be the chief care of every body, eſpecially of ſuch as are in public ſtations, to carry themſelves with the greateſt prudence and moderation. Nothing will contribute more to our reputation abroad, and our ſecurity at home."

Then the lord-keeper, by her majeſty's command, prorogued the parliament to Thurſday the firſt of May following.

The narrow eſcape, intimated by the queen in her ſpeech, was univerſally underſtood to be meant of 'the Tack,' as indeed it could be meant of nothing elſe.

Thus this ſeſſion, and with it this parliament, came to an end. It was no ſmall bleſſing to the queen and to the nation, that they got ſo well out of ſuch hands. They had diſcovered on many occaſions, and very manifeſtly what lay at the bottom with moſt of them; but they had not ſkill enough to know how to manage their advantages, and to make uſe of their numbers. The conſtant ſucceſſes, which had attended the queen's reign, put it out of their power to compaſs that, which was aimed at by them, the forcing a peace, and conſequently delivering up all to France. Sir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, the wiſeſt man of the party, died before the laſt ſeſſion; and by their conduct after his death, it appeared, that they wanted his direction. He had been at the head of the oppoſition, that was made in the reign of king William from the beginning to the end; but he gave up many points of great importance in the critical minute, for which there were good grounds to believe, that he had twelve thouſand pounds from the king at different times. At his death he appeared to be much richer than by any viſible computation he could be valued at; which made ſome caſt an imputation upon his memory, as if he had received great ſums even from France.

Before we take leave of this parliament, it will be proper to take notice of ſome things, which were begun, but not finiſhed in it. There was a bill offered for the naturalization of ſome hundreds of Frenchmen, to which the commons added a clauſe, diſabling the perſons ſo naturalized from voting in elections of parliament. The true reaſon of this was, that it was obſerved, that the French in England gave in all elections their votes for thoſe, who were moſt zealous againſt France; and yet, with an apparent diſingenuity, ſome of the members gave it as a reaſon for ſuch a clauſe, that they muſt be ſuppoſed ſo partial to the intereſts of their own country, that it was not fit to give them any ſhare in the government, the lords looked on this as a new attempt, and the clauſe added was a plain contradiction to the body of the bill, which gave them all the rights of natural born ſubjects; while this took from them the chief of them all, the chuſing their repreſentatives in parliament. They would not therefore agree to it, and the commons reſolved not to depart from it; ſo that, without coming to a free conference, the bill, fell this ſeſſion.

Another bill was begun by the lords againſt the papiſts. It was occaſioned by ſeveral complaints brought from many parts of the kingdom, eſpecially from Cheſhire, of the practices and inſolence of thoſe of that religion. A bill therefore was ordered to be brought in with clauſes in it, which would have made the act, paſſed againſt them four years before, prove effectual, which, for want of theſe, had hitherto been of no effect at all. This paſſed the lords, and was ſent to the commons, who had no mind to paſs it, but, to avoid the ill effects of their refuſing ſuch a bill, they added a clauſe to it[q], containing ſevere penalties on papiſts, who ſhould once take the oaths, and come into the communion of the church of England, if they ſhould be guilty of any occaſional conformity with popery afterwards. They imagined, that this of occaſional conformity was ſo odious to the lords, that every clauſe, that condemned it, would be rejected by them. But when they came to underſtand, that the lords were reſolved to agree to the clauſe, they would not put it to that hazard; and therefore the bill lay on their table till the prorogation.

A general ſelf-denying bill was offered by thoſe very men, who, in the firſt ſeſſion of parliament, when they hoped for places themſelves, had oppoſed the motion of ſuch a bill with great indignation. Now the ſcene was a little altered; they ſaw they were not like to be favourites, and therefore pretended to be patriots. This looked ſo ſtrangely in them, that it was rejected; but another bill of a more reſtrained nature paſſed, diſabling ſome officers, particularly thoſe, who were concerned in the prize-office, from ſerving in parliament. To this a general clauſe was added, that diſabled all, who held any office, that had been created ſince the year 1684, or any officer that ſhould be created for the future, from ſitting in parliament. This bill had a quick and eaſy paſſage among the commons, being brought in on the 16th of January, and ſent up to the lords on the 23d of that month, who did not think fit to agree to ſo general a clauſe, but conſented to a particular diſability put on ſome offices by name. The commons did not agree to this alteration; but inſiſted on the whole, and therefore the bill fell.

Among the many ways and expedients, by which the tory party of the houſe of commons endeavoured to ſecure their intereſt againſt a new election, they thought it neceſſary to procure an act, whereby the commiſſions of the peace ſhould be lodged in the hands of men of eſtates; and thereupon a bill was brought in, and paſſed on the 2d of February, 'for qualification of juſtices of peace;' but, the ſame being ſent up to the lords, they did not think fit to give it their concurrence.

[1705.] On the 5th of April, the parliament, according to the triennial act, being near expiring, a proclamation was iſſued out for diſſolving it; and, on the 23d, another was publiſhed for calling a new parliament[r].

The concluſion of the parliament ſet the whole nation in a general ferment; both parties ſtudied how to diſpoſe the minds of the people in the new elections, with great induſtry and zeal.

The affairs of Europe were now thought in ſuch a ſituation, that the war could not run beyond the period of the next parliament. A well-choſen one muſt prove a public bleſſing, not only to England, but to all Europe; as a bad one would be fatal at home, as well as to the allies abroad. France was now reduced to great exigencies. All methods of raiſing money were ſo much exhauſted, that they could afford no great ſupplies; ſo that, in imitation of our exchequer bills, they began to give out Mint bills; but they could not create that confidence, which is juſtly put in parliamentary credit. The French had hopes from their party in England; and there was a diſjointing in the ſeveral provinces of the United Provinces; but, as long as England continued firm and united, it had a great influence on the States, at leaſt, to keep things entire during the war. It was viſible, therefore, that a good election in England muſt give ſuch a proſpect for three years, as would have a great influence on all the affairs of Europe.

The convocation ſat at the ſame time with the parliament, though it was then ſo little conſidered, that ſcarce any notice was taken of them; and they deſerved that no mention ſhould be made of them. As the houſe of commons thought fit, in their addreſs at the beginning of the ſeſſion, to put the ſucceſſes by ſea and land on a level, the lower houſe of convocation were reſolved to follow their example, and would have the ſea and land both mentioned in the ſame terms; but the biſhops would not vary from the pattern ſet them by the houſe of lords, ſo no addreſs was made by the convocation. The lower houſe continued to proceed with much indecent violence, and brought up injurious and reflecting addreſſes to the upper houſe, which gave a very large exerciſe to the patience and forbearance of the archbiſhops and biſhops. On

[q] It was as follows: "Provided always, that all perſons, who, by virtue of this act, ſhall be obliged to take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, and ſubſcribe the declaration, ſhall, at the ſame time, declare himſelf to be a member of the church of England, as now by law eſtabliſhed; ſuch declaration to be entered on the ſame roll, where the ſaid oaths and declarations, ſo to be taken and ſubſcribed, are to be entered. And in caſe any ſuch perſons ſhall, after their taking ſuch oaths, and making ſuch declarations, as aforeſaid, knowingly and wilfully reſort to, or be preſent at any conventicle, aſſembly, or meeting, under colour or pretence of any exerciſe of religion, in other manner, than according to the liturgy and practice of the church of England, in any place within this kingdom, he ſhall forfeit the ſum of one hundred pounds, for every time he ſhall be preſent at ſuch aſſembly, conventicle, or meeting."

[r] On the 10th of April, the queen, with his royal highneſs, went to Newmarket. Two days after, Dr. Ellis, vice chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge, waited on her, and deſired her to honour them with her preſence at dinner. The queen having accepted the invitation, was magnificently entertained in Trinity-College-Hall. Eleven noblemen were made doctors of law, and Pellet, Arbuthnot, and Vernon, doctors of phyſic. James Montague, council for the univerſity, the vice chancellor, and the famous Iſaac Newton, mathematical profeſſor, were knighted.

December 1, they preſented another repreſentation, ſignifying their grief at the general complaint of the clergy, that though convocations had been held now for ſome years, after a long diſcontinuance, yet the public had not hitherto reaped the benefits that might be expected: That this tended to diſparage the conſtitution of the church, and tempted ſome to ſpeak againſt the neceſſity and uſefulneſs of eccleſiaſtical ſynods. They promiſe, for time to come, to do what they can to ſilence that complaint: And intimate, that the fault did not lie in them that more had not been done. That the unhappy diſputes between the two houſes had been their hindrance, but that they neither raiſed them, nor omitted any means they could contrive for bringing them to a regular determination. They begged leave again to take notice, of the many pernicious books that were publiſhed and diſperſed, and requeſted their lordſhips (as formerly) to uſe their intereſt in parliament for a bill to repreſs the licentiouſneſs of the preſs. They repreſented alſo the increaſing difficulties of the parochial clergy, about adminiſtering the holy ſacrament indifferently to all perſons that demand it, in order to qualify themſelves for offices; becauſe they ſaw not how they could in ſeveral caſes act conformably to the rubricks and canons of the church, in repelling ſuch perſons as were unworthy, and particularly notorious ſchiſmatics, without expoſing themſelves to vexatious and expenſive ſuits at law. They beg they would uſe their intereſts for the freeing them from theſe difficulties, and, in the mean time, give them directions how to behave themſelves under ſuch exigencies. The archbiſhop and biſhops made large remarks on this paper. They obſerve, that it was not directed to the preſident, whom they had endeavoured to deprive of his ancient title. They tell them, that it is they, who, by their unwarrantable claims and incroachments, made it impoſſible for the convocation to do the church any ſervice. That, ſhould their innovations run on, there would be a new danger of preſbytery; for preſbyters would be enabled hereafter to bid defiance to their eccleſiaſtical ſuperiors, and to act independently from them in the higheſt and moſt general concerns of the church. That it is ſtrange any of the clergy ſhould underſtand ſo little of the conſtitution, as to complain, that no buſineſs is finiſhed, when the royal licence has not enabled to begin any: Or, that they ſhould hope, that an attempt to do buſineſs, while this was wanting, could have any other effect than the encreaſing differences. For that they would be ſtill running into irregular practices, againſt which their brethren would enter their proteſtations, and againſt which their lordſhips muſt find ſome other method of proceeding. That their lordſhips could not but look upon the ſeeming earneſtneſs of the clergy to proceed to buſineſs, as a deſign to render themſelves popular, and their ſuperiors odious: And that it was dangerous to thoſe whom they repreſented. That in 1689 the lower houſe was for ſuperſeding all buſineſs with a royal licence in their hands, &c. That there are laws and canons in being ſufficient to correct and puniſh offenders. That, if any thing hindered diſcipline, it was the reproaches induſtriouſly ſpread amongſt the clergy againſt the biſhops and their proceedings. That the preſent diſputes grew purely from the attempts of ſome of the clergy to diſengage themſelves from the authority of the biſhops, by privileges, which their predeceſſors never claimed nor pretended to, and therefore they were amazed at their ſolemn contrary declaration. The ſteps the biſhops had taken are reckoned up, by which they had teſtified their deſire of peace and good agreement. That the convocation has really no authority to paſs ſuch cenſures upon books as they deſired: That grievances of the clergy may be regularly offered by their repreſentatives in convocation. But that it is without precedent for preſbyters to expect, that their metropolitan and biſhops ſhould be accountable to them for their conduct and behaviour in their ſeveral viſitations. And that, as concerning directions about the refuſal of the holy ſacrament to unworthy perſons, they could give them no better than the rubricks and canons of the church, which he, that would ſtrictly and religiouſly obſerve, could not be wanting, either in a dutiful regard to his ſuperiors, or in a conſcientious care of the flock. The lower houſe ſent up two other papers, in one of which they complain of the 'diſſenting teachers' preſuming to adminiſter baptiſm in private houſes, and of the encreaſe of non-licenſed ſchools and ſeminaries; and in the other they accuſe the biſhop of Sarum of inſinuating, that many of the perſons, concerned in preparing their repreſentation of grievances laſt winter, were 'enemies to their lordſhips, the queen, and the nation.'

As the lower houſe ſtill held their intermediate ſeſſions, the archbiſhop, on February 14, aſked the prolocutor, if they had held any intermediate ſeſſions ſince the laſt ſynodical day: The procolutor anſwered, that they held one the Monday before. The archbiſhop told him it was very irregular, and that he admoniſhed them to hold no more intermediate ſeſſions, which was a violation of the preſident's right, and contrary to the conſtant cuſtom of convocations.

February 23. The prolocutor told the archbiſhop, that their houſe had taken his admonition into conſideration; and repreſented in return, that they had not been guilty of any irregularity by their intermediate ſeſſion; that the holding ſuch ſeſſions, as oft as they ſhall ſee cauſe, is no violation of the preſident's right, nor contrary to the cuſtom of convocations, but an unqueſtionable right of the lower-houſe, from which they could not depart. And that, if the admonition was intended as judicial, they proteſted againſt it as void and null, and of no effect in law, and to which no obedience can be due: And deſired, that this their anſwer and proteſtation (for which they were ready to aſſign their reaſons) might be entered in form by the regiſter in the acts of the day.

However this put a ſtop to their intermediate meeting, for they would not venture on the cenſures, that muſt in courſe follow, if no regard was had to the Admonition. On March 15, at the final prorogation, the archbiſhop diſmiſſed them with a wiſe well-compoſed ſpeech. He told them, that, whereas they had brought up many complaints, the greateſt part of them did not require any anſwer, after ſo many former expreſſions of the judgments and reſolutions of the biſhops concerning them. That their paper, of December 1, was of ſo undutiful a nature, that it might juſtly be accounted an act of clemency in their lordſhips to paſs it by without cenſure: And yet they drew up obſervations upon it, and entered them in their regiſter, and they might be ſeen by any one that deſired it. That there is no ſuch thing as adjournments, in the language or practice of convocations, and that prorogations have been all along managed by commiſſaries, from the reſtoration to the revolution. That their repreſentation concerning unlicenſed ſchools and ſeminaries was a matter of law. That their former complaints againſt the biſhop of Sarum had not ſufficient ground. That, in what they now complained of, the biſhop referred to flying reports ſet about to the prejudice of the upper-houſe, which they had all reaſon to complain of; though they prayed God to forgive the guilty, and pitied thoſe who were led away by wilful and perpetual miſrepreſentations. That their lordſhips would govern themſelves by the articles and rubricks, the canons and ſtatutes; and that they knew no way of retrieving the honour of convocations, but by the departing of the clergy of the lower-houſe from unwarrantable claims and innovations, and returning to the antient canonical methods.

He added, that this convocation was near an end, and a new one would probably be ſummoned: And that, if new occaſion ſhould be offered, he ſhould think himſelf obliged to exert his authority, ſeeing no better fruit had been reaped from his paſt conduct, which ſome aſcribed to fear, and others to remiſſineſs. And he told them, he wiſhed, that the clergy of the next convocation might govern themſelves by the conſtitution as it is, and not as they would deſire it might be, that they might not divide in two that body of the convocation, which is but one; but prevent all irregularies, and thereby all cenſure, by meeting together with ſuch peaceable tempers and dutiful diſpoſitions, as became their function and order.

The governing men among the lower-houſe were headſtrong and factious, and deſigned to force themſelves into preferments by the noiſe they made, and by this ill humour, that they endeavoured to ſpread among the clergy, who were generally foured, even with relation to the queen herſelf, beyond what could be imagined poſſible.

Before the queen went to Cambridge, ſhe reſolved at laſt to fill the ſee of St. David's, which had now been long vacant. Dr. Bull was promoted to it in the room of Dr. Watſon, deprived for his enormities[s]. Bull had writ the moſt learned treatiſe, the age had produced, of the doctrine of the primi-

[s] Watſon's affair was debated this laſt ſeſſion in the houſe of lords, which the queen came to hear in perſon. His buſineſs had been kept long on foot in the courts below, by all the methods of delay that lawyers could invent: After five years pleading, the concluding judgment was given in the Exchequer, that he had no right to the temporalities of that biſhopric: And that, being affirmed in the exchequer chamber, it was now a writ of error brought before the lords in the laſt reſort: But, as the houſe ſeemed now to be ſet, he had no mind to let it go to a final deciſion: So he delayed the aſſigning the errors of the judgment, till the days were lapſed, in which, according to a ſtanding order, errors ought to be aſſigned upon a writ of error; in default of which, the record was to be ſent back. He ſuffered the time to lapſe, though particular notice was ordered to be given him, on the laſt day, in which, according to the ſtanding order, he might have aſſigned his errors: And the houſe ſat that day ſome hours on purpoſe waiting for it. Some weeks after that, when the ſeſſion tive church, concerning the trinity. This treatiſe had been ſo well received all Europe over, that, in an aſſembly general of the clergy of France, the biſhop of Meaux was deſired to write over to a correſpondent he had in London, that they had ſuch a ſenſe of the ſervice he had done their common faith, that upon it they ſent him their particular thanks: I read the letter, ſays Burnet, and ſo I can deliver it for a certain truth, how uncommon ſoever it may ſeem to be. The queen had, a little before this, promoted Dr. Beveridge to the ſee of St. Aſaph, who had ſhewed himſelf very learned in the eccleſiaſtical knowledge. They were both pious and devout men, but were now declining; both of them being old, and not like to hold out long. Soon after this, the ſee of Lincoln became vacant by that biſhop's death, and Dr. Wake (late archbiſhop of Canterbury) was promoted to it. He was a man eminently learned, an excellent writer, a good preacher, and, which is above all, a man of an exemplary life.

It was no ſmall mortification to the high-church party, that the duke of Buckingham was removed, and the privy-ſeal given to the duke of Newcaſtle, whoſe intereſt was great with the whigs. About the ſame time, the earl of Peterborough and the lord Cholmondley were ſworn to the privy-council. The lord Cutts was appointed to command the forces in Ireland under the duke of Ormond; but this ſeeming preferment was, in reality, a kind of diſgrace; for his lordſhip would gladly have changed this command for an equivalent in the ſervice abroad. The earl of Montague was created marquis of Mounthermer, and duke of Montague.

Before the operations of the campaign are related, it will be neceſſary to give an account of the proceedings in the parliaments of Scotland and Ireland.

In Ireland, the new heat among the proteſtants there, raiſed in the earl of Rocheſter's time, and connived at, if not encouraged by the duke of Ormond, went on ſtill: A body of hot clergymen, ſent from England, began to form meetings in Dublin, and to have emiſſaries and a correſpondence over Ireland, on deſign to raiſe the ſame fury in the clergy of that kingdom againſt the diſſenters, that they had raiſed here in England: Whether this was only the effect of an unthinking and ill-governed heat among them, or if it was ſet on by by foreign practices, was not yet viſible. It did certainly ſerve their ends, ſo that it was not to be doubted, that they were not wanting in their endeavours to keep it up, and to promote it, whether they were the original contrivers of it or not; for indeed hot men, not practiſed in affairs, are apt enough, of their own accord, to run into wild and unreaſonable extravagances.

The parliament met at Dublin the 5th of March, and voted a hundred and fifty thouſand pounds for the ſupport of the neceſſary branches of the eſtabliſhment. A few days after, the lower-houſe of convocation of the clergy of the church of Ireland being informed, that the heads of a bill, for the better improvement of the hempen and flaxen manufactures of that kingdom, were brought into the houſe of commons, wherein there was a clauſe to aſcertain the tythes of hemp and flax: They preſented a memorial to the houſe of commons, deſiring, that the clauſe might not paſs in the bill, being, as they apprehended, very prejudicial to the rights and properties of the clergy of Ireland, with the care of which they were intruſted. This meſſage was ſigned by the prolocutor, and delivered by their actuary, who was a ſervant to the upper-houſe of convocation. Upon the receipt of the memorial, the commons, inſtead of appointing a time for hearing their reaſons upon it, voted the perſon, that brought it, guilty of a breach of the privilege of the houſe; and, ordering him to be taken into cuſtody, further reſolved, "That it appeared to them, that the convocation, in pretending to have the care of the civil rights of the clergy, were guilty of a contempt and breach of the privilege of that houſe." The commons expected, that the convocation ſhould make a ſubmiſſion, and acknowlege, "That they had nothing to do with the civil rights; and that their meddling with thoſe rights was a contempt and a breach of privilege." But, inſtead of that, the convocation ſent them a letter, wherein they juſtified their memorial, "as no ways encroaching upon the privileges of the houſe of commons, and conſequently no breach of privilege." Hereupon the commons voted, "That all matters relating to the memorial ſhould be razed out of the journals and books of convocation." Which being like to raiſe greater heats, the duke of Ormond thought proper to ſend a meſſage to both houſes, that they ſhould adjourn to the 1ſt of May enſuing; which was done accordingly.

During this adjournment, the duke made a progreſs into the north of Ireland; and, having taken ſome able engineers along with him, cauſed plans and ſchemes to be made, to encreaſe the ſtrength of ſeveral fortified towns. He was received every where with great reſpect; and the preſbyterians, who had been miſrepreſented, upon account of ſome late tranſactions in Scotland, thought this a proper opportunity to clear themſelves of the aſperſions caſt upon them; and therefore, while the duke was at Antrim and Londonderry, ſome of the preſbyterian miniſters waited on him, and delivered to him very dutiful addreſſes. But that did not hinder the convocation from inveighing againſt them, in a reſolution paſſed by them ſoon after.

Upon the duke's return to Dublin, the parliament ſate again; and the houſe of commons, taking notice of the reſtleſs endeavours of the enemies of the public peace, to create diviſions among the proteſtants of that kingdom, to ſtrengthen the intereſt of the pretended prince of Wales, and obſtruct the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line, came to the following unanimous reſolutions:

"I. That endeavouring to create or promote miſunderſtanding betwixt the proteſtants of this kingdom, tends to the advantage of the papiſts, and the weakening the proteſtant intereſt, is ſeditious, and of dangerous conſequence to her majeſty's government, and the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line as by law eſtabliſhed.

"II. That by writing or diſperſing pamphlets, or otherwiſe to inſinuate danger to the eſtabliſhed church from the ſucceſſion as by law eſtabliſhed, tends to promote popery, and the intereſt of the pretended prince of Wales.

"III. That it is the indiſpenſable duty of all magiſtrates in this kingdom to put the law ſtrictly in execution, againſt all perſons who ſhall be guilty of ſuch pernicious practices."

Theſe vigorous reſolutions were chiefly owing to Mr. Moleſworth.

On the other hand, the convocation of the clergy, to clear themſelves from the aſperſion of being enemies to the proteſtant ſucceſſion, paſſed the following reſolutions: "1. That this church and nation, having lately been in the utmoſt danger of being over-run by popery and tyranny, were happily delivered from both, by means of the late revolution, brought about (under God's providence) by his late majeſty king William III. of glorious memory. 2. That the continuance and improvement of theſe bleſſings are due (next under God) to the auſpicuous reign and happy government of her majeſty queen Anne, whom Almighty God long preſerve. 3. That the future ſecurity and preſervation of this church and nation depends wholly (under God) on the ſucceſſion of the crown, as it is now ſettled by law, in the proteſtant line. 4. That if any clergyman of this church, ſhall either by word or writing declare any thing in oppoſition to the foregoing reſolutions (which we hope will never happen) we ſhall look upon him as a ſower of diviſions among the proteſtants of the eſtabliſhed church, and as an enemy to our conſtitution. And, after this public and ſolemn declaration, we hope no perſon whatſoever will be ſo unjuſt and uncharitable, as to declare and inſinuate that the clergy of the church of Ireland, as by law eſtabliſhed, were not entirely in their affections for ſeſſion was ſo near an end, that he thought his cauſe could not be heard during the ſeſſion, and ſo muſt in courſe have been put off to another ſeſſion, he petitioned for leave to aſſign his errors: This was one of the moſt ſolemn orders, that related to the judicature of the lords, and had been the moſt conſtantly ſtood to: It was not therefore thought reaſonable to break through it, in favour of ſo bad a man, of whom they were all aſhamed, if parties could have any ſhame: He had affected, in every ſtep he had made, to ſeek out all poſſible delays, for keeping the ſee ſtill void, which, by reaſon of a bad biſhop and a long vacancy, was fallen into great diſorder: Yet, after all this, he had ſtill by law the benefit of a writ of error, which he might bring in any ſubſequent ſeſſion of parliament. For which reaſon the queen reſolved to fill the ſee.

[1] On the 1ſt of June, the attorney-general reported, from the committee appointed to conſider the ſtate of the nation, the following reſolutions, which were unanimouſly agreed to by the houſe:

"I. That to ſuggeſt by words or writings, that the eſtabliſhed church is not well affected to the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, as ſettled by acts of parliament, or any way inclined to countenance popery, is a falſe and malicious aſperſion, and tends to create a dangerous diviſion amongſt proteſtants, and to promote the deſigns of the papiſts and traytors in favour of the pretended prince of Wales.

"II. That the erecting and continuing any ſeminary for the inſtruction or education of youth in principles contrary to the eſtabliſhed church and government, tends to create and perpetuate miſunderſtandings among proteſtants.

"III. That ſaying maſs, preaching or teaching in ſeparate congregations by perſons, who have not taken the oath of abjuration, and hearing, maintaining, and countenancing ſuch perſons, tends to defeat the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, and to encourage and advance the intereſt of the pretended prince of Wales.

"IV. That all judges and magiſtrates are under the higheſt obligation to make the moſt diligent enquiry into all ſuch wicked practices; and, to their utmoſt, endeavour to diſcover and puniſh the authors of them; and ſuch as wilfully neglect the ſame, ought to be looked upon as enemies to her majeſty's government and the proſperity of this kingdom.

The

the late king William of glorious memory, or are not in the true intereſt of the preſent government; or that they are any way diſaffected to the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line, as by law eſtabliſhed." But to theſe four reſolutions the convocation added a fifth, levelled againſt the preſbyterians: "That for any perſon to preach againſt the doctrine, government, rites or ceremonies of this church; or to keep up and maintain ſchools and ſeminaries for the education of youth, in principles contrary to the eſtabliſhed church, is a contempt of the eccleſiaſtical laws of this kingdom, is of pernicious conſequence, and ſerves only to continue and widen the unhappy ſchiſms and diviſions in the nation."

Soon after theſe reſolutions and votes, the parliament was prorogued to the 13th of June 1706, and the duke of Ormond embarked for England, leaving the adminiſtration of the government of Ireland in the hands of ſir Richard Cox, lord-chancellor, and of the lord Cutts, commander in chief of the queen's forces, who were appointed lords juſtices during the duke's abſence.

A great change was now made in the miniſtry of Scotland. The Engliſh miniſtry, having with difficulty eſcaped being attacked upon account of the 'act of ſecurity' paſſed there, reſolved to uſe their utmoſt endervours to get the 'proteſtant ſucceſſion' ſettled there, or to procure a union of the two kingdoms. The dukes of Argyle and Queenſberry took this opportunity to ſerve each other; and ſeverally to repreſent to the whig lords, "That the marquis of Tweedale and his party had been zealous promoters of the act of ſecurity: That they were ſo inſignificant and ſo deſpiſed through the whole nation, that they could do nothing; but, granting they ſhould prevail, and carry the ſucceſſion with the 'limitations' inſiſted on, of what dangerous conſequence muſt even that prove, ſince thereby a great part of the chief means England had to continue Scotland in dependance was removed, perhaps never to be recovered? That the duke of Queenſberry had been laid aſide for no crime, and no reaſon given, but what teſtified his firmneſs and reſolution in oppoſing every thing, that was diſagreeable and inconvenient to England. And that the duke of Argyle, being a young man of a forward bold ſpirit, and lively natural parts, who had gained the leading of the preſbyterians, as his father had done before him, was therefore a proper perſon to be employed at this juncture." Theſe, and the like conſiderations, had the deſired effect with the whig lords, who prevailed with the queen and her miniſters to lay aſide the motley miniſtry of Scotland; and, accordingly, the marquis of Tweedale, the earls of Rothes, Roxburgh, and Selkirk, the lords Belhaven, Mr. Bailie of Jerviſwood, and Mr. Johnſton were removed; and the chief management of affairs was committed to the duke of Queenſberry, though with the bare title of lord privy-ſeal. At the ſame time the duke of Argyle was declared high-commiſſioner to the next parliament: the earl of Seafield reinſtated chancellor; the marquis of Annandale and the earl of Loudon made ſecretaries of ſtate; ſir James Murray of Philiphaugh regiſter; and all the privy-councillors laid aſide by the laſt miniſtry (except ſir James Fowles of Colingtoun, and Mr. Lockhart of Cornwarth) were reſtored.

The Duke of Argyle's inſtructions were, that he ſhould endeavour to procure an act, ſettling the ſucceſſion as it was in England; or to ſet on foot a treaty for the union of the two kingdoms. When he came to Scotland, and laid his inſtructions before the reſt of the miniſters there, the marquis of Annandale preſſed, that they ſhould firſt try that, which was firſt named in the inſtructions; and he ſeemed confident, that, if all, who were in employments, would concur in it, they ſhould be able to carry it. Thoſe of another mind, who were in their hearts for the pretended prince of Wales, put this by with great zeal, alledging, they muſt not begin with that, which would meet with great oppoſition, and be perhaps rejected: Oppoſition would beget ſuch an union of parties, that, if they miſcarried in the one, they ſhould not be able to carry the other; therefore they thought, that the firſt propoſition ſhould be for the union: not only as it was a popular thing, but as it ſeemed to be remote: And conſequently, there would be a great oppoſition made to a general act about it. Thoſe who intended ſtill to oppoſe it, would reckon they ſhould find matter enough in the particulars to raiſe a great oppoſition and to defeat it. This courſe was agreed on; at which the marquis of Annandale was ſo highly offended, that he concurred no more in the councils of thoſe, who gave the other advice. Some ſincerely deſired the union, as that which would render the whole iſland happy. Others were in their hearts againſt it: They thought it was a plauſible ſtep, which they believed would run by a long treaty into a courſe of ſome years: That during that time, they ſhould be continued in their employments; and they ſeemed to think, it was impoſſible ſo to adjuſt all matters, as to frame ſuch a treaty, as would paſs in the parliaments of both kingdoms. The jacobites concurred all heartily in this. It kept the ſettling the ſucceſſion at a diſtance, and very few looked on the motion for the union as any thing but a pretence, to keep matters yet longer in ſuſpence.

At the opening of the ſeſſion of parliament, which met on the 28th of June 1705, there appeared three different parties; the 'cavaliers or anti-revolutioners; the ſquadrone, or flying ſquadron,' conſiſting of diſcarded courtiers, who pretended to hold and turn the balance of the contending parties [u]; and the preſent courtiers, who conſiſted of zealous preſbyterians and revolutioners. The cavaliers, headed by the duke of Hamilton, applied to the marquis of Tweedale and his party, the flying ſquadron, to perſuade them to unite again, to oppoſe the courtiers; but they poſitively refuſed to treat or concert meaſures with the cavaliers, reſenting the diſappointments they had met with the laſt year.

Many members being abſent at the opening of the ſeſſion, the lord commiſſioner adjourned the parliament to the 3d of July, when being met again, the queen's letter to them was read, wherein her majeſty "recommended to them with the greateſt earneſtneſs, the ſettling the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line, and, to prevent any objection to the ſettlement, that could be ſuggeſted from the views or fear of future inconveniencies, that might happen to Scotland from thence, ſhe told them, ſhe ſhould be ready to give the royal aſſent to ſuch proviſions and reſtrictions, as ſhould be found neceſſary and reaſonable in ſuch a caſe. That being fully ſatisfied, that great benefits would ariſe to all her ſubjects by an union of Scotland and England; and that nothing could contribute more to the compoſing of differences, and extinguiſhing the heats raiſed and fomented by the enemies of both nations, than the promoting of every thing, that tended to the procuring the ſame: Therefore ſhe earneſtly recommended to them to paſs an act for a commiſſion, to ſet a treaty on foot between the two kingdoms, as her parliament of England had done. Concluding with the uſual demand of the neceſſary ſupplies, and acquainting them with her choice of the duke of Argyle to be her commiſſioner, whom ſhe had fully empowered to declare her firm reſolution to maintain the government both in church and ſtate, as by law eſtabliſhed, and to conſent to ſuch further laws, as ſhould be thought neceſſary for that end, for the better improving of trade and manufactures, and generally for the good and advantage of the kingdom." The lord commiſſioner, and the earl of Seafield, lord chancellor, in their reſpective ſpeeches, inferred the neceſſity of what was recommended in the queen's letter; and the ſame day was read another letter from the queen to the lord commiſſioner, appointing lord Archibald Campbel, his firſt couſin, to have the place and vote of lord high-treaſurer, in this ſeſſion of parliament.

On the 6th of July, the marquis of Annandale preſented a propoſal, "That the parliament would go upon the conſideration of ſuch limitations and conditions of government, as ſhould be judged proper for the next ſucceſſor in the proteſtant line: and that, at the ſame time, a committee be appointed to conſider the condition of the coin of the nation, and the ſtate of its commerce or trade, as to export and import, and to prepare and bring in the moſt proper remedies and regulations for that end." Hereupon the earl Mariſchal preſented a reſolve, "That the houſe, previous to all other affairs, would make ſuch regulations of the trade and coin of this kingdom, as might be moſt for the advantage of the nation." Another reſolve was alſo preſented by the earl of Mar, "That the houſe would, preferably to all other buſineſs, take into their conſideration the nation's circumſtances, as to England, and how to enter into a treaty with them." This laſt being ſeconded by few, his lordſhip thought fit to withdraw it till another time; but the houſe fell into a debate of ſix hours upon the two firſt motions, and at laſt it came to the queſtion, whether to proceed firſt to the conſideration of coin and trade, or that of limitations; and the firſt was carried. Then a ſecond queſtion was put, whether the coin and trade ſhould be taken into conſideration by way of reſolve, which excluded all other buſineſs till that ſhould be determined, or by way of propoſal, which admitted of other buſineſs; and this was carried likewiſe by a great majority. It was the opinion of many, that the cavaliers made a wrong ſtep in poſtponing the more material affairs, and trifling away the beginning of the ſeſſion in matters of no importance; for, if they had immediately called for the queen's letter, in order to return an anſwer to it, the treaty with England would naturally have fallen under conſideration, and the duke of Queenſberry's friends not being yet gone off from them, they might have either rejected it, or at leaſt clogged it as they pleaſed, and choſen ſuch members as they thought fit to be commiſſioners. Whatever ground there may have been for this conjecture, it is certain, that the three next and many other 'ſederunts' or ſittings were ſpent in the conſideration of trade; in relation to which ſeveral overtures or propoſals were laid before the houſe, ſome of which paſſed into laws, and the others were rejected. Amongſt the reſt there were two propoſals made for 'ſupplying the nation with money by a paper-credit.' The firſt was offered by Dr. Hugh Chamberlane, whoſe project by a 'land-bank' had, ſome years before, miſcarried in England, and reduced him ſo low, that he was obliged to fly from his creditors into Scotland. The other was propoſed by John Law, the ſon of a goldſmith in Edinburgh, a man of ſubtle parts, who, having ſquandered away his ſmall fortune, was forced to live by gaming, but who, being an agreeable debauchee, found the way to ingratiate himſelf with the duke of Argyle, and the leaders of the 'flying ſquadron.' Upon the confidence of their ſupport, he preſented a very plauſible ſcheme, which was readily eſpouſed by all the courtiers, and many of the 'flying ſquadron,' becauſe it was ſo framed, that, in proceſs of time, it would have brought all the eſtates of the kingdom to depend upon the government. But the houſe rejected the propoſal, and came to a reſolution, "That the eſtabliſhing any kind of paper credit, ſo as to make bills paſs for current coin, was an improper expedient." A council was likewiſe appointed, with power to put the laws relating thereto into execution; and it was recommended to them to bring the export and import of the nation to a balance, and lay the ſame before the houſe next ſeſſion.

Before this act was brought to perfection, the cavaliers made all poſſible efforts to prevent the ſettling of the ſucceſſion, for which purpoſe the duke of Hamilton, on the 17th of July, preſented the following reſolve, "That this parliament will not proceed to the nomination of a ſucceſſor, till they have had a previous treaty with England in relation to commerce, and other concerns with that nation." And further, "That this parliament will proceed to make ſuch limitations and conditions of government for the rectification of the conſtitution, as may ſecure the liberty, religion, and independency of this kingdom, before they proceed to the nomination of a ſucceſſor." The court, and moſt of the 'flying ſquadron,' united againſt this reſolve; but the cavaliers inſiſted vigorouſly upon it, and, by the aſſiſtance of ſome of the duke of Queenſberry's friends, carried it by a great majority. Upon this occaſion the lord Belhaven made a long ſpeech[w], which had ſuch an effect, that, after ſome debate, the duke of Hamilton's reſolve was approved. On the 20th of July, the parliament met again, and read the [w] The ſpeech was as follows:

My lord chancellor,

"By what experience I have had in this world, I always found, that when diviſions are once come to that conſiſtency, as to form themſelves in factions upon different meaſures and oppoſite deſigns, that then reaſon and reaſoning make but a very ſmall impreſſion upon either of the parties. Therefore I ſhall not enter into the merits of this 'reſolve,' nor of its expediency or inexpediency at this time, that I may not give the leaſt riſe to debate, or occaſion of miſunderſtanding amongſt ourſelves. What I ſhall ſay on this head, is to advance this poſition, viz. That there is more danger to our nation, and national concerns by diviſions and factions, than by any miſtakes in fit and adequate meaſures, if they be unanimouſly gone upon.

"A wrong meaſure, eſpecially in reſolutions, may be rectified and redreſſed, when we come to a fuller view of the affair. And, though ſometimes they prove unſucceſsful, yet unanimity endures a ſhock with firmneſs; but diviſions and factions encreaſe and multiply, and that from very ſmall beginnings, ſo as to render all perſuaſions abortive; and that more eſpecially amongſt men of honour, who, as they are generally more grateful, conſtant, and firm to their words and parties, ſo upon diſappointments they are more prone to reſentment and revenge, the moſt dangerous of all paſſions, and the moſt fatal to the very being of nations.

"What I plead for, my lord, at this time, 'is unity.' Would you have limitations? Go upon them unanimouſly. Would you have a treaty? Do the like. Would you ſettle the ſucceſſion upon limitations without a treaty? Would you ſettle the ſucceſſion on treaty without limitations? Would you have neither done at this time? In ſhort, whatever you would have done, let it be done 'nemine contradicente,' and it will not want its own weight; for I am perſuaded, that, whatever reſolution this honourable houſe ſhall come to, a wrong meaſure is preferable to a good one, if there be unanimity in the one, and faction at the bottom of the other.

"My lords, I could bring in inſtances from the hiſtories of Europe, to confirm what I have ſaid, and from none more than that of our neighbours, the States of Holland, whoſe unity has raiſed them to the grandeur and riches they are poſſeſſed of at this day. They wanted not wrong meaſures and unſucceſsful attempts; but their unanimous firmneſs in the vindication of their liberty hath made good the verity of their motto, 'Concordiâ res parvæ creſcunt.'

"But, waving what is foreign, I ſhall confine myſelf to our own hiſtories, and by four examples I ſhall make it evidently appear, that our predeceſſors, when in good underſtanding amongſt themſelves, were always in a condition to defend their rights and liberties againſt the Engliſh, and that they never did prevail over us, ſave when we were divided and broke by factions.

"The firſt inſtance is of that famous controverſy about the right of ſucceſſion of Alexander the Third. The ſtory is ſo well known, that I ſhall not give this honourable houſe the trouble of hearing it repeated, but ſhall only ſay, we divided upon it. What followed upon that? The king of England gave us a king. What was the conſequence of that? Both of us paid very dear for it. For, as the hiſtorians of both nations tell us, there followed upon it the longeſt and moſt bloody war, that ever was betwixt two nations. Then, and not before, could it be ſaid, that England had any pretence of homage from us.

"Pray, my lord, had it not been better, that our predeceſſors had of themſelves choſen the worſt of competitors, yea the worſt men of the nation by a general conſent, rather than to have ſuſtained thoſe calamities, which followed on that diviſion?

"The other time, my lord, that we groaned under Engliſh bondage, was by Cromwell, who knew as well how to divide, as how to fight. We had called home king Charles the ſecond, as ſucceſſor to his father. Cromwell enters Scotland with an army, and prevails. What was the reaſon of it? Was his army comparable to ours in number? He knew very well king Charles the firſt, his maſter, had come upon us with a far better army, and we leſs prepared, and leſs accuſtomed to war; and yet, though ſword in hand, he was neceſſitated to give us a valuable treaty at the Birks. He knew very well, that we had the remains of that gallant army, which had procured us ſo good conditions at the treaty of Rippon, and who afterwards had raiſed the parliamentary power above that of their ſovereign. He knew, that we had the brave troops, that had preſerved the north of Ireland from the Iriſh rebels. Whence then came all thoſe hopes of Oliver? It came, my lords, from our diviſions: We were united in thoſe former times, and broken then. In ſhort, we had the Hamiltons, Grahams, and Campbells, each driving on oppoſite deſigns. Nay, my lord, faction was come to that height of enthuſiaſm, that, when we came to fight Cromwell at Dunbar, we would not fight but as Gideon did the Midianites, although we had no ſuch warrant for it. I pray God, my lords, things come not to ſuch an height now, eſpecially when we, as they, mind more, who ſhall do ſuch and ſuch things, than what things are fitteſt to be done; ſo that every commiſſioner now muſt have the board ſwept clean, before he undertakes the queen's buſineſs. I ſpeak not this, my lord, out of any reſentment I have, by being lately turned out of a poſt, I profeſs I have not the leaſt reſentment upon it. Why ſhould not the queen employ what ſervants ſhe thinks fit? But I ſpeak of it, becauſe I am afraid it proves a ſeed to faction, it having proved ſo prolific already, as to have two crops in one year, though in this northern climate.

"The two inſtances, where our unity preſerved us from the fatal conſequences of war with England, are thoſe of king David and king James the firſt, after we had recovered under the conduct of the noble Bruce, who had forced the grandchild, by a moſt ſolemn renunciation, to yield up the claim of homage, unjuſtly impoſed by the father upon us. Two unhappy accidents put theſe two kings in the hands of the Engliſh. Did they let go the opportunities to trump up their claim of homage? No, my lord. What hindered them to proceed further? King David had loſt a conſiderable battle, was there made priſoner himſelf, many of the nobility killed and taken, England ſucceſsful againſt France at the ſame time, and their king priſoner in England. King James the firſt was their priſoner, being forced to fly from the unjuſt deſigns of his uncle Robert, and as unjuſtly made priſoner by them. Theſe occaſions, my lord, did appear favourable enough for England to make uſe of; but our firm unanimity put a ſtop to their deſigns. We declared we would not obey our kings as long as they were under Engliſh power and influence; and ſo both our armies in France, and peers in Scotland, refuſed their oaths, as long as they were in England, looking upon them not as their king's commands, but the commands of an enemy. And thus we were preſerved, and our kings delivered to us upon ranſom.

"My lord, I have obſerved, that England never let go any opportunity, neither before nor ſince the union of the two crowns, to bring us under their power; and I am perſuaded, that the heats and animoſities amongſt us theſe ſeveral ſeſſions of parliament have, amongſt other things, occaſioned that threatning and unaccountable act of parliament, wherein they characterize our miniſters, and criticize our acts; as it hath alſo given birth to thoſe contemptible and ignorant pamphlets, publiſhed of late againſt the ſovereignty and independency of our nation. Will you prevent the conſequences of what is deſigned againſt us? Be as united as they in your actings againſt them. Did whig and tory differ about us? No, my lord: The two houſes, though in civil war among themſelves, did vie with one another, which of them ſhould have the honour to give us the ſharpeſt and ſevereſt blow.

"To conclude, Would you quench the fire, that appears to be raiſed againſt us in England? Would you have a ſucceſsful treaty and good limitations? Be unanimous; and, I hope, the caſe is not as yet ſo deſperate, but what our predeceſſors have found, we may yet find the like.

"It may be aſked, my lord, How ſhall we be unanimous, and who ſhall yield? I think providence has made that very eaſy with relation to this reſolve. For ſuppoſe ſome be for limitations, that are not for a treaty; and others for a treaty, that are not for limitations; and that thoſe, who are againſt a treaty, are againſt it, becauſe they do not expect reaſonable and good conditions from England; and that thoſe, who are againſt limitations, are againſt them, becauſe they would prove of no long continuance, and conſequently look upon them only as an amuſement to bring us to the Engliſh ſucceſſion: There is no reaſon, my lord, in all this, why both parties ſhould not agree in the reſolve. For, ſuppoſe all thoſe ſuppoſitions ſhould prove true, ſhall we then be in any worſe condition than we are at preſent? Shall it be ſaid, we will not ſo much as reſolve to treat with England; or that limitations, which are in our power, both to make and to keep, ſhall be looked upon by us as things impracticable, and of no duration? No, my lord, we have a gracious queen, that will aſſiſt us in both, and who, in her gracious letter, ſeems to deſire both.

"I do conſider England, with relation to the ſucceſſion of Britain, as ſo many fiſhes incloſed in a large ſtrong net. They have room to ſwim, toſs, and tumble; but, as long as the fiſherman keeps his hold, they cannot break through. I believe by this time they are ſenſible, that the ſucceſſion to the two kingdoms in Britain ought not to have been deſigned, much leſs ſettled, draught of a letter preſented by the marquis of Tweedale, in anſwer to her majeſty's letter to the parliament; as alſo a draught of an 'act for a treaty with England,' preſented by the earl of Mar; another draught of an 'act for a treaty with England' preſented by the marquis of Lothian; a draught of an act concerning the way of chuſing officers of ſtate, privy-councillors, and members of the Exchequer and Treaſury, in caſe of her majeſty's deceaſe, without heirs of her body to ſucceed, preſented by the earl of Rothes; and ſome other draughts of acts relating to trade: All which were ordered to be printed.

On the 23d of July, the duke of Queenſberry arrived at Edinburgh, where he made a public entry with great ſplendor and magnificence, and was received with greater demonſtrations of joy, than the three times he had been commiſſioner. The next day he went to parliament, where the draught of a letter, in anſwer to the queen's, was read, intimating "the parliament's readineſs to eſtabliſh the ſame ſucceſſor with England; begging her majeſty would grant them ſuch limitations to her ſucceſſors, as were neceſſary for that purpoſe; and aſſuring her, that, if this was once done, they would chearfully ſet about the work." But, a motion being made, that, preferably to that letter, the houſe ſhould take into conſideration acts relating to trade, the ſame was agreed to.

This being over, the cavaliers inclined to proceed upon the limitations, propoſing thereby, in the firſt place, to obſtruct the eſtabliſhment of the ſucceſſion, in caſe the projected treaty ſhould fail; for they knew the court would not grant them the royal aſſent, and that the ſucceſſion would then miſcarry. In the next place, to lay all the reſtraints poſſible on the monarch, in caſe the houſe of Hanover ſhould come to the crown. And laſtly, to ingratiate themſelves with the people, who thought themſelves oppreſſed by England, and were extremely fond of every thing, that ſeemed to free them from it. A motion being made on the 31ſt of July, to grant the firſt reading 'to an act of commiſſion for a treaty with England,' the duke of Hamilton, in oppoſition thereto, moved, that the houſe would proceed to the enacting 'the limitations;' and, a vote being ſtated in theſe terms, proceed to conſider the 'act for a treaty,' or 'limitations,' the latter was carried. In the next 'ſederunt,' on the 2d of Auguſt, ſeveral acts for that purpoſe were preſented; the moſt conſiderable of which was, an act for regulating the chuſing the officers of ſtate, enacting, "That from and after her majeſty's deceaſe, without heirs of her body, all officers of ſtate, and privy-councillors, and lords of ſeſſion, ſhould be choſen and appointed by the parliament; and in caſe of the deceaſe of any of them, during the vacancy of parliament, the office to be ſupplied by one nominated by the council, who ſhould continue in the ſame till next ſeſſion of parliament: And that all the officers of ſtate and privy-councillors ſhould be accountable to the parliament." The court offered, on the 16th of Auguſt, a clauſe, giving the power of chuſing officers of ſtate (which by this act was ſolely lodged in parliament) to the king, with conſent of parliament, which was carried in the negative; as alſo a motion, that there ſhould be three preſidents of the ſeſſion, to preſide by turns each two months. On the 22d, the whole act was approved, and, the next day, an act for a triennial parliament was read in theſe terms: "Our ſovereign lady, being willing to reſtore to her ancient kingdom their ancient cuſtom and right to frequency of parliaments, does therefore, with the advice and conſent of parliament, ſtatute and ordain, that there ſhall be a new parliament called and indicted, to meet, ſit, and act; and that once every third year after the 1ſt of Auguſt in the year. And her majeſty does hereby declare, with conſent aforeſaid, that this preſent parliament ſhall not continue and endure any longer than the 1ſt of Auguſt aforeſaid; and this, without prejudice of her majeſty and ſucceſſors royal prerogative and power to diſſolve parliaments ſooner than the ſaid term of three years, as ſhall be thought fit. And further, with the advice aforeſaid, ſtatutes and ordains, that, from and after the 1ſt day of Auguſt aforeſaid, no farmer or collector of her majeſty's cuſtoms or exciſe, or any other branch of her majeſty's revenue, ſhall be capable to be a member of parliament, nor to ſit and vote therein after the date aforeſaid; and it ſhall be a ſufficient objection againſt any member, that he is concerned, directly or indirectly, as a farmer or collector, in any part of her majeſty's revenue, to remove him from his place and vote in parliament." The courtiers ſaw it was to no purpoſe to oppoſe this act; and, being afraid of a new parliament, they only propoſed, that this act ſhould not take place during her majeſty's life. The cavaliers, on the other hand, inſiſted, that it ſhould commence immediately; but many members, who doubted their own intereſt to be elected anew; propoſed a medium betwixt the two, that it ſhould take place three years after the date, that is, the 1ſt of Auguſt 1708; with which, as the leaſt of the two evils, the courtiers joined and carried it, and ſo the whole act was approved. Another act ordaining, that the Scots embaſſadors, repreſenting Scotland, ſhould be preſent, when the ſovereign had occaſion to treat with foreign princes and ſtates, and accountable to the parliament of Scotland, was alſo approved: But ſeveral other overtures were made, that never were engroſſed into acts. Nor did the abovementioned act obtain the royal aſſent, though the court promiſed it often to many of the members, and thereby kept them in good humour, while the act for a treaty was framing, they thinking themſelves in a tolerable good ſtate by thoſe acts of limitation, and never imagining, that the treaty would terminate as it did. But Fletcher of Salton, having, in a long diſcourſe, ſet forth the deplorable ſtate, to which the Scots nation was reduced by being ſubjected to Engliſh counſels and meaſures, while the ſame perſon was king of both kingdoms, concluded, that thoſe acts were not ſufficient, and therefore preſented a ſcheme of 'limitations,' which he propoſed to be engroſſed into an act, and taken into conſideration.

"I. That elections ſhould be made at every Michaelmas head-court for a new parliament every year, to ſit the 1ſt of November next following, and adjourn themſelves from time to time till next Michaelmas. That they chuſe their own preſident, and that every thing be determined by balloting in place of voting.

"II. That ſo many leſſer barons ſhould be added to the parliament, as there had been noblemen created ſince the laſt augmentation of the number of barons: And that in all time coming, for every nobleman, that ſhould be created, there ſhould be a baron added to the parliament.

"III. That no man ſhould have a vote in parliament, but a nobleman, or elected member.

"IV. That the king ſhould give the royal aſſent to all the laws offered by the eſtates; and that the preſident of the parliament be empowered by his majeſty to give the royal aſſent in his abſence, and have ten pounds ſterling a day ſalary.

"V. That a committee of thirty-one members, of which nine be a quorum, choſen out of their number by every parliament under the king, ſhould have the adminiſtration of the government, be his council, and accountable to the parliament, with power, on extraordinary occaſions, to call the parliament together: And that, in the ſaid council, all things be determined by balloting, inſtead of voting.

"VI. That the king, without conſent of the parliament, ſhould not have the power of making peace and war, or of concluding any treaty with any other ſtate or potentate.

"VII. That all places and offices, both civil and military, and all penſions formerly conferred by the crown, ſhould ever after be given by parliament.

"VIII. That no regiment or company of horſe, foot, or dragoons, be kept on foot in peace or war, but by conſent of parliament.

"IX. That all the fencible men in the nation, betwixt ſixty and ſixteen, be armed with bayonets and firelocks, all of a caliver; and continue always provided in ſuch arms and ammunition ſuitable.

"X. That no general indemnity, or pardon for any tranſgreſſion, ſhould be valid, without conſent of parliament.

"XI. That the fifteen ſenators of the college of juſtice ſhould be incapable of being members of parliament, or of any office or penſion, but the ſalary, that belongs to their place, to be increaſed as the parliament ſhould think fit. That the office of preſident ſhould be in three of their num-without acquainting one part of Britain with the deſign, and that one part independent upon the other. Therefore if we be united, and keep our hold, and make no unreaſonable demand, either of limitations from our queen, or conditions from England, but merely ſuch as the neceſſity of the nation requires; I hope, by the bleſſing of God upon our juſt endeavours, and the cordial ſupport of our excellent ſovereign, that we ſhall have all our deſires granted, and a good underſtanding betwixt the two nations promoted, not for this time only, but for ever: Which if they do ſlight at this time, I dare pretend to propheſy that the time will come, when they will give with leſs ceremony.

"Thus, my lord, I have frankly told you my mind, and that with all deference and ſubmiſſion to this honourable houſe; and though I do not pretend to the thanks of this parliament, as the lord Haverſham had of the houſe of lords, yet I will not yield to his lordſhip, as to my integrity and ſincere concern for the commonwealth of Britain. And in one thing, I think, I have the advantage, that what I have ſaid tends to the compoſing of differences; firſt, among ourſelves, and then betwixt our neighbouring nations and us. Whereas his lordſhip's ſpeech, if I be not as much miſtaken, as his lordſhip was at the time he ſpoke it, tends directly the quite contrary way. Therefore I am for the reſolve, and for the beginning with the limitations.

The

ber, to be named by the parliament, and that there be no extraordinary lords: As alſo, that the lords of the juſtice-court ſhould be diſtinct from thoſe of the ſeſſion, and under the ſame reſtrictions.

" XII. That, if any king ſhould break in upon any of theſe conditions of government, he ſhould, by the eſtates, be declared to have forfeited the crown." Fletcher enlarged upon every article, endeavouring to ſhew, that the firſt eight were neceſſary to prevent Engliſh influence over Scots affairs; the ninth, to enable the nation to defend its rights and liberties; and the tenth, to deter miniſters of ſtate from preſuming to give the king bad advice, and doing things contrary to law[x]. The eleventh article he ſaid was neceſſary to preſerve the judicatories from corrupt judges: " And if the twelfth, concluded he, be not approved, ſure, I am, this houſe muſt own, the laſt king James was barbarouſly and unjuſtly treated." However this ſcheme of limitations was never framed into an act.

Another material point, under the conſideration of this parliament, was the plot. They had, in the former ſeſſion, addreſſed the queen to tranſmit to them ſuch perſons, as were evidences in, and ſuch papers as related to, that affair; and, in the beginning of this ſeſſion, the dukes of Hamilton and Athol were very deſirous to proſecute it to the utmoſt. But the cavaliers were not ſo forward; firſt, becauſe they were under a kind of engagement to the earl of Mar and ſir James Murray of Philiphaugh, that, if the duke of Queenſberry's friends oppoſed the marquis of Tweedale and his party, as in the former ſeſſion, they ſhould not inſiſt on that affair, which would irritate the duke's friends to ſuch a degree, that many of them would not concur in oppoſing the act for a treaty. In the next place, the cavaliers conſidered, that the edge of many people's indignation againſt the plot was blunted, by its lying ſo long dormant. And being, at the ſame time, apprehenſive of being baffled, if they attempted any thing againſt the duke of Queenſberry, they reſolved to ſtand neuter, at leaſt till they ſaw, whether the dukes of Hamilton and Athol could prove any thing. It being proved, on the 28th of Auguſt, that the houſe might be acquainted what anſwer the queen had returned to the addreſs, the lord-commiſſioner declared, That he had received a letter from her majeſty relating to that matter, and would ſignify her pleaſure therein to the parliament in a few days. Accordingly, on the 11th of September, the lord-chancellor acquainted the houſe, that the reſt of the papers relating to the late plot were now tranſmitted; and that they ſhould be given to the clerk regiſter, to be peruſed by the members of the houſe. But, when the houſe took theſe papers into conſideration, it was urged, that they were only copies, and that the principal evidences, ſuch as ſir John Maclean, Mr. Keith, and others remained in London; and that the parliament could not proceed any further in that affair, unleſs the original papers, and the perſons, who were evidences, were at their command. However, the dukes of Hamilton and Athol, and Bailie of Jerviſwood, made ſpeeches in their own vindication, aſſerting, that the accuſation againſt them in the diſcovery of the pretended plot was falſe and calumnious. The duke of Athol, in particular, made a long narrative of the beginning, progreſs, and concluſion of the whole affair; accuſed the duke of Queenſberry of endeavouring to give the queen ſiniſter impreſſions of her good ſubjects; produced copies of letters ſent from him to her majeſty, affirming, that all the cavaliers had an hand in the plot, or, at leaſt, were enemies to her; and that, the better to carry on his deſign, he had employed and held correſpondence with Frazer or lord Lovat. But, notwithſtanding all this great clamour, no further notice was taken of this affair.

The buſineſs, which the court had principally at heart, was the 'Act for a treaty with England.' The earl of Mar had, in the beginning of this ſeſſion, preſented an 'Act for appointing commiſſioners to treat with commiſſioners from England of an union;' which lay upon the table, till moſt of the overtures in relation to trade and the limitations were diſcuſſed; but theſe being over, the other was re-aſſumed. This act was much of the ſame nature and import with the act paſſed in England, both empowering commiſſioners to meet and treat of an union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, and reſtraining them from treating of any alterations of the church government, as by law eſtabliſhed, in the reſpective realms. The only material difference was, that the Engliſh act not only gave the queen the nomination of the commiſſioners on the part of England, but required alſo that the queen ſhould name and appoint the Scots commiſſioners; whereas, in the draught preſented by the earl of Mar, there was a blank for the power of the nomination. This gave occaſion to Fletcher of Salton, in a pathetic ſpeech, on the 28th of Auguſt, to inveigh againſt the haughty and imperious proceedings of the Engliſh in this affair, exhorting the houſe to reſent this treatment, as became Scotſmen, for which purpoſe he offered an addreſs to be preſented to her majeſty, importing, " That the act paſſed in the parliament of England, containing a propoſal for a treaty of union of the two kingdoms, was made in ſuch injurious terms to the honour and intereſt of the Scots nation, that they, who repreſented that kingdom in parliament, could no ways comply with it: which they had the greater regret to refuſe, becauſe a treaty of union had, in this ſeſſion, been recommended to them by her majeſty. But that they ſhould be always ready to comply with any ſuch propoſal from the parliament of England, whenever it ſhould be made in terms no way diſhonourable or diſadvantageous to the Scots nation." The houſe, rejecting this motion, called for the earl of Mar's draught, and for the Engliſh act, both of which were read. The cavaliers and country-party obſerving, that there was a great inclination in the houſe to ſet a treaty on foot, thought it improper to oppoſe it any longer in general terms; and therefore reſolved to endeavour to clog the commiſſion with ſuch reſtrictions and proviſions, as ſhould retard the treaty's taking effect. In order thereto, the duke of Hamilton preſented a clauſe to be added to the act, importing, " That the union to be treated on ſhould no ways derogate from any fundamental laws, ancient privileges, offices, rights, liberties, and dignities of the Scots nation." This the courtiers vigorouſly oppoſed, as inconſiſtent with the intended entire or 'incorporating union,' of which the aboliſhing the Scots parliament was a neceſſary conſequence. And thereupon they urged, " That, ſince Scotland and England were under one ſovereign, who mediated between her two kingdoms, and England had already given ample powers to their commiſſioners, it would be unbecoming in Scotland to reſtrain their commiſſioners. That it would ſhew a jealouſy of her majeſty, and might put a ſtop to the treaty, ſince England could not but expect, that the Scots commiſſioners ſhould have as ample powers as theirs. That there could be no danger in giving unlimited powers to their commiſſioners, ſince it was expreſsly provided, that no matter or thing treated of, and agreed to, ſhould be of any force, unleſs it were firſt approved of and ratified by the parliaments of both kingdoms. And therefore, when their commiſſioners ſhould make their report of the ſcheme of of Union, that ſhould be agreed on, then it would be proper for the houſe to conſider, whether they would ratify or reject the ſame." To this it was anſwered, " That Scotland and England's being under one ſovereign made this clauſe neceſſary, ſince woeful experience taught them, and it had been often complained of in the houſe, that their ſovereign was under Engliſh influence, and ſubject to the counſels of her Engliſh miniſters, who regarded the intereſt and honour of Scotland no further than was conſiſtent with that of England. That the adding of this clauſe could never imply the leaſt miſtruſt of the queen's inclinations towards her ancient kingdom, ſince all that could be made of it was, that the Scots parliament being ſenſible, that the queen was not in a capacity to know the intereſt and circumſtances of Scotland ſo well as thoſe of England, had taken care to prevent any inconveniencies, that might ariſe from thence. That there were ſome things ſo ſacred, that the leaſt innovation or alteration, much leſs the abrogating or ſuſpending them, was never to be attempted, or the ſubject of any treaty. And the particulars of this clauſe, ſuch as the 'Sovereignty, independency, and freedom of the nation,' being of this nature, ought therefore to be added. That England could not take it amiſs, ſince they themſelves had reſtrained their own commiſſioners from treating of any alteration in the church-government of that kingdom. That the Scots were a free independent people, and had a power to give what inſtructions, powers and reſtrictions they pleaſed to their commiſſioners. Neither was it to be imagined, that England would refuſe to treat upon account of this clauſe, becauſe the very clauſe, in the ſame expreſs words, was inſerted in the act of the treaty in the reign of king James VI. and to the ſame purpoſe in moſt of the ſubſequent acts of treaty; and yet [x] The earl of Stair having ſpoken againſt this ſcheme, Fletcher, in anſwer, ſaid, " It was no wonder his lordſhip was againſt it; for, had there been ſuch an act, his lordſhip had been long before hanged for the advices he gave king James, the murder of Glenco, and his conduct ſince the revolution." Lockhart.

On

neither that king (who would have had good reaſon to be offended at any diſreſpect or diſtruſt ſhewn towards him) nor his ſucceſſors, nor the parliament of England, made any ſcruple upou that account, to meet and treat with the commoners of Scotland." Theſe and many other arguments were urged for and againſt the clauſe: but the queſtion being put, whether it would be added or not? it was carried in the negative by two voices only, through the neglect of ſeven or eight of the cavaliers and country-party, who happened to be abſent.

This being over, aoothe clauſe was offered, importing, "That the commiſſioners ſhould not go out of Scotland, to enter into any treaty with thoſe to be appointed for England, until there was an act paſſed by the parliament of England, reſcinding that clauſe in the Engliſh act, by which it was enacted, that the ſubjects of Scotland ſhould be adjudged and taken as aliens, after the 25th of December 1705." The cavaliers inſiſted upon this clauſe as neceſſary to vindicate the honour of the nation from the injuſtice of the Engliſh in that act, upon a belief, that, if it were added, the Engliſh would not comply with it, and ſo the treaty would come to nothing. Upon the ſame conſideration the courtiers oppoſed it; but, obſerving it took with the houſe, they did not preſume to do it openly, but by this artful motion, "That the clauſe ſhould be approved, tho' not as was propoſed, engroſſed with the body of the act for a treaty, but a reſolve of the houſe paſſed, that, after the act were finiſhed, the houſe would immediately proceed to conſider, whether the clauſe ſhould be of force by a particular act, or by an order of the houie;" and the queſtion being ſtated, "Add the clauſe to the act or by a ſeparate way," the latter was carried. By this the courtiers were ſure of having a treaty, for, if the clauſe was turned into an act at the cloſe of the ſeſſion (when they had no more to require of the parliament) they might grant the royal aſſent to the act of treaty, or refuſe it to this, as they ſhould be directed from England: And in caſe the clauſe was turned into an order of the houſe, then they might diſſolve the parliament, by which means the act empowering the commiſſioners to treat, remained in force, and the order ceaſed. Before the vote was ſtated, upon the act for a treaty, the duke of Athol, on the firſt of September entered his proteſt in theſe terms; "In regard, that by an Engliſh act of parliament made in the laſt ſeſſion thereof, entitled, 'An act for the effectual ſecuring England from the dangers, that may ariſe from the ſeveral acts lately paſſed in Scotland,' the ſubjects of this kingdom are to be adjudged aliens, born out of the allegiance of the queen, as queen of England, after the 25th of December, 1705; I do therefore proteſt for myſelf, and in the name and behalf of all ſuch, as ſhall adhere to this my proteſtation, that, for ſaving the honour and intereſt of her majeſty, as queen of this kingdom, and maintaining and preſerving the undoubted rights and privileges of her ſubjects, no act for a treaty with England ought to paſs in this houſe, unleſs a clauſe be adjected thereto, prohibiting and diſcharging the commiſſioners, that may be nominated and appointed for carrying on the ſaid treaty, to depart the kingdom, in order thereto, until the ſaid act be repealed and reſcinded by the parliament of England." To this proteſt moſt of the cavaliers and country-party, and all the Squadrone adhered, making in all twenty-four peers, thirty-ſeven barons, and eighteen boroughs. While the rolls were calling, upon this reſolve (it being very late) many of the members, after they had given their votes, went out of the houſe, expecting, that the parliament would not have proceeded to any more buſineſs that night; but immediately after the laſt name in the roll was called, duke Hamilton, addreſſing himſelf to the chancellor, moved, that the nomination of the commiſſioners for the treaty ſhould be left wholly to the queen. Upon this unexpected motion fourteen or fifteen of the cavaliers ran out of the houſe in rage and deſpair, ſaying aloud, "That it was to no purpoſe to ſtay any longer, ſince the duke of Hamilton had deſerted and ſo baſely betrayed them." However thoſe, who remained, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the motion; and a hot debate aroſe upon it, wherein the cavaliers uſed the very arguments, which duke Hamilton had often urged; "What! leave the nomination to the queen? No: ſhe is in a manner a priſoner in England; and the eſtates of Scotland had taught us our duty in a caſe nearly related to this, during the captivity of king James the firſt. Our queen knows none of us, but as introduced by her Engliſh miniſtry, and recommended by our inclinations to ſerve that kingdom. Our queen never had an opportunity to know the true intereſt of our country; and though ſhe did, yet in her preſent circumſtances, cannot ſhew her regard for it: And who then ſo proper to nominate Scots commiſſioners to treat of Scots affairs as a Scots parliament?" Little or nothing was offered in anſwer either to theſe arguments, or againſt the motion, "That no perſon, who had any eſtate in England, ſhould be of the number of the commiſſioners:" Which was levelled at the duke of Hamilton. But the courtiers ſtill inſiſting, that the ſenſe of the houſe might be known in this matter, the queſtion was put, "Whether the nomination of the commiſſioners be left in the queen, or to the parliament?" And by reaſon of the abſence of the members before-mentioned, it was carried for the queen by a majority of eight voices only. Duke Hamilton's proceeding in this affair was highly reſented by the cavaliers; but he endeavoured to vindicate himſelf, by alledging, That after the parliament had rejected the ſeveral clauſes, that were propoſed to be added to the act, he thought it in vain to contend any longer; and ſince the court would have had a majority, to give the nomination to the queen, he might be allowed to make her the compliment. Beſides, it was the duke's opinion, that, if the commiſſioners named by the queen ſhould do any thing that ſhould not be approved in the ſubſequent parliament, they might be the more ſeverely cenſured for it, than if the parliament had named them. But it is thought that the duke had a mind to be one of the commiſſioners himſelf; and fearing, that he ſhould not be named by the parliament, he reſolved to rely upon the duke of Argyle's and the earl of Mar's promiſe of his being named by the queen; who having refuſed to do ſo, the duke of Argyle reſented it ſo far, that he would not ſuffer himſelf to be named, and even threatened to oppoſe the union, though means were afterwards found to induce him to alter his mind.

In the next ſitting of the parliament, on the 4th of September, two draughts of an addreſs were preſented, one by the Earl of Sutherland, the other by Fletcher of Salton, beſeeching her Majeſty to uſe her endeavours with the parliament of England to reſcind that part of the Engliſh act, declaring the ſubjects of Scotland to be aliens; both which draughts were read, as was alſo the overture of an act, ordaining, that the commiſſioners on the part of Scotland ſhould not enter upon the treaty of an union with England, until that clauſe were repealed. Hereupon the courtiers moved, that the parliament ſhould proceed by way of order to their commiſſioners, and by addreſs to her Majeſty, and not by way of act; and, after ſome debate, the queſtion being put, was carried for the order and addreſs, which were immediately drawn up, and unanimouſly agreed to. Then an overture of an act was preſented, 'diſcharging the peers of Scotland, without leave of the privy-council;' but, on the 6th of September, after a firſt reading of this overture, it was rejected. After this, the houſe conſidered the act for a treaty with England, and made ſome amendments to the clauſe containing the powers to be given to the commiſſioners. The cavaliers took this occaſion to renew the motion, "that an union ſhould not derogate from any fundamental laws, ancient privileges, offices, rights and dignities, and liberties of the kingdom of Scotland;" but, after ſome debate, the queſtion being put, whether that clauſe ſhould be added, it was carried in the negative, and then the act was approved, and received the royal aſſent. However, the duke of Athol proteſted againſt it, for the reaſons contained in his former proteſt, and was adhered to by twenty noblemen, thirty-three barons, and eighteen boroughs. Two days after, the act for granting the queen a ſupply of ſix months ceſs, amounting to four hundred and thirty-two thouſand, eight hundred pounds (Scots money) for maintaining the army, garriſons, and frigates for one year, was approved. On the 18th of September, the houſe went upon the public accounts, and allowed to the commiſſioners of the ſame two hundred pounds Sterling each; fifty pounds to the clerk, and twenty pounds to other ſervants; and fifteen hundred pounds to lord Belhaven; three hundred pounds to the duke of Queenſberry, and three thouſand pounds to the duke of Argyle, as being due to him; which ſums were paid out of the fifty thouſand pounds Sterling granted to the queen. After which, the parliament was adjourned to the 20th of December following [z].

Not long after the adjournment, the earl of Mar, who, during the whole ſeſſion, had done conſiderable ſervice to the [z] On the 16th of Auguſt, it was moved and reſolved, that Mr. James Anderſon, writer to her majeſty's ſignet, having written a book entitled, 'An Hiſtorical Eſſay ſhewing that the Crown and Kingdom of Scotland, are imperial and independent,' have a reward of four thouſand eight hundred pounds Scots money for that good ſervice; and that the thanks of the parliament be given him by the lord chancellor in preſence of the lord high commiſſioner; which was done accordingly. It was alſo moved and reſolved, that Mr. James Hodges, who in his writings had ſerved the intereſts of the Scots, court, was made ſecretary of ſtate in the room of the marquis of Annandale, who was appointed lord preſident of the council in Scotland, and who was removed from the poſt of ſecretary, becauſe he was thought to hold a private correſpondence with the Squadrone, being rather inclined to favour the proteſtant ſucceſſion without, than with an union; and therefore would not follow the duke of Queenberry's dictates further than he pleaſed; upon which account, he was much careſſed by the cavaliers.

Having thus given a full relation of the parliamentary affairs of this year, it is now time to turn to the progreſs of the war.

The duke of Marlborough, having delivered the empire by the victory at Blenheim, had long conſidered how to improve that ſucceſs; and, having communicated his ſeveral projects to the cabinet council, none ſeemed ſo judiciouſly laid, as the making an impreſſion upon the frontiers of France. The deſign therefore was, that the Moſelle ſhould be the ſcene of action; and care was taken to lay up magazines of all ſorts in Triers for that purpoſe. To carry on this deſign, two things were abſolutely neceſſary; firſt, the concurrence of the Dutch, who ſeemed unwilling to let their troops go ſo far from their frontiers, leſt they ſhould loſe, in one campaign, the barrier, which they had been forming in two or three; and, ſecondly, the quickening the ſlowneſs of the Germans, without whoſe joint aſſiſtance, the duke of Marlborough could not act there with probability of ſucceſs. The ſtates, however, conſented, that he ſhould carry the greateſt part of their army to the Moſelle, and reſolved to lie on the defenſive upon their own frontiers; for they reckoned, that, how ſtrong ſoever the elector of Bavaria's army was at that time, yet, when France ſhould be preſſed with ſo great a force, as they computed would be on the Moſelle, he would be ordered to ſend ſuch detachments thither, that his army would be ſoon diminiſhed, and ſo would not have the ſuperior ſtrength long.

This being the duke of Marlborough's ſcheme, he ſet out on the 26th of March 1705, from St. James's towards Harwich, where he embarked on the 30th, and landed in Holland on the 2d of April. Upon his arrival at the Hague, he had ſeveral conferences with the penſionary and other members of the aſſembly of the States General, in which he laid before them the great advantages, which would ariſe to the whole confederacy, from the vigorous proſecution of his deſign; which would deprive France of the means, either of enlarging her conqueſts in Piedmont, or of protecting Spain, by reducing her to the neceſſity of defending herſelf at home. The duke had likewiſe another motive, which concurred to put him upon theſe meaſures. The marſhal de Villars, lately made a duke of France, was the principal dependence of Lewis XIV: The duke therefore judged, that to triumph over and ruin the reputation of the marſhal, by a ſingle defeat, would be a ſervice to the common cauſe preferable to all others. The conſequence of ſuch a defeat would have been the ſubmiſſion of the three biſhoprics; after which, nothing could have prevented his making himſelf maſter of Thionville, and even of Luxemburgh itſelf.

The Dutch were ſoon made ſenſible of the reaſonableneſs of the duke's plan; but the difficulty was to bring prince Lewis of Baden to concur in it. That prince had ſeemed to approve of it ſo well, during the winter, that no doubt was then made of his being both able and willing to enter upon this new ſcene of the war. But, as the duke of Marlborough was ſetting out, depending on his concurrence, he received an expreſs from him, excuſing himſelf, both from his own want of health, and becauſe the force he had about him was not conſiderable, nor was that, which he expected, like to come to him ſo ſoon as might be wiſhed for. This could not ſtop the duke of Marlborough, who had ſet his heart upon opening the campaign in thoſe parts, and had great hopes of ſucceſs. He reſolved therefore to puſh the affair as far as he could, and accordingly went to confer with the prince at Raſtadt, where he arrived on the 19th of May. The prince's ill health ſeemed only a pretence. It was true, that the princes and circles of the empire had not ſent in their quotas; but it appeared, that there was already ſtrength enough, in conjunction with the army, which the duke of Marlborough was to bring, to advance, and open the campaign with great advantage, at leaſt till detachments ſhould come from other parts. The prince of Baden at laſt conſented to this, and promiſed to follow with all the forces he could bring.

The duke, being ſatisfied with theſe aſſurances, went from Raſtadt, on the 22d of May, to view the lines of Biehl and Stolhoffen, from whence he proceeded to Manheim, and then to Triers, where he arrived on the 26th, and having aſſembled all the troops in the neighbourhood of that place, the Engliſh and Dutch forces, which were encamped near Igel on the other ſide of the Moſelle, paſſed that river, on the 3d of June, over ſeveral bridges, and from thence marched to thoſe prepared for them over the Saar, which river they paſſed alſo at Conſaarbruck. The Heſſians, Danes, and Lunenburghers paſſed the Saar at the ſame time, and ſo all the forces joined. After a difficult march of near eight hours, they at laſt advanced within a quarter of a league of Sirk, near which place marſhal Villars was encamped with a numerous army. It being too late to encamp, the troops lay on their arms all that night. The next morning they encamped at Elſt, the right being at Perle near Sirk on the Moſelle, and the left at Hollondorp within ſight of the enemy's army. Upon the appearance of the allies the day before, the enemy immediately prepared for a retreat, which they now put in execution with great precipitation, and marched from Sirk towards Coningſmacheren, poſſeſſing themſelves of a very advantageous camp, which they made yet ſtronger by caſting up entrenchments, and felling trees; ſo that there was no poſſibility of attacking them in that poſt with the leaſt probability of ſucceſs. This indeed was no diſappointment to the duke, for he did not deſign to attack them; and his advancing ſo far was only to cover the intended ſiege of Saar-Louis. The taking of that place was of ſo great importance, that the ſucceſs of the whole campaign on that ſide depended on it; and, time being very precious, the duke diſpatched frequent expreſſes to quicken the march, not only of the imperialiſts, but of the Wirtemberghers, Pruſſians, and Palatines, and to exhort the princes, who had promiſed to furniſh artillery, horſes, and waggons, to ſend them with all poſſible expedition. His requeſts, though ſeconded by thoſe of the States General, were however to little purpoſe. Some imperial troops were indeed detached from Lauterberg for the Moſelle, but they kept ſo truly to their own uſual pace, and marched ſo ſlowly, that, inſtead of being on the Saar the 9th or 10th of June, N. S. as they ſhould have been, they were not arrived on the 20th, nor were there either horſes or artillery provided. Prince Lewis of Baden, who had promiſed to come in perſon, came indeed as far as Creutznach, and then, falling ſick, took an opportunity to go to the wells of Schwalbach and the bath at Schlangenbade, leaving theſe forces under the command of the count de Frieze. Thus his former excuſe of want of health and force was repeated, not without ſhrewd ſuſpicions of treachery; for it appeared plainly, that the French knew what he intended to do, and their management ſhewed they depended on it, becauſe they ordered no detachments to augment Villars's army. The duke of Wirtemberg made a little more haſte with four thouſand men in the pay of the States, and the Pruſſians arrived before the grand army was obliged to decamp.

In the mean time the enemy, on the 28th of May, inveſted Huy with a detachment under the command of count de Gaſſe; and, on the 10th of June, the caſtle ſurrendered, the garriſon being made priſoners of war. After this the elector of Bavaria and marſhal de Villeroy, being willing to make the beſt uſe of the duke of Marlborough's abſence, marched with their army towards Liege, and reſolved to form the ſiege of that place. This diſagreeable news had no ſooner reached the duke's army, but he received a letter from the States, wherein they repreſented to him "the loſs of Huy; the ſiege of Liege, which was begun; the threats of the elector and marſhal de Villeroy, that they would recover the former conqueſts of the allies; the neceſſity, which there was to make a powerful diverſion to oppoſe their enterprizes; and, if that could not be done on the Moſelle, the States deſired him to return with his army towards the Maeſe." The duke perceiving, that the delay of the German troops would render the ſiege of Saar-Louis abortive; the difficulty of ſubſiſting a numerous army in a ruined country; and the impracticableneſs of attacking marſhal Villars, who, beſides his ſuperiority of troops, was poſted in an inacceſſible camp, reſolved at laſt to march to the relief of Liege. He decamped, on the 17th of June, and moved towards Triers, where it was reſolved in a council of war, that the forces, under his command, ſhould march back to the Maeſe, except ſeven thouſand Palatines in the pay of England and Holland, who were left for the ſecurity of Triers, and other poſts on that ſide, under the command of lieutenant-general Aubach. In purſuance of this reſolution, the duke, after having ſpent ſome weeks in this fruitleſs attempt, marched for the Netherlands by the ſhorteſt way, very much mortified at the ill uſage he had received; and the imperial troops, the Pruſſians, and Wirtembergers, moved towards the Upper Rhine.

Scots nation, ſhould have the like reward. But on the other hand, complaint being made of a book intitled, 'The ſuperiority and direct dominion of the imperial crown of England over the kingdom of Scotland,' and alſo of the pamphlet, intitled, the 'Scots patriot unmaſked,' both written by Mr. William Atwood, as ſcurrilous, full of falſhoods, and reflecting upon the honour and independency of the Scots nation; the ſame were ordered to be burnt by the hand of the common hangman.

The prince of Baden's conduct, throughout this whole affair, was liable to great cenſure, and he was ſuſpected to have been corrupted by the French; while thoſe, who did not carry their ſuſpicions ſo far, attributed his acting as he did to his pride; and thought, that he, envying the duke of Marlborough, and apprehending, that the whole glory of the campaign would be aſcribed to him, choſe rather to defeat the whole deſign, than to ſee another carry away the chief honour of any ſucceſſes, that might have happened.

Marſhal Villars, having now no enemy before him, ſent a detachment to reinforce the elector of Bavaria, and another for the army under marſhal de Marſin in Alſace, and advanced with the reſt towards the Saar. Upon the firſt notice of which, the Palatine general ſent orders to the governor of Saarbruck to quit the caſtle, and blow up the fortifications, which he accordingly performed. And to compleat the ill conduct of the Germans, on the 25th of June (even before the enemy appeared in ſight) he deſtroyed all the magazines at Triers, blew up the fortifications, burnt the boats deſigned to make bridges, and in a diſhonourable manner quitted that important poſt, which had coſt the allies immenſe ſums of money. The enemy immediately took poſſeſſion of the place, and Villars marched to join de Marſin, and with him drove the imperialiſts from the lines of Croon-Weyſſenburg; and general Thungen found it very difficult to maintain himſelf in the lines of Lauterburg. Theſe unpardonable miſmanagements obliged the duke of Marlborough to ſend colonel Durel, one of his aids de camp, to repreſent the whole matter to the emperor.

In the mean time, the duke, by his diligent march, arrived time enough to ſave the citadel of Liege; ſo that the face of affairs was immediately changed in the Netherlands; for the enemy, upon advice of his approach, ſent back their artillery to Namur, and retired in great precipitation to Tongeren. On the other hand, the duke, continuing his march, arrived at Maeſtricht on the 27th of June, and, having taken meaſures with monſieur Auverquerque and the other generals to march towards the enemy, they decamped for that purpoſe; but the French thought fit to prevent them, and retired from Tongeren nearer to their lines. On the 2d of July, the duke paſſed the Maeſe, and advanced to Haneff, while the forces under monſieur Auverquerque marched at the ſame time to Theys upon the Jaar. The enemy, having notice of this march, decamped in haſte, and, as it were, fled into their lines, having ſent away moſt of their heavy baggage the day before.

The French having thus ſecured themſelves within their lines, the confederate generals thought fit to undertake the ſiege of Huy, before they proceeded further; and, to that end, made a detachment under general Scholten, to inveſt that place on the 6th of July, while the duke of Marlborough and monſieur Auverquerque made each a ſmall motion to cover the ſiege. Two days after, the batteries began to play againſt fort Picard; and, the diſpoſitions being made for attacking it, the allies ſoon made themſelves maſters of the covered way, and were reſolutely climbing up the fort, which the enemy perceiving, fled into the caſtle, having quitted the Red Fort two hours before. The next day, July the 11th, a battery was brought to play againſt the caſtle, and another was erected in fort St. Joſeph; ſo that, a conſiderable breach being made, the enemy beat a parley, and demanded to march out, and be conducted to Namur; which being refuſed, they ſurrendered upon the ſame conditions, as had been granted to the Dutch two months before, the governor and garriſon being made priſoners of war. The garriſon conſiſted of five hundred men, commanded by monſieur de St. Pierre, a brigadier-general in the French ſervice; beſides whom, there was a governor appointed by the elector of Cologne. They marched out of the place on the 12th, to the number of four hundred and fifty men, beſides the ſick and wounded, and were conducted to Maeſtricht.

After the reduction of Huy, the duke of Marlborough was reſolved to undertake ſome more conſiderable action; and, as nothing appeared more advantageous in its conſequence, than the attacking the enemy's lines, he ſent general Hompeſch to propoſe it to the States-general, who returned anſwer, "That, having an entire confidence in his conduct and prudence, they left it entirely to him to do whatever he ſhould think fit, for the good of the common cauſe." Upon this, the duke held a general council of war, wherein that undertaking was debated; but, nothing being concluded the firſt time, a ſecond council was called, when ſome of the Dutch generals oppoſed it; but monſieur Auverquerque, the prince of Heſſe, count de Noyelles, and ſome others, gave unanſwerable reaſons, why it ought to be undertaken: ſo the attack was reſolved upon.

The enemy were poſted along their lines with near a hundred battalions, and a hundred and forty-ſix ſquadrons; and the allies having ninety-two battalions, and a hundred and ſixty ſquadrons, the two armies were pretty near equal. It was reſolved therefore to make a feint, to divide the enemy's forces; and, accordingly, the army under monſieur Auverquerque made a motion on the other ſide of the Mehaigne, and the duke of Marlborough made another at the ſame time, as if he intended to ſupport him in the attack of the lines about Meſſelen, where they were not ſo ſtrong as in other parts. This ſtratagem ſucceeded to the wiſhes of the two generals; for theſe motions, particularly the paſſing the Mehaigne, gave great jealouſy to the French, ſo that they beſtowed their chief attention on that ſide. Whereupon the duke made the following diſpoſition, in order to march with the whole army, in the night, between the 17th and 18th of July.

Lieutenat-general Scholten having rejoined the army with ten battalions and ten ſquadrons only, thirteen ſquadrons more out of the right of the duke's ſecond line were added to them; and five of thoſe ſquadrons were given to colonel Chanclos, who, being perfectly acquainted with the lines and the nature of the ground, was ordered to march at the head of all. Eleven battalions, and all the horſe of the right wing of the duke's army, to the number of twenty-four ſquardons, were alſo detached, in order to march at the head of the firſt line; and thoſe two detachments were to be commanded by count Noyelles, general of the infantry, having under him the lieutenant-generals Lumley, Hompeſch, Scholten, and count d'Ooſt Friſe; the major-generals Wood, Roſs, Erbach, Welderen, prince of Heſſe-Homburg, and Weeck; and the brigadiers Hey, Palmo, Baldwin, Sacken, Gravendorf, Poſorn, Meredith, and Hamilton.

On the 17th about four in the afternoon, the duke gave orders for the whole army to get ready to march; that all the baggage ſhould aſſemble at ſix near Tourine, behind the the camp, under the guard of a colonel with four thouſand foot, and a hundred horſe; that, at nine in the evening, count Noyelles ſhould advance with the two bodies abovementioned, filing off by their right, that which aſſembled before their firſt line to the left, and that of lieutenant-general Scholten to the right, marching through the route, which the guides would ſhew them, directly towards Wangen and Elixheim, which two poſts they were to attack, if the poſture of the enemy would permit. That the duke's army ſhould march likewiſe at ten o'clock, following the ſame route, which the two detachments took: That the artillery ſhould move at the ſame time on the right of the army: That monſieur Auverquerque's artillery ſhould follow the ſame way: That, an hour before the army marched, all the horſe of the left wing of the duke's army ſhould move along the two lines, and repair to the right of the infantry: That at the ſame time the body of horſe commanded by the earl of Albemarle ſhould advance forwards from their camp: That monſieur Auverquerque's army ſhould repaſs the Mehaigne over the twelve bridges made there for that purpoſe, and ſhould join, with the right of his foot, the left of the duke's army: That, when monſieur Auverquerque ſhould begin to move, he ſhould detach a party of dragoons towards Gerbiſe, to give the alarm in the enemy's line on that ſide; and that the detachment commanded by the lord Albemarle ſhould bring up the rear of all. This diſpoſition being made, and the gun, which is uſually fired for the tattoo, being now the ſignal for taking down the tents, the two armies began their march between ten and eleven in the evening, filing off by their right in two columns, leaving Cortis, Montenaken, Houtein, and St. Gertruydenland, to their right; and the villages Troyne, Cras, Auvergne, Baudwin, Reitſhoven, Over-Winden, and Neer-Winden, to their left; and marching directly towards their line, where the two firſt detachments were to attempt to force their paſſage at Elixheim, the caſtle of Wangh, and the villages of Wangh, Neer-heſpen, and Ooſtmalen.

The darkneſs of the night ſomewhat puzzled the guides, who conducted theſe detachments, ſo that it was half an hour paſt four in the morning, and broad day, before they came near the abovementioned poſts, which, according to information, were found to be but thinly guarded. Count Noyelles elles cauſed the caſtle of Wangh, which defended a ſtone-bridge, that was there on the Geete, to be attacked; but the French immediately abandoned that poſt, and gave an opportunity to the grenadiers, who were ordered on that ſervice, to march forwards, and attack the barrier of that line, which the guards did not defend much better than the other had done the caſtle, and ſo the troops entered the line on that ſide with little or no oppoſition, although the enemy had twelve ſquadrons of dragoons encamped behind Ooſtmalen (within a cannon-ſhot of the place, where the firſt detachment entered) who immediately mounted their horſes, but durſt not advance to defend their barriers. At the ſame time three battalions poſſeſſed themſelves of the bridge and village of Heiliſheim, a quarter of a league from Wangh on the left, which was done with as little oppoſition. Nor did lieutenant-general Scholten meet with greater reſiſtance at the villages of Over-heſpen and Neer-heſpen, ſo that, being maſters of thoſe bridges and barriers, and having made ſeveral other bridges, the horſe went over them, and immediately ranged themſelves in order on the eminence, extending their right towards the village of Hackendoren, and ſome battalions drew up along the line, and behind the horſe.

While the pioneers were buſy in making paſſages through the line, ten of the enemy's ſquadrons, and four battalions, were perceived between the villages of Gouchancourt and Eſtmale; but they gave time to the confederate forces to extend themſelves, endeavouring only to advance to the village of Elixheim. Count Noyelles cauſed all the troops, which he had with him, to go over as faſt as poſſible; and thereupon, the duke of Marlborough arriving with his whole army, his cavalry went over the line with extraordinary expedition, as the reſt had done, and ſo they all made up towards the enemy, who by this time were reinforced to the number of fifty ſquadrons and twenty battalions, and advanced with great reſolution behind the hollow way, that goes from Elixheim to Tirlemont. This obliged the confederate horſe to make a ſtand a few minutes, till ſome battalions advancing lined the hollow way, and, firing upon the enemy's horſe, obliged them to retire out of the reach of their muſkets, and to form themſelves before their infantry, which gave an opportunity for the confederate horſe to paſs the hollow way. In the mean time, the French cauſed eight pieces of cannon with treble barrels to advance, with which they made a terrible fire on the confederate horſe. But, the duke of Marlborough being come in perſon at the head of freſh ſquadrons, and ſeeing, that the enemy were continually receiving reinforcements, and that their infantry was going to join them, he reſolved to charge them with horſe only; which was done with that ardour and courage, that, the cavalry of the two crowns being ſoon broken and put to flight, they went to rally themſelves behind their infantry, whilſt his victorious horſe poſſeſſed themſelves of the cannon and ammunition-waggons. The enemy, being joined with ſome ſquadrons, and having interlined ſome battalions with them, moved again towards the confederates; but the latter, being likewiſe reinforced, and ſuſtained by their infantry, made advances to receive them.

The right of the confederate horſe, coming too near the hedges of the village of Eſtmale, which were lined with French and Bavarian foot, were ſomewhat diſordered by their fire, and obliged to ſhrink back. But, having ſoon after extended themſelves more towards the right, to make way for ſome battalions, that marched againſt the enemy's foot, they both charged with that bravery and briſkneſs, that the enemy's horſe was ſoon defeated and cut in pieces, and their infantry, left alone in the plain, with great difficulty got away in diſorder between the villages of Heiliſheim and Gerſhoven, where they met with the reſt of the army, and formed themſelves as well as they could. In the mean time the duke of Marlborough cauſed all the reſt of the troops to enter the lines, and extended the right of his army towards the Great Geete before Tirlemont, in which town they took the battalion of Monluc, which, upon the firſt ſummons, ſurrendered at diſcretion.

In this action the marquis d' Alegre and count de Horne, lieutenant-generals, a major-general, two brigadiers, and ſeveral other officers of all ranks, beſides abundance of private-men, were made priſoners. All the troops of the allies behaved themſelves with great bravery and reſolution; but, amongſt the horſe, the regiment of brigadier Cadogan diſtinguiſhed themſelves, having had the honour to charge firſt, which they did with ſuch ſucceſs, that they defeated four ſquadrons of Bavarian guards, drove them through two battalions of their own foot, and took four ſtandards, and all this with the loſs of lieutenant Auſtin and ſome few men. Nor was the loſs of the other troops greater in proportion. The duke of Marlborough, having very much expoſed himſelf in the action, was in great danger of his life; for, as he was leading on ſeveral ſquadrons, a French or Bavarian officer quitted his poſt, and advanced ſword in hand to attack him; but, as he was raiſing himſelf upon his ſtirrups to reach him, he fell off his horſe, and was preſently killed. The Bavarian horſe, which conſiſted of twenty-four ſquadrons, offering to oppoſe the confederates, was almoſt entirely ruined; as were likewiſe the two regiments of Alſace and la Marque.

The body of troops, commanded by monſieur d' Alegre, being thus defeated, the elector of Bavaria and marſhal de Villeroy conſulted for the ſafety of the reſt of the army; and decamping in ſight of the confederates, paſſed the Geete and the Dyle with all imaginable diligence, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the ſtrong camp at Park, with their left at Rooſelaer, and their right againſt the height of Louvain at Wineſelen. From thence the elector wrote to the baron of Malknecht, his favourite, in this manner: "Dear baron, God forgive thoſe, who ſuffered themſelves to be ſurprized. The whole army is here, and the evil is not ſo great as to be paſt remedy. The country of Brabant may be ſaved, as well as Antwerp, if it pleaſe God. I am well, but exceedingly fatigued."

On the other hand the duke of Marlborough's army paſſed the Great Geete, and encamped with the right at Roſbeeck, and the left behind Tirlemont, and that of monſieur Auverquerque extended itſelf with the right to Grain, and the left to Elixheim. The next day the confederate army moved, and in their march took about one thouſand two hundred priſoners, who could not follow the precipitate march of the enemy; and encamped the ſame evening within cannon ſhot of Louvain.

But though by this ſucceſs the enemy were forced to abandon Dieſt, Sichem, Arſchot, and ſome other ſmall places; yet the ſuffering them to poſſeſs themſelves of the ſtrong poſt of Park was thought a very great overſight. Some will have it, that the troops were too much fatigued to march to that camp the ſame day after the action; while others pretend, that ſome of the Dutch generals were againſt it. The duke afterwards endeavoured to force ſome paſs upon the Dyle, but, not ſucceeding, he marched from thence to Meldert, and ſent the baron de Hompeſch to propoſe a new project to the States General, who approved of it by directions to their deputies in the army, to make two or three marches without calling a council of war, to favour the deſign formed by the duke. To countenance that expedition, baron Spaar, who commanded a ſmall body of Dutch troops in Flanders, marched from Riemen with all his grenadiers, and a ſufficient number of fuſileers to ſupport them, being followed by the reſt of the forces under his command, and in his march defeated a party of French troops. He came in the night to Reboth on the canal, that goes from Bruges to Ghent, where his men made a bridge and paſſed over it, although the enemy had a guard there, who pretended to make ſome oppoſition. After this he attacked their lines, which were defended by ſeveral forts, forced them ſword in hand at Lovendegen, and, in leſs than three quarters of an hour, took poſſeſſion of four of theſe forts, and made ſeveral officers, with three hundred private men, priſoners at diſcretion. He then marched towards Bruges, but, having intelligence, that the enemy were advancing towards him with a ſuperior force, which they had drawn out of ſeveral garriſons in the French and Spaniſh Flanders, he thought fit to retire, carrying away with him ſeveral hoſtages, for the ſecurity of the payment of contributions; and having burnt the paliſadoes, houſes, and Corps de guard, along the French lines, thrown the cannon, he found there, into the canal, and deſtroyed all the ammunition.

The duke of Marlborough, having left two battalions at Tirlemont, and as many at Dieſt, for the ſecurity of theſe places, marched with his army from Meldert, and encamped at Corbais; the Dutch forces, under the command of Auverquerque, advancing at the ſame time to St. Martin's. The next day the two armies continued their march to Genap, and there united into one body: and the day following advanced to Fiſchermont, the right being at Hulpen, and the left at Braine la Leu; general Churchill being detached at the head of the line with twenty battalions and as many ſquadrons. In that day's march, Auverquerque cauſed one of the poſts of the enemy, called Waterlo, defended by brigadier Paſteur, with two regiments of dragoons and as many many battalions of foot, to be attacked by a detachment commanded by lieutenant general Dompre, who drove the enemy from that poſt, and purſued them about a league in the wood of Soignies.

This ſudden march of the confederates kept the enemy in great apprehenſions and gave them an equal fear for ſome places in Brabant and Flanders. However, upon the duke of Marlborough's advancing from Ghent to Hulpen, the elector of Bavaria and the marſhal de Villeroy only ſtretched out their right to Over-Yſche near the wood of Soignies, and kept ſtill their left, at Neer-Yſche, with the little river Yſche before them, by which means they covered both Bruſſels and Louvain.

On the 18th of Auguſt, by break of day, the confederate army filed off with the right wing in two columns, and paſſed the long narrow road of Hulpen, where they were not a little ſurprized to find no enemy to defend that difficult paſs. About noon, the whole army was drawn up in ſight of the enemy, whom the duke of Marlborough and monſieur Auverquerque having viewed, they were both of opinion to attack them immediately, before they had time to recover the conſternation, which was apparent enough in their army. But the artillery not being yet come up, through the fault (as it was ſaid) of general Sclangenburg, and that general, who had reſented the duke's having undertaken the attack of the lines without his conſent or privity, having perſuaded ſome other Dutch commanders to join with him, they made a report to the deputies of the States, that the enterprize was neither adviſeable nor practicable; whereupon the deputies abſolutely refuſed to conſent to it. The duke ſubmitted, though with great reluctance, as apears from the expoſtulatory letter, which he wrote to the States General upon the occaſion, wherein he informed them, "That his heart was ſo full, that he could not forbear to repreſent to their high-mightineſſes, that he found he had much leſs authority here, than when he had the honour of commanding their troops the laſt year in Germany."

This letter, being made public at rhe Hague, occaſioned great murmurings among the people; and a great breach was like to ariſe both in the army and in the towns of Holland, particularly in Amſterdam, where the burghers came in a body to the Stadthouſe, complaining of the deputies, and that the duke of Marlborough had not fuller powers. On the other hand, the deputies endeavoured to juſtify their conduct by a letter, which they wrote to the States General, in which they repreſented, that the generals Sclangenburg, Zalich, and Dompre were of opinion, "That the attacking the enemy in their poſts would be attended with the greateſt difficulty and hazard to the common cauſe, alledging, that, conſidering the enemy could not be attacked but with the greateſt diſadvantage on the ſide of the confederates, the latter, in caſe of a defeat, would be reduced to the greateſt ſtraits imaginable, partly, becauſe, being ſo far advanced into the enemy's country, they ſhould neither have had places nor hoſpitals to ſend their wounded men to; and partly, becauſe, in ſuch a caſe, the enemy might eaſily have cut off their convoys of bread: In ſhort, that the affairs of the allies and the republic, juſtly weighed, were not yet reduced to ſuch a condition, as to attempt ſo deſperate a work."

All indeed agreed, that the enterprize was bold and doubtful; ſome thought it muſt have ſucceeded, though with ſome loſs at firſt; and, that if it had ſucceeded, it might have proved a deciſive action: Others, on the contrary, looked on it as too deſperate. Thus the military men were of different opinions in this point, ſome juſtifying the duke of Marlborough as much as others cenſured him. He ſhewed great temper on this occaſion; and though it gave him a very ſenſible trouble, yet he ſet himſelf to calm all the heat that was raiſed upon it.

The duke of Marlborough's project being thus defeated, the confederate army marched to Lower-Waveren, where, having reſted one day, they returned to Corbais; and monſieur Auverquerque's army came at the ſame time to mount St. Hubert. Four days after, both armies marched and encamped together, with the right near la Ramee, and the left at Perwitz. A few days after, a detachment was made under the command of lieutenant-general Dedem, to beſiege Soute-Leuwe [a], a little town in a moraſs, and the chief defence of the enemies lines. On the 4th of September, the governor deſired to capitulate, and ſent out a major to Dedem, with propoſals, upon which he was willing to ſurrender the place. The general would admit of no other terms, than the garriſon being priſoners of war, which was conſented to; provided that the officers might march out with their ſwords, and ſave their baggage; which being communicated to the duke of Marlborough, monſieur Auverquerque, and the deputies of the States, it was allowed; and, on the 5th, two hundred men of the confederate troops took poſſeſſion of the town and citadel, without having fired one gun. On the 7th, the garriſon marched out, in order to be conducted to Maeſtricht; together with brigadier-general du Mont, their governor, and monſieur de Mers, the lieutenant du Roy. There were found in the place ten pieces of braſs, and eight of iron cannon, and two braſs mortars; with a great number of bombs, ten thouſand grenadoes, two hundred barrels of powder, ſix thouſand tools of ſeveral kinds, two thouſand muſkets, a hundred barrels of muſket ſhot, eighteen thouſand ſacks of meal, beſides other proviſions and neceſſaries.

The confederate army having taken this place, the duke of Marlborough ordered the lines of the enemy to be levelled, and Tirlemont to be diſmantled; and having paſſed the Demer, encamped at Arſchot, where he continued ſome days, to give directions for the beginning and carrying on the fortifications of Dieſt, Haſſelt, Tongeren, and ſome other places. The army marched afterwards towards Herentals and Turnhout, where monſieur Buys, penſionary of Amſterdam, waited on the duke on the part of Holland and Weſt-Friesland, and had a long conference with him. He ſet out, a few days after, for the Hague, and left the army under the command of monſieur Auverquerque, which continued at Herentals till the 20th of October, when the duke being returned from the Hague (where he had ſpent ſome days to confer with the States upon the orders he had received from England to go to Vienna) they broke up, and removed to Oſtmaeel, whence they continued their march the next day to Brecht. During the march, fifty ſquadrons of the enemy came within muſket ſhot of the rear-guard of monſieur Auverquerque's army, and they put grenadiers into the villages of Herentals, Brumel, and Nyle, to ſupport thoſe ſquadrons; but they did not think fit to attack that general. They fell into Herentals, and plundered the waggons of about thirty ſuttlers, who ſtaid behind contrary to order; and, when monſieur Auverquerque's troops were employed in breaking down ſix bridges, over which they had paſſed the Neere, they fired briſkly upon them from their ramparts, and either killed or wounded above twenty men.

On the 24th of October, count Noyelles inveſted Santvliet with fifteen battalions and eight ſquadrons drawn out of Bergen-Op-Zoom, and other garriſons. On the 29th, two large breaches being made, monſieur Auverquerque gave orders, that all the grenadiers of the army, ſupported by three battalions of the garriſon of Bergen-Op-Zoom, ſhould be ready to attack the fort the next morning. But, that evening, the beſieged beat a parley, and count Noyelles having ſent word to the governor, that he, with his garriſon, muſt expect no other terms, than to be made priſoners of war; after ſome deliberation, he ſurrendered upon theſe conditions.

While the allies were engaged in the ſiege of Santvliet, the elector of Bavaria made a detachment, on the 24th of October, to ſurprize Dieſt, under the command of Don Marcello de Grimaldi; and, at the ſame time, ſent word to count d'Artagnan, governor of Louvain, to join them on the march with his garriſon. Whereupon, they unexpectedly appeared before the place; immediately ſecured all the avenues on each ſide the Demer, and ſent a trumpeter to ſummon the governor to ſurrender; which he refuſing, about eleven o'clock the Spaniſh troops attacked a ſmall fort on an eminence, and carried it with the loſs of thirty men killed or wounded. About two, all the Spaniſh, French, and Bavarian troops of the detachment, advanced ſword in hand, to make a general ſtorm; but the garriſon, not thinking fit to ſtand it, beat a parley, and ſurrendered priſoners of war; and, about five o'clock, the troops of the two crowns took poſſeſſion of the town. The garriſon conſiſted of four battalions, and a regiment of dragoons, and was commanded by brigadier Gaudecker, who, being carried priſoner to Bruſſels, ſent a relation of this misfortune to the States, concluding, "That he was extremely concerned, that, after thirty-four years ſervice, performed without the leaſt diſgrace or ſtain to his reputation, he ſhould be put into a place, where a man of honour was not capable of defending himſelf." In this manner ended the campaign in the Netherlands, which, by prince Lewis of Baden's backwardneſs, and the caution of the Dutch deputies, was leſs glorious than was expected:

[a] Soute-Leuwe is a little ſtrong town and caſtle of the Low-countries in the dukedom of Brabant. It ſtands in a moraſs almoſt inacceſſible, and was taken the preſent campaign by the confederates, after the glorious action of forcing the French lines. It ſtands on the river Gheet, by the borders of Liege, ſixteen miles almoſt eaſt of Louvain, twenty-one weſt of Maeſtricht, and twenty-four of Namur and Liege.

Druſenheim

For the duke of Marlborough was never known to ſet out ſo full of hopes, as in the beginning of it. But things had not anſwered his expectation.

With regard to the motions of the confederates on the Upper Rhine, the emperor, having expreſſed to colonel Durel his great diſſatisfaction at the fatal cauſes which had broke the duke of Marlborough's meaſures on the Moſelle, diſpatched immediately general Gronsfelt and Count Wells to prince Lewis of Baden, to expoſtulate the matter with him, in order to prevent the like miſmanagements for the future. The prince, finding his honour ſullied on that account, publiſhed a manifeſto, endeavouring to clear himſelf, which contained ſome reflections upon a particular perſon, and was induſtriouſly ſuppreſſed. In the mean time the Imperial army continued at Lauterburg, in which advantageous poſt marſhal Villars did not think fit to attack them. However, in the beginning of July, he advanced to Croon-Weiſſenburg, took part of the garriſon priſoners of war, and came in ſight of the Imperial army. They made ſome attacks, but found all the poſts ſo well guarded, that, after having conſumed the forage between Lauter and Landau, demoliſhed the walls of Croon-Weiſſenburg, and the lines about that place, they retired towards Hagenau. Soon after, the French not only raiſed the lines about Triers, but beſieged and took Homburg, the Palatines having ſurrendered that place upon articles.

Marſhal Villars, having paſſed the Rhine at Straſburg, on the 6th of Auguſt, obliged general Thungen to do the like with the Imperialiſts: and, on the 12th, prince Lewis of Baden arrived in the camp at Stolhoffen. The prince having taken a review of the army, and held a council of war, reſolved to advance in the night directly towards the enemy, who were very advantageouſly encamped. But marſhal Villars had no ſooner notice of his approach, but he retired under the cannon of Kehl, and, a few days after, repaſſed the Rhine. On the 22d, the prince of Baden repaſſed that river with his army, leaving the count de la Tour with twelve thouſand men to guard the lines of Stolhoffen; and, on the 28th, advanced in order to attack the lines of Hagenau, although they were ſtrongly guarded. The enemy at firſt made ſome reſiſtance; but the count de Merci with the horſe attacked them with that vigour, that he ſoon made himſelf maſter of their lines. After this, he perceived the enemy's whole army drawn up in order of battle; but the prince of Baden having notice of it, immediately reinforced him with two regiments of horſe, and advanced himſelf with part of the army to ſupport him, ſo that the French thought fit to retire. The Imperialiſts loſt no more than one lieutenant and ſixteen ſoldiers in forcing the lines, whereas the enemy had near four hundred killed or taken.

The imperial and French armies having been ſeveral times within ſight of one another, it was expected on both ſides, that an engagement would have enſued. But, prince Lewis being reinforced by ten battalions and twenty ſquadrons of the Pruſſian troops, marſhal Villars, on the 13th of September, thought fit to decamp in the night with the utmoſt privacy, and retire towards Straſburg. The ſame day nine ſquadrons and nine battalions, with a detachment of grenadiers under the command of count de Frize, were ordered to beſiege Druſenheim, a fortified place in Alſace [b]. The trenches were opened on the 19th, and the attacks were carried on with ſo much vigour, that the garriſon, conſiſting of about four hundred men, ſurrendered, on the 24th, priſoners of war. The confederates found in the place four hundred ſacks of meal, four pieces of cannon, four hundred muſkets, and twelve barrels of powder; and the taking of it gave an opportunity to the imperialiſts cloſely to block up Fort Louis. On the 28th, Hagenau [c] was inveſted by a ſtrong detachment, commanded by general Thungen, having under him the generals Erffa and Arnheim. The Poliſh infantry of the king of Pruſſia, and that of Wirtemberg, were employed in that ſiege, with twenty ſquadrons: And, though the place had a good counterſcarp, a large ditch full of water, and a ſtrong wall, yet the garriſon made but a ſlender reſiſtance, offering to ſurrender the 5th of October upon articles; but, none being allowed, but to be made priſoners of war, they reſolved to quit the place in the night, and retire to Savern. The place not being inveſted on that ſide, they put their deſign in execution, to the great diſſatisfaction of prince Lewis of Baden. The taking of Druſenheim and Hagenau enabled the Germans to ſecure their quarters on that ſide of the Rhine, and very much facilitated the projects of the enſuing campaign. Thus nothing was done by that noble army, under the prince of Baden, equal either to their numbers or ſtrength, or to the reputation, which he had formerly acquired. This was contrary to the general expectation; for it was thought, that, being at the head of ſo great an army, he would have ſtudied to ſignalize himſelf, if it had been but to rival the glory, which the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene had acquired.

The emperor Leopold V. died in May this year. He was the moſt knowing and the moſt virtuous prince of his communion; only he wanted the judgment, which was neceſſary for conducting great affairs in ſuch critical times. He was almoſt always betrayed; and yet he was firm to thoſe, who had the addreſs to inſinuate themſelves into his good opinion and confidence, that it was not poſſible to let him ſee thoſe miſcarriages, which ruined his affairs ſo often, and brought them ſometimes near the laſt extremities. Of theſe every body elſe ſeemed more ſenſible than he himſelf. He was devout and ſtrict in his religion, and was ſo implicit in his ſubmiſſion to thoſe prieſts, who had credit with him, and particularly the Jeſuits, that he owed all his troubles to their counſels. The perſecutions, they began in Hungary, raiſed one great war; which gave the Turks occaſion to beſiege Vienna, by which he was almoſt entirely ſwallowed up. This danger did not produce more caution: after the peace of Carlowitz, there was ſo much violence and oppreſſion in the government of Hungary, both of papiſts and proteſtants, that this raiſed another war there; which, in conjunction with the revolt of the elector of Bavaria, brought him a ſecond time very near utter ruin. Yet, he could not be prevailed upon, either to puniſh, or ſo much as ſuſpect thoſe, who had ſo fatally entangled his affairs, that without foreign aid nothing could have extricated him. He was naturally merciful to a fault; for even the puniſhment of criminals was uneaſy to him. Yet all the cruelty in the perſecution of heretics ſeemed to raiſe no relentings in him. It could not but be obſerved by all proteſtants, how much the ill influence of the popiſh religion appeared in him, who was one of the mildeſt and moſt virtuous princes of the age, ſince cruelty in the matters of religion had a full courſe under him, though it was as contrary to his natural temper as it was to his intereſt, and proved oftener than once almoſt fatal to all his affairs. His ſon Joſeph, elected king of the Romans, ſucceeded him both in his hereditary and elective dignities. It was given our, that he would apply himſelf much to buſineſs, and would avoid thoſe rocks, on which his father had ſtruck, and almoſt ſplit, and correct thoſe errors, to which his father's eaſineſs had expoſed him. He promiſed to thoſe miniſters, whom the queen and the States had in his court, that he would offer all reaſonable terms to the Hungarians; and he conſented to their ſetting on foot a treaty, in which they were to be the mediators, and become the guarantees for the obſervance of ſuch articles, as ſhould be agreed on; and he gave great hopes, that he would not continue in that ſubjection to the prieſts, to which his father had been captivated. He deſired to confer with the duke of Marlborough, and to concert all affairs with him. The queen conſented to this, and the duke ſet out from the army, and arrived on the 12th of November N. S. at Vienna, where he was treated with great freedom and confidence, and had all the aſſurances, that could be given him in words. He found, that the emperor was highly diſſatisfied with prince Lewis of Baden; but that prince had ſuch credit in the empire, eſpecially with the circles of Swabia and Franconia, that it was neceſſary to bear with that, which could not be helped. The duke of Marlborough returned through the hereditary dominions to Berlin, where he learned ſo perfectly to accommodate himſelf to the king of Pruſſia's temper, that he ſucceeded in every thing, that he propoſed, and renewed all treaties for one year longer. He went from thence to the court of Hanover, and there he gave them full aſſurances of the queen's adhering firmly to their intereſts, in maintaining the ſucceſſion to the crown in that family; with which the elector was fully ſatisfied; but it appeared the electreſs had a mind to be invited over into England. From thence he came back to the Hague, where having ſettled ſeveral important matters with the States General, particularly the taking ten thouſand men more into the pay of [b] Druſenheim is a fortified poſt in Alſace, through which the lines of Hagenau run towards the Rhine. It was taken by prince Lewis of Baden as above-mentioned, but ſince retaken by the French. It ſtands about a league weſt of the Rhine, four miles ſouth eaſt of Hagenau, eleven miles almoſt north from Straſburg, and ſix miles weſt of Stolhoffen.

[c] Hagenau is a city of Germany, in the circle of the Upper Rhine, and Lantgravedom of Alſatia, once imperial, but in an uncertain ſtate, ſince the taking of Landau by the Germans in 1702; for, in 1703, the French repoſſeſſed it, and, in 1704, drew lines by it, which prince Lewis of Baden forced this campaign, and took the town. It was retaken by the French in 1706. It ſtands on the river Matebrun, thirteen miles almoſt north of Straſburg, and as many weſt of Baden.

England and Holland, to reinforce prince Eugene's army in Italy, he returned to England, and arrived at St. James's on the 30th of December[d].

Prince Eugene encountered this year with great difficulties in Italy. He had a weak army, and it was both ill provided, and ill paid. He was long shut up within the country of Bergamo: at last he broke through Cusano, where there was a very hot action between him and the duke of Vendosme. Both sides pretended they had the victory, yet the duke repassed the river, and the imperialists kept the field of battle. The French threatened Turin with a siege; but they began with Chivas, which held out some months, and was at last abandoned. The duke de Feuillade commanded the army near Turin, and seemed to dispose every thing in order to a siege; but the design was turned upon Nice, though late in the year. That place made a brave resistance for many weeks, but in December was obliged to capitulate, and was demolished by the French.

The firmness, which the duke of Savoy expressed in all these losses was the wonder of all Europe. He had now but a small army of eight thousand foot and four thousand horse, and had scarce territory enough to support these. He had no considerable places left him but Coni and Turin. But he seemed resolved to be driven out of all, rather than abandon the grand alliance. His duchess, with all the clergy, and indeed all his subjects, desired him to submit to the necessity of his affairs. But nothing could shake him. He admitted none of his bishops nor clergy into his councils, nor had any certain confessor; but sent sometimes to the Dominicans, and sometimes to the Franciscans, for a priest, when he intended to go to confession.

Gibraltar was defended with great bravery and resolution. Sir John Leake (as has been related) who was left with part of the confederate fleet in those seas, upon notice that Pointi with a squadron of French men of war was arrived at Gibraltar in order to besiege the place by sea, as the Spaniards had done by land, sailed from Lisbon in October, and came so unexpectedly that he surprized two of the enemy's frigates of thirty-four guns each, one of twelve, a fireship and two English prizes, all which, being run-ashore, were burnt; and one of the thirty-guns was taken. Whereupon, having reinforced the garrison with two thousand men, he returned to Lisbon.

In the end of February following, sir John Leake received advice that Pointi was again arrived in the bay of Gibraltar with fourteen men of war and two fire-ships, and that the French and Spanish army designed to make a general assault upon the town. Upon this advice, sir John Leake sailed again from Lisbon to its relief. In his way he met admiral Dilkes, who was sent from England to encrease his force. By this addition he had a strong fleet of thirty men of war, and therefore held on his course with the utmost expedition, hoping to find Pointi in the bay of Gibraltar. But, on the 9th of March, he discovered five sail of the enemies making out of the bay to follow the rest of their squadron, which went off upon the first notice of his approach. These he immediately gave chace to, and soon after one of them, called the Arrogant of sixty guns, was taken; as were two others, the Ardent of sixty-six, and the Marquise of fifty-six, after some little resistance. The other two, the Magnanima of seventy-four, and the Lis of eighty-six guns, were run a-shore and burnt by the enemies themselves near Marbella. Sir John sailed up the Mediterranean, to see if he could overtake the rest of the French squadron; but, after a fruitless pursuit for some days, he returned back to Gibraltar, which was now so well supplied, that the Spaniards lost all hopes of being able to take it, and therefore raised the siege, turning it into a very feeble blockade.

The campaign in Portugal had a very promising beginning. For the vigorous defence of Gibraltar, as it obliged the French and Spaniards to draw most of their forces that way, so it gave an opportunity to the Portuguese and their allies to invade Spain, both on the frontiers of Boyra, and those of Alentejo. This, however, was undertaken against the advice of some great men of the court of Lisbon, who urged, that, considering how much the auxiliary forces had been weakened by the detachments sent by the lord Galway to Gibraltar, the confederate army could not take the field, till they were joined by the recruits expected from England and Holland. But the earl of Galway over-ruled that pretence, and, by his care and industry, the preparations for an early campaign were not much retarded by the king of Portugal's indisposition, during which the queen dowager of England was intrusted with the regency of the kingdom. Most of the troops appointed to take the field, being assembled near Estremos, they began their march from thence on the 24th of April, N. S. the Conde das Galveas, a Portuguese, having the chief command; the Conde de la Corsona, the earl of Galway, and baron Fagel, commanding under him, each his week alternately; the Conde de Villaverde, being general of the artillery. Four days after, the army, being joined by a considerable number of horse and foot from Elvas, was found to consist of above twenty-four thousand men; and, having no enemy to oppose them in the field, the generals resolved to attack their fortified towns. Valencia d'Alcantara was first besieged, and carried by storm on the 8th of May, N. S. The garrison of Albuquerque, fearing the same fate, surrendered the place, on the 22d of that month, upon articles. After which, several councils were held, in which the earl of Galway and general Fagel proposed the siege of Badajox; but it was opposed by the Portuguese upon several pretences. The English and Dutch generals continuing their instances, and offering several expedients to remove all difficulties, it was resolved to draw near Badajox, and endeavour to fall on marshal de Thesse, who was posted with about four thousand horse and foot on the banks of the Guadiana, to cover that important place. Accordingly the army marched, on the 4th of June, N. S. and made some preparations to pass the Guadiana; but, not being able to get a sufficient number of pontoons to make bridges, and wanting other necessaries for a siege, it was thought proper to lay aside that enterprize, and, in the mean time, to send the troops into quarters of refreshment.

While these things passed on the side of Alentejo, the marquis das Minas, who commanded the Portuguese forces in the province of Beyra, attacked the town of Salvaterra, and made the garrison prisoners of war; after which, the Portuguese plundered and burnt Sarca, which the French garrison and inhabitants had abandoned upon their approach. But the marquis das Minas's progress was soon stopped by a body of French and Spaniards, which marched against him, and obliged him to retire to Penamacos.

Notwithanding the earl of Galway's inceſſant ſollicitations, and the ſolemn engagements of the Portugueſe to king Charles of Spain to take the field in the beginning of September, in order to give the Spaniards a diverſion, they continued in their quarters till the end of that month, when, all the confederate forces being drawn together in the neighbourhood of Elvas, ſeveral councils of war were held to regulate the operations of the autumn campaign. Some propoſed to march directly to Merida, to deſtroy the magazines, which the enemy had in that place; others, to march into Spain another way than by Eſtremadura; and others again, the ſiege of Badajox, which the earl of Galway at laſt prevailed with the Portugueſe to undertake, as the moſt proper means to give the enemy ſo conſiderable a diverſion, that they ſhould not be able to oppoſe the earl of Peterborough's attempt on Catalonia.

The generals being ſenſible, that the diviſions among them about the punctilios of command had hitherto been a great obſtruction to the execution of their projects, reſolved, if poſſible, to prevent the like inconveniencies for the future; and, in order thereto, agreed, that the earl of Galway, baron Fagel, and the Conde de Corſana ſhould command each in turn, for a week, as camp-maſters-general, under the marquis das Minas generaliſſimo. This great difficulty about the command being removed, the army marched on the 1ſt of October, N. S. towards Badajox, which they reached the 3d, and opened the trenches the next day. The ſiege was carried on with ſo good ſucceſs, that it was thought almoſt impoſſible, that the enterprize ſhould miſcarry, as it did by an unforeſeen accident.

On the 11th of October, in the afternoon, a bomb of the enemy falling on one of the batteries of the beſiegers, and blowing up the powder with ſome of the gunners, the earl of Galway and baron Fagel repaired thither immediately, to encourage the ſoldiers, and give the neceſſary directions; and, as they had both their arms lifted up, a cannon ball from an old caſtle paſſed between them, took off the ſleeve of baron Fagel, and ſtruck off the lord Galway's right hand, a little below the elbow. The earl being obliged to be carried away, baron Fagel took upon him the command of the army, and direction of the ſiege; and the batteries continued firing with ſo great execution, that the beſiegers reckoned to ſtorm the place on the 15th. But the marquis de Theſſe, having aſſembled three thouſand horſe and five thouſand foot at Talavera, marched the night between the 13th and 14th with ſuch expedition and ſecrecy, that in the morning they were drawn up in battalia, flanking the left wing of the confederates. After ſome time ſpent in conſultations, the whole confederate army paſſed the Guadiana, in order to fight the enemy; but the marquis de Theſſe, having thrown a relief of a thouſand men into Badajox, retired over the Chevera, with as great diligence as he advanced; and, on the 17th of October, N. S. the confederates thought fit to raiſe the ſiege. Baron Fagel, who being weary of a ſervice, where there was little or no harmony among the generals, had ſome time before demanded and obtained to be recalled, ſet out immediately for Liſbon, and there embarked for Holland, with the mortification of having the miſcarriage before Badajox imputed to him, of which he endeavoured to clear himſelf in print. As for the earl of Galway, beſides his being condoled by the king of Portugal in a letter, and receiving another from the queen, written all with her own hand, he had the ſatisfaction of having it generally believed, that, if the diſpoſition, which he had made for preventing the enemy's deſign, and was approved in the council of war the morning he loſt his arm, had been executed, the confederates would not have been obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Badajox.

By this time all Europe was attentive to the great ſucceſs of the confederates in Catalonia. Towards the latter end of May, the Engliſh fleet, with about five thouſand land forces on board, under the joint command of ſir Cloudeſly Shovel and the earl of Peterborough, ſailed from St. Hellen's, and arrived at Liſbon the 20th of June, N. S. a week after the Dutch fleet, commanded by admiral Allemonde, was come into that river. The earl of Galway, with the other generals, being about the ſame time come to Liſbon, ſeveral councils were held about the intended expedition of the confederate fleet: and, upon the preſſing inſtances of the earl of Peterborough, the earl of Galway was prevailed with to let him take with him the beſt part of two Engliſh regiments of dragoons, the lord Raby's and Cunningham's. The prince of Heſſe d'Armſtadt, arriving at this juncture at Liſbon from Gibraltar, gave king Charles III. poſitive aſſurances of the inclinations of the province of Catalonia and kingdom of Valencia to declare for him, which together with his being weary of Portugal, made him reſolve to try his fortune with the earl of Peterborough. This, however, was vehemently oppoſed by ſome Spaniſh grandees; but, their reaſons being over-ruled by the earl of Peterborough's ſtronger arguments, the king was confirmed in his reſolution, and having ſent back the prince of d'Armſtadt to Gibraltar, to get the garriſon of that place in readineſs to embark, he went on board the Ranelagh with the earl of Peterborough. They put to ſea on the 28th of July, N. S. and, a few days after, arrived in the bay of Gibraltar, where he was received as lawful ſovereign; and having taken on board the battalions of Engliſh guards, and three old regiments, which had lately ſo bravely defended the place, and left two new raiſed battalions in garriſon there, they ſailed again the 5th of Auguſt, N. S. Six days after they came to another in the bay of Altea, in order to water; and the earl of Peterborough cauſed a manifeſto to be publiſhed in Spaniſh, declaring, "That he was not come into theſe parts to take poſſeſſion of any place, in the name of her Britannic majeſty, or of the States-general, but to maintain the juſt right of the moſt auguſt houſe of Auſtria to the monarchy of Spain, and to defend the good and loyal ſubjects of the Spaniſh monarchy, and free them from the inſupportable yoke of a government of foreigners." Hereupon, all the inhabitants of Altea, and the neighbouring villages, came to acknowledge his catholic majeſty, imploring his protection, and brought with them the fruits of the country, and other neceſſary proviſions. At the ſame time, about eight hundred or a thouſand men in the adjacent mountains, being weary of the French yoke, declared for king Charles III. and ſeized the town of Denea, not far from Altea bay. His catholic majeſty appointed major general Ramos, who had aſſiſted the prince of Heſſe d' Armſtadt in the ſiege of Gibraltar, to be governor of that place, ſending with him about four hundred men for its greater ſecurity. All this while the motions of the confederate fleet not only kept the French and Spaniards in alarms, but the allies themſelves in ſuſpenſe; there being various conjectures about the true deſign of this expedition. It appears by a letter from on board the Britannia in Altea bay, dated Auguſt 14, N. S. "That the earl of Peterborough having got nineteen battalions of infantry, about one thouſand three hundred horſe, with a good train of artillery, and the king of Spain on board the fleet, his lordſhip deſigned to have gone directly for Italy, where, with the forces that were to join him, either from the duke of Savoy or prince Eugene, he might have driven the French out of Italy, and ſet his royal highneſs at liberty to employ his forces another way. But when letters arrived at Liſbon from Turin and Genoa, adviſing of the good diſpoſition of the Catalans in favour of Charles III. that four thouſand of them had actually taken up arms, this broke his lordſhip's former meaſures, and obliged him, contrary to his inclinations, to frame deſigns upon Catalonia, according to new orders." But, whatever ground there was for this, the fleet, having ſailed from Altea bay about the middle of Auguſt, N. S. arrived in the bay of Barcelona the 22d of the ſame month [e].

The prince of Anhalt d' Armſtadt being ſent before with two frigates, to inquire into the poſture of affairs in thoſe parts, he put into Mataro, four leagues from Barcelona; and having adviſed the people of Vick, who had declared for king Charles, to come down to the ſea ſide, he rejoined the fleet on the 23d of Auguſt; and the infantry were landed, not only without any diſturbance, but even with the aſſiſtance of the country people, who expreſſed great joy for the arrival of the fleet, and the catholic king. The next day, the dragoons, and part of the horſe, were ſet on ſhore, and joined the reſt of the forces, which were encamped about a quarter of a mile from the town of Barcelona on the eaſt ſide, in a place well fortified by nature. The circumference of the town being ſo large, that the forces from the fleet were not ſufficient to inveſt it, the people of the country aſſiſted them in ſecuring all the avenues.

After the artillery and heavy baggage were landed, king Charles reſolved to go on ſhore, to encourage the expedition by his preſence, and ſhew himſelf to the people of the country, who came from divers parts in great multitudes, to ſee him. Accordingly, he landed on the 28th, N. S. at four in the evening, and, when he went from on board, the whole fleet ſaluted him, that by this the inhabitants of Barcelona might be aſſured, that his catholic majeſty was come with the fleet. As ſoon as the king got on ſhore, an infinite number of people, who came from Vick, and divers other towns and villages, with great acclamations, and repeated cries of 'Long live the king,' ran to the water-ſide, caſt themſelves at his feet, and kiſſed his hand with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy, inſomuch, that it was difficult for him to get from among ſo great and joyful a multitude. But at laſt, mounting on horſeback, he rid to the camp, where the forces were all drawn up in a line to receive him.

Barcelona had a garriſon in it of five thouſand men, who were commanded by officers entirely in the intereſts of king Philip. It ſeemed a very unreaſonable thing to undertake the ſiege of ſuch a place with ſo ſmall a force: They could not depend on the raw and undiſciplined multitudes, which came in to join them, who, if things ſucceeded not in their hands, would ſoon abandon them, or perhaps ſtudy to merit a pardon by cutting their throats.

A council of war was called to conſult on what could be propoſed and done, in which both Engliſh and Dutch, were all of opinion, that the ſiege could not be undertaken with ſo ſmall a force [f], thoſe within being as ſtrong as they were; nor did they ſee any thing worth the attempting.

[e] Biſhop Burnet ſays, The firſt deſign of this expedition was concerted with the duke of Savoy; and the forces, they had on board, were either to join him, or to make an attempt on Naples and Sicily, as ſhould be found moſt adviſeable: There were agents employed in different parts of Spain, to give an account of the diſpoſition people were in, and of what ſeemed moſt practicable. A body of men roſe in Catalonia about Vick; upon the knowledge king Charles had of this, and upon other advertiſements, that were ſent to our court, of the diſpoſitions of thoſe of that principality, the orders which king Charles deſired were ſent, and brought by a runner, that was diſpatched from the queen to the fleet; ſo the fleet ſteered to the coaſt of Catalonia, to try what could be done there. The earl of Peterborough, who had ſet his heart on Italy, and on prince Eugene, was not a little diſpleaſed with this, as appeared in a long letter from him, which the lord-treaſurer ſhewed the biſhop. Vol. II. 420.

[f] Dr. Friend, in his 'account of the earl of Peterborough's conduct in Spain, p. 9. 3d edit.' obſerves, That his lordſhip, upon incamping before Barcelona, found the ſcene of affairs quite otherwiſe, than what he was promiſed he ſhould meet with. Inſtead of ten thouſand men in arms, to cover his landing, and ſtrengthen his camp, he ſaw only ſo many higlers and ſuttlers flocking into it. Inſtead of a city in a weak condition, and ready to ſurrender

They therefore thought, that no time was to be loſt, but that they were all to go again on board, and to conſider what courſe was next to be taken before the ſeaſon was ſpent, when the fleet would be obliged to return back again; and, if they could not fix themſelves any where before that time, they muſt ſail back with the fleet. The prince of Heſſe d'Armſtadt only was of opinion, that they ought to ſit down before Barcelona, alledging, that he had ſecret intelligence of the good affections of many in the town, who were well known to him, and on whom he relied; and he undertook to anſwer for their ſucceſs. This could not ſatisfy thoſe, who knew nothing of his ſecrets, and conſequently could only judge of things by what appeared to them. The debate laſted ſome hours: In concluſion the king himſelf ſpoke near half an hour; he reſumed the whole debate; he anſwered all objections, that were made againſt the ſiege, and treated every one of thoſe, who had made them, as he anſwered them, with particular civilities. He ſupported the truth of what the prince of Heſſe had aſſerted, as being known to himſelf. He ſaid in the ſtate, in which his affairs then ſtood, nothing could be propoſed, that had not great difficulties in it: All was doubtful, and much muſt be put to hazard. But this ſeemed leſs dangerous than any other thing, that was propoſed; many of his ſubjects had come and declared for him to the hazard of their lives; it became him therefore to let them ſee, that he would run the ſame hazard with them. He deſired, that they would ſtay ſo long with him, till ſuch attempts ſhould be made, that all the world might be convinced, that nothing could be done; and he hoped, that, till that appeared, they would not leave him. He added, that, if their orders obliged them to leave him, yet he could not leave his own ſubjects. Upon this, they reſolved to ſit down before Barcelona being all amazed to ſee ſo young a prince, ſo little practiſed in buſineſs, argue in ſo nice a point with ſo much force, and conclude with ſuch heroical reſolutions. This proved happy in many reſpects. It came to be known afterwards, that the Catalons and Miquelets, who had joined them, hearing, that they were reſolved to abandon them, and go back to their ſhips, had reſolved, either out of reſentment, or that they might merit their pardon, to murder as many of them as they could. When this ſmall army ſate down before Barcelona, they found they were too weak to beſiege it, and could ſcarce mount their cannon. When they came to examine their ſtores, they found them very defective, and far ſhort of the quantities, that by their liſts they expected to find. It ſoon appeared, that the intelligence was true concerning the inclinations of thoſe in the town: Their affections were entire to king Charles; but they were overawed by the garriſon, and by Velaſco, who, as well as the duke of Popoli, who had the chief command, was devoted to the intereſts of king Philip. Deſerters came daily from the town, and brought them intelligence: the moſt conſiderable thing was, that fort Montjuic was very ill guarded, it being thought above their ſtrength to make an attempt upon it. It was concluded therefore, that all the hopes of reducing Barcelona lay in the ſucceſs of their deſign on that fort [g].

Two bodies were ordered to march ſecretly in the night of the 13th of September, N. S. and to move towards the other ſide of Barcelona, that the true deſign might not be ſuſpected, for all the hopes of ſucceſs lay in the ſecrecy of the march.

der upon the appearance of his troops, he found an orderly garriſon, and a force almoſt equal to his army. In theſe difficulties, his lordſhip, as he was obliged by his inſtructions, called frequent councils of war; wherein day after day, for above a fortnight together, it was often unanimouſly and always by a majority, agreed, that, conſidering the weakneſs of our forces, and the ſtrength of the enemy; conſidering, that our batteries, as our engineers declared, would be almoſt as long a raiſing on the ſide of the town we were maſters of, as the fleet could well ſtay: In ſhort, conſidering the extreme want of every thing neceſſary towards ſuch an attempt, the ſiege was utterly impracticable. His lordſhip did indeed twice give his vote for the undertaking; but from the councils of war it will appear, that it was only out of the extreme paſſion he had to comply with the king of Spain's deſires, and not out of any confidence he had of ſucceeding. At the ſame time his lordſhip propoſed and offered to his majeſty, either to ſail with the whole fleet to Italy, in order to ſupport the duke of Savoy; or to march by land along the ſea coaſt, where, with the countenance and aſſiſtance of the fleet, many towns of conſequence might be reduced, the whole country diſpoſed to declare for, and pay obedience to his catholic majeſty, as ſome part of the neighbouring parts had done; and upon any reaſonable encouragement from Catalonia, and the kingdoms of Valentia and Arragon, winter-quarters might be ſecured, and a body of troops raiſed out of them, which might enable his majeſty to march to Madrid next ſpring. But the author of the 'Impartial Enquiry into the Management of the War in Spain,' printed at London in 1712, in 8vo. obſerves, p. 27, that 'this extreme paſſion, which the earl of Peterborough had to comply with the king of Spain's deſires,' did not laſt long, as appears from thoſe very councils of war, which are publiſhed by Dr. Friend; for in the firſt council held on the 16th of Auguſt 1705. O. S. the ſiege of Barcelona was judged impracticable, 'nemine contradicente;' on the 22d a particular attack upon the curtain was propoſed, and the earl the only perſon who approved it; on the 25th a general attack was propoſed for eighteen days, which was agreed to only by the earl, and the brigadiers, Stanhope and St. Armand; and on the 26th it was reſolved by all the generals, at the king of Spain's requeſt, to try their fortune eighteen days before the town. But on the 28th another council was held, wherein the earl was as forward as any for embarking the troops again; and ſeems to have furniſhed the generals with the reaſons of that reſolution; which is the more probable, becauſe the reaſons alledged in that council were, that they had not been aſſiſted either by the fleet, or the country people, as they expected; that the king was uncertain in his reſolutions, ſometimes for a march, ſometimes for a ſiege; and that the deputies of the Catalans had declared to his lordſhip, that they would not promiſe any number of men to work in the trenches or batteries, or in any places where they ſhould be expoſed to fire. It is certain, that in the council of the 26th, when the generals reſolved to try their fortune for eighteen days before the town, it was deſired, that the fleet would furniſh a certain number of men: and that the prince of Heſſe ſhould procure a proportion of Miquelets; upon which, the earl of Peterborough having ſigned this council in the affirmative as general, wrote a letter to the prince of Heſſe, and ſent brigadier Stanhope to make a demand of men in behalf of the land-council of war from the flags; but, coming on board himſelf the ſame day, in regard to the ſafety of the fleet, his lordſhip gave his opinion in writing as admiral, directly contrary to his opinion as general; as appears from the earl's letter to the prince of Heſſe of the 27th of Aug. and his opinion at a council of war, of Engliſh and Dutch flag officers held on board the Britannia, Aug. 27, 1705. "Thus, ſays the author of the Impartial Inquiry, p. 32, his lordſhip having voted only conditionally as general for undertaking the ſiege of Barcelona, and having afterwards diſagreed to the performance of that condition as admiral, we may reaſonably conclude he did not vote for undertaking the ſiege at all, and yet had a mind the experiment ſhould be made at the hazard of the other admirals in his abſence. But however contradictory theſe two opinions may appear, and however oppoſite they may have really been to his catholic majeſty's intereſt; this is not the only inſtance his lordſhip has given under his own hand, of the little inclination he had to contribute to the reduction of Catalonia, as will plainly appear by ſeveral original papers.—Now, as to what regards the king of Spain's reſolution, I think that may eaſily be accounted for from the different temper of his two generals, the prince of Heſſe continually adviſing his majeſty to preſs the ſiege; my lord Peterborough as aſſiduous to make him lay aſide all thoughts of it; as may be ſeen very evidently from the following letter to ſir Cloudeſly Shovel from the prince of Heſſe, dated at the camp, Sept. 8, 1705, wherein he writes thus: 'His catholic majeſty, being in the greateſt trouble in the world to find my lord Peterborough again reſolved to leave this enterprize, hath his only recourſe to you; his majeſty declaring, that, if his lordſhip perſiſts in his reſolution to go away, his majeſty finding, that without reaſon his crown and ſo good ſubjects ſhall be ſacrificed, is reſolved to ſtay with them, happen what will. This I muſt acquaint you with, in hopes that you will never permit ſuch a cruel abandoning, and to take your meaſures accordingly. The king begs it of you as the laſt favour, and intreats you, in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner, to find out a way, that his majeſty may not be the ſacrifice of fools and knaves.'

[g] Dr. Friend, in his Account of the Earl of Peterborough's Conduct in Spain, p. 32, ſays, that his lordſhip 'now made uſe only of his own thoughts, and by an uncommon artifice made that never to be forgotten attack upon fort Montjuic, the very foundation of all our footing in Spain. This, I know, ſome would attribute to the late prince of Heſſe. That brave prince indeed had too great a ſhare in the danger of this undertaking; but, as he had no command in the army, ſo he was not in the leaſt concerned in the forming of this deſign.——The injudicious, or rather impracticable propoſals made by the prince of Heſſe, and inſiſted upon by him to the laſt, were the occaſion of theſe unanimous councils of war againſt an enterprize, which promiſed ſuch certain ruin; and the freedoms taken in diſcourſe by that prince had prevented any correſpondence for ſome time between him and the earl of Peterborough. So far was this project againſt Montjuic from being propoſed by that prince to his lordſhip, that in truth the earl of Peterborough was forced to make it a ſecret even to the court, where reſentments were very public and remarkable, upon the orders to embark the artillery and the king's baggage, which his lordſhip gave out, the better to diſguiſe his real deſign. Nay, the excuſe the earl of Peterborough made to the prince of Heſſe, for inviting him to aſſiſt in an action he could not yet acquaint him with, was, that the indiſpenſable neceſſity of deceiving the enemy, had made him reſolve to ſurprize his friends in an attempt, which, however deſperate, was yet the only poſſible way of carrying on the ſiege with ſucceſs.'

On the other hand the author of the 'Impartial Enquiry into the management of the war with Spain,' p. 35. aſſures us, that the earl's project, for that time at leaſt, was of a quite different nature from that of the attack upon fort Montjuic; which he proves from the following original papers, viz. a letter from the prince of Heſſe to ſir Cloudeſly Shovel from the camp, September 10, 1705, in which are theſe words:

"I do not doubt captain Norris hath given you an account of what happened yeſterday. Notwithſtanding, the king hath ordered me to acquaint you of all the particulars. Having found, that the land-officers were not to be reduced to conſent to the attack upon this place, my lord Peterborough hath been at laſt diſpoſed to offer to the king, for an expedient, the march to Tarragona, and from thence to extend our quarters to Tortoſa, and even into Valencia; which the king willingly accepted, as the only hopes left for him, that might conduct him to the throne, ſeeing that nothing elſe could be done; ſo that this march is now fully reſolved upon for next Monday or Thurſday. The king, at the ſame time, deſires of you to conſider, that, his perſon ſtaying in this kingdom, if it would not be ſerviceable, that the fleet, or part of it, during our march, ſhould make themſelves maſters of Majorca, or Minorca, and Ivica, where no reſiſtance can be made; and then to leave in the winter ſome ſquadron of light frigates in the Alfaques, and to ſecure Port Mahon with another; which place, you know, is large enough, ſo that ten years ago the whole Smyrna and Turkey fleet came there to an anchor. Then his majeſty deſires your opinion, before we leave this place, if it would not be convenient to throw ſome ſhells, and cannonade the place, where they build their gallies, and there to ſummon the town, and then to make ſome attack with boats and with ladders by the country people, according to the anſwer the governor ſhall give; all which I leave to your beſt conſideration. His catholic majeſty relies in every part on your good zeal, and particular love, you have ſhewn on all occaſions to his perſon, and ſhall always owe to you the good ſucceſs of this undertaking."

The next paper cited is the king of Spain's agreement to the expedient propoſed to him by the earl of Peterborough, dated at the camp September 15, N. S. 1705, in theſe words:

My lord earl of Peterborough,

"I accept the offer you make me, ſeeing, by the reſolutions of the councils

The first body consisted of eight hundred, and both the prince of Hesse and the earl of Peterborough led them. The other body consisted of six hundred, who were to follow these at some distance, and were not to come above half way up the hill till some further order. Brigadier Stanhope led this body. They drew up with them some small field-pieces and mortars. They had taken a great compass, and had marched all night, and were much fatigued by the time that they had gained the top of the hill; and three hundred of them, being commanded to another side of the fort, were separated from the rest, and, mistaking their way, fell into the hands of a body of men sent up from the town to reinforce the garrison in the fort. Before they were separated, the whole body had attacked the out-works, and carried them. But, while the prince of Hesse was leading on his men, he received a shot in his body, upon which he fell; yet he would not be carried off, but continued too long in the place giving orders, and died in a few hours, much and justly lamented. The governor of the fort, seeing a small body in possession of the out-works, resolved to sally out upon them, and drew up four hundred men for that purpose. These would soon have mastered a small and wearied body, disheartened by so great a loss; so that, if he had followed his own resolution, all would have been lost; for all, that brigadier Stanhope could have done, would have been to receive and bring off such as got to him; but one of those newly taken happening to cry out, 'O poor prince of Hesse!' the governor, hearing this, called for him, and examined him: and when he learned, that both the prince of Hesse and the earl of Peterborough were with that body, he concluded, that the whole army was certainly coming up after them; and reflecting on that, he thought it was not fit for him to expose his men, since he believed, that the body, which they were to attack, would be soon much superior to him; for which reason he resolved not to risque a sally, but to keep within, and maintain the fort against them. Thus the earl of Peterborough continued quiet in the out-works, and, being reinforced with more men, he attacked the fort, but with no great hopes of succeeding, till, throwing a few bombs into it, one of them fell into the magazine of powder, and blew it up, by which the governor, and some of the best officers were killed; and this struck the rest with such a consternation, that they delivered up the place.

This success was the more considerable, as the town of Barcelona lay just under the hill, on which the fort stood. Upon this, the party in Barcelona, that was well-affected to king Charles, began to resume their courage, and to shew themselves. Nor did the earl of Peterborough lose any time in improving his advantages, for, as soon as Stanhope's brigade and some other troops were come up, he caused the trenches to be opened, and four batteries of cannon, and two of mortars, to be erected; in which service, both the Miquelets and the English and Dutch seamen were useful. In the mean time, the bomb-vessels threw about four hundred shells into the town, which occasioned a great consternation among the people; and the batteries fired with so much success, that, on the 4th of October, N. S. don Francisco de Velasco consented to capitulate; and brigadier Stanhope was exchanged, with count de Ribeira, as hostages. The viceroy made several extravagant demands, the debating of which continued till the 9th, when it was agreed, that the garrison should march out with all the marks of honour, be transported by sea to St. Felix near Palamos, and conducted from thence to Gironne. But, upon advice, that Gironne had surrendered to king Charles III, it was agreed, that Velasco, with his garrison, should be transported to Roses, which, by this time, was the only place in Catalonia, that had not declared for the house of Austria. Thus was accomplished the conquest of the largest and richest province of Spain, with an army scarce double the number of the garrison of Barcelona.

King Charles was received into that city with great expressions of joy. In the first transport, the people seemed resolved to break through the articles granted to the garrison, and to make sacrifices of the chief officers at least. Upon that, the earl of Peterborough, with brigadier Stanhope and other officers, rode about the streets, to stop this fury, and to prevail with the people to maintain their articles religiously; and, in doing this, they run a greater hazard from the shooting and fire, that was flying about in that disorder, than they had done during the whole siege. They at last quieted the people, and the articles of capitulation were punctually observed.

Brigadier Stanhope was soon after sent to England, to give a full relation of this great transaction; by whom king Charles wrote to the queen a long and clear account of all his affairs, full of great acknowledgements of her assistance, with a high commendation of all her subjects, especially of the earl of Peterborough. This letter was all with the king's own hand, and the French of it was so little correct, that it was not like what a secretary would have drawn for him, and therefore it was concluded, that it was penned by himself. The lord treasurer had likewise another letter from him, all in his own hand; one correction in which seemed to make it evident, that the king composed it himself [h]. He wrote towards the end of the letter, that he must depend on 'his protection:' Upon reflection, that word seemed not fit for him to use to a subject, and therefore was dashed out, but the letters were still plain; and, instead of it, 'application' was writ over it. These letters gave a great idea of so young and unexperienced a prince, who was able to write with so much clearness, judgment, and force. Nor could he receive much assistance from tils of war, there remains nothing else to support me in Spain; so that, I assure you, I shall remain positive in the resolution of marching into the country, being what you may take upon yourself, and justify it, because the council of war had determined upon it. For the rest of the dispositions and particulars of the march, and of further designs to be formed, they will be easily regulated by you, and those persons, that I shall appoint to assist you on my part, reposing an entire trust in you, and the zeal you express to my service."

The author of the 'Impartial Inquiry' then takes notice of Dr. Friend's not allowing the prince of Hesse any share in the design against Montjuic, because of the open misunderstanding at that time between that prince and the earl of Peterborough, who even concealed that design from the court. "And yet, says the author of the 'Impartial Inquiry,' the prince of Hesse went voluntier upon this project, which one would think he should hardly have done in those circumstances, had the thought been entirely my lord Peterborough's, and kept a secret from his highness till the execution. But to say nothing of the prince's longer service and experience, and to pass over the improbability of his lordship's having formed in so little a time as one night a happy project against a fort, which he could not possibly know so well as the prince, that had been viceroy of Catalonia in king Charles the IId's time, and had defended Barcelona against the duke of Vendosme; let us examine into the success of this attack, which was, that a party of grenadiers, supported by the prince of Hesse, carried all before them; and made themselves masters of the out-works; but the taking of the Dungeon, which began to be despaired of, was afterwards entirely owing to the accidental firing of a bomb, that blew up the enemy's magazine of powder, and frighted them into a surrender, which happy accident was the chief occasion of our taking Barcelona. For my part, I shall not pretend to determine, who has the best right to the glory of this project; but it is certain the prince of Hesse was no stranger to it." The author then gives several letters to sir Cloudesly Shovel from that prince, who, in that of the 8th of September, N. S. writes thus:

"As his catholic majesty has heard nothing of my lord Peterborough's talking again of a sudden embarking, he hopes it will not be so; and desires me to tell you, that, if it could be done, being the resolutions of the council of war, to land as soon as possible all the guns, and every thing necessary to hinder any resolution to be taken to the contrary."

In another, dated September 9, N. S. the prince writes thus:

"Since the land-officers are so disposed now to depart from their last resolution, and the king finding himself obliged in honour and in conscience not to abandon so good subjects, who have demonstrated to him all the zeal imaginable, more than the two thirds of the country having put themselves under the obedience of their lawful king, so that he can by no means leave them to their utmost ruin, as his majesty has signified to-day to my lord Peterborough, desiring of him some expedient, and being very willing to follow his advice: I believe the only way, which is left, is, that my lord may be disposed to follow the resolutions taken by a council of war for a march, as you are informed without doubt, such as has been taken to make ourselves masters of Tarragona, to keep the Dutch with us, and then to extend our winter-quarters to Tortosa, and even into Valencia, as occasion shall permit. This his majesty desires of you, to interpose with his lordship to come to a determination how far he can assist his majesty in this; which favour his majesty will esteem as the most particular and only expedient left to preserve some hopes of being put into the possession of the crown of Spain."

In his letter, of the 13th of September, N. S. the prince writes thus:

"I heard just now, that captain Cavendish is to sail immediately, according as the king of Spain desired, as you have writ to the earl of Peterborough. But I having not been with the king to-day, and some particular service being resolved (the attack on Montjuic) as captain Norris will tell you, when he comes back, I take the liberty to desire of you the favour, if possible, to stop captain Cavendish's proceeding till to-morrow morning. Captain Norris will inform you more at large about the matter in question. My lord Peterborough desires me to write these lines, and hopes, that this night's business will make us all easy."

The author of the 'Impartial Inquiry' then gives us two letters of sir Cloudesly Shovel, which not only contain an exact journal of the siege, but likewise shew, that something was due in the reduction of Catalonia to the good disposition of the people, and a great deal to the assistance of the fleet.

Mr. Boyer, in his history of queen Anne, p. 203. asserts, That it was the prince of Hesse, who proposed to the earl of Peterborough the scheme of surprizing the fort of Montjuic, and desired, that his lordship would give him only a thousand men for that purpose, offering himself to conduct and command them; and that the earl having taken a view of that fort, and of the town on that side, and maturely weighed his highness's reason, and considered the manner, in which he intended to proceed in the attack, not only concurred with the prince, and readily granted him the thousand men he desired, but likewise resolved to support his highness himself with a thousand men more, and some dragoons.

[h] Bishop Burnet saw both these letters.

the prince of Lichtenſtein, who was, by all accounts, a man of a low genius, who thought of nothing but the ways of enriching himſelf, even at the hazard of ruining his maſter's buſineſs.

A council of war being held at Barcelona, it was thought fit to comply with the king's reſolution of venturing his own perſon with the Catalans; and that the earl of Peterborough ſhould continue with that prince with the land forces, and as many of the marines, as could be ſpared from the ſervice of the ſhips. The ſeaſon of the year being far ſpent, it was, at the ſame time, reſolved, That ſir Cloudeſly Shovel and admiral Allemonde ſhould return home immediately; that twenty-five Engliſh and fifteen Dutch men of war ſhould winter at Liſbon, under the command of ſir John Leake and rear-admiral Waſſenaer; and that four Engliſh and two Dutch frigates ſhould be left at Barcelona. The fleet ſailed from thence a few days after; and don Velaſco, not thinking himſelf ſafe at Roſes, and having deſired to be tranſported to Malaga, was landed there, with about a thouſand men of the garriſon of Barcelona. The reſt having readily liſted themſelves in the ſervice of king Charles, a regiment of five hundred dragoons was formed out of them for his guard; and ſix other regiments were afterwards raiſed by the ſtates of Catalonia.

While the well-affected Miquelets and Catalans, headed by the count de Cifuentes, and aſſiſted by the Engliſh and Dutch forces, ſecured themſelves in the cities and towns of Tarragona, Tortoſa, Lerida, San Mattheo, Gironne, and other places, don Raphael Nebot, a Catalan, having quitted king Philip's ſervice, came with his whole regiment of five hundred horſe, and one hundred and fifty horſe more, that joined him, to Denia, where being reinforced by major-general Ramos, with part of the garriſon, they made themſelves maſters of Xabea, Oliva, Gandia, and Alzira, in the kingdom of Valencia. Fluſhed with theſe ſucceſſes, they marched to the capital city with a thouſand horſe, five hundred foot, and a great number of the militia, and, by the aſſiſtance of the inhabitants, made themſelves maſters of that place, where they took the marquis de Villa Garcia, the viceroy, and the archbiſhop priſoners. Hereupon, the whole kingdom, the towns of Alicant and Peniſola excepted, declared for king Charles III, who immediately raiſed colonel Nebot to the poſt of a major general; and, a few days after, appointed the count de Cifuentes viceroy of Valencia, at which the earl of Peterborough, who began to be jealous of that count, was not a little diſguſted.

In the firſt conſultation about the war, after the taking of Barcelona, the earl of Peterborough was of opinion, that the forces ſhould be divided, and the better half march immediately into Valencia, the reſt into Arragon. The Engliſh and Dutch major-generals, Cunningham and Schratenbach, were againſt fatiguing and diminiſhing the troops; which they thought muſt be preſerved with the utmoſt care, ſince they were hardly ſufficient to defend the places already poſſeſſed in Catalonia. The latter opinion prevailed; and reſt could hardly be refuſed to troops, which had undergone ſuch hardſhips at ſea, and the fatigues of ſuch a ſiege. However, the earl of Peterborough obtained an univerſal conſent to ſend a good body to Lerida, and about one thouſand foot and two hundred horſe to Tortoſa, the bordering city on the kingdom of Valencia. With this ſmall force he impatiently preſſed for marching into Valencia; but there were ſome at court, who were better pleaſed, that the reduction of that kingdom ſhould be procured by their correſpondence and management, than that it ſhould be owing to her majeſty's arms. In the mean time, the city of Valencia was brought to declare for the houſe of Auſtria; but the rejoicings upon this occaſion were of ſhort continuance, and the diviſions at the court of Barcelona gave the enemy time to bring a body of three thouſand horſe and as many foot into the kingdom of Valencia, under the command of the Conde de las Torres, a general of known courage and of long ſervice, who laid ſiege to St. Mattheo, where colonel Jones commanded ſome hundreds of miquelets. This place being of ſo great importance by its ſituation, in regard that all communication between Catalonia and Valencia muſt have been cut off, had it fallen into the enemy's hands, the news of its being beſieged gave great alarms to the court. However, upon a report, that the country people of Catalonia, Valencia, and Arragon had taken up arms, to the number of ſixteen thouſand men; that they had ſurrounded count Tilly, who had with him one thouſand horſe and one thouſand foot; and that there was nothing wanting to the entire deſtruction of thoſe troops before St. Mattheo, but a few officers, and ſome of the diſciplined troops, that were in Tortoſa, to encourage and direct this multitude, ſo conveniently poſted, the king ordered the earl of Peterborough to give ſpeedy directions in it. The earl regretted the loſt time too much to loſe one moment more; and, inſtead of ſending to a ſubaltern the orders required, he immediately went poſt to Tortoſa; and, though St. Mattheo was above thirty leagues from Barcelona, in about eight days from his departure, he found ways to raiſe that ſiege, though the report of the country's being up in arms was not true, and though he had nothing to depend upon but one thouſand foot and two hundred dragoons. The methods taken in effecting this were as much out of the common road, as the reſolution to attempt it [1].

After the raiſing of the ſiege of St. Mattheo, the earl of Peterborough reſolved to make a ſhew of purſuing the enemy, without entirely expoſing his little body, if they ſhould be better informed, and lay aſide their panic fear; and therefore, while they marched through a narrow plain leading to [1] Dr. Friend gives a particular account of this affair, and ſays, p. 206, that the enemy was before St. Mattheo with between two thouſand three hundred horſe, and about four thouſand foot, whereas his lordſhip had nothing to depend upon but one thouſand foot and two hundred dragoons. It is not hard to gueſs what the general opinion was in theſe circumſtances; neither did his lordſhip endeavour to perſuade the officers, that it was reaſonable to approach ſuch numbers with ſo inconſiderable force, but only made them ſenſible, that, unleſs he could raiſe that ſiege, their affairs were deſperate, and therefore only capable of deſperate remedies. Upon which, he deſired his officers to be content to let him try his fortune, whether he could not by diligence and ſurprize effect that, which by downright force was utterly impracticable. The confidence, which theſe gentlemen had in the earl's care and intelligence, made them on all occaſions approve of, or acquieſce at leaſt in his deſigns, whatever difficulties might ſeem to lie in the way. It is certain, the Conde de las Torres had not the leaſt notice of any enemy, till thoſe employed by the earl of Peterborough gave him the account; which was in ſuch a manner contrived by his lordſhip, and performed by his ſpies, that it obtained the deſired effect. His lordſhip never made uſe of any Spaniards, without getting the whole family in his poſſeſſion, to be anſwerable for thoſe he employed; and, as the people of that country have very good natural parts, and will run any hazards for money, it was hard for the general of the other ſide to avoid being impoſed upon, without renouncing all intelligence, and refuſing credit to every thing, though never ſo probable.

By marches in the mountains, by dividing his troops, and by the help of obſcurity, his lordſhip brought all his men to meet in one night at a place called Traguera, within ſix miles of the enemy's camp; and there, having got them within the walls, by his diligence and care he prevented any perſon from going out of town to give the enemy intelligence. He began his march before day, and, having with a ſmall party viewed the woods and hills, he placed a few dragoons and miquelets ſo conveniently, that they could not be ſeen but by thoſe they had already paſſed by, which his lordſhip took care to ſecure; ſo that all the ſoldiers were brought to their reſpective poſts, to appear at an hour prefixed, ſoon after his lordſhip's ſpies had made the intended impreſſion on the enemy's army. What this ſtratagem was, and what influence it was deſigned to have upon the enemy, will be beſt conceived from this letter, which his lordſhip wrote to colonel Jones, who was then governor of St. Mattheo.

" You will hardly believe yourſelf what this letter informs you of, if it comes ſafe to you; and, though I have taken the beſt precautions, it will do little prejudice, if it falls into the enemies hands, ſince they ſhall ſee and feel the troops, as ſoon almoſt as they can receive intelligence, ſhould it be betrayed to them. The end, for which I venture it to you, is, that you may prepare to open the furtheſt gate towards Valencia, and have your thouſand miquelets ready, who will have the employment they love and are fit for, the following and pillaging a flying enemy. The country is as one could wiſh for their entire deſtruction. Be ſure, upon the firſt appearance of our troops, and the firſt diſcharge of our artillery, you anſwer with an Engliſh halloo, and take to the mountains on the right with all your men. It is no matter what becomes of the town; leave it to your miſtreſſes. The Conde de las Torres muſt take the plains, the hills on the left being almoſt impaſſable, and ſecured by five or ſix thouſand of the country people. But what will moſt gall them, the old regiment of Nebot, which revolted to us near Valencia, is likewiſe among them.

" I was eight days ago myſelf in Barcelona; and I believe, the Conde de las Torres muſt have ſo good intelligence from thence, that he cannot be ignorant of it. What belongs to my own troops, and my own reſolutions, I can eaſily keep from him, though nothing elſe. You know the force I have, and the multitudes, that are gathering from all parts againſt us; ſo that I am forced to put the whole upon this action; which muſt be deciſive, to give any hopes to our deſperate game.

" By nine or ten, within an hour after you can receive this, aſſure yourſelf, you will diſcover us on the tops of the hills, not two cannon-ſhot from the camp.

" The advantages of the ſea are inconceivable, and have contributed to bring about, what you could never expect to ſee, a force almoſt equal to the enemy in number: and you know leſs would do our buſineſs. Beſides, never men were ſo tranſported, to be brought with ſuch ſecrecy ſo near an enemy. I have near ſix thouſand men locked up this night within the walls of Traguera; I do not expect you ſhould believe it till you ſee them.

" You know we had a thouſand foot and two hundred dragoons in Tortoſa. Wills, and a thouſand foot, Engliſh and Dutch, came down the Ebro in boats; and I embarked a thouſand foot more at Tarragona, where I landed at Virares; and the artillery from thence I brought in country carts. It was eaſy to aſſemble the horſe. Zinzendorf and Moras are as good as our own, and with our Engliſh dragoons make in all near two thouſand. But the whole depends upon leaving them to retreat without interruption.

" Dear Jones, prove a good dragoon: Be diligent and alert; and preach that welcome doctrine to your miquelets, 'Plunder without danger.'

Your Friend,

PETERBOROUGH.

The

Valencia, the earl took along the edge of the hill, to a place called Albocazor. Here he received an expreſs from the king with the melancholy account, "That the duke of Noailles was entering, with near eight thouſand men, in Catalonia, from the ſide of Rouſſillon: That the body under prince Tſercles Tilly in Arragon was four or five thouſand, preſſing upon all the places near Lerida: That the duke of Anjou, with marſhal de Theſſe, was forming a body of ten thouſand men near Madrid, which would ſoon be in motion; beſides the troops under the duke of Berwick on the ſide of Portugal." After theſe informations, the king acquainted him, that he was obliged to countermand the one thouſand foot, and three hundred horſe, which were appointed to join him, and were already come almoſt as far as Tortoſa. The letters from court at the ſame time repreſented the neceſſity of defending Catalonia, and, above all, the care and preſervation of the king's perſon; but, however, in this matter the earl had no poſitive orders from the king. In theſe circumſtances, he adviſed with his officers, who were unanimouſly of opinion, that all endeavours ought to be uſed for the ſpeedy defence of Catalonia. The earl ſo far complied with the council of war, as to give orders to the foot, with a ſmall party of horſe, to march back to Vinares, ſix leagues from Tortoſa, where, in caſe of neceſſity, he could embark the foot in boats, and throw them ſecurely into the Ebro; but being fully reſolved never to repaſs that river, without poſitive orders from the king, he ſet out with a party of horſe to purſue the enemy. The earl expreſſed himſelf very freely upon that ſubject, in a letter he wrote from Alcala to the king, wherein he told him, "That, if his majeſty would have believed him, he probably had not only had, at this time, a viceroy of Valencia, but the kingdom:" Concluding, "That, if the time loſt expoſed him to a ſacrifice, at leaſt he would periſh with honour, and as a man deſerving a better fate." At the ſame time, the earl ſent orders to the thouſand Spaniſh foot and three hundred horſe, to enter into Valencia; and, in caſe the king ſhould again remand them to Lerida, he had ſent poſitive orders for colonel Wills to march immediately with an equal number of horſe and foot to his aſſiſtance. This reſolution produced the deſired effect; and orders were ſent from the court at Barcelona to the Spaniſh forces, to follow the direction of the Engliſh general. Hereupon the earl of Peterborough continued the purſuit of the enemy, who retired from him with the ſame precipitation as they had fled from St. Mattheo, being ſtill, by the ſame artifices (uſed to make them raiſe the ſiege) perſuaded, that they were followed by conſiderable forces. After ſeveral days march, the earl poſſeſſed himſelf of Nules, where he began to form that cavalry, which ſecured the kingdom of Valencia, and afterwards contributed to ſave Barcelona; taking near two hundred horſe in a place, where the enemy had three thouſand men the day before. After this he came to Caſtillon de la Plana, a town populous, rich, and well affected, where having procured and bought eight hundred horſes, he not only recruited the diſmounted Engliſh and Spaniſh dragoons, but formed a new regiment of dragoons out of part of the lord Barrimore's regiment of foot; the command of which new corps he gave to lieutenant-colonel Pierce, ordering the remaining officers of the old to return to England, to recruit the ſame. Having drawn together ten ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, and four battalions of foot, regular forces, beſides about three thouſand militia, he marched to Molviedro, the ancient Saguntum, ſo famous in the Roman hiſtory, four leagues diſtant from Valencia, where brigadier Mahoni, an Iriſh officer, had under his command about eight hundred men, near half of whom were his own regiment of dragoons. The town and caſtle were an old fortification, ſecured by a river, which the earl of Peterborough was to paſs, and ſo were capable of making ſome reſiſtance. But, brigadier Mahoni having conſented to an interview with the earl, the latter made ſo advantageous a ſhow of his ſtrength, that Mahoni was at laſt induced to ſurrender the town, being allowed to withdraw his troops. At the ſame time, the earl of Peterborough ſo dexterouſly raiſed jealouſies of Mahoni in ſeveral of the Spaniſh officers, and in the duke of Arcos, who had ſucceeded the Conde de las Torres, that he met with no diſturbance in his march, through the plain from Molviedro to Valencia, where he was received with extraordinary demonſtrations of joy. Whole bodies of prieſts and friars, in their ſeveral habits, were regimented and drawn up under arms to attend him, publicly acknowledging, that they owed their preſervation to his reſolution and activity [k].

About this time, a conſiderable action happened near St. Iſtevan de Litera. Major-general Cunnyngham, who was lately made lieutenant-general, and commanded in Lerida, with a ſtrong garriſon of Engliſh and Dutch, having intelligence, that the enemy about Balbaſtro deſigned to attack ſome of his dragoons at Tamarite, he immediately ſent thither colonel Wills with ſix hundred men; upon which the enemy repaſſed the river, and retired to Balbaſtro. Three days after, the chevalier d'Asfeld, with nine ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, and as many battalions of foot, all French, advanced to attack colonel Wills, who, the day before, had marched to St. Iſtevan de Litera, with no more than four hundred foot and thirty dragoons, Upon the enemy's approach, colonel Wills drew out his ſmall number, and attacked their advanced guard ſo briſkly, that he beat them back to their body, and purſuing them a league, obliged them to retire in confuſion to Fons and Almana. At night, colonel Wills was joined by Cunnyngham and colonel Palm, with the reſt of the troops, to the number in all of between eleven and twelve hundred men.

The next morning, the chevalier d'Asfeldt advanced with his troops to attack the confederates, who thereupon drew out, and poſted their foot on a hill, towards which the enemy's foot was marching. About eight o'clock they were fully engaged, and the enemy puſhed two companies of Engliſh grenadiers; but major Buſton marched up with ſome platoons, and beat them back again; at which time, Cun-

This letter was given to two ſeveral perſons: the one inſtructed and ordered, by ſuch an hour in the morning, to pretend the betraying of it into the hands of the Conde de las Torres; the other was to remain hid in the mountains, and agreed with to endeavour to give it in the night to colonel Jones. This man was really perſuaded, that the number of troops was as conſiderable as was pretended. The firſt was ordered to ſay nothing of the earl of Peterborough's force, leſt he might be expoſed to ill uſage when the truth came to be diſcovered. When he had given the letter, he had directions to inform, where the other ſpy was hid, upon condition made for the ſecurity of his life. Whether the artificial account of the one or the ſincere confeſſion of the other prevailed is not known; but it is certain, that, as ſoon as the letter was tranſlated, orders were given to prepare for a march; and, not long after, when, upon a retreat of a ſmall part of the enemy, ſome of the earl's men approached the top of the hill, which overlooks St. Mattheo, the whole army was in the utmoſt confuſion, the ſoldiers ſtriking their tents, loading their baggage, and preparing to quit the ſiege.

In a very little time the troops of the earl of Peterborough appeared on the top of the adjoining mountain, not above random cannon ſhot from ſome part of the enemies camp. The country, which was full of little riſing grounds and vallies, and covered with olive trees, being favourable for ſuch an approach, and the enemies advanced party being drawn into the camp, before any judgment could be formed of the earl's ſtrength, it was eaſy for him to make a ſhew of his forces to advantage. This ſurprize made their fears as great as could be deſired; and had the earl had any proportion of troops, he had a fair opportunity of cutting them all off. But he was content to let ſeven thouſand men go off without being attacked, and thought it enough to raiſe the ſiege with a force ſo diſproportionate as that of one thouſand two hundred; after his lordſhip found, not only all the informations, which engaged him in that attempt, entirely wrong, but his circumſtances ſo very difficult, as would have deterred any other man from ſo hazardous an undertaking.

[k] Dr. Friend obſerves, p. 268. That his lordſhip had, as his officers conceived, two inſuperable difficulties; the one to get poſſeſſion of Molviedro, and ſecure the paſs on the river; the other, to paſs the two leagues of the plains, which were betwixt Molviedro and Valencia, before ſo good and ſo ſtrong a body of horſe as that commanded by Mahoni. His lordſhip was in hopes, if he ſucceeded in one, to compaſs the other; and, to that end, as ſoon as he found the treaty with Mahoni in a fair way, he choſe two Iriſh dragoons out of Zinzendorf's regiment, which he well inſtructed and well paid, and ſent immediately as deſerters to the duke of Arcos. He promiſed to make them officers, if they ſucceeded; which was punctually made good to one, who well had deſerved it, the other dying ſoon after his return. They were to diſcover to the duke of Arcos, that being hid under the rocks of the hill, where they were drinking a glaſs of wine, they had heard all the diſcourſe between the earl and Mahoni: That they ſaw five thouſand piſtoles delivered; and that Mahoni was to be a major-general, upon the Engliſh and Spaniſh eſtabliſhment, and to command a body of ten thouſand Iriſh catholics, which were raiſing for the ſervice of king Charles. They agreed with the duke of Arcos to have no reward, if he were not ſoon made ſenſible of the truth of what they ſaid, by Mahoni himſelf; ſince they were perſuaded, that he would ſoon ſend to engage the duke of Arcos to march immediately with the whole army towards the Carthuſian convent, under pretence of joining with his horſe, in order to prevent the earl of Peterborough from paſſing the plains of Molviedro; but that, whereas this march muſt be made in the night, all matters were ſo agreed and contrived betwixt the earl and Mahoni, and the troops ſo placed, that he muſt fall into the ambuſhes deſigned, and run great hazards of an entire defeat. It fell out, that, ſoon after thoſe ſpies had given this account to the duke of Arcos, Mahoni's aid-de-camp arrived with propoſals exactly to the ſame purpoſe. The Spaniſh general (whoſe ſuſpicions were confirmed by the jealouſies, which the earl of Peterborough had raiſed in ſeveral of the Spaniſh officers, who were come from Molviedro to him) inſtead of complying with the immediate march propoſed by Mahoni, removed his camp quite the contrary way. Mahoni with his horſe expoſed the whole army at the Carthuſian convent, till the approach of the earl of Peterborough made him retire to the duke of Arcos's camp; and as ſoon as he arrived, he was ſecured by that general, and ſent to Madrid. But, when Mahoni came to tell his ſtory at court, he was made a major-general, and the duke of Arcos was recalled.

The author of the 'Impartial Inquiry into the management of the war in Spain, having quoted this ſtory from Dr. Friend, obſerves, p. 79. "That it was not thus the Romans got poſſeſſion of Molviedro, when it bore the name of Saguntum: They would not have rendered an enemy's general ſuſpected to his maſter by arts unwarrantable, nor did they ever interpret in ſo looſe a ſenſe, 'Dolus an virtus quis in hoſte requirat?'

This

nyngham received a ſhot through his belly, and was carried off. Colonel Wills, having then the command, continued the fight till three in the afternoon; but, though the enemy employed a great part of their forces to drive the confederates from the hill, yet they kept their ground with ſo much reſolution, that the enemy thought fit to retreat again to Fons and Almana. The troops fought with extraordinary bravery on both ſides, ſo that the muzzles of their pieces met. The confederates had ſeveral officers, and about one hundred and fifty private men killed or wounded, but had no priſoners taken from them; whereas the enemy had four hundred men killed, and left behind them a lieutenant-colonel, and a lieutenant of dragoons, who were made priſoners. Colonel Wills continued till five on the field of battle, and then marched to Balaguer, where lieutenant-general Cunnyngham died, three days after, of his wounds.

Upon the news of the ſucceſs in Catalonia, the councils of Portugal were quite changed. That court had a better proſpect than formerly of the reduction of Spain. The war was now divided, which lay wholly upon them before; and the French party there had no longer the old pretence to excuſe their counſels by, that it was not fit for them to engage themſelves too deep in the war, nor to provoke the Spaniards too much, and expoſe themſelves to revenge, if the allies ſhould deſpair and grow weary of the war, and recall their troops and fleets. But now, that they ſaw the war carried on ſo far in the remoteſt corner of Spain, which muſt give a great diverſion to king Philip's forces, it ſeemed a much ſafer, as well as it was an eaſier thing, to carry on the war with more vigour for the future. Upon this, all poſſible aſſurances were given the earl of Galway, that things ſhould be conducted hereafter fully to his ſatisfaction; ſo that by his diſpatches to England it appeared, that he was thoroughly convinced of the ſincerity of their intentions, of which he had been in great doubt, or rather deſpair.

Our affairs at ſea were more proſperous this year than they had been formerly. In the beginning of the ſeaſon, our cruiſers took ſo many of the French privateers, that we had ſome thouſands of their ſeamen in our hands; and we kept ſuch a ſquadron before Breſt, that the French fleet did not think fit to venture out; and their Toulon ſquadron had ſuffered ſo much in the action of the former years, that they either could not or would not venture out. By this means our navigation was ſafe, and our trade proſperous.

In Hungary matters went on very doubtfully. Tranſylvania was almoſt entirely ruined. Ragotſki had great misfortunes there, as the court of Vienna publiſhed the progreſs of the new emperor's arms; but this was not to be much depended upon. They could not conceal, on the other hand, the great ravages which the male-contents made in other places; ſo that Hungary continued to be a ſcene of confuſion and plunder.

Poland was in no better condition. King Auguſtus's party continued firm to him, though his long ſtay in Saxony gave credit to a report ſpread about, that he was reſolved to abandon that kingdom, and to return to it no more. This ſummer paſt over in motions and actions of no great conſequence: What was gained in one place, was loſt in another. Staniſlaus procured himſelf to be crowned. The old cardinal, though ſummoned to Rome, would not go thither. He ſuffered himſelf to be forced to own Staniſlaus, but died before his coronation; and that ceremony was performed by the biſhop of Cujavia. The Muſcovites made as great ravages in Lithuania, as they had formerly done in Livonia. The king of Sweden was in perpetual motion; but, though he endeavoured it much, he could not bring things to a deciſive action. In the beginning of winter, king Auguſtus, with two perſons only, broke through Poland in diſguiſe, and got away to the Muſcovite army, which was put under his command. The campaign went on all the winter-ſeaſon, which, conſidering the extreme cold in thoſe parts, was thought a thing impracticable before. In the ſpring after, Reinſchild, a Swediſh general, fell upon the Saxon army, which was far ſuperior to his in number; for he had not above ten thouſand men, whereas the Saxons were about eighteen thouſand; notwithſtanding which, he gave them a total defeat, killed about ſeven thouſand, and took eight thouſand priſoners, and their camp, baggage, and artillery. Numbers, upon ſuch occaſions, are often ſwelled, but it is certain, this was an entire victory. The Swedes gave it out, that they had not loſt a thouſand men in the action; and yet even this great advantage was not like to put an end to the war, nor to the diſtractions, into which that miſerable kingdom was caſt. In it the world ſaw the miſchiefs of an elective government, eſpecially when the electors have loſt their virtue, and ſet themſelves to ſale. The king of Sweden continued in an obſtinate averſion to all terms of peace; his temper, courage, and his military conduct, were much commended; but he grew too ſavage, and was ſo poſitive and peremptory in his reſolutions, that no applications could ſoften him, and he would ſcarce admit them to be made. He was devout almoſt to enthuſiaſm; and he was ſeverely engaged in the Lutheran rigidneſs, almoſt equally againſt Papiſts and Calviniſts; but his education was ſo much neglected, that he had not an equal meaſure of knowledge to direct his zeal.

Having given ſuch a view of the ſtate of Europe this ſummer, as may ſerve to ſhew the proceedings in every part of it, we ſhall now return to England. The election of the members of the houſe of commons was managed with zeal and induſtry on both ſides. The clergy took great pains to infuſe into all people tragical apprehenſions of the danger the church was in. The univerſities were inflamed with this, and took all poſſible means to ſpread it over the nation with much vehemence. The danger of the church of England grew to be the word as given in an army. Men were known as they anſwered it. None carried this higher than the jacobites, though they made a ſchiſm in the church. At laſt, even the papiſts, both at home and abroad, ſeemed to be diſturbed with the fears which the danger of our church put them under; and this was ſupported by the Paris Gazette, though of that the party ſeemed aſhamed. Books were writ and diſperſed over the nation with great induſtry, to poſſeſs all people with the apprehenſions that the church was to be given up, that the biſhops were betraying it, and that the court would ſell it to the diſſenters. Now it was, that 'the memorial of the church of England,' penned by ſome zealous churchman, was printed and ſpread abroad, ſetting forth her melancholy ſituation and diſtreſs[1]. They alſo hoped, that this campaign, proving leſs proſperous than had been expected, might put the nation into ill humour, which might furniſh them with

[1] This pamphlet was compoſed by Dr. Drake the phyſician, and others, and humbly offered to the conſideration of all true lovers of our church and conſtitution. In it was the following paſſage: "Thoſe, that look no deeper than the ſurface of things, are apt to conclude, without heſitation, that the church of England is in a very flouriſhing condition. Its dignities and preferments make a very good ſhew, and the patronage of the queen ſeems to promiſe a continuance of proſperity. But, for all this fine complexion and fair weather, there is an hectic fever lurking in the very bowels of it, which, if not timely cured, will infect all the humours, and at length deſtroy the very being of it. The nation has a long time abounded with ſectaries, who, in the preceding century, violently overturned both church and ſtate, though their own extravagance and confuſions, through a ſpecial providence, contributed more than human wiſdom to the re-eſtabliſhment of them. The ſons of thoſe men yet remain, and inherit, many of them, the principles of their fathers. It would therefore be no very uncharitable ſuppoſition, without any other argument, to imagine them heirs of their deſigns likewiſe; for it is eaſy to demonſtrate, that ſuch principles lead naturally to ſuch deſigns, and that no man can heartily embrace one, without having favourable thoughts of the other. Nor can we blame them; for, if any man is perſuaded (as many of our ſectaries avow themſelves to be) that the diſcipline and worſhip of the church of England are an abomination, his conſcience will readily ſuggeſt to him, that he ought to do his utmoſt to purge the land from ſuch abomination; and upon this pretence has the church been once already ſubverted, though raiſed again by God in a miraculous manner. In thoſe days a 'thorough reformation, root and branch,' was the cry of all the pulpits, the Shibboleth of the party. If, ſince the church recovered its ancient luſtre and authority, they have been more ſilent, and in appearance more moderate, it is not that they are better tempered or affected, but that, ſubmitting to the neceſſity of the times, they have diſſembled their intentions better: Yet ſome over-attempts here, and the whole courſe of their proceedings in Scotland during theſe two laſt reigns, ſufficiently ſhew us what treatment we might expect, if they had the power. But theſe people, though they may have the will, have not the power alone to endanger the church. The diſſenters are not yet conſiderable enough for their numbers, (however they boaſt of them) wealth, or quality, to bring about any great change in the conſtitution of church and ſtate. And our church is too ſtrong to be ſhaken, but through the treachery or ſupine negligence of its own members, or thoſe, at leaſt, that pretend to be ſuch; and, as ſuch, palm themſelves frequently upon their country and church, to the irreparable damage of both. The ſudden death of the late king diſappointed, mortified, and humbled the diſſenters and their abettors, the whigs, ſo exceſſively, that they were ready to have thrown a blank to the church, and would have taken a general indemnity, with an excluſion from all public truſt and office. They, who not a month before, breathed nothing but defiance, and inſulted the church, and treated the princeſs with the moſt ſcandalous indignities and rudeſt calumnies, were in an inſtant grown the moſt peaceable, meek, chriſtian-ſpirited people in the univerſe. They preached nothing but charity, peace, and love, forgiveneſs of injuries, oblivion of wrongs, and the utter abolition and extinction of parties and factions for ever. So very good and gracious can men in fear be! But whence this humility and dejection of mind, this ſweetneſs of temper? Was it natural, or the reſult of more extraordinary grace, or more chriſtian principles than other men were poſſeſſed of? No; but they had juſt before injured and affronted the princeſs and church of England in ſo inſolent and outrageous a manner, upon preſumption, that durable ſchemes were upon the anvil in their favour, that their own conſciences, upon the vaniſhing of them, prompted them to ſeek pardon and peace, from thoſe whom they had ſo abuſed, by an extraordinary ſubmiſſion. But when, contrary to theſe fears, they found the head of the church, and, after her example, the members of it too, inclined not only to forgive, but to forget paſt injuries, and that, inſtead of puniſhment, they met not with ſo much as a rebuke or reproach, but comfortable ſpeeches and kind aſſurances from the queen herſelf, and good countenance from ſome of her prime miniſters, their ſpirits were elated in an inſtant; the ſpirit of humility ſome advantages. In oppoſition to all this, the court acted with ſuch caution and coldneſs, that the whigs had very little ſtrength given them by the miniſters in managing the elections. They ſeemed rather to look on as indifferent ſpectators, but the whigs exerted themſelves with great activity and zeal. The diſſenters, who had been formerly much divided, were now united entirely in the intereſts of the government, and joined with the whigs every where.

When the elections were all over, the court took more heart, for it appeared, that they were ſure of a great majority; and the lord Godolphin declared himſelf more openly, than he had yet done, in favour of the whigs. The firſt inſtance given of this, was the diſmiſſing of ſir Nathan Wright, who had continued ſo long lord-keeper, that he was fallen under a high degree of contempt with all ſides; even the tories, though he was wholly theirs, deſpiſing him. He was ſordidly covetous, and did not at all live ſuitably to that high poſt. He was become extremely rich, though he was not charged with bribery in his court; but there was a rumour with relation to the livings of the crown, that were given by the great ſeal, as if they were ſet to ſale by the officers under him. The great ſeal being ſent for, the cuſtody of it was given, in council, to William Cooper, with the title of lord-keeper. He was a gentleman of a good family, of excellent parts, and of an engaging deportment, very eminent in his profeſſion, and had been, for many years, conſidered as the man, who ſpoke the beſt in the houſe of commons. His promotion was very acceptable to the whigs, who had been much diſguſted with the lord-treaſurer for the coldneſs he expreſſed, as if he would have maintained a neutrality between the two parties, though the one ſupported him, while the other deſigned to ruin him. But this ſtep, in preferring the new lord-keeper, went a great way towards reconciling the whigs to him [m].

The new parliament met on the 25th of October. The appearance in the houſe of commons was greater than had been known at the opening of any parliament for fifty years before; no leſs than four hundred and fifty-ſix members being preſent. The firſt ſtruggle was about the choice of a ſpeaker, by which a judgment was to be made of the temper and inclination of the members. The court declared for Mr. John Smith, a man of clear parts, and of a good expreſſion, who was then in no employment, but had gone through great poſts in the former reign with reputation and honour, having been a commiſſioner of the treaſury, and chancellor of the Exchequer. He had, from his firſt ſetting out in the world, been thoroughly in the principles and intereſts of the whigs, yet with a due temper in all things, with relation to the tories. But the tories all declared againſt him for Mr. Bromley, one of the repreſentatives of the univerſity of Oxford, a man of a grave deportment and good morals, but conſidered as a violent tory, and as a great favourer of jacobites, which appeared evidently in a relation, which he printed of his travels. The marquis of Granby, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Rutland, who firſt propoſed Mr. Smith, was ſeconded by Mr. Robert Walpole; and ſir John Holland, the marquis of Hartington, ſir William Strickland, ſir Charles Turner, and ſome others ſpoke by turns on the ſame ſide. On the other hand, the earl of Diſert recommended Mr. Bromley, and was ſupported by ſir Thomas Hammer, ſir Edward Seymour, ſir William Drake, Mr. Frederick Herne, Mr. Anneſley, and ſir Roger Moſtyn. No affair of that ſort had ever been carried with ſuch heat on both ſides as this was: So that it was juſt to form a judgement upon it of the temper of the houſe. After a debate of about an hour and half, the houſe divided, and, two members being appointed to tell the voices, Mr. Smith had two hundred and forty-eight, and Mr. Bromley two hundred and five only. Mr. Smith being, on the 27th of October, preſented to the queen, ſeated on the throne in the houſe of peers, ſhe approved the choice of him, and made the following ſpeech to the houſes:

My lord and gentlemen,

"I Have been very deſirous to meet you as early as I thought you might be called together without inconvenience to yourſelves. And it is with much ſatisfaction, I obſerve ſo full an appearance at the opening of the parliament, becauſe it is a ground for me to conclude, you are all convinced of the neceſſity of proſecuting the juſt war, in which we are engaged, and therefore are truly ſenſible, that it is of the greateſt importance to us, to be timely in our preparations.

"Nothing can be more evident, than that if the French king continues maſter of the Spaniſh monarchy, the balance of power in Europe is utterly deſtroyed, and he will be able, in a ſhort time, to engroſs the trade and the wealth of the world.

"No good Engliſhman could at any time be content to ſit ſtill, and acquieſce in ſuch a proſpect; and at this time we have great grounds to hope, that by the bleſſing of God upon our arms, and thoſe of our allies, a good foundation is laid for reſtoring the monarchy of Spain to the houſe of Auſtria; the conſequences of which will not only be ſafe and advantageous, but glorious for England.

"I may add, we have learned by our own experience, that no peace with France will laſt longer, than the firſt opportunity of their dividing the allies, and of attacking ſome of them with advantage.

"All our allies muſt needs be ſo ſenſible this is the true ſtate of the caſe, that I make no doubt but meaſures will ſoon be ſo concerted, as that, if we be not wanting to ourſelves, we ſhall ſee the next campaign begin offenſively on all ſides againſt our enemies, in a moſt vigorous manner.

"I muſt therefore deſire you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, to grant me the ſupplies, which will be requiſite for carrying on the next year's ſervice both by ſea and land; and, at the ſame time, to conſider, that the giving all poſſible diſpatch, will make the ſupply itſelf much more effectual.

"The firmneſs and conduct, which the duke of Savoy has ſhewn amidſt extreme difficulties, is beyond example. I have not been wanting to do all that was poſſible for me, in order to his being ſupported.

"I ought to take notice to you, that the king of Pruſſia's troops have been very uſeful to this end. Your approbation of that treaty laſt ſeſſion, and the encouragement you gave upon it, leave me no doubt of being able to renew it for another year.

"I take this occaſion to aſſure you, that not only whatever ſhall be granted by parliament for bearing the charge of the war, ſhall be laid out for that purpoſe with the greateſt faithfulneſs and management; but that I will continue to add, out of my own revenue, all I can reaſonably ſpare, beyond the neceſſary expences for the honour of the government.

humility and pacification vaniſhed; their former inſolence and preſumption returned upon them in full force; and they began to challenge and provoke the church as boldly as ever. Thus far the hiſtory of their carriage towards the church is public and recent, as likewiſe the advances, that have been made in their favour, and the repulſes, which the church has met with. Every thing has paſſed in Scotland to the deſire of the preſbytery, even to the endangering the church and monarchy of England, and the diſheriſon of its crown, and the immediate prejudice of its ſovereignty; but, on the contrary, nothing for the ſecurity of the church here, which cannot only boaſt itſelf to be a main branch of the civil conſtitution, but the prop and ſupport of the whole frame of government; which removed, it muſt neceſſarily fall to the ground, as has been once fatally experimented. All attempts to ſettle it on a perpetual foundation have been oppoſed and rendered ineffectual by miniſters, who owe their preſent grandeur to its protection; and who, with a prevarication as ſhameful as their ingratitude, pretend to vote and ſpeak for it themſelves, while they ſollicit and bribe others with penſions and places to be againſt it."

This laſt reflection was viſibly levelled againſt the duke of Marlborough and the lord treaſurer Godolphin; and the reſt of that libel, containing no leſs injurious inſinuations againſt the queen herſelf for removing ſome of her miniſters, the grand jury of London and county of Middleſex, at the ſeſſions held at the Old Bailey, on the 31ſt of Auguſt, "with the utmoſt indignation and reſentment, preſented one book, lately printed by a notorious criminal [David Edwards] (convicted in that court for printing and publiſhing a ſeditious and treaſonable libel, for which he was fined and pilloried, and was now fled from juſtice) intituled, 'The Memorial of the Church of England,' &c. to be a falſe, ſcandalous, and traiterous libel, ſecretly, but induſtriouſly ſpread abroad, to advance and accompliſh traiterous and wicked deſigns, highly impeaching the truth and ſincerity of her majeſty's royal reſolution and pious aſſurances to ſupport and preſerve our government, both in church and ſtate, the rights, liberties, and properties of all her people; and alſo craftily deſigned to reproach and ſcandalize her wiſe and faithful miniſtry, divide her councils, create variances, diſputes, and diſcords in her parliament, and to raiſe and foment animoſities, fears, and jealouſies amongſt all her people." Upon this preſentment the court ordered the ſaid libel to be forthwith burnt in the ſight of the ſaid court then ſitting, and alſo, on the Tueſday following, before the Royal Exchange; which was done accordingly, on the 1ſt of September, the ſheriffs attending.

[m] The ducheſs of Marlborough, in the account of her conduct (p. 159) ſays, The next year I prevailed with her majeſty to take the great ſeal from ſir Nathan Wright, a man deſpiſed by all parties, of no uſe to the crown, and whoſe weak and wretched conduct, in the court of Chancery, had almoſt brought his very office into contempt. His removal, however, was a great loſs to the church, for which he had ever been a warm ſtickler. And this loſs was the more ſenſibly felt, as his ſucceſſor, my lord Cow er, was not only of the whig party, but of ſuch abilities and integrity, as brought a new credit to it in the nation.

My lords and gentlemen,

"By an act of parliament paſſed the laſt winter, I was enabled to appoint commiſſioners for this kingdom, to treat with commiſſioners to be impowered by authority of parliament in Scotland, concerning a nearer and more complete union between the two kingdoms, as ſoon as an act ſhould be made there for that purpoſe. I think it proper for me to acquaint you, that ſuch an act is lately paſſed there; and I intend, in a ſhort time, to cauſe commiſſions to be made out, in order to put the treaty on foot, which I heartily deſire may prove ſucceſsful, becauſe I am perſuaded, that an union of the two kingdoms will not only prevent many inconveniencies, which may otherwiſe happen, but muſt conduce to the peace and happineſs of both nations; and therefore I hope I ſhall have your aſſiſtance, in bringing this great work to a good concluſion.

"There is another union I think myſelf obliged to recommend to you in the moſt earneſt and affectionate manner; I mean, an union of minds and affections amongſt ourſelves. It is that, which would, above all things, diſappoint and defeat the hopes and deſigns of our enemies.

"I cannot but with grief obſerve, there are ſome amongſt us, who endeavour to foment animoſities; but I perſuade myſelf, they will be found to be very few, when you appear to aſſiſt me in diſcountenancing and defeating ſuch practices.

"I mention this with a little more warmth, becauſe there have not been wanting ſome ſo very malicious, as even in print to ſuggeſt the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed, to be in danger at this time.

"I am willing to hope, not one of my ſubjects can really entertain a doubt of my affection to the church, or ſo much as ſuſpect, that it will not be my chief care to ſupport it, and leave it ſecure after me; and therefore we may be certain, that they, who go about to inſinuate things of this nature, muſt be mine and the kingdom's enemies, and can only mean to cover deſigns, which they dare not publicly own, by endeavouring to diſtract us with unreaſonable and groundleſs diſtruſts and jealouſies.

"I muſt be ſo plain, as to tell you, the beſt proofs we can all give at preſent of our zeal for the preſervation of the church, will be to join heartily in proſecuting the war againſt an enemy, who is certainly engaged to extirpate our religion, as well as to reduce this kingdom to ſlavery.

"I am fully reſolved, by God's aſſiſtance, to do my part.

"I will always affectionately ſupport and countenance the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed.

"I will inviolably maintain the toleration.

"I will do all I can to prevail with my ſubjects to lay aſide their diviſions, and will ſtudy to make them all ſafe and eaſy.

"I will endeavour to promote religion and virtue amongſt them, and to encourage trade, and every thing elſe, that may make them a flouriſhing and happy people.

"And they, who ſhall concur zealouſly with me in carrying on theſe good deſigns, ſhall be ſure of my kindneſs and favour."

This ſpeech, which was ſuppoſed to be drawn up by the new lord keeper, was received with great applauſe by the generality of the people, and the majority of both houſes of parliament. On the 1ſt of November the lords attended the queen with an addreſs, wherein, having taken notice of what had been delivered from the throne, they aſſured her, "That they concurred in theſe her majeſty's wiſe and noble ſentiments; and that no dangers ſhould deter them, nor any artifices divert them, from doing all that was in their power, to aſſiſt her majeſty in carrying on the war, till ſhe ſhould be enabled to procure ſuch a peace for Europe, as ſhe had mentioned in her ſpeech. They admired in her majeſty that tender and indulgent affection to her people, which ſhe had ſhewn from the beginning of her reign; that earneſt deſire to unite them among themſelves, and to make them all eaſy, ſafe, and happy under her government; that ſteady zeal for the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed; and that compaſſion for thoſe, who were ſo unhappy, as to diſſent from her." And they promiſed, "to do all they could to diſcountenance and defeat the deſigns and practices of thoſe, who fomented animoſities among her people; ever to ſhew the utmoſt deteſtation of thoſe ungrateful and wicked men, who laboured to diſhonour her majeſty's reign, and diſtract her ſubjects with unreaſonable and groundleſs jealouſies of dangers to the church of England; and to be ready to concur in all meaſures requiſite to put a ſtop to the malice of thoſe incendiaries."

The commons addreſſed the queen, five days after, in much the ſame manner. Theſe addreſſes of the two houſes went the more eaſily, becauſe ſome kept out of the way, from whom it was expected, that they would afterwards open more copiouſly on the ſubject. The chairmen of the ſeveral committees of the houſe of commons were men, of whom the court was well aſſured.

On the 13th of November, the commons, having taken the queen's ſpeech into conſideration, preſented a ſecond addreſs of thanks for her great care and endeavours to ſettle the ſucceſſion of the kingdom of Scotland in the houſe of Hanover, for the preſervation of the peace, and promoting the union of the two kingdoms, and to aſſure her, they would, to the utmoſt of their power, aſſiſt her to bring that great work to a happy concluſion. They alſo deſired her to direct, that the whole proceedings of the laſt ſeſſions of parliament in Scotland, relating to the union and the ſucceſſion, might be laid before the houſe. The lords had made the ſame requeſt the day before, and the queen promiſed both houſes that the ſtate of thoſe matters ſhould be laid before them.

The firſt thing, with which the commons generally begin, is to receive petitions againſt the members returned; and this gave a further diſcovery of the inclinations of the majority. The corruption of the nation was grown to ſuch an height, and there was ſo much foul practice on all hands, that there was no doubt great cauſe of complaint. The firſt election that was judged, was that of St. Albans, where the ducheſs of Marlborough had a houſe. She recommended admiral Killigrew to thoſe in the town, as was done all over England by perſons of quality, who had any intereſt in the Burghers. Yet, though much foul practice was proved on the other hand, and there was not the leaſt colour of evidence to fix any ill practice upon her, ſome reflected very indecently upon her. Mr. Bromley compared her to Alice Piers in king Edward the third's time, and ſaid many other virulent things againſt her; for indeed ſhe was looked upon by the whole party, as the perſon who had reconciled the whigs to the queen, from whom her majeſty was naturally very averſe. Moſt of the controverted elections were carried in favour of the whigs; in ſome few they failed, more by reaſon of private animoſities, than by the ſtrength of the other ſide.

The houſe of commons readily voted all the ſupplies that were aſked, and went on to provide proper funds for them.

The moſt important debates, that were in this ſeſſion, began in the houſe of lords, the queen being preſent at them all. The Lord Haverſham opened the motions of the tory ſide. On the 15th of November, when the lords went upon the ſtate of the nation, the lord Haverſham made a long ſpeech, wherein he arraigned the duke of Marlborough's conduct, both on the Moſelle and in Brabant, and reflected ſeverely on the Dutch, which he carried ſo far as to ſay, that the war coſt them nothing. He came at length to the point, which was laid to be the debate of the day, and concluded his ſpeech with ſaying:

"The laſt thing, my lords, is that which I take to be of the greateſt concernment to us all, both queen and people. I always love to ſpeak very plain, and ſhall do ſo in this point.

"My lords, I think there can be nothing more for the ſafety of the queen, for the preſervation of our conſtitution, for the ſecurity of the church, and for the advantage of us all, than if the preſumptive heir to the crown, according to the act of ſettlement in the proteſtant line, ſhould be here amongſt us. It is very plain, that nothing can be more for the ſecurity of any throne, than to have a number of ſucceſſors round about it, whoſe intereſt is always to defend the poſſeſſor from any danger, and prevent any attempt againſt him, and revenge any injury done him. Is there any man, my lords, who doubts, that if the duke of Glouceſter had been now alive, her majeſty had not been more ſecure than ſhe is? We cannot think of that misfortune without the greateſt grief; but yet we are not to neglect our own ſafety. And, though a ſucceſſor be not the child of the prince, yet is he the child of the queen and the people.

"Beſides, my lords, the heats and differences, which are among us make it very neceſſary, that we ſhould have the preſumptive heir reſiding here. The duty and reſpect we pay her majeſty, and the authority of the law, can hardly keep us in peace and union amongſt ourſelves at preſent. What then may we not fear, when theſe bonds ſhall ever happen to be broken? And would it not be a great advantage to the church for the preſumptive heir to be perſonally acquainted with the reverend the prelates? Nay, would it not be an advantage advantage to all England, that, whenever the ſucceſſor comes over, he ſhould not bring a flood of foreigners along with him, to eat up and devour the good of the land?

"I will ſay no more to your lordſhips, but conclude with this motion:

"That an humble addreſs be preſented to her majeſty by this houſe, that her majeſty will be graciouſly pleaſed to invite the preſumptive heir to the crown of England, according to the acts of parliament made for ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, into this kingdom, to reſide here."

The duke of Buckingham, and the earls of Rocheſter, Nottingham, and Angleſey, carried on the debate with great earneſtneſs. It was urged, That they had ſworn to maintain the ſucceſſion, and by that were bound to inſiſt on this motion, ſince there was no means ſo ſure to maintain it, as to have the ſucceſſor upon the place, ready to aſſume and maintain his right. It appeared through our whole hiſtory, that whoever came firſt into England, had always carried it. The pretending ſucceſſor might be in England within three days; whereas it might be three weeks before the declared ſucceſſor could come. From thence it was inferred, that the danger was apparent and dreadful, if the ſucceſſor ſhould not be brought over. If king Charles had been in Spain, when the late king died, probably that would have prevented all this war, in which we were now engaged. With theſe lords, by a ſtrange reverſe, all the tories joined; and by another, and as ſtrange a reverſe, all the whigs joined in oppoſing it. They thought, that this matter was to be left wholly to the queen; that it was neither proper nor ſafe either for the crown or for the nation, that the heir ſhould not be in an entire dependence on the queen: That a rivalry between the two courts might occaſion great diſtractions, and be attended with very ill conſequences: That the next ſucceſſor had expreſſed a full ſatisfaction, and reſted on the aſſurances, which the queen had given her of her firm adherence to her title, and to the maintaining of it: That the nation was prepared for it by the orders, which the queen had given to name her in the daily prayers of the church: That great endeavours had been uſed to bring the Scots nation to declare the ſame ſucceſſor: That it was true, we ſtill wanted one great ſecurity, not having yet made any proviſion for carrying on the government, for maintaining the public quiet, for proclaiming and ſending for the ſucceſſor, and for keeping things in order, till the ſucceſſor ſhould come. It ſeemed therefore neceſſary to make an effectual proviſion againſt diſorders, that might happen in ſuch an interval. This was propoſed firſt by biſhop Burnet, and ſeconded by the lord-treaſurer; and all the whigs went into it, and then the queſtion was put upon the other motion, as firſt made, by a previous diviſion, Whether that ſhould be put or not, and was carried in the negative by about three to one. However, ſome lords, who were for the affirmative, entered their proteſts in the following words: "We humbly conceive, that having a preſumptive heir to the crown reſiding in the kingdom, will be a great ſtrengthening to her majeſty's royal hands, in the adminiſtration of the government and ſecurity of her majeſty's royal perſon, and of the ſucceſſion to the crown, as by law eſtabliſhed, in the proteſtant line[n]."

The queen heard the debate, and ſeemed amazed at the behaviour of ſome, who, when they had credit with her, and apprehended, that ſuch a motion might be made by the whigs, had poſſeſſed her with deep prejudices againſt it; for they had made her apprehend, that, when the next ſucceſſor ſhould be brought over, ſhe herſelf would be ſo eclipſed by it, that ſhe would be much in the ſucceſſor's power, and reign only at her or his courteſy. Yet theſe very perſons were proſecuting that very motion, which they had made her apprehend was the moſt fatal thing, that could happen. This the ducheſs of Marlborough told biſhop Burnet, but named no perſon; and upon it a very black ſuſpicion was taken up by ſome, that the propoſers of this matter knew, or at leaſt believed that the queen would not agree to the motion, which way ſoever it might be brought to her, whether in an addreſs, or in a bill; and then they might reckon, that this would give ſuch a jealouſy, and create ſuch a miſunderſtanding between her and the parliament, or rather the whole nation, as would unſettle her whole government, and put all things in diſorder. But this was only a ſuſpicion[o].

Though the invitation of the princeſs Sophia was rejected, yet a bill for a regency, entitled, "A bill for the better ſecurity of her majeſty's perſon and government, and of the ſucceſſion to the crown of England," was brought in. On the 19th of November, the lord Wharton opened the debate in a manner that charmed the whole houſe. He had not been preſent at the former debate, but he ſaid, he was much delighted with what he had heard concerning it. He obſerved, that he had ever looked on the ſecuring a proteſtant ſucceſſion to the crown as that, which ſecured all our happineſs. He had heard the queen recommend from the throne union and agreement to all her ſubjects, with a great emotion in his own mind. It was now evident, there was a divinity above her, when ſhe ſpoke: The cauſe was certainly ſupernatural, for we ſaw the miracle, that was wrought by it: Now all were for the proteſtant ſucceſſion. It had not been always ſo. He rejoiced in their converſion, and confeſſed it was a miracle. He would not, he could not, he ought not to ſuſpect the ſincerity of thoſe, who moved for inviting the next ſucceſſor; yet he could not hinder himſelf from remembering what had paſſed in a courſe of many years, and how men had argued, voted, and proteſted all that while. This confirmed his opinion, that a miracle was now wrought; and that might oblige ſome to ſhew their change by an exceſs of zeal, which he could not but commend, though he did not fully agree to it. After this preamble, he opened the propoſition for the regency in all the branches of it: That regents ſhould be empowered to act in the name of the ſucceſſor, till he ſhould ſend over orders: That beſides thoſe, whom the parliament ſhould name, the next ſucceſſor ſhould ſend over a nomination ſealed up, and to be opened, when that accident ſhould happen, of perſons, who ſhould act in the ſame capacity with thoſe, who ſhould be named by parliament. The motion being thus digeſted, was agreed to by all the whigs, and a bill was ordered to be brought in, purſuant to theſe propoſitions. But, upon the debate on the heads of the bill, it appeared, that the converſion, which the lord Wharton had ſo pleaſingly magnified, was not ſo entire as he ſeemed to ſuppoſe. For when a ſecurity, that was real and viſible, was thus offered, thoſe, who made the other motion, flew off from it. They pretended, that it was, becauſe they could not depart from their firſt motion: But they were told, that the immediate ſucceſſor might indeed, during her life, continue in England; yet it was not to be ſuppoſed, that her ſon, the elector, could be always abſent from his own dominions, and throw off all care of them, and of the concerns of the empire, in which he

[o] The ducheſs of Marlborough, in "The account of her own conduct, p. 160." clears up this matter: ſhe ſays, the earls of Rocheſter and Nottingham, and the other grave men of the party, had not the leaſt hope or the leaſt deſire to carry their point; but being well aſſured, that the queen would never conſent to ſuch an invitation, nor pardon her miniſters if they encouraged the deſign, this was a notable ſtratagem to ruin them, either with her majeſty, or with the nation; for if, in compliance with her prejudices, they oppoſed this motion, it was to be hoped it would draw the public odium upon them, as declared enemies to the proteſtant ſucceſſion. This hopeful ſcheme, however, did not ſucceed. The whigs oppoſed the invitation, and yet preſerved their credit, to the great mortification of the other party. I know, that my lord Godolphin, and other great men, were much reflected upon by ſome well-diſpoſed perſons, for not laying hold of this opportunity, which the tories put in their hands, of more effectually ſecuring the ſucceſſion of the crown in the houſe of Hanover. But thoſe of the whigs, whoſe anger againſt the miniſter was raiſed on this account, little knew how impracticable the project of 'Invitation' was, and that the attempt would have only ſerved to make the queen diſcard her miniſtry, to the ruin of the common cauſe of theſe kingdoms, and of all Europe. I had often tried her majeſty upon this ſubject, and when I found, that ſhe would not hear of the immediate ſucceſſor's coming over, had preſſed her, that ſhe would at leaſt invite hither the young prince of Hanover, who was not to be her immediate ſucceſſor, and that ſhe would let him live here as her ſon: But her majeſty would liſten to no propoſal of this kind in any ſhape whatſoever.——It was upon this occaſion, that the queen gave the firſt indications of any thing like a real reconcilement to the whigs.——She had been preſent at the debate in the houſe of lords upon the ſubject of the invitation, and had heard the duke of Buckingham treat her with great diſreſpect, urging as an argument for inviting over the princeſs Sophia, that the Queen might live till ſhe did not know what ſhe did, and be like a child in the hands of others, and a great deal to that effect. Such rude treatment from the tories, and the zeal and ſucceſs of the whigs, in oppoſing a motion ſo extremely agreeable to her, occaſioned her to write to me in the following terms:

"——I believe dear Mrs. Freeman and I ſhall not diſagree, as we have formerly done; for I am ſenſible of the ſervices thoſe people have done me, that you have a good opinion of, and will countenance them, and am thoroughly convinced of the malice and inſolence of them, that you have always been ſpeaking againſt."

And at this time it was, that the queen authorized the lord Godolphin to give the utmoſt aſſurances to the chief men of the whigs, that ſhe would put herſelf and her affairs into ſuch hands as they ſhould approve, and would do every thing poſſible for the ſecurity of the proteſtant religion.

The

bore ſo great a ſhare. If he ſhould go over for ever ſo ſhort a time, the accident might happen, in which it was certainly neceſſary to provide ſuch an expedient, as was now offered. This expoſed them to much cenſure; but men engaged in parties are not eaſily put out of countenance. It was reſolved, that the regents ſhould be ſeven, and no more; and they were fixed by the poſts they were in. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord-chancellor, lord-keeper, lord-treaſurer, lord-preſident, lord privy-ſeal, lord high-admiral, and the lord chief-juſtice of the Queen's Bench for the time being, were named for the high truſt. The tories ſtruggled hard, that the lord treaſurer ſhould not be one, only to ſhew their ſpleen againſt the lord Godolphin; but their motion was rejected with ſcorn; for it ſeemed ridiculous in a time, when there might be much occaſion for money, to exclude an officer from that high truſt, who alone could furniſh them with it, or direct them how to be furniſhed. The tories moved likewiſe, that the lord-mayor of London ſhould be one; but that was alſo rejected; for the deſign of the act was, that the government ſhould be carried on by thoſe, who ſhould be at that time in the conduct and ſecret of affairs, and were perſons choſen by the queen; whereas the lord-mayor was choſen by the city, and had no practice in buſineſs. Theſe regents were required to proclaim the next ſucceſſor, and to give orders for the like proclamation over England and Ireland. The next ſucceſſor might ſend a triplicate of the perſons named by her or him; one of theſe was to be depoſited with the archbiſhop of Canterbury, another with the lord-keeper, and a third with his own miniſter reſiding at this court; upon the producing whereof, the perſons nominated were to join with the regents, and to act in equality with them. The laſt parliament, even though diſſolved was to be immediately brought together, and empowered to continue ſitting for ſix months; and thus things were to be kept in order, till the ſucceſſor ſhould either come in perſon, or ſend over his orders.

The tories made ſome oppoſition to every branch of the act; but, in that of the parliament's ſitting, the oppoſition was more remarkable. The earl of Rocheſter moved, that the parliament and the regents ſhould be limited to paſs no act of repeal of any part of the 'act of Uniformity;' and in his poſitive way ſaid, that, if this was not agreed to, he ſhould ſtill think the church was in danger, notwithſtanding what they had heard from the throne in the beginning of the ſeſſion. It was objected to this, that, if the regal power was in the regents, and if the parliament was likewiſe a legal one, then by the conſtitution the whole legiſlature was in them, and that could not be limited; for they could repeal any law that limited them: But the judges were of opinion, that the power of regents might be limited; ſo that, as the deſign of moving this might be to have a new pretence to poſſeſs the clergy, that there was a ſecret deſign againſt the church, which might break out at ſuch a time, the lords gave way to it, though they thought it unreaſonable, and propoſed with no good deſign. The tories, upon the yielding this to them, propoſed a great many more limitations; ſuch as the reſtraining the regents from conſenting to a repeal of the act for triennial parliaments; the acts for trials in caſes of treaſon, and ſome others; and ſo extravagant were they in their deſign of making the act appear ridiculous, that they propoſed as a limitation, that they ſhould not have power to repeal the act of ſeſſion. All theſe were rejected with ſcorn and indignation; the lords ſeeing by this their error in yielding to that propoſed by the earl of Rocheſter. The bill paſſed the houſe of lords, but the tories proteſted againſt it.

There was not any thing in the management of the tories, by which they ſuffered more in their reputation than by this. They hoped, that the motion for the invitation would have cleared them of ſuſpicion of inclinations towards the pretended prince of Wales, and would have reconciled the body of the nation to them, and turned them againſt all, who ſhould oppoſe it. The management was ſo ill diſguiſed, that it was viſible they intended only to provoke the queen by it, hoping that the provocation might go ſo far, that in the ſequel all their deſigns might be brought about, though by a method, that ſeemed quite contrary to them, and deſtructive of them.

The bill lay long in the houſe of commons, by a ſecret management, that was againſt it. The tories there likewiſe propoſed, on the 14th of December, that the next ſucceſſor ſhould be brought over; which was moved by ſir Thomas Hanmer, ſeconded by Mr. Benſon, and ſupported by Mr. Bromley, and others. This was oppoſed by the whigs, who moved, 'that the chairman leave the chair;' which was carried in the affimative without dividing. The ſecret management was from Hanover. Some indigent perſons, and others employed by the tories, had ſtudied to infuſe jealouſies of the queen and her miniſters into the electreſs Sophia. She was then ſeventy-five, but had ſtill ſo much vivacity, that, as ſhe was the moſt knowing and the moſt entertaining woman of the age, ſo ſhe ſeemed willing to change her ſcene, and to come and ſhine here in England. They prevailed with her to write a letter to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, intimating her readineſs to come over, if the queen and parliament ſhould deſire it. This was made public by ſome intriguing perſons in that court, and a colour was ſoon found to keep ſome whigs from agreeing to the act. In the act, which firſt ſettled the ſucceſſion, one limitation had been, that, when the crown ſhould paſs into that houſe, no man, who had either place or penſion, ſhould be capable of ſitting in the houſe of commons. The clauſe in this bill, which impowered either the parliament, which ſhould be current at the queen's death, or that which had ſate laſt (though diſſolved) to ſit for ſix months, or till the ſucceſſor ſhould diſſolve it, ſeemed contrary to this incapacitating clauſe in the former act. Great exceptions were taken to this by ſome zealous whigs, who were ſo poſſeſſed with the notion of a ſelf-denying bill, as neceſſary to preſerve public liberty from the practices of a deſigning court, that for ſome weeks there was cauſe to fear, not only the loſs of the bill, but a breach among the whigs upon this head. Much pains were taken, and with good effect, to heal this. It was at laſt ſettled; and a great many offices were enumerated; and it was declared, that every man, who held any of theſe, was thereby incapacitated from ſitting in the houſe of commons; and every member of the houſe, who accepted of any other office, was, upon that, excluded the houſe, and a new writ was to go out to thoſe, whom he repreſented, to chuſe again; but it was left free to them to chuſe him, or any other, as they pleaſed. It was deſired by thoſe, who preſſed this matter moſt, that it ſhould take place only in the next reign. But to remove all jealouſy, the miniſters were content, that theſe clauſes ſhould take place immediately, upon the diſſolution of the preſent parliament. And, when the houſe of commons ſent up theſe ſelf-denying clauſes to the lords, they added to them a repeal of that clauſe in the firſt act of ſucceſſion, by which the ſucceeding princes were limited to govern by the advice of their council, and by which all the privy-councillors were to be obliged to ſign their advices; which was impracticable, ſince it was viſible, that no man would be a privy-councillor on thoſe terms. The lords added the repeal of this clauſe to the amendments ſent up by the commons; and they made ſome alterations in the clauſe inſerted by the commons, their lordſhips excluding only the commiſſioners of the prize-office, and all ſuch new officers, as the court might create for the time to come. Two conferences were held about theſe reſpective amendments between the two houſes; and, the report of the latter conference being made in the houſe of commons, on the 15th of February, it occaſioned a long and warm debate. The court party endeavoured to ſhew the injuſtice of excluding from the houſe ſuch as were actually performing ſervices to the nation; urging, that all counties and corporations of England have, by their charters, liberty to elect ſuch, as they think beſt qualified to repreſent them in parliament; they ſhould, in great meaſure, be deprived of that liberty by this excluſion of ſeveral officers, military and civil; who, by reaſon of the great eſtates they have in thoſe corporations, ſeldom fail, and have more right than any others, to be choſen. And that the excluſion of thoſe officers would very much abate the noble ardour, which ſeveral gentlemen ſhewed at this juncture, to ſerve the nation in this juſt and neceſſary war, ſince they could not but look upon it as a diſgrace, to be made incapable of ſerving likewiſe their country in parliament. The oppoſite party, which chiefly conſiſted of the tories, with whom ſeveral of the whigs joined on this occaſion, alledged, the ill uſe, which a bad prince might make of a parliament, in which there ſhould be many of his creatures; ſuch are generally all thoſe, who have employments immediately depending on the crown. The other party, foreſeeing that they ſhould loſe the queſtion, agreed to the poſtponing of three of the lords amendments, having already agreed to one of them. But, three days after, being reinforced by the return of thoſe, who, for ſome time, had voted on the contrary ſide, the lords amendments were approved, with ſome few alterations; to which the lords agreed on the 19th of February[r].

[r] The debates in both houſes about the invitation of the princeſs Sophia having made a great noiſe, Mr. Charles Gilſton, a writer, well known for his ſhare in the 'Oracles of Reaſon,' and for his confutation of that book afterwards, either by directions from others, or out of mere zeal, handed to The

On the 22d of November, the lord Haverſham moved, that the miſcarriages of the laſt campaign, occaſioned by the allies, might be enquired into. In the courſe of this debate, the errors, committed in the conduct of the war this year, were complained of; the blame, indeed, of the miſcarriage of the deſign on the Moſelle was laid on the prince of Baden, and the errors in Brabant on the States and their deputies. But, as the party ſaid, they could not judge of theſe things, nor be able to lay before the queen thoſe advices, that might be fit for them to offer to her, unleſs they were made acquainted with the whole ſeries of theſe affairs; therefore they propoſed, that by an addreſs they might pray the queen to communicate to them all that ſhe knew concerning thoſe tranſactions during the laſt campaign; for they reckoned, that, if all particulars ſhould be laid before them, they ſhould find ſomewhat in the duke of Marlborough's conduct, on which a cenſure might be fixed. To this it was anſwered, that, if a complaint was brought againſt any of the queen's ſubjects, it would be reaſonable for them to enquire into it by all proper ways; but the houſe of lords could not pretend to examine or to cenſure the conduct of the queen's allies, who were not ſubject to them, nor could be heard to juſtify themſelves; and it was ſomewhat extraordinary, if they ſhould paſs a cenſure, or make a complaint of them. It was one of the truſts, which was lodged with the government, to manage all treaties and alliances, ſo that our commerce with our allies was wholly in the crown. Allies might ſometimes fail, being not able to perform what they undertook; they are ſubject to errors and accidents, and are ſometimes ill ſerved. The entering into that matter was not at all proper for the houſe, unleſs it was intended to run into raſh and indiſcreet cenſures, on deſign to provoke the allies, and by that means to weaken, if not break the alliance. The queen would, no doubt, endeavour to redreſs whatever was amiſs, and that muſt be truſted to her conduct. Thus this attempt, which was chiefly levelled againſt the duke of Marlborough, not only failed, but it happened upon this, as upon other occaſions, that it was turned againſt thoſe, who made it. For, on the 27th of November, the two houſes attended the queen with an addreſs, importing, "That being juſtly alarmed by the many artifices, which the emiſſaries of France had put in practice the laſt year, in order to raiſe jealouſies, and create miſunderſtandings amongſt the allies; and being apprehenſive leſt ſuch malicious inſinuations, if they ſhould paſs unobſerved, might in time ſo far take place, as to abate the ſpirit, and ſlacken the zeal of the confederacy; they moſt humbly beſought her majeſty, to uſe all poſſible endeavours to preſerve a good correſpondence amongſt all the confederates, and, in a particular manner, to maintain and cultivate a ſtrict friendſhip with the States General of the United Provinces; as alſo, by all proper means, to excite the whole confederacy to make early and effectual preparations, and to exert their utmoſt vigour in the proſecution of the war againſt France." This had a very good effect in Holland; for the agents of France were, at the ſame time, both ſpreading reports in England, that the Dutch were inclined to a peace; and, in Holland, that the Engliſh had unkind thoughts of them. The deſign was to alienate us from each other, that ſo both might be the better diſpoſed to hearken to a project of peace, which, in the preſent ſtate of affairs, was the moſt deſtructive thing, that could be thought on; and all motions, that looked that way, gave very evident diſcoveries of the bad intentions of thoſe who made them.

The queen having laid before the two houſes the addreſſes of the Scots parliament againſt any progreſs in the treaty of union, till the act, which declared them aliens by ſuch a day, ſhould be repealed; the tories, upon this occaſion, to make themſelves popular, after they had failed in many attempts, reſolved to promote this, apprehending, that the whigs, who had firſt moved for that act, would be for maintaining their own work; but they ſeemed to be much ſurprized, when, after they had prefaced their motions in this matter with ſuch declarations of their intentions for the public good, that ſhewed they expected oppoſition and a debate; the whigs not only agreed to this, but carried the matter further to the other act relating to their manufacture and trade. This paſſed very unanimouſly in both houſes; and, by this means, way was made for opening a treaty, as ſoon as the ſeſſion ſhould come to an end. All the northern parts of England, that had been diſturbed for ſome years with apprehenſions of a war with Scotland, which would certainly be miſchievous to them, whatever the end of it might prove, were much delighted with the proſpect of peace and union with their neighbours.

The commons, in the mean while, proceeded with great unanimity in voting ſeveral branches of the ſupply; and the queſtion being propoſed on the 22d of November, 'Whether it ſhould be referred to the committee, to conſider, that, in the clauſe for adding ten thouſand men to act in conjunction with the Dutch, it ſhould be provided, that the Dutch be obliged to leave off trading with France?' It was carried in the negative by a majority of an hundred and eighty-four againſt an hundred and ſeventeen.

The nation having been long in ſuſpence about the ſucceſs of the earl of Peterborough's expedition, when the account of it was at laſt brought by captain Norris in the Britannia, with the lord Shannon and brigadier Stanhope, the queen went to the houſe of peers on the 27th of November, and, the commons being ſent for, ſhe made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

HAving newly received letters from the king of Spain and the earl of Peterborough, which contain a very particular account of our great and happy ſucceſſes in Catalonia, the preſs, 'A letter from ſir Rowland Gwynne to the right honourable the earl of Stamford, dated at Hanover, January 1, O. S. 1705-6,' importing in ſubſtance, "That the princeſs Sophia being informed, that her good intentions to the queen and nation were miſrepreſented, ſome having reported, That ſhe might give a riſe to intrigues againſt the queen and the public if ſhe came thither; ſhe thought herſelf therefore obliged to declare to the lord archbiſhop of Canterbury and others, to whom ſhe wrote, and alſo to tell the duke of Marlborough and the earl of Sunderland, when they were at Hanover, 'That ſhe would always moſt ſincerely maintain a true friendſhip with the queen, and alſo be ready to comply with the deſires of the nation in whatever depended upon her, though ſhe ſhould hazard her perſon in paſſing the ſeas, if they thought it neceſſary towards the eſtabliſhment of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and for the good of the kingdom. But that, in the mean time, ſhe lived in great quiet and content there, without meddling with parties or cabals, and left it to the queen and parliament to do whatever they ſhould think fit.' That none but jacobites can have the malice to invent and inſinuate to others, 'That the preſence of the ſucceſſor was dangerous.' That we had been proud to ſay, that the houſe of Hanover, the people of England, and our poſterity were moſt obliged to the whigs, next to the king, for ſettling the ſucceſſion of that moſt ſerene houſe; and how much ſhould we be to be blamed, if we ſhould loſe this merit, by parting with our principles, that were ſo well grounded upon honour and the public good, and by deſtroying the work of our own hands for a baſe and uncertain intereſt, or for a blind obedience to thoſe, who led others where they pleaſed, and yet were led themſelves by their paſſions or imaginary proſpects, of which they might yet be diſappointed? For, if they hoped to get into favour by ſuch methods, they could not be long ſerviceable, nor preſerve the favour they ſought; for they would ſoon be caſt off, when it was found, that they had loſt the eſteem and affection of the people by their weak or mercenary conduct. That they could not do any thing, that would better pleaſe their enemies; for, while they thought to keep down the tories by a majority, and oppoſe them, even in things ſo reaſonable and juſt, they would raiſe the reputation of that party, inſtead of leſſening it. That he was ſorry for thoſe, who ſuffered themſelves to be impoſed upon; but they, who had wicked deſigns, might one day repent of them; for they muſt either plunge the nation into the greateſt confuſion, to make it unable to puniſh them, or be anſwerable for the dangers, into which they were like to bring it. That he could not conceive what colour any body could have for ſo baſe an inſinuation, as, 'That the coming of the electreſs into England would ſet up two courts, that would oppoſe each other;' for the electreſs declared, 'That ſhe would be entirely united with the queen; and that all thoſe, who imagined ſhe would countenance any intrigue againſt her majeſty, would be very much deceived in their expectations.' That ſuppoſing, contrary to all appearance, that diſcontented ill men might impoſe upon the electreſs's good nature, and incline her to do ſuch things, as might diſpleaſe the queen; what hurt could that do, ſince her royal highneſs's court could have no power in England, and muſt be ſubject to the queen's court? So that it was moſt abſurd to make people believe, that this pretended oppoſition of the two courts could bring the nation into ſo great dangers, as thoſe they might avoid by having the proteſtant heir in the kingdom. That the keeping the proteſtant heir at a diſtance muſt be grounded upon two ſuppoſitions equally wicked and criminal: Firſt, 'That the queen was againſt the electreſs's coming over:' And ſecondly, 'That her being in England, during the queen's life, was a thing ill in itſelf.' That, in ſhort, to oppoſe the further ſecuring of the proteſtant ſucceſſion was to act directly for the Jacobites; and to hinder the ſucceſſor's coming into England was to oppoſe the further ſecuring of the ſucceſſion." This letter having been publiſhed, and giving great offence to the miniſtry, a complaint was made of it, on the 8th of March, in the houſe of commons, who, after the reading of it, came to this reſolution, "That it was a ſcandalous, falſe, and malicious libel, tending to create a miſunderſtanding between her majeſty and the princeſs Sophia, and highly reflecting upon her majeſty, upon the princeſs Sophia, and upon the proceedings of both houſes of parliament: That an addreſs be preſented to her majeſty, that ſhe would be pleaſed to give order for the diſcovery and proſecuting the author, printer, and publiſhers of the ſaid pamphlet; and that the ſaid reſolutions be communicated to the lords at a conference, and their concurrence deſired thereunto." The lords readily concurred with the commons; and, upon the two houſes preſenting the addreſs, on the 12th of March, purſuant to the ſaid reſolutions, the queen told them, "That nothing could be more acceptable to her, than ſo ſeaſonable an inſtance of their concern to preſerve a good underſtanding between her and the princeſs Sophia, and of their care to defeat the artifices of deſigning and malicious men. That ſhe was fully ſenſible of the very ill deſigns of the paper, which they had ſo juſtly cenſured; and ſhe would not fail to give the neceſſary directions for complying, in the moſt effectual manner, with all they deſired in their addreſs." Accordingly, about a year after, on the 14th of February, 1706-7, Mr. Charles Gildon was tried at Guildhall, and, being found guilty of publiſhing ſir Rowland Gwynne's letter to the earl of Stamford, was fined, on the 12th of May 1707, one hundred pounds by the court of the Queen's Bench. Pr. H. C. III.

and ſhewing, at the ſame time, the reaſonableneſs of their being immediately ſupported; I look upon this to be a matter of ſo much conſequence in itſelf, and ſo agreeable to you, that I have ordered a copy of the king of Spain's letter to myſelf; a letter from the Junta of the military arm of Catalonia; and another letter from the city of Vich; as alſo an extract of the earl of Peterborough's letter to me, to be communicated to both houſes of parliament.

" I recommend the conſideration of them to you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, very particularly, as the ſpeedieſt way to reſtore the monarchy of Spain to the houſe of Auſtria. And therefore I aſſure myſelf, you will enable me to proſecute the advantages we have gained, in the moſt effectual manner, and to improve the opportunity, which God Almighty is pleaſed to afford us, of putting a proſperous end to the preſent war.

My lords and gentlemen,

" I muſt not loſe this occaſion of deſiring you to give as much diſpatch to the matters before you, as the nature of them will allow; that ſo our preparations for the next year may be early, which cannot fail of being of great advantage to us."

The commons being returned to their houſe, Mr. ſecretary Hedges laid before them the letters mentioned in the queen's ſpeech; and, two days after, they voted the granting of ſeveral ſums, and, in particular, two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, 'for her majeſty's proportion of the charge of proſecuting the ſucceſſes already gained by king Charles III, for the recovery of the monarchy of Spain to the houſe of Auſtria[q].'

After the act for the regency had paſſed, the lord Hallifax remembering what the earl of Rocheſter had ſaid concerning the danger, the church might be in, moved, that a day might be appointed, to enquire into theſe dangers, about which ſo many tragical ſtories had been publiſhed of late. Accordingly, the 6th of December was appointed for this purpoſe, when the earl of Rocheſter began the debate (the queen being preſent) and told their lordſhips, " That the ſubject matter of it was of ſo tender a nature, that it was difficult to ſpeak to it: for her majeſty had expreſſed herſelf ſo concluſively in her ſpeech, that it ſeemed to be to contradict the queen, to 'ſpeak freely:' But in regard that the miniſters might be ſuppoſed to make the ſpeeches, he deſired, that what he had ſaid might not be offenſive to the queen, for whom he had all the affection and reſpect, that could be. He urged, that miniſters might miſtake, and not always act for the public good; and inſtanced in the miniſtry of Portugal, where the king was our friend, but the miniſtry ſeemed to be otherwiſe, inſomuch that the alliance was of no benefit to us: And added, that the duke of Buckingham and archbiſhop Laud were heartily in the intereſt of king Charles I. but did many things, that very much injured him. The full expreſſions in the queen's ſpeech he compared to the law in king Charles the ſecond's time, to make it 'treaſon to call the king a papiſt;' for which very reaſon, he ſaid, he always thought him ſo. The reaſons he gave for his fear of the church's danger aroſe from theſe three cauſes: Firſt, the 'act of ſecurity' in Scotland: Secondly, the heir of the houſe of Hanover not being ſent for over: Thirdly, the not paſſing the 'occaſional bill.' Upon the firſt, he ſaid, the preſbyterian church in Scotland was fully eſtabliſhed without a toleration. That to arm that people, was to give them a power to invade England, where they had a powerful party for their friends, who never wanted the will to deſtroy the church. That he thought the heir to the crown ought to be preſent among us, in order to be fully acquainted with us and our conſtitution, and thereby inabled to prevent any evil deſigns upon the church and ſtate. That the 'Occaſional Conformity' bill was in itſelf ſo reaſonable, and the church's requeſt in it ſo ſmall, that the induſtry in oppoſing it gave the greater ground for ſuſpicion."

When the earl had done, the houſe ſate ſtill a quarter of an hour, expecting that ſome body would ſecond him; but, no other lord ſpeaking on that ſide, the lord Hallifax ſaid, " That, he having moved for the preſent debate, it might be expected, that he ſhould ſpeak to it. He ſaid, the 'act of ſecurity' in Scotland was a national thing, wholly foreign to church affairs. That it was paſſed only to prevent an immediate war, which the Scots ſeemed to have reſolved upon. That, in caſe it ſhould ever be made uſe of, it would be but as other wars with that nation had been in former days, wherein England was always able to defend itſelf, and would be ſure hereafter to be more able to do it, inſomuch that the ſtrength of England was encreaſed much more in proportion than that of Scoland, ſo that, unleſs France, whoſe hands were already too full, ſhould come into the quarrel, it would ſignify little: But that, by God's bleſſing, things were ſo well compromiſed with the Scots, and their former heats ſo much abated, that there was no reaſon to doubt of an amicable iſſue of that difference. As to the houſe of Hanover, he ſaid, that was a danger but of eight days ſtanding; for he durſt ſay, a fortnight ago, no body made the abſence of the princeſs Sophia a danger to the church: And, as for her abſence upon the queen's demiſe, that was now ſo well provided for by the act for lords juſtices, that he thought no evil could poſſibly happen to the church before her arrival. That he wondered the houſe of Hanover ſhould be now eſteemed ſuch a ſecurity to the church, whereas, when the laws were made for the ſecurity of that ſucceſſion, it was generally reckoned a hardſhip upon the church; urging, that a clergyman, in a company of convocation men, had openly called the princeſs Sophia 'an unbaptized Lutheran,' the truth of which he could prove. As to the 'Occaſional bill,' he ſaid, that matter had been canvaſſed already; and it was then the opinion of that houſe, that it would not prove of any advantage and ſecurity to the church, but rather the contrary. That, upon the whole, there had been times in their memory, wherein the church might be ſaid to be in danger. That king Charles II. was a Roman catholic; at leaſt, his brother thought fit to declare it after his death; and the ſucceſſor, who had the management of all affairs, was known to be ſuch; and yet the church thought herſelf then ſecure; and thoſe patriots, who ſtood up in its defence, and endeavoured to prevent the evils, which might enſue from a popiſh ſucceſſor, were diſcountenanced and puniſhed. Nay (added his lordſhip) when that ſucceſſor came to the throne, and that the church was very apparently in the greateſt danger by the high-commiſſion court, and otherwiſe, we were then indeed generally alarmed; but we know who ſate in that court, and went large ſteps in the work then on foot[r]. That, ſoon after the ſucceſſion of king William to the crown, the cry of the church's danger began, and was continued all his reign, but with what ground his lordſhip was yet unacquainted with. That, upon her majeſty's happy ſucceſſion, for ſome time the complaint was ſilent; but that, when ſhe was pleaſed to make ſome alterations in her miniſtry, it was immediately revived, and ever ſince continued: And ſo his lordſhip concluded, that 'the church was now in no danger."

The biſhop of London (Compton) coming into the houſe juſt as theſe laſt words were delivered, immediately took up the lord Hallifax; giving for his reaſon of the church's being in danger, " That profaneneſs and irreligion were ſo rife among us, and the licentiouſneſs of the preſs ſo intolerable, that a moſt vile book had been lately publiſhed by a clergyman in his dioceſe (meaning Mr. Hickeringhill) whom he had endeavoured to puniſh; but that he had ſuch ſubterfuges in the quirks of the law, that he could not come at him: And that ſermons were preached, wherein rebellion was countenanced, and reſiſtance to the higher powers encouraged." To this the biſhop of Saliſbury replied, " That his lordſhip ought to have been the laſt man to complain of that ſermon (meaning Mr. Benjamin Hoadley's before the lord-mayor) for, if the doctrine of that ſermon was not good, he did not know what defence his lordſhip could make for his appearing in arms at Nottingham. Then the biſhop, proceeding to the queſtion in debate, inſtanced in a piece of French hiſtory in the reign of Henry the third (which, he ſaid, had been much in vogue of late in a neighbouring houſe) in whoſe time the catholics ſet up the ſame cry of the church's danger from the Huguenots, and forced the king to comply with them; but that, their power thereby becoming great, they turned it upon the king himſelf, and he found he ſhould be thruſt into a monaſtery, if he did not ſpeedily cruſh them, and therefore ſtabbed the duke of Guiſe to the heart. To the reaſons, which the noble lord, who began the debate, gave for the church's danger, he replied, that, as to the Scots affairs, he was par-

[q] On the 15th of November, the duke of Montague was in that quality introduced into the houſe of peers; as was, on the 3d of December, the duke of Argyle of the kingdom of Scotland, as baron and earl of the kingdom of England, by the title of baron of Chatham, and earl of Greenwich in the county of Kent. The ſame day the queen came to the houſe of peers with the uſual ſtate, and gave the royal aſſent to 'an act for exhibiting a bill in this preſent parliament, for naturalizing the moſt excellent princeſs Sophia, electreſs and ducheſs dowager of Hanover, and the iſſue of her body.'

ticularly acquinted with them, and therefore he would venture to ſpeak with the more aſſurance. That the Scots Kirk being eſtabliſhed without a toleration was an unfair allegation; for there needed no law for toleration, where there was no law to inhibit. The Epiſcopalians were not forbid to worſhip God their own way, being only excluded from livings; and that there were at that time fourteen epiſcopal meeting-houſes in Edingburgh, as open as the churches, and as freely reſorted to; in many of which the Engliſh liturgy was uſed, but that in ſeveral of them the queen was not prayed for. And the bill for giving patrons liberty of conferring their benefices on clerks epiſcopally ordained would have paſſed (at leaſt, king William had allowed it) if they would have put in a clauſe to oblige them to take the oath to the government; but, upon offering that clauſe, the perſon, that ſollicited it, let it drop. That, if the lord, who had mentioned the 'act of ſecurity,' had looked two years backwards, he might have found another law, which ſeemed much more to his purpoſe: namely, 'the act for confirming preſbytery, 1 Annæ; but his lordſhip was a miniſter of ſtate, when that act paſſed, and ſo perhaps adviſed it." As to the argument of the Hanover family, it was not obſerved, that the biſhop offered any thing remarkable; and, for the 'Occaſional Conformity bill,' he ſaid, "It had been there already ſufficiently argued, and he was glad they were rid of it: But, as to what a noble prelate had advanced, he owned, that the church would always be ſubject to the enmity of 'profaneneſs and irreligion:' That the devil would have his agents in the world, be the government never ſo careful; but he hoped he might ſay, that irreligion and profaneneſs were not now at a higher pitch than uſually: That he hoped quite the contrary, and thought the ſociety ſet up for reformation in London, and other cities, had contributed conſiderably to the ſuppreſſing of vice. He was ſure the corporation for 'the propagation of the goſpel' had done a great deal towards inſtructing men in religion, by giving great numbers of books in practical divinity; by erecting libraries in country pariſhes; by ſending over many able divines to the foreign plantations; erecting libraries for their uſe; and ſetting up ſchools to breed up children in chriſtian knowledge: That, to his knowledge, one thouſand two hundred pounds had been expended, the year before, in books to theſe purpoſes, all collected by voluntary contribution, but, in truth, very little from thoſe, who appeared ſo wonderfully zealous for the church. That the preſs was indeed become very licentious, and ſermons were preached, wherein very ſtrange expreſſions were publiſhed: That he would read ſome of them to their lordſhips; and then taking out Tilly's and Madder's ſermons, and having read ſome paragraphs, theſe, ſaid he, were preached at Oxford, and theſe are the men picked out for public occaſions." Then the archbiſhop of York, ſtanding up, ſaid, "that he apprehended danger from the 'increaſe of Diſſenters,' and particularly from the many academies ſet up by them; and moved, that the judges might be conſulted what laws were in force againſt ſuch ſeminaries, and by what means they might be ſuppreſſed." Hereupon the lord Wharton moved, "That the judges might alſo be conſulted, about means of ſuppreſſing ſchools and ſeminaries held by nonjurors, in one of which a noble lord of that houſe had both his ſons educated." Upon which the ſame archbiſhop ſtood up again, and ſaid, "He ſuppoſed he was the perſon meant, and therefore he muſt explain that matter. He owned his two ſons were taught by Mr. Ellis, a ſober virtuous man, and a man of letters, who had qualified himſelf according to law, when they were ſent to him; but, when the abjuration-oath was injoined, it ſeems, he refuſed it; which, as ſoon as he was informed of, he took his ſons from him." The lord Wharton, having made a reply to this, went on, and ſaid, "That, although he had been born and bred a diſſenter, yet he ſoon conformed to the church, when he grew up, and became acquainted with its doctrine and diſcipline: That he was now firmly reſolved, by God's bleſſing, always to continue in that church, and would go as far in defending it as any man. Wherefore, if he were now ſenſible, that it was in any danger, he would heartily concur in providing remedies againſt it; but that, after all the cry and expectation they were ſcrewed up to, hearing wherein thoſe dangers conſiſted, it appeared juſt as he expected, namely, that it was only repeating the memorial, which pamphlet he had carefully read over, but could learn nothing from it, except that the d—— of B——, the E—— of R——, the E—— of N——, were out of place. What theſe B's, R's, and N's meant, he could not tell: Perhaps there might be ſome charm in it for the church's ſecurity; but, if theſe letters meant ſome noble perſons there preſent, he remembered very well, that ſome of them ſate in the high commiſſion court, and then made no complaints of the church's danger: But now that we had a queen, who was herſelf a real lover of the church, and had given ſuch encouragement and bountiful tokens of her affection to it, we muſt be amuſed with the church's danger. But he concluded, with being of opinion, 'that the church was in no danger." Then Patrick, biſhop of Ely, ſtood up, and moved, "That the judges might be conſulted, what power the queen had in viſiting the univerſities; complaining of the heat and paſſion of the gentlemen there, which they inculcated into their pupils, who brought the ſame fury with them to the pariſhes, when they came abroad, to the great diſturbance of public charity. That, at the election at Cambridge, it was ſhameful to ſee an hundred or more young ſtudents encouraged in hallooing, like ſchool-boys and porters, and crying out, 'No fanatics, no occaſional conformity,' againſt two worthy gentlemen who ſtood candidates. Adding another complaint of the undutifulneſs of the clergy to their biſhops, and the difficulty the latter had to govern them regularly." Hough, biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry, made the ſame complaint; ſpoke of the opprobrious names, which the clergy gave their biſhops, and of the calumnies they laid on them, as if they were in a plot to deſtroy the church, and had compounded to be the laſt of their order; and, when the plot was ripe, to reſign their biſhoprics, and accept of a penſion for life. He alledged, That the church was as well governed, as it had at any time been; challenged any body to charge the biſhops with any omiſſion of their duty, or any action, wherein they ſtrained their power, or injured any body; mentioned the honour he had to ſuffer in a good cauſe; and added, that he thought that might have protected his reputation from the aſperſion of being an enemy to the church. Hooper, biſhop of Bath and Wells, complained of the terms of high-church and low-church, ſaying, "That it was an invidious diſtinction, tending to ſet us at enmity: That, by high-church, people were made to believe a man inclined to popery, or, at leaſt, one, that endeavoured to carry church power beyond our conſtitution; which he thought was great injuſtice to the gentlemen, that bore that character, who meant nothing more, than to keep up the juſt dignity and diſcipline of the church: Neither did he believe, that the others, called the low church, had any deſigns of lowering or levelling it with preſbytery, as was, on the other hand, maliciouſly ſuggeſted." The duke of Leeds obſerved, "That he apprehended the church was in danger, and that it could not be ſafe without the act againſt occaſional conformity: Adding, that the queen had, in a diſcourſe with him, declared herſelf of that opinion." The lord Sommers recapitulated all the arguments on both ſides[s], added his own judgment, and ended with a declaration, "That the nation was happy, and under a moſt wiſe and juſt adminiſtration, wherein the public money was juſtly applied, the treaſury kept in a moſt regular method, and thereby the public credit in the higheſt eſteem: The armies and fleets were ſupplied; and the ſucceſs of her majeſty's arms gave the nation greater honour and reputation than had

[s] Biſhop Burnet gives us the ſubſtance of the debates in the following manner: On the day appointed we were all made to believe, that we ſhould hear many frightful things: But our expectations were not anſwered: Some ſpoke of danger from the preſbytery, that was ſettled in Scotland: Some ſpoke of the abſence of the next ſucceſſor: Some reflected on the occaſional bill, that was rejected in that houſe: Some complained of the ſchools of the diſſenters: And others reflected on the principles, that many had drank in, that were different from thoſe formerly received, and that ſeemed deſtructive of the church.

In oppoſition to all this, it was ſaid, that the church was ſafer now than ever it had been: At the revolution, proviſion was made, that our king muſt be of the reformed religion, nor was this all; in the late act of ſucceſſion it was enacted, that he ſhould be of the communion of the church of England: It was not reaſonable to object to the houſe the rejecting a bill, which was done by the majority, of whom it became not the leſſer number to complain: We had all our former laws left to us, not only entire, but fortified by late additions and explanations; ſo that we were ſafer in all theſe, than we had been at any time formerly: The diſſenters gained no new ſtrength, they were viſibly decreaſing: The toleration had ſoftened their tempers, and they concurred zealouſly in ſerving all the ends of the government; nor was there any particular complaint brought againſt them: They ſeemed quiet and content with their toleration, if they could be but ſecure of enjoying it: The queen was taking the moſt effectual means poſſible, to deliver the clergy from the depreſſions of poverty, that brought them under much contempt, and denied them the neceſſary means and helps of ſtudy: The biſhops looked after their dioceſes with a care, that had not been known in the memory of man: Great ſums were yearly raiſed, by their care and zeal, for ſerving the plantations better than had ever yet been done: A ſpirit of zeal and piety appeared in our churches, and at ſacrament, beyond the example of former times. In one reſpect it was acknowledged the church was in danger; there was an evil ſpirit and a virulent temper ſpread among the clergy; there were many indecent ſermons preached on public occaſions, and thoſe hot clergymen, who were not the moſt regular in their lives, had raiſed factions in many dioceſes againſt their biſhops: Theſe were dangers created by thoſe very men, who filled the nation with this out-cry againſt imaginary ones, while their own conduct produced real and threatening dangers. Burnet, Vol. II. p. 435.

However

ever been known; and that we had a fair proſpect of bringing the war to a happy concluſion, to the immortal honour of the preſent age, and to the inexpreſſible benefit and ſafety of poſterity. Wherefore for men to raiſe groundleſs jealouſies, at this time of day, could mean no leſs than an intention to embroil us at home, and to defeat all thoſe glorious deſigns abroad." The debate being at length over, the queſtion was put, Whether the church of England was in danger? which, upon a diviſion, was carried in the negative by a majority of ſixty-one voices againſt thirty; and then their lordſhips made the following vote, viz. "Reſolved by the lords ſpiritual and temporal, that the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed, which was reſcued from the extremeſt danger by king William III. of glorious memory, is now, by God's bleſſing, under the happy reign of her majeſty, in a moſt ſafe and flouriſhing condition; and that whoever goes about to ſuggeſt and inſinuate that the church is in danger under her majeſty's adminiſtration, is an enemy to the queen, the church, and the kingdom[t]."

The next day, December 7, the lords ſent a meſſage to the commons, to acquaint them with their proceedings, and to deſire their concurrence to their reſolution in relation to the church. Whereupon the queſtion was put the day following, Whether they ſhould conſider of that meſſage in a committee, or in a full houſe? It being carried for the latter, by a majority of two hundred and twenty-two voices againſt one hundred and ſixty-one, Mr. Bromley opened the debate with a ſpeech, wherein he endeavoured to prove the church to be in danger, by the ſame arguments that had been inſiſted on in the houſe of peers, ſuch as, "The power of the preſbyterians in Scotland, where the church of England was not ſo much as tolerated: The abſence of the next proteſtant ſucceſſor, in caſe of the queen's demiſe: The want of an act againſt 'Occaſional conformity:' The encreaſe of preſbyterian ſchools and ſeminaries: Profaneneſs, immorality, and irreligion: And the act of Security paſſed in Scotland: To which he added another, viz. the abuſe and ill diſpenſation of her majeſty's late bounty to the clergy." Sir John Packington, who ſpoke on the ſame ſide, urged the licentiouſneſs of the preſs, and the great number of libels, which were daily publiſhed againſt the church; the encreaſe of preſbyterian conventicles; and the lords reſolution itſelf, which was the ſubject-matter of their debate, as proofs of the church's being in danger; adding, "That if the commons agreed to that reſolve, the ſame would, in ſome meaſure, have the force of an act of parliament, which would be a dangerous weapon in the hands of ill miniſters of ſtate, who thereby might awe people into ſilence, in caſe the fancy ſhould take them to ſuppreſs epiſcopacy." The oppoſite party anſwered theſe arguments, and, after a long debate, the lords reſolution was agreed to by a majority of two hundred and twelve againſt a hundred and ſixty; and, on the 14th of December, the commons agreed likewiſe with the lords in an addreſs to the queen, containing the reſolution relating to the church, "beſeeching her withal, to take effectual meaſures for making the reſolution public; and alſo for puniſhing the authors and ſpreaders of the ſeditious and ſcandalous reports of the church being in danger." The queen anſwered, "That ſhe would freely comply with their addreſs, and was very well pleaſed to find both houſes ſo forward to join with her in putting a ſtop to theſe malicious reports." And, according to the deſire of both houſes, the queen, on the 20th of December, ordered a proclamation to be iſſued out, for making their 'Reſolution' public; and for diſcovering the author of 'the memorial of the church of England,' and apprehending David Edwards, a profeſſed papiſt, charged upon oath to be the printer and publiſher of that libel [u].

The queen came, the next day, to the houſe of peers, and among other bills, gave the royal aſſent to the land-tax bill; and alſo to an act for the naturalization of the moſt excellent princeſs Sophia, 'electreſs and ducheſs dowager of Hanover, and the iſſue of her body;' which done, ſhe made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein ſhe took notice of 'the unanimity of their proceedings, and of the good diſpoſition they had ſhewn towards an union with Scotland; and returned the commons thanks for the great diſpatch of this ſeaſonable ſupply, not doubting but after the receſs, they would return with the ſame good diſpoſitions to give all poſſible diſpatch to the public affairs ſtill depending.' The commons, having reſolved to preſent an addreſs of thanks for this ſpeech adjourned themſelves to the 7th of January following.

[1705-6] As ſoon as the commons met again, they reſolved "to give the thanks of their houſe to the duke of Marlborough, for his great ſervices performed to her majeſty and the nation in the laſt campaign, and for his prudent negotiations with her allies:" And they appointed a committee for that purpoſe, who having attended the duke, he ſaid, "He was ſo ſenſible of the great honour, that was done him by this meſſage, that he could not have the leaſt concern at the reflections of any private malice, while he had the ſatisfaction of finding his faithful endeavours to ſerve the queen, and the kingdom, ſo favourably accepted by the houſe of commons." That next day, Mr. Secretary Hedges acquainted the houſe, "That her majeſty, in purſuance of the addreſs of both houſes, had put out a proclamation, in which was an encouragement for the diſcovery of the author of the 'memorial of the church of England, &c.' The printer of which book being now in cuſtody, and other perſons examined, in whoſe depoſitions there appeared the names of ſome members of this houſe; her majeſty's tenderneſs for any thing, which had the appearance of the privileges of this houſe, had inclined her to command him to acquaint this houſe, before ſhe directed any further proceedings in that examination." Upon this the commons reſolved, "That an addreſs of thanks be preſented to her majeſty, for her tender regard to the privileges of this houſe; and to deſire, that ſhe would be pleaſed to give order for the further examination into the authors of the libel mentioned in her paſſage." Which addreſs being preſented, the queen anſwered, "That ſhe was glad to find this houſe expreſs ſo much reſentment againſt the libel mentioned in her meſſage, and took very kindly the confidence the houſe repoſed in her, which ſhe would make the beſt uſe of for the advantage of the public."

It is to be obſerved, that, on the 15th of January, David Edwards, printer of the 'Memorial,' who had a long time abſconded, and was left without any ſupport by the party,

[t] However this reſolution was oppoſed by many lords, who entered the following reaſons for diſſenting from it: Firſt, "Becauſe they conceived there might be dangers to the church always impending on ſeveral accounts: That the prayers ſet forth to be uſed on the ſolemn faſt-days, under the head of 'a prayer for unity, imploring, God Almighty's grace, that every body may ſeriouſly lay to heart the great danger we are in by our unhappy diviſions,' ſhewed plainly, that, in the opinion of the compilers of that form of prayer, and in her majeſty's judgment, who commanded it to be uſed in all the churches and chapels throughout England and Wales, there were very many dangers." Secondly, "They conceived the church in danger from a neighbouring kingdom, which, though under her majeſty's ſovereignty, during her life, had not yet been induced to ſettle the ſame ſucceſſion to the crown, as was eſtabliſhed in this kingdom in the proteſtant line; but that, on the contrary, that ſucceſſion had been abrogated by the 'act of ſecurity,' which, with ſeveral other acts paſſed in that kingdom, had been judged by this houſe to be dangerous to the preſent and future peace of this kingdom." Thirdly, "They conceived there might be very great dangers to the church for want of a law to prevent any perſons whatſoever from holding any offices of truſt and authority, both in church and ſtate, who were not conſtantly of the communion of the church eſtabliſhed by law; and therefore on the account of the unhappy diviſions in point of religious and divine worſhip, as alſo on the account of the calamities of the age, in the too public and common diſowning any religion at all, the church might be in danger." Fourthly, "Though they had an entire confidence in her majeſty's zeal and piety to the church, they durſt not, in duty to her majeſty, and the ſervice of the government, condemn all ſuch as might have fears, in relation to the preſervation of the church and ſafety of the crown." And, fifthly, "being ſincerely convinced, that theſe reaſons, among others mentioned in the debate, were ſufficient to juſtify their fears, they conceived that it was not a proper way to prevent dangers, by voting there are none." Theſe reaſons were ſigned by the following peers,

Duke of Buckingham,	Lord Craven,
Earl of Northampton,	Lord Chandos,
Earl of Caernarvon,	Lord Guernſey,
Earl of Weymouth,	Earl of Thanet,
Lord Oſborn,	Earl of Scarſdale,
Earl of Denbigh,	Earl of Rocheſter,
Dr. George Hooper, biſhop of Bath and Wells,	Lord Conway,
	Lord Howard of Eſerick,
Lord Granville,	Henry, Biſhop of London,
Duke of Beaufort,	Duke of Leeds,
Earl of Winchelſea,	Lord Guildford,
Earl of Nottingham,	Earl of Abingdon,
Lord North and Grey,	Lord Haverſham.
Earl of Angleſea,

The lord Haverſham proteſted only for the firſt, ſecond, and fourth reaſons. The archbiſhop of York, the biſhop of St. Aſaph, the earl of Suſſex, and the lord Leigh were of the thirty, who voted againſt the reſolution, but did not enter their proteſt; and the archbiſhop of York and the biſhop of Rocheſter proteſted afterwards.

[u] In the debates of this ſeſſion ſome ſevere remarks were made on the men in power. December 19. the regency-bill ingroſſed from the lords, intituled, 'An act for the better ſecurity of her majeſty's perſon and government, and of the ſucceſſion to the crown of England in the proteſtant line,' being read a ſecond time; a debate roſe thereupon, wherein Charles Cæſar eſq. member for the borough of Hertford, ſaid, among other things, "That there was a noble lord, without whoſe advice the queen did nothing, who, in the late reign, was known to keep a conſtant correſpondence with the court of St. Germains." This being a ſevere reflection on the lord-treaſurer, the words were directed to be ſet down in writing at the table, upon which Mr. Cæſar endeavoured to excuſe himſelf; and being withdrawn, after a ſhort debate, it was reſolved, "That the ſaid words were highly diſhonourable to her majeſty's perſon and government; and that the ſaid Charles Cæſar, eſq. be, for his ſaid offence, committed priſoner to the Tower."

On

that employed him, was, by his own conſent, taken into cuſtody of a ſtate meſſenger, upon promiſe in writing from Mr. ſecretary Harley, "That he ſhould have his pardon, provided he diſcovered the author or authors of that pamphlet." Three days after, being examined before the ſame ſecretary, he pretended he could fix it upon three gentlemen, members of the houſe of commons, Mr. Pooley, Mr. Ward, and ſir Humphrey Mackworth; and related, that a woman in a maſk, with another barefaced, brought the manuſcript to him, and made a bargain with him to have two hundred and fifty printed copies of it, which he delivered to four porters, ſent to him by the perſons concerned. But though the woman, who came to Edwards's without a maſk, and ſome of the porters, were found out, and taken up, yet it was impoſſible to carry on the diſcovery any farther; which gave occaſion to a member of the houſe of commons, Mr. Pooley, to ſay, "That it was not uſual to accuſe members of their houſe of being concerned in any thing to the prejudice of the government, without naming their names."

After this, the commons proceeded with great chearfulneſs in the diſpatch of the public buſineſs; and, on the 16th of February, the queen came to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral money bills; after which ſhe made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein ſhe thanked the commons in particular, 'for perfecting ſo great ſupples in ſo ſhort a time.'

On the 23d of the ſame month, the commons proceeded to take into further conſideration the accounts of the revenues and debts, ever ſince the queen's acceſſion to the crown, and reſolved, "That it appeared to this houſe, that the public revenues granted or ariſen, ſince her majeſty's happy acceſſion to the crown, had been duly applied to the advancement of the public credit, and for the advantage and honour of the nation."

The commons went on in creating funds for the ſupplies, which they had voted for the next year. And the nation was ſo well ſatisfied with the government, and the conduct of affairs, that a fund being created for two millions and a half by way of annuities for ninety-nine years, at ſix and a half per cent, at the end of which the capital was to ſink, the whole ſum was ſubſcribed in a very few days. At the ſame time, the duke of Marlborough propoſed the advance of a ſum of five hundred thouſand pounds to the emperor, for the uſe of prince Eugene, and the ſervice of Italy, upon a branch of the emperor's revenue in Sileſia at eight per cent, and the capital to be repaid in eight years. The nation ſo abounded both in money and zeal, that this was likewiſe advanced in a very few days. Our armies, as well as our allies, were every where punctually paid. The credit of the nation was never raiſed ſo high in any age, nor ſo ſacredly maintained. The treaſury was as exact and as regular in all payments, as any private banker could be. It is true, a great deal of money went out of the kingdom in ſpecie. That, which maintained the war in Spain, was to be ſent thither in that manner, the way by bills of exchange not being yet opened. The trade with Spain and the Weſt Indies, which formerly brought great returns of money, was now ſtopped. By this means, there grew to be a ſenſible want of money over the nation. This was in a great meaſure ſupplied by the currency of Exchequer bills and bank notes. And this lay ſo obvious to the diſaffected party, that they were often attempting to blaſt, at leaſt to diſparage this paper credit: But it was ſtill kept up. It raiſed a juſt indignation in all, who had a true love to their country, to ſee ſome uſing all poſſible methods to ſhake the adminiſtration, which, notwithſtanding the difficulties at home and abroad, was much the beſt, that had been in the memory of man, and was certainly not only eaſy to the ſubjects in general, but gentle even towards thoſe, who were endeavouring to undermine it.

On the 27th of February, a petition of the gentry and clergy of the ſouth parts of Lancaſhire, at their monthly meeting, on the 12th, in the borough of Wigan, for ſuppreſſing profaneneſs and immorality, was preſented to the houſe, complaining of ſeveral grievances they laboured under from the prieſts, Romiſh gentry, and popiſh emiſſaries, and praying for redreſs and relief. After the reading of this petition, it was unanimouſly reſolved to addreſs the queen, "that ſhe would be pleaſed to iſſue out her royal proclamation for the putting in execution the laws in force againſt all ſuch perſons, as had or ſhould endeavour to pervert her majeſty's ſubjects to the popiſh religion:" And they ordered, that a bill be brought in for making more effectual the act of the eleventh year of his late majeſty's reign, 'for the further preventing the growth of popery.' This bill was accordingly preſented the next day by ſir James Montague, and read the firſt time; and, on the 1ſt of March, the commons gave it a ſecond reading, and went through it in a grand committee. By the act, paſſed in the latter end of the late reign, it was provided, "That all papiſts ſhould, within ſix months, after they had reached the age of eighteen, take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, or declare themſelves proteſtants; in default whereof, their eſtates were to go to the next heirs, being proteſtants." Now this clauſe was ſo lamely expreſſed, that the Roman catholics found two ways to evade it. Firſt, there being in all families a gradation of age among the ſeveral heirs to the ſame eſtates, it happened, that though the perſon, who was come to the age of eighteen, did not take the oaths preſcribed by the law, yet the title of proteſtant heir remained undecided, as long as any next popiſh heir was under age. Secondly (and this was the main inconvenience) it lying by that clauſe upon the next heir to him, who at the age of eighteen refuſed to declare himſelf a proteſtant, to prove, that he had not made that declaration, it was impoſſible for the next heir to prove ſuch a negative. Now, to make that clauſe binding and effectual, it was enacted in this bill, "That all papiſts and reputed papiſts ſhould, within ſix months after they had reached the age of eighteen, not only declare themſelves proteſtants, but prove alſo, that they had made ſuch a declaration." This alarmed all of that religion, ſo that they made very powerful (or to follow the raillery of that time) weighty interceſſions with the conſiderable men of the houſe of commons. The court looked on, and ſeemed indifferent in the matter; yet it was given out, that ſo ſevere a law would be very unreaſonable, when the nation was in alliance with ſo many princes of that religion; and that it muſt leſſen the force of the queen's interceſſion in favour of the proteſtants, who lived in the dominions of thoſe princes. The proceeding ſeemed rigorous, and not ſuited to the gentleneſs, which the chriſtian religion ſo particularly recommended, and was contrary to the maxims of liberty of conſcience and toleration, that were then in great vogue. It was anſwered, that the dependence of thoſe of that religion on a foreign juriſdiction, and at preſent on a foreign pretender to the crown, put them out of the caſe of other ſubjects, who might differ from the eſtabliſhed religion, ſince there ſeemed to be good reaſon to conſider them as enemies rather than as ſubjects. But the application was made in ſo effectual a manner, that the bill was let fall; for, on the 2d of March, when ſir James Montague was to report to the houſe the amendments made to the bill by the grand committee, the duke of Norfolk, the chief among the Roman catholics in England, petitioned, "That he might be heard by his council for explanation of ſome words in the bill, and for ſuch relief to him, as to the houſe ſhould ſeem meet." Upon the reading of this petition, the commons ordered, that the duke of Norfolk be heard by his council, as to the property in the office of earl-marſhal of England only. But, his council not being then ready, the houſe heard ſir James Montague's report, and then ordered the bill, with the amendments, to be engroſſed. Two days after, the bill was read the third time, and ſeveral other amendments were made to it; after which the queſtion was put, 'that the bill do paſs?' This occaſioned a great debate, wherein colonel Godfrey, Mr. Boſcawen, and Mr. Aſgil endeavoured to ſhew the injuſtice of ſuch a law, urging, that, beſides the offence it would give to the Roman catholic princes in alliance with the nation, it would look as if they approved the perſecution exerciſed by the French king and other catholic princes againſt their proteſtant ſubjects. At laſt the bill was rejected by a majority of one hundred and nineteen againſt forty-three. And, though the lords had made ſome ſteps towards ſuch a bill, yet ſince they ſaw what fate it was like to have in the houſe of commons, inſtead of proceeding further in it, they diſmiſſed that matter with an addreſs to the queen, on the 14th of March, "That a more watchful eye ſhould be had over the Britiſh prieſts and papiſts for the future; and, for that purpoſe, that a diſtinct and particular account ſhould be taken of all papiſts and reputed papiſts in the kingdom, with their reſpective qualities, eſtates, and places of abode; and that the ſeveral accounts of theſe enquiries be laid before their houſe at the next ſeſſion of parliament." To this addreſs the queen anſwered, "That ſhe was fully convinced, that the inſolent behaviour of the papiſts had made what their lordſhips adviſed neceſſary to be done for the ſafety of her perſon and government, and the welfare of her people; and that ſhe would give the neceſſary orders for every thing their lordſhips deſired." But whatever orders were given, they were very negligently executed[w].

There was a project ſet on foot at this time by the lord

[w] On the 2d of March, the lords read a petition of Joſeph Boone, merchant, in behalf of himſelf and many other inhabitants of the province of Carolina, and London merchants trading thither: Upon which, the lord Granville, palatine of the province of Carolina, having deſired to be heard by his

Hallifax, for putting the records and public offices of the kingdom in better order. He had, in a former ſeſſion, moved the lords to ſend ſome of their number to view the records in the Tower, which were in great diſorder, and in a viſible decay, for want of ſome more officers, and by the neglect of thoſe employed. The lords, in their report, propoſed ſome regulations for the future, which have been ſince followed ſo effectually (though at a conſiderable charge, by creating ſeveral new officers) that the nation has reaped the benefit of all this very ſenſibly. But lord Hallifax carried this project much farther. The famous library, collected by ſir Robert Cotton, and continued down in his family, was perhaps the greateſt collection of manuſcripts relating to the public, that any nation in Europe could ſhew. The late owner of it, ſir John Cotton, had by his will left it to the public, but in ſuch words, that it was rather ſhut up, than made any way uſeful: and, indeed, it was to be ſo carefully preſerved, that none could be the better for it. Lord Hallifax therefore moved the houſe of lords to intreat the queen, that ſhe would be pleaſed to buy Cotton-Houſe, which ſtood juſt between the two houſes of parliament; ſince ſome part of that ground would furniſh them with many uſeful rooms, and there would be enough left for building a noble ſtructure for a library; to which, beſides the Cotton library and the queen's library, the royal ſociety, who had a very good one at Greſham college, would remove and keep their aſſemblies there, as ſoon as it was made convenient for them. This was a great deſign, which that lord who ſet it on foot, ſeemed reſolved to carry on till it was finiſhed. Had that been done it would have been of great advantage to the learned world, as well as an honour to the queen's reign.

The lord Sommers likewiſe made a motion in the houſe of lords, to correct ſome of the proceedings in the common law and in chancery, which were both dilatory and very chargeable. He began the motion with ſome inſtances, that were more conſpicuous and groſs; and he managed the matter ſo, that both the lord keeper and judges concurred with him, though it paſſes generally for a maxim, that judges ought rather to enlarge than contract their juriſdiction. A bill paſſed the houſe of lords, which began a reformation of proceedings at law; but, when it went through the commons, it was viſible, that the intereſt of under officers, clerks, and attornies, whoſe gains were to be leſſened by this bill, was more conſidered than the intereſt of the nation itſelf. Several clauſes, how beneficial ſoever, to the ſubject, which touched on their profit, were left out by the commons. But what fault ſoever the lords might have found with theſe alterations, yet to avoid all diſputes with the commons, they agreed to their amendments.

There was another general complaint made of the private acts of parliament, that paſſed through both houſes too eaſily, and in ſo great a number, that it took up a great part of the ſeſſion to examine them, even in that curſory way, that was ſubject to many inconveniencies. The fees, that were paid for theſe to the ſpeakers and clerks of both houſes, inclined them to favour and promote them. The lord Sommers therefore propoſed a proper regulation in that matter. The lord-keeper Cowper did indeed very generouſly obſtruct thoſe private bills, as much as his predeceſſor Wright had promoted them. He did another thing of a great example: On the firſt day of the year, it became a cuſtom for all thoſe, who practiſed in chancery, to offer a new-year's gift to the lord, who had the great ſeal. Theſe grew to be ſo conſiderable, that they amounted to fifteen hundred pounds a year. On the new year's day of this year, which was his firſt, he ſignified to all thoſe, who, according to cuſtom, were expected to come with their preſents, that he would receive none, but would break that cuſtom. He thought it looked like the inſinuating themſelves into the favour of the court; and that if it was not bribery, yet it came too near it, and looked too like it. This contributed not a little to the raiſing his character; and he managed the court of Chancery with impartial juſtice and great diſpatch, and was very uſeful to the houſe of lords in the promoting of buſineſs [x].

On the 19th of March the queen came to the houſe of peers, and having given the royal aſſent to ſeventeen public acts, and fifty three private ones, ſhe made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

" My Lords and Gentlemen,

" BEING now come to a cloſe of this ſeſſion, I am to return you my thanks for having brought it ſo ſpeedily to a good concluſion, eſpecially for the wiſe and effectual proviſion made to ſecure the proteſtant ſucceſſion in this kingdom, and the great advances on your part, towards procuring the like ſettlement in the kingdom of Scotland, and a happy union of both nations.

" I am very well pleaſed likewiſe with the ſteps you have made for the amendment of the law, and the better advancement of juſtice.

" I muſt again repeat to you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, that I am extremely ſenſible of the diſpatch you have given to the public ſupplies. I aſſure you, I will be very careful, that they may be applied in the moſt effectual manner for our common intereſt.

" My Lords and Gentlemen,

" At the opening of this parliament, I recommended, with great earneſtneſs, an entire union of minds and affections among all my ſubjects, and a ſincere endeavour to avoid and extinguiſh all occaſions of diviſions and animoſity. I am much pleaſed to find, how entirely your ſentiments have agreed with mine. Your unanimity and zeal, which I have his council, the ſame was granted, and the further debate of this affair put off till the 9th of that month. Their lordſhips, having then heard what the lord Granville's council had to offer in his behalf, came to theſe two reſolutions: Firſt, " That it is the opinion of this houſe, that the act of the aſſembly of Carolina lately paſſed there, and ſince ſigned and ſealed by John lord Granville, palatine, for himſelf, and for the lord Carteret, and the lord Craven, and by ſir John Colleton four of the proprietors of that province, in order to the ratifying of an act entitled, 'an act for the eſtabliſhment of religious worſhip in this province, according to the church of England, and for the erecting of churches, for the public worſhip of God, and alſo for the maintenance of miniſters, and the building convenient houſes for them,' ſo far forth as the ſame relates to the eſtabliſhing a commiſſion for the diſplacing the rectors or miniſters of the churches there, is not warranted by the charter granted to the proprietors of that colony as being not conſonant to reaſon, repugnant to the laws of this realm, and deſtructive to the conſtitution of the church of England." Secondly, " That it is the opinion of this houſe, that the act of aſſembly in Carolina, entitled, 'an act for the more effectual preſervation of the government of this province, by requiring all perſons, that ſhall hereafter be choſen members of the commons houſe of aſſembly and ſit in the ſame, to take the oaths, and ſubſcribe the declaration appointed by this act, and to conform to the religious worſhip in this province, according to the church of England, to receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the rights and uſage of the ſaid church,' lately paſſed there, and ſigned and ſealed by John lord Granville, palatine, for himſelf and the lord Craven, and alſo for the lord Carteret, and by ſir John Colleton, four of the proprietors of that province, in order to the ratifying of it, is founded upon falſity in matter of fact, is repugnant to the laws of England, contrary to the charter granted to the proprietors of that colony, is an encouragement to atheiſm and irreligion, is deſtructive to trade, and tends to the depopulating and ruining the ſaid province." Theſe reſolutions being laid before the queen in an addreſs, wherein their lordſhips "beſought her majeſty to deliver the ſaid province from the arbitrary oppreſſions, under which they lay, and to order the authors thereof to be proſecuted according to law;" the queen told them, "That ſhe was very ſenſible of what great conſequence the plantations were to England; and ſhe would do all in her power to relieve her ſubjects in Carolina, and to protect them in their juſt rights." P. R. H. L. II.

[x] There were alſo ſome regulations made this ſeſſion about ſeamen, which were inſerted in a bill for the encouragement and increaſe of ſeamen. This bill was brought in, becauſe about twelve thouſand ſailors were wanted at this time to man the fleet, and was perfected and paſſed both houſes in four days. The reſolutions in the bill were as follow:

I. That, in order to the ſpeedy and more compleat manning of her majeſty's navy for the year 1706, the juſtices of the peace and other civil magiſtrates throughout the ſeveral counties, ridings, cities, towns, and places, within the kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, be empowered and directed forthwith to make, or cauſe to be made, ſtrict and diligent ſearch for all ſuch ſeamen, or ſea-faring men, as lie hid, and are not in her majeſty's ſervice.

II. That the juſtices, and other civil magiſtrates, do take up, ſend, conduct, and convey, or cauſe to be taken up, ſent, conducted, and conveyed, all ſuch ſeamen or ſea-faring men, to be delivered to ſuch perſons, as ſhall be appointed to receive the ſame.

III. That a penalty be inflicted upon every perſon, who ſhall preſume to harbour or conceal ſuch ſeamen or ſea-faring men.

IV. That a reward be given to every perſon, who ſhall diſcover and take up, ſuch ſeamen or ſea-faring men, as aforeſaid, the ſame to be diſtributed and paid to every ſuch diſcoverer or perſon, ſo taking up ſuch ſeamen or ſea-faring men reſpectively, out of the money given for the ſervice of the navy.

V. That conduct money be allowed for conveying and ſubſiſting ſuch ſeamen and ſea-faring men, according to the preſent uſage of the navy.

VI. That, for the encouragement of the ſervice, every ſeaman, who ſhall be turned over from one ſhip to another, ſhall be paid his wages, which ſhall appear to be due to him in the ſhip, from which he was turned over, before ſuch ſhip, to which he ſhall be turned over, do go to ſea, either in money, or by a ticket, which ſhall entitle him to an immediate payment.

VII. That ſuch able-bodied landmen, who are liable to be raiſed for the recruiting her majeſty's land-forces and marines, be raiſed for the ſervice, in the like manner, and delivered to ſuch perſons, who ſhall be appointed to receive the ſame. And they ordered, that the committee, to whom the bill, for the encouragement and encreaſe of ſeamen, and for the better and ſpeedier manning her majeſty's fleet, and for making proviſion for the widows and orphans of all ſuch, as ſhall be ſlain or drowned in her majeſty's ſervice, and for the ſupport of trade, was committed, have power to receive a clauſe or clauſes purſuant to theſe reſolutions: and that it be an inſtruction to the committee, that they have power to receive a clauſe for diſcharging of ſuch ſeamen, and other inſolvent perſons, as are in priſon for debt, and delivering them into her majeſty's ſervice on board the fleet.

obſerved,

obſerved, with great ſatisfaction, throughout this whole ſeſſion, againſt every thing, that tends towards ſedition, doth ſo much diſcourage all ſuch attempts for the future, and hath ſet ſuch an example to the whole kingdom, that, when you are returned into your ſeveral countries, I doubt not but you will find the effects of it every where; and I aſſure myſelf you will make it your buſineſs and care to improve and perfect that good work you have ſo far advanced here; and by continuing to ſhew a juſt diſlike of all factions and turbulent proceedings, and reſolving to diſcountenance the encouragers of them, you will ſoon make the whole kingdom ſenſible of the good effect of ſo prudent and happy a conduct."

Then the lord-keeper prorogued the parliament to the 21ſt of May following.

Thus this ſeſſion of parliament came to a very happy concluſion. There was in it the beſt harmony within both houſes, and between them, as well as with the crown; and it was the beſt applauded in the city of London, over the whole nation, and indeed over all Europe, of any ſeſſion of thoſe times. And when it was conſidered, that this was the firſt of the three, ſo that there were to be two other ſeſſions of the ſame members, it gave an univerſal ſatisfaction, both to the people at home, and our allies abroad, and afforded a proſpect of a happy end, that would be put to this devouring war, in all probability before the concluſion of the parliament. This gave an inexpreſſible ſatisfaction to all, who loved their country and religion, and who now hoped, that there was in view a good and ſafe peace.

With the new parliament, a new convocation alſo met at St. Paul's, October 15th. The Latin ſermon was preached by Dr. Stanhope, but Dr. Binks carried it from him for prolocutor, and was preſented by the dean of Chriſt-Church. This convocation was choſen as the former had been, and the members, that were ill-affected, were ſtill prevailed on to come up, and to continue in an expenſive, but uſeleſs attendance in town. The upper houſe ſoon agreed in an addreſs to the queen, containing humble thanks for her affectionate care for the church of England, as eſtabliſhed by law, from her firſt acceſſion to the throne to this day. And then they added thus, by way of harmony with the two houſes of parliament: "We are exceedingly grieved, that any of your ſubjects ſhould be ſo ungrateful and unworthy, as once to ſuggeſt, that our 'church can be in danger,' for want of ſuch ſupport and encouragement in your majeſty's reign, as may make it flouriſh in your own time, and leave it ſecure after you. And, although it is no new thing for deſigning men to proſtitute the venerable name of the church to the ſervice of their own private ends, yet we think it very ſtrange, that any ſhould be found ſo extremely weak and undutiful as to be deluded by theſe groundleſs clamours, when they have been ſo often and ſo publicly confuted by your royal word and actions; and when the happy ſtate of the church of England is ſo much obſerved and eſteemed abroad, that ſeveral of the foreign churches are endeavouring to accommodate themſelves to our liturgy and conſtitution. To inſinuate that 'the church is in danger' under theſe circumſtances, and againſt all the teſtimonies and aſſurances of your royal care and protection, can proceed from nothing but prejudice, intereſt, and ambition. We humbly crave leave to expreſs our juſt reſentment of the 'indignity of all ſuch ſuggeſtions' not only as falſe and groundleſs in themſelves, but chiefly as they are diſhonourable reflections upon your royal promiſes for the ſupport of the church, and upon your princely wiſdom in chuſing the moſt proper and effectual meaſures to that end. We beg leave alſo, in a deep ſenſe of your majeſty's goodneſs, and an entire dependence upon your royal word, to expreſs our great joy and ſatisfaction in the flouriſhing condition of the church under your moſt auſpicious government. We are ſure it will always be in your will to ſupport and protect it; and that the diſtractions, which theſe groundleſs jealouſies are intended to raiſe, may never put it out of your power, we promiſe to uſe our utmoſt endeavours to diſcountenance them, and, in our ſeveral ſtations, to defend and preſerve inviolably, ſo far as in us lies, the doctrine, diſcipline, and worſhip of our church, as by law eſtabliſhed; and to promote peace and unity amongſt your ſubjects; praying earneſtly for your majeſty's long and proſperous reign over us, as, under the divine providence, the greateſt bleſſing and ſecurity that either church or ſtate can enjoy."

When this addreſs was communicated to the lower houſe, they refuſed to join in it, but would give no reaſon for their refuſal, and the majority carried it for drawing up one of their own. A committee was appointed, and the dean of Chriſt-Church, at their next meeting, reported an wholly new form, which contained thanks to her majeſty for her great zeal for the church, and tender affection to it, but expreſſed not that full ſatisfaction as to the ſafety of the church, and that indignation againſt ſuch as repreſented her to be in danger, as appeared in that which came down from the upper houſe. This new addreſs was carried up by the prolocutor, November 19. The archbiſhop made anſwer in writing, that they could not receive their addreſs, but required them to go back to their houſe, and conſider the addreſs ſent down to them, and either agree to it, or bring up their exceptions againſt it in writing.

Some of the lower houſe, when they returned, were for doing this: But the majority in two meetings agreed, that ſuch notice be taken of thoſe words in the meſſage from the upper houſe, 'We cannot receive the addreſs you have offered to us,' as to affirm, and effectually aſſert their right, of having what they offered to the upper houſe received by his grace and their lordſhips: That it was proper for the houſe in their anſwer to ſay, that they conceived their lordſhips refuſal was an infringement of that right: That it is not a neceſſary duty of the lower houſe to re-conſider, when their lordſhips require it, what they have declared to their lordſhips they have maturely conſidered, and cannot join in it. That the lower houſe, notwithſtanding their lordſhips expectation, expreſſed in their meſſage, was ſtill at liberty to diſagree, without offering their exceptions: However, they agreed to re-conſider the addreſs of the lords, and to lay before them the ſubſtance of the reſolutions foregoing. They alſo agreed, not to depart from their former reſolution of not joining with their lordſhips in their addreſs; and afterwards, not to carry up any exceptions to their lordſhips addreſs; but to ſignify to them, that it is the undoubted right of the lower houſe to have the paper they preſented received by their lordſhips, and that they hoped they would be ſatisfied upon peruſing it. And that the lower houſe entirely confided in her majeſty's zeal for the church of England, and an hearty deteſtation of all perſons, that ſhould endeavour to raiſe any jealouſies concerning it. And, purſuant to theſe reſolutions, a paper was carried from the lower to the upper houſe, on December 1.

The lower houſe thus refuſing, either to agree to the addreſs, or to offer their objections, the addreſs was let fall; and upon that a ſtop was put to all further communication between the two houſes. The lower houſe went on in their former practice of intermediate ſeſſions, in which they began to enter upon buſineſs, to approve of ſome books, and to cenſure others; and they reſolved to proceed upon the ſame grounds, that factious men among them had before ſet up, though the falſhood of their pretenſions had been evidently made to appear.

On December 16, the dean of Peterborough proteſted againſt the irregularities of the lower houſe: And particularly againſt the prolocutor's proroguing the houſe by the authority of the houſe itſelf: The pretending to a power to put the prolocutor into the chair before he is confirmed by the archbiſhop and biſhops: The pretending to a power to give leave to their members to abſent themſelves, and ſubſtitute proxies: The electing an actuary in prejudice of the right of the archbiſhop: The late diſreſpectful and undutiful carriage of the houſe to the archbiſhop and biſhops, in refuſing their addreſs to her majeſty without making any exceptions. This was ſigned by above fifty, and the whole body was but an hundred and forty-five. Some were neutral, ſo that very near one half broke off from the reſt, and ſate no more with them. The lower houſe would not ſuffer this proteſtation to be read, and therefore it was carried to the upper, and entered in their acts.

Whilſt the lower houſe was deliberating how to vent their indignation againſt the proteſtors, a more ſenſible mortification enſued. The archbiſhop had prorogued them to the 1ſt of March; by which time the queen ſent a letter to him, dated February 25, ſignifying her concern, that the differences in convocation were ſtill kept up, and rather encreaſed than abated: And that ſhe was the more ſurprized, becauſe it had been her conſtant care and endeavour to preſerve the conſtitution of the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed, and to diſcountenance all diviſions and innovations whatſoever: Declaring ſhe was reſolved to maintain her ſupremacy, and the due ſubordination of preſbyters to biſhops, as fundamental parts thereof; and that ſhe expected, that he and his ſuffragans ſhould act conformably to his and her reſolution: and that, in ſo doing, they might be aſſured of the continuance of her favour and protection: And that neither of them ſhould be wanting to any of the clergy, whilſt they were true to the conſtitution, and dutiful to her, and their eccleſiaſti-

cal ſuperiors; and preſerved ſuch a temper as became all, but eſpecially thoſe who were in holy orders: And ſhe required him to communicate this to the biſhops and clergy; and on March 1, to prorogue the convocation to ſuch time as appeared moſt convenient. On that day the archbiſhop ſent for the lower houſe, and read to them the queen's letter, with which they were ſtruck, for it had been carried ſo ſecretly, that it was a ſurprize to them all. When they ſaw they were to be prorogued, they ran indecently to the door, and with ſome difficulty were kept in the room till the prorogation was intimated to them. They went afterwards to their own houſe, where, though prorogued, they ſate ſtill in form, as if they had been a houſe, but they did not venture on paſſing any vote. So factious were they, and ſo implicitly led by thoſe, who had got an aſcendant over them, that, though they had formerly ſubmitted the matters in debate to the queen, yet now, when ſhe declared her pleaſure, they would not acquieſce in it.

An affair of the utmoſt conſequence was now in agitation. The uniting of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland was ever thought of ſuch importance to the wealth, ſtrength, and tranquillity of the iſland of Great Britain, that ſeveral attempts were made towards it, both before and after the union of the two crowns, in the perſon of king James I. of England, and VI. of Scotland; of which attempts it will not be improper to give here a ſummary view.

King Henry VIII. to bring the government of the iſland under one monarch, offered his daughter Mary to king James V. of Scotland; and, to prevent all difficulties, that might happen about the ſucceſſion after his death, he propoſed to make king James duke of York, and lord-lieutenant or deputy governor of England, immediately upon the marriage. The king of Scotland was inclinable enough to fall in with that advantageous propoſal; but the French court and the popiſh clergy, who equally dreaded the effects of ſuch a conjunction, found means to prevent it. This engaged the Scots nation, againſt their will, in a war againſt England, and occaſioned the defeat at Solan Moſſe; which brought their king to his grave, upon an apprehenſion, that his nobility had conſpired againſt him.

King Edward VI. purſuing his father's deſign of an amicable union of the two kingdoms, propoſed a match betwixt himſelf and queen Mary of Scotland; which had been agreed on in the Scots parliament in king Henry VIII's time; but the French and popiſh faction broke that agreement, and brought upon the Scots another war with England, which ended in their defeat at the battle of Pinky near Muſſelburg. Notwithſtanding this great victory, by which the Engliſh became poſſeſſed of moſt of the ſouth of Scotland, yet king Edward and his council were ſo far from deſigning a conqueſt of Scotland, or the overthrowing of the conſtitution of that kingdom, that his uncle, the duke of Somerſet, protector of the kingdom of England, publiſhed a declaration to invite the Scots to amity and equality: "We overcome in war (ſaid that declaration) and offer peace: We win holds, and offer no conqueſt: We get in your land, and offer England. What can be more offered than intercourſe of merchandizes, and interchange of marriages; the aboliſhing of all our ſuch laws, as prohibit the ſame, or might be an impediment to the mutual amity? We have offered not only to leave the authority, name, title, right, or challenge of Conqueror; but to receive that, which is the ſhame of men overcome; to leave the name of the nation, and the glory of our victory, and to take the indifferent old name of Britons; becauſe nothing ſhould be left on our part to be offered; nothing on your part unrefuſed, whereby ye might be inexcuſable. What face has this of conqueſt? We ſeek not to diſinherit your queen, but to make her heirs inheritors alſo of England. We ſeek not to take from you your laws nor cuſtoms; but we ſeek to redreſs your oppreſſion." This was a very generous propoſal from a Conqueror; but the popiſh French faction ſtill made it ineffectual, and brought Scotland under a yoke of French tyranny; which ſo much incenſed the Scots, that, when they ſet about the reformation, they deſtroyed the hierarchy from the very foundations, and reduced the eccleſiaſtics (who had then one third of the kingdom in their poſſeſſion) to their ancient dependence upon the ſtate, as to their maintenance and benefices.

King James I. ſoon after his acceſſion to the Engliſh throne, in March 1604, moved the parliament of England for an union betwixt the two kingdoms; "That, as they were made one in the head, ſo among themſelves they might be inſeparably conjoined, and all memory of by-paſt diviſions extinguiſhed." The motion ſeemed at firſt to be generally well-reliſhed by both nations, whoſe reſpective parliaments appointed their commiſſioners; the Engliſh forty four in number, and the Scots thirty. The met accordingly at Weſtminſter, and agreed upon ſome articles about repealing all hoſtile laws made either in England againſt Scotland, or in Scotland againſt England; and the mutual communication of trade and commerce; reſerving the king's prerogative in the preferment of men to offices and honours in either kingdom. The king recommended the proſecution of that buſineſs to the parliament of England; but, of all the articles agreed upon by the commiſſioners, only that was enacted, which concerned the aboliſhing of 'hoſtile laws.' The king was extremely grieved at this; and conceiving, that the work would more eaſily be effected, if begun in Scotland, called a parliament there. The eſtates, at the king's deſire, readily allowed all the articles concluded in the treaty, with a 'proviſo,' that the ſame ſhould, in like manner, be ratified in the parliament of England; otherwiſe, the concluſions not to have the force of a law. And it was alſo declared, "That, if the union ſhould happen to take effect, the kingdom, notwithſtanding, ſhould remain an abſolute and free monarchy, and the fundamental laws receive no alteration." But, the Engliſh puritans being elated with the hopes they had conceived from an union of the two nations, the church party grew jealous of them, and, inveighing againſt the Scots in parliament, convocation, and pulpits, defeated all endeavours to accompliſh that union. They ſoon diſcovered king James's foible; and, knowing his inclinations to encreaſe his power, they found out other employment for him, which was to advance his prerogative in Scotland, to the ſubverſion of the liberties of that kingdom both in church and ſtate, and concurred with him as heartily in that, as they oppoſed him in the union.

In the reign of king Charles I. we do not find an union to have been once mentioned; for, the prejudices againſt the puritans ſtill encreaſing, and the church party growing powerful at court, by the promotion of biſhop Laud to the ſee of Canterbury, an ill-timed and miſtaken zeal for the church of England had ſo great an aſcendant over that unhappy prince, as to engage him with more eagerneſs than his father to overturn the conſtitution, and endeavour a conqueſt of Scotland; which was one of the fatal cauſes of all his misfortunes.

Soon after the beginning of the civil wars, there was a league or confederacy between the two kingdoms, which continued with various interruptions for ſome years, till it was entirely broke in 1650; when, a war breaking out between the two nations, Scotland was reduced to the obedience of the prevailing power of the houſe of commons, who ſtiled themſelves 'the parliament of England.' But, though Scotland was reduced, it was thought it could not be ſo well ſecured, as by an union. Accordingly, after the battle of Worceſter, the parliament appointed eight commiſſioners to go down to Scotland, and treat with the eſtates of that kingdom of an union. Twenty of thirty-two ſhires, and thirty-five of the then fifty-ſeven boroughs, agreed to the union; and in their aſſembly at Edinburgh, about two months after, the reſt likewiſe concurred. Purſuant to this agreement, a bill was prepared, but, before it could be finiſhed, the long parliament was turned out of doors by Cromwell, which put a ſtop to the union. In April 1653, Cromwell took the government upon him; and, in December following, ſigned an inſtrument, whereby, among other things, the counties, cities, and boroughs of England, Scotland, and Ireland, were brought under a new regulation, with reſpect to their repreſentatives in parliament. By this ſcheme England was to have four hundred repreſentatives, Scotland thirty, and Ireland thirty. When England was rated at ſeventy thouſand pounds per month, Scotland was to pay ſix thouſand pounds, and Ireland nine thouſand pounds, and the ſhare each county and borough was to pay of theſe aſſeſſments in 1656, was ſettled. Theſe aſſeſſments were ſuppoſed to be about two ſhillings in the pound, conſequently they valued the rents of England at eight millions and four hundred thouſand pounds, of Scotland at ſeven hundred and twenty thouſand pounds, and of Ireland at one million and eighty thouſand pounds, which valuations are ſaid to have been above two thirds of the real extended values.

On the 12th of April 1654, Oliver publiſhed an ordinance for uniting Scotland with England. By this ordinance the powers of Aſſemblies, Conventions, and Parliaments in Scotland were taken away, with Wards, Servitudes, and Slaviſh Tenures. Theſe were aboliſhed in England after reſtoration, but Wards and Liveries were, in 1660, reſtored again in Scotland. Thus ſtood the union for ſome years, during which, it is ſaid, the Scots nation was never more eaſy, nor juſtice more impartially adminiſtered.

At the reſtoration, every thing relating to Scotland and Ireland were put upon the ſame foot as before the civil wars. The ill effects whereof were ſoon felt in many inſtances, particularly ticularly by the paſſing and execution of ſeveral negative acts relating to trade, which not only ſtirred up the old, but raiſed many new animoſities. The Scots made heavy complaints againſt theſe impoſitions and excluſions, but without any redreſs.

However, in the year 1670, the parliament of Scotland paſſed an act, 'impowering king Charles to grant a commiſſion under the great ſeal of Scotland for ſuch perſons, as he ſhould think fit to name, to treat with commiſſioners of England about the union;' but with this proviſo, 'that nothing they agreed upon ſhould ſtand, except confirmed by the parliament of Scotland.' When the commiſſioners met, the king ſent them the five following points to be conſidered, as the ſubject-matter of the treaty; "1. The preſerving to either kingdom their laws, civil and eccleſiaſtical, entire. 2. The uniting of the two kingdoms into one monarchy, under his majeſty, his heirs, and ſucceſſors, inſeparable. 3. The reducing both parliaments into one. 4. The ſtating of all privileges, as to trade and other advantages. 5. The ſecuring the conditions of the union." And it was ſettled, as a preliminary, that, except all was agreed on, no particular thing reſolved upon ſhould be binding. When they came to conſider the matter, ſir John Niſby, one of the commiſſioners for Scotland, a great lawyer, and the king's advocate, urged, "That the union could not be, as propoſed in the ſecond and third articles, becauſe they were deſtructive to the fundamental government of the kingdom of Scotland, and tended to take away their parliaments, which, he ſaid, the parliament itſelf could not do; nor were the commiſſioners appointed for the treaty impowered to diveſt the electors of that power: and alledged an act of parliament, (8 Jac. 6.) which declared it treaſon, to attempt 'the alteration of the conſtitution of parliament.' He alledged farther, that king James's commiſſion to treat was not of that nature, and that his commiſſion ought to be the rule of the treaty; adding, that, in the union among the republics of Greece, each republic preſerved their ſovereignty." And the earl of Lauderdale ſaid, "That it was the like among the United Provinces, the ſeveral kingdoms of Spain, and the thirteen cantons of Swiſſerland." Then, as to the conſtitution of the parliament, the commiſſioners of Scotland reſolutely adhered to it, "That none of the conſtituent members of the parliament of Scotland ſhould be excluded from the parliament of Great Britain; for they could not exclude any of thoſe, from whom they had their authority; but agreed, that his majeſty might call together both parliaments, to conſult about the public affairs of the monarchy." There were alſo debates among them about appeals to parliament from courts of judicature, whoſe ſentences in Scotland are not queſtionable but by parliament; and that it would be an inconſiſtency, that one part of the monarchy ſhould be liable to appeals before the parliament, and the other not. As to the union of both kingdoms into 'one Monarchy,' the Scots commiſſioners would agree to it on no other terms, but in the poſterity of king James VI, in which the Engliſh made ſome difficulty, and thought Heirs and Succeſſors ſufficient. But the Scots inſiſted upon it, and alledged, that, by the 11th of Henry VII. an uſurper being crowned, was reputed lawful ſucceſſor in England. Thus the treaty came to nothing (which laſted from the 13th of September to the 14th of November following) the commiſſioners, on the part of Scotland, not only inſiſting upon their old pretences of preſerving ſovereignties and independencies, but likewiſe, that, by their conſtitution, they could not ſo much as treat of an union, till the whole parliament, and even all their conſtituents, had conſented. And, though at laſt, they offered to try if they could get their countrymen's conſent to have the two parliaments joined, yet they would not abate one of their members upon any account whatſoever. Thus, though the firſt motions of a treaty came entirely from themſelves, it was the Scots who broke it off. The ſecret motives of their ſo doing proceeded, as it is ſaid, from ſome about the court (who, at firſt, fancied they could encreaſe their power and influence by the union) being afterwards convinced it would have quite another effect.

In the time of king James II. there was nothing done in the union, the court being ſufficiently taken up with other deſigns. But though in the reigns of king William and queen Mary, both nations were too much diſtracted among themſelves, and the king and his miniſters too buſy about other affairs, to think in earneſt of uniting the two kingdoms; yet, the ſame being propoſed by the Scots convention of the eſtates, who appointed commiſſioners to treat upon that matter with England, king William, in his ſpeech to both houſes of parliament, on the 21ſt of March 1689-90, recommended to their re-conſideration an union with Scotland. The parliament took little notice of this recommendation from the throne; ſo that no anſwer was returned to the Scots parliament; and that buſineſs reſted till the year 1700, when the king, in his anſwer to the lords addreſs againſt the Scots ſettlement at Darien, took that opportunity of putting the houſe of peers in mind of what he recommended to his parliament, ſoon after his acceſſion to the throne: "That they would conſider of an 'union between the two kingdoms:' That his majeſty was of opinion, that nothing would contribute more to the ſecurity and happineſs of both; and was inclined to hope, that, after they had lived an hundred years under the ſame head, ſome happy expedient might be found for making them one people, in caſe a treaty was ſet on foot for that purpoſe. And therefore he very earneſtly recommended that matter to the conſideration of the houſe." Hereupon the lords framed and paſſed a bill for authorizing certain commiſſioners of the realm of England to treat with commiſſioners of Scotland, 'for the weal of both kingdoms.' But, the commons refuſing their concurrence to this bill, the buſineſs of the union went no further.

[1706.] This great work therefore was reſerved for the reign of queen Anne; for though the negotiation, which was ſet on foot ſoon after her acceſſion to the throne, unhappily miſcarried; yet it was reſolved to endeavour again the union of the two kingdoms, of which many had quite deſpaired. And thoſe, who entertained better hopes, thought it muſt have run out into a long negotiation for many years: But, beyond all men's expectation, it was begun and finiſhed within the compaſs of one. According to the powers given to the queen by the parliaments of England and Scotland, on the 10th of April ſhe appointed the commiſſioners on the part of England, the commiſſioners on the part of Scotland having been named before, on the 27th of February. Mr. George Dodington was named ſecretary by the Engliſh, and ſir Daniel Nairne by the Scots commiſſioners. The perſons who were appointed on the Engliſh ſide were well choſen. They were the moſt capable of managing the treaty and the beſt diſpoſed to it of any in the kingdom[y]. The Scots commiſſioners were ſo ſtrangely choſen, that from thence many concluded, that an union was not ſincerely deſigned by the miniſtry, when they ſaw ſuch a nomination[z]. For they were not looked on as men well affected to the deſign, moſt of them having ſtood out in a long and firm oppoſition to the Revolution, and to all that had been done afterwards purſuant to it [a]. The nomination of theſe was fixed on by the Dukes of Queenſberry and Argyle. It was ſaid by them, that, though theſe objections did indeed lie againſt them, yet they had ſuch an intereſt in Scotland, that engaging them to be cordially for the Union would be a great means to get it agreed to in the Parliament there. The Earl of Stair, who heartily concurred in the deſign, was thought to have a hand in this piece of policy, in which the event ſhewed that right meaſures were taken. The Scots had got among them the notion of a Fœderal Union, like that of the United Provinces, or the Cantons of Switzerland. But the Engliſh reſolved to loſe no time, in the examining or diſcuſſing that project, for this reaſon, beſides many others, that, as long as the two nations had two different parliaments, they could break the union whenever they pleaſed; for each nation would follow their own parliament. The deſign was now to ſettle a laſting and firm union between the kingdoms; therefore they reſolved to treat only about an 'incorporating union,' that ſhould put an end to all diſtinctions, and unite all their intereſts: So they at laſt entered upon the ſcheme of an entire union.

On Tueſday the 16th of April, the commiſſioners of both kingdoms met, the firſt time, in the council-chamber in the Cock-pit near Whitehall, the place appointed for their conferences; and their commiſſions being opened and read by the ſecretaries, the lord-keeper of England, and the lord-chancellor of Scotland, made introductory ſpeeches; after which it was agreed, that copies of the two commiſſions ſhould be prepared and ſigned by the reſpective ſecretaries, and interchanged againſt the next meeting, which was put off till the Monday following.

Accordingly, on the 22d of April, they met again, and the lord-keeper delivered to the board the following preliminaries: "I. That all propoſals made by either ſide be made in writing, and every point, when agreed, reduced into writing. II. That no points, though agreed on, and reduced into writing, be obligatory on either ſide, till all matters be proper to be laid before the queen and the two parliaments for their approbation. III. That there be a committee appointed, conſiſting of a certain number of each commiſſion, to reviſe the minutes of what paſſes, which are not to be inſerted by the ſecretaries in their reſpective books, but by order of the ſaid committee, having firſt made report thereof to the reſpective commiſſioners, and received their approbation of the ſame. IV. That all the proceedings of the commiſſioners, of both kingdoms, during the treaty, be kept ſecret." The lord keeper alſo delivered to the board the following propoſal, "That the two kingdoms of England and Scotland be for ever united into one kingdom by the name of Great Britain: That the united kingdom of Great Britain be repreſented by one and the ſame parliament; and that the ſucceſſion to the monarchy of the united kingdom of Great Britain, in caſe of failure of heirs, of her majeſty's body, be, according to the limitations mentioned in an act of parliament, made in England in the 12th and 13th years of the reign of the late king William, entitled 'An Act for the further limitation of the crown, and the better ſecuring the rights and liberties of the ſubject."

After this the commiſſioners adjourned to the 24th of the ſame month, when the lord chancellor of Scotland acquainted the board, that the commiſſioners of Scotland did agree to the preliminary articles propoſed at the laſt meeting, for regulating the method of proceeding in this treaty: And then he delivered to the board the following propoſals: "I. That the ſucceſſion to the crown of Scotland, in caſe of failure of heirs of her majeſty's body, ſhould be eſtabliſhed upon the ſame perſons mentioned in an act of parliament made in England, in the 12th and 13th years of the reign of the late king William. II. That the ſubjects of Scotland ſhould for ever enjoy all rights and privileges, as natives of England, in England, and the dominions thereunto belonging; and reciprocally, that the ſubjects of England enjoy the like rights and privileges in Scotland. III. That there be a free communication and intercourſe of trade and navigation between the two kingdoms and plantations thereunto belonging, under ſuch regulations, as, in the progreſs of this treaty, ſhall be found moſt for the advantage of both kingdoms. IV. That all laws and ſtatutes in either kingdom, contrary to the terms of this union, be repealed." The commiſſioners for England, after a ſhort conſultation by themſelves, returned an anſwer, "That nothing but an 'entire union' of the two kingdoms would ſettle perfect and laſting friendſhip between them, that they therefore thought fit to decline entering into any further conſideration upon the propoſals now made by the commiſſioners for Scotland, as not tending to that end; and deſired, that the commiſſioners for Scotland would give in their anſwer to the propoſal delivered by the commiſſioners for England, in order to an entire union of both kingdoms."

The next day the lord chancellor, in the name of the commiſſioners for Scotland, delivered to the board the following anſwer: The commiſſioners for Scotland have conſidered the propoſal given in to them by the commiſſioners for England, on Monday the 22d inſtant; and do agree, that the kingdoms of Scotland and England be for ever united into one kingdom, by the name of Great Britain: That the united kingdom of Great Britain be repreſented by one and the ſame parliament: And that the ſucceſſion to the monarchy of the kingdom of Great Britain, in caſe of failure of heirs of her majeſty's body, ſhall deſcend upon the moſt excellent prin-

[a] Mr. Lockhart, on the other hand, aſſures us, in his memoirs, p. 186, that all the commiſſioners were of the court or whig intereſt, except himſelf and the archbiſhop of York. "This laſt, as was reported (ſays he) was named merely out of reſpect to the dignity of the office he bore, but would not be preſent ſo much as once at the treaty. The other, becauſe being my lord Wharton's nephew, they intended to carry him off: and, as he was ſurprized at his being named, ſo he had no inclination to the employment, and was at firſt reſolved not to have accepted it: but his friends, and thoſe of his party, believing he might be ſerviceable, by giving an account how matters were carrying on, prevailed with him to alter his reſolution. But he, foreſeeing that ſeveral things would occur during the treaty, that were contrary to his principles, as the buſineſs of an incorporating union, and, in conſequence thereto, the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover to the crown; he convened together the earls of Hume and Strathmore, the viſcount of Stourmont, Mr. Cockran of Kilmarnock, Mr. Fletcher of Salton, and Mr. Henry Maule of Kelly, who were the chief inſtruments of perſuading him to attend the treaty; and wrote to the duke of Hamilton, who was then in Lancaſhire; and having communicated to them his difficulties, he deſired their advice and direction how he ſhould behave, and particularly, whether or not he ſhould proteſt and enter his diſſent againſt theſe meaſures; being reſolved to receive inſtructions from them, as a warrant for his procedure, and to juſtify his conduct. To whom they all unanimouſly returned this anſwer, that, if he ſhould proteſt, he could not well continue longer to meet with the other commiſſioners; and, if he entered his diſſent, it would render him odious to them; that they would be extremely upon the reſerve, ſo as he would be utterly incapable to learn any thing, that might be uſeful afterwards in the oppoſing the deſign: whereas, if he ſate quiet, and concealed his opinion as much as poſſible, they, expecting to perſuade him to leave his old friends and party, would not be ſhy, and he might make diſcoveries of their deſigns, and thereby do a ſingular ſervice to his country."

The ſame writer afterwards tells us, p. 191. "That the treaſurer of England and court-party there did not at firſt deſign the union ſhould have gone the length it afterwards did; it being a mighty ſtroke to the monarchy, and conſequently to them, who adviſed and directed the queen in all matters. But the treaſurer, being extremely blamed for allowing the queen to paſs the Scots act of ſecurity, and concerning peace or war, into law, knew the tories, who only waited for a proper time, deſigned to lay hold on this as an handle, wherewithal to pull him down; and therefore to ſave himſelf by amuſing the Engliſh with the hopes of an entire union, he ſet this treaty on foot, with a deſign to have ſpun it out ſo long, as he was in hazard of the attempts and malice of his enemies. But the whig party joined moſt ſincerely in the meaſure of an incorporating union.——They had ſomewhat in view beſides the general intereſt and ſecurity of England, or eſtabliſhing the houſe of Hanover on the two thrones of this iſland (all monarchs and race of kings being equally odious to them) their deſign being ſooner or later to eſtabliſh a commonwealth, or at leaſt to clip the wings of the royal prerogative, and to reduce the monarch to ſo low an ebb, that his power ſhould not exceed that of a ſtadtholder of Holland, or a doge of Venice. And it was plain and obvious ſuch deſigns could be more eaſily executed, when the legiſlative authority of Scotland was abrogated, by reducing the repreſentatives of the nation to a ſmall and inconſiderable number incorporated with a much greater, and ſubjecting her to the laws, regulations, and government of another kingdom, of which they had the chief direction, than if the Scots nation and parliament remained a diſtinct and independent people and judicature, and were thereby in a capacity to aſſiſt their ſovereign in maintaining his juſt rights and prerogatives in that as well as his other kingdoms. They remembered how the Scots, in the reign of king Charles II. did caſt the balance, and defeat their deſign of ſecluding the duke of York from ſucceeding to the crown; and were reſolved by this incorporating union to remove that obſtacle to their future projects and deſigns. Thus, the court and whig parties in England agreeing (though upon different topics and views at firſt) in the meaſure of a treaty of union betwixt the two kingdoms, the latter prevailed to have a plurality of their own party in both commiſſions, particularly the Scots, who ſo frankly yielded to the demands of the Engliſh, and proſtituted the honour, and ſurrendered the intereſt of their country, that the terms of the treaty proved ſo advantageous for England and deſtructive to Scotland, that the treaſurer and court party could not, without giving a greater handle againſt them, than what they propoſed to evade by this meaſure, ſo much as connive at, or countenance any perſon, that endeavoured to obſtruct the union's taking effect. On the other hand, the Scots ſtateſmen and revolutioners were ſo ſenſible of their own guilt in betraying their country, and acting contrary to its intereſt theſe many years paſt, that they thought themſelves in no ſecurity from being called to an account for their actions, unleſs they removed the parliament, and rendered the nation ſubſervient and ſubject to a people, whom they had ſerved, and from whom they looked for protection."

ceſs Sophia, electreſs and ducheſs dowager of Hanover, and remain to her and the heirs of her body, being proteſtants, with this proviſion, That all the ſubjects of the united kingdom of Great Britain ſhall have full freedom and intercouſe of trade and navigation, to and from any part or place within the united kingdom, and plantations thereunto belonging; and that there be a communication of all other privileges and advantages, which do or may belong to the ſubjects of either kingdom."

After a private conſultation, the lord-keeper, in the name of the commiſſioners for England, delivered to the board this reply, "The commiſſioners for England are of opinion, that the proviſion added by the commiſſioners of Scotland, to the propoſal made by the commiſſioners for England, on the 22d inſtant, is a neceſſary conſequence of an 'entire union;' and, therefore, their lordſhips do agree to that proviſion, under ſuch terms, as in the further progreſs of this treaty ſhall be found to be for the common advantage of both kingdoms."

The ſame day, in purſuance of the third preliminary, a committee was appointed for reviſing the minutes; and there were nominated, on the part of England, the lord Grey; Mr. John Smith, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons; ſir Thomas Trevor, ſir John Cook, and Dr. Waller, or any three of them; and on the part of Scotland, the earl of Sutherland, the earl of Leven, the lord preſident of the ſeſſion, the lord juſtice Clerk, John Clark of Pennycook, or any three of them.

Four days after, the commiſſioners met again, and the lord keeper delivered to the board the following propoſal: "That there be the ſame cuſtoms, exciſes, and all other taxes; and the ſame prohibitions, reſtrictions, and regulations of trade throughout the united kingdom of Great Britain." Hereupon the Scots commiſſioners propoſed, "That a committee be appointed of an equal number of each ſide, to adjuſt the ſeveral points contained in that propoſal; and deſired, that the Engliſh commiſſioners would order the account of the taxes and other things, to be laid before the committee."

The Engliſh commiſſioners having propoſed to appoint a committee, to conſiſt of eleven of each ſide, and of them any ſix to have power to proceed, and that they ſhould be nominated the next meeting; this was readily agreed to by the Scots; and accordingly, on the 1ſt of May, the commiſſioners proceeded to the nomination of the committee. The Engliſh named the dukes of Somerſet and Bolton, the earl of Sunderland, the lords Townſhend, Wharton, and Sommers, the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, the marquis of Hartington, Mr. ſecretary Harley, Mr. Henry Boyle, and ſir Simon Harcourt. The Scots appointed the lord chancellor, the duke of Queenſberry, the earls of Sutherland, Leven, and Stair, the lord Duplin, the lord preſident of the ſeſſion, the lord juſtice Clerk, and ſir Patrick Johnſtoun: And it was agreed, that this committee ſhould meet the next morning, and have power to adjourn themſelves.

On the 21ſt of May, when the treaty was pretty well advanced, the queen went to the meeting, and told the commiſſioners, "That ſhe was ſo much concerned for the union of the two kingdoms, that ſhe could not ſatisfy herſelf without coming, before ſhe went out of town, to ſee what progreſs they had made in the treaty, and to recommend very earneſtly to them the bringing it to a happy concluſion, with as much diſpatch, as the nature of it would admit; not doubting of the general ſatisfaction, which her ſubjects of both kingdoms would receive, in finding them to overcome all difficulties to attain ſo great and public a good." When ſhe had done ſpeaking, the lord keeper deſired to know, if ſhe would hear the propoſals, made on either ſide, and the reſolutions taken thereupon, read by the ſecretaries; which ſhe allowed of, and then retired.

About a month after, the queen came again to their meeting, and told the commiſſioners, "That ſhe was come thither once more to ſee what further progreſs they had made in the treaty, and to preſs a ſpeedy concluſion of it, in regard her ſervants of Scotland could not, without great inconveniency, be much longer abſent from that kingdom." Upon this, in the thirty-fifth meeting, on the 28th of June, the Engliſh commiſſioners propoſed, That four commiſſioners of each part be appointed to draw up into form the articles of the treaty, upon the points already agreed, or which ſhould afterwards be agreed. To which the Scots commiſſioners having conſented, the articles were brought to perfection by the 22d of July, when the commiſſioners of both kingdoms ſigned and ſealed the inſtruments, and ordered, that the reſpective ſecretaries of each commiſſion ſhould ſign each other's journals of the proceedings, and afterwards enter in the journals the 'articles of the treaty of union.'

The next day, the commiſſioners for both kingdoms went from the Cockpit to attend the queen at St. James's, where the lord keeper, in the name of the commiſſioners for England, preſented to her majeſty one of the ſigned and ſealed inſtruments, containing the 'articles of union,' and made the following ſpeech:

May it pleaſe your majeſty,

"WE the commiſſioners appointed by your majeſty, in purſuance of the act of parliament paſſed in your kingdom of England, to treat concerning an union of the two kingdoms, with the commiſſioners of Scotland, do (according to our duty) humbly beg leave to preſent to your majeſty theſe the effects of our continued and faithful endeavours to that end.

"They are the articles agreed upon between your commiſſioners of both kingdoms, as the terms or conditions, upon which the intended union is to take place, if your majeſty, and the parliaments of both kingdoms, ſhall think fit to approve and confirm the ſame.

"In theſe we have come to an agreement on every point we judged neceſſary to effect a complete and laſting union; and we have endeavoured not to ſtir into any matter we had reaſon to think was not ſo.

"And although we have unanimouſly carried this treaty thus far, purely from a conviction, that we have done therein to God, your majeſty, and our countries good ſervice; yet we are far from thinking, that what we have done, will or ought to be of any weight or authority elſewhere; but do moſt entirely ſubmit theſe our labours to the high wiſdom of your majeſty and both your parliaments, to ſtand or fall by the reaſon, juſtice, and public utility, on which they are founded.

"Your majeſty's royal preſence and ſeaſonable admonitions to us, at the fitteſt junctures, were (we moſt thankfully acknowledge) a very great encouragement and aſſiſtance to us in the difficulties we met with.

"Your majeſty's glory is already perfect; and the finiſhing this work is all that is wanting, to complete as well as ſecure the happineſs of ſo great a people as your ſubjects may now, without any arrogance, pretend to be.

"May your majeſty live, not only to give ſanction to this univerſal bleſſing to all your people, but alſo to ſee in a long and proſperous reign over us the many immediate or near good effects of it. But as for that great and main conſequence of it, for which your majeſty is making, by a moſt gracious and charitable foreſight, this only effectual proviſion; I mean, the continuance of peace and tranquillity in this iſland, upon a deſcent of the crown, inſtead of that bloodſhed, and deſtruction which would probably follow upon the fatal diviſion of it;

"May we be ſo happy, as never, in our days, to experiment the fitneſs of theſe meaſures your majeſty is now taking for that end; but may late, very late, poſterity only in that reſpect reap the advantage of them."

Then the lord chancellor of Scotland, in the name of the commiſſioners for that kingdom, preſented alſo to her majeſty one of the ſigned and ſealed inſtruments of the 'articles of union,' on the part of Scotland, with the following ſpeech;

May it pleaſe your majeſty,

"THE commiſſioners, appointed by your majeſty for the kingdom of Scotland to treat of an union of your two kingdoms of Scotland and England, have commanded me to return your majeſty their moſt humble and dutiful acknowledgements for the honour your majeſty has conferred on them, in employing them to negotiate this moſt important affair, which is of the greateſt conſequence to all your majeſty's ſubjects.

"We have endeavoured to diſcharge this truſt with all fidelity; and are now come humbly to lay before your majeſty the articles and conditions of union, which we have treated of, and agreed upon, and do ſubmit them to your majeſty's royal conſideration.

"It is a great ſatisfaction to us, that, what we have concluded, in this matter, has been done with unanimity. And we muſt own, that the knowledge we had of your majeſty's great great concern for uniting your two kingdoms, and the earneſtneſs, with which your majeſty has been moſt graciouſly pleaſed to recommend it, hath enabled us to bring this treaty to a happy and ſpeedy concluſion, to the mutual ſatisfaction of the commiſſioners on both ſides; and we ſhall eſteem it our greateſt happineſs, if what we have prepared be acceptable to your majeſty, and ratified by the parliaments of both kingdoms, without which what we have done can be of no authority.

"An union of the two kingdoms has been long wiſhed for, it being ſo neceſſary for eſtabliſhing the laſting peace, happineſs, and proſperity of both nations. And though it has been frequently endeavoured by your majeſty's royal predeceſſors without the deſired ſucceſs; yet the glorious ſucceſſes, with which God has bleſſed your majeſty's endeavours for the happineſs of your people, make us hope, that this great work is reſerved to be accompliſhed in your majeſty's reign."

After which the queen was pleaſed to make the following ſpeech.

My Lords,

"I Give you my thanks for the great pains you have taken in this treaty, and am very well pleaſed to find your endeavours and applications have brought it to ſo good a concluſion. The particulars of it ſeem ſo reaſonable, that I hope they will meet with approbation in the parliaments of both kingdoms. I wiſh therefore, that my ſervants of Scotland may loſe no time in going down to propoſe it to my ſubjects of that kingdom: And I ſhall always look upon it as a particular happineſs, if this union (which will be ſo great a ſecurity and advantage to both kingdoms) can be accompliſhed in my reign."

The ſame day, the queen being in council, an order was made, importing, "That whoſoever ſhould be concerned in any ſeditious diſcourſe, or libel, or laying wagers relating to the union, ſhould be proſecuted, for ſuch their offences, according to the utmoſt rigour of the law."

The lord Sommers had the chief hand in projecting this ſcheme of the union, into which all the commiſſioners of the Engliſh nation went very eaſily. The advantages, that were offered to Scotland in the whole frame of it, were ſo great and ſo viſible, that nothing but the conſideration of the ſafety, that was to be procured by it to England, could have brought the Engliſh to agree to a project, that, in every branch of it, was much more favourable to the Scots nation. The Scots were to bear leſs, than the fortieth part of the public taxes. When four ſhillings in the pound were levied in England, amounting to two millions, Scotland was only to be taxed at forty-eight thouſand pounds, which was eight months aſſeſſment of the ſix thouſand pounds which they had been accuſtomed for ſome years to pay, and which, they ſaid, was all that the nation could bear. It is held a maxim, that, in the framing of a government, a proportion ought to be obſerved between the ſhare in the legiſlature, and the burden to be borne. Yet, in return of the fortieth part of the burden, the Scots were offered near the eleventh part of the legiſlature. For the peers of Scotland were to be repreſented by ſixteen peers in the houſe of lords; and the commons, by forty-five members in the houſe of commons; and theſe were to be choſen, according to the methods to be ſettled in the parliament of Scotland. And ſince Scotland was to pay cuſtoms and exciſes on the ſame foot with England, and was to bear a ſhare in paying much of the debt, which England had contracted during the war; three hundred and ninety-eight thouſand pounds was to be raiſed in England, and ſent into Scotland, as an equivalent for that; and this was to be applied to the recoining the money, that all might be of one denomination and ſtandard; and to the payment of the public debts of Scotland, and repaying to their African company all their loſſes with intereſt, upon which that company was to be diſſolved; and the overplus of the equivalent was to be applied to the encouragement of manufactures. Trade was to be free all over the iſland, and to the plantations; private rights were to be preſerved; and the judicatories and laws of Scotland were ſtill to be continued. But all was put, for the future, under the regulation of the parliament of Great-Britain; the two nations now were to be one kingdom, under the ſame ſucceſſion to the crown, and united in one parliament. There was no proviſion made in this treaty with relation to religion; for in the acts of parliament in both kingdoms, which impowered the queen to name commiſſioners, there was an expreſs limitation, that they ſhould not treat of thoſe matters.

This was the ſubſtance of the articles of the treaty, which, when they came to be laid before the parliament of Scotland, met with great oppoſition, as will hereafter appear [b]. It is time now to return to the operations of the war.

The French ſeemed to have laid the deſign of their cam-

[b] As the articles of union will be often referred to, it will be proper to inſert them at large.

I. That the two kingdoms of England and Scotland ſhall, upon the firſt day of May, which ſhall be in the year 1707, and for ever after, be united into one kingdom, by the name of GREAT BRITAIN; and that the enſigns armorial of the ſaid united kingdom be ſuch as her majeſty ſhall appoint; and the croſſes of St. George and St. Andrew be conjoined in ſuch manner as her majeſty ſhall think fit, and uſed in all flags, banners, ſtandards, and enſigns, both at ſea and land.

II. That the ſucceſſion to the monarchy of the united kingdom of Great Britain, and of the dominions thereunto belonging, after her moſt ſacred majeſty, and in default of iſſue of her majeſty, be, remain, and continue to the moſt excellent princeſs Sophia, electreſs and ducheſs dowager of Hanover, and the heirs of her body, being proteſtants, upon whom the crown of England is ſettled, by an act of parliament made in England, in the twelfth year of the reign of his late majeſty king William the Third, intituled, 'An act for the further limitation of the crown, and better ſecuring the rights and liberties of the ſubject.' And that all papiſts, and perſons marrying papiſts, ſhall be excluded from, and for ever incapable to inherit, poſſeſs, or enjoy the imperial crown of Great Britain, and the dominions thereunto belonging, or any part thereof: And, in every ſuch caſe, the crown and government ſhall from time to time deſcend to, and be enjoyed by ſuch perſon, being a proteſtant, as ſhould have inherited and enjoyed the ſame, in caſe ſuch papiſt, or perſon marrying a papiſt, was naturally dead, according to the proviſion for the deſcent of the crown of England, made by another act of parliament in England, in the firſt year of the reign of their late majeſties king William and queen Mary, intituled, 'An act declaring the rights and liberties of the ſubjects, and ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown.'

III. That the united kingdom of Great Britain be repreſented by one and the ſame parliament, to be ſtiled the parliament of Great Britain.

IV. That all the ſubjects of the united kingdom of Great Britain ſhall, from and after the union, have full freedom and intercourſe of trade and navigation, to and from any port or place within the ſaid united kingdom, and the dominions and plantations thereunto belonging; and that there be a communication of all other rights, privileges, and advantages, which do, or may belong to the ſubjects of other kingdom, except where it is otherwiſe expreſly agreed in theſe articles.

V. That all ſhips or veſſels belonging to her majeſty's ſubjects of Scotland, at the time of ratifying the treaty of union of the two kingdoms in the parliament of Scotland, though foreign built, be deemed and paſs as ſhips of the build of Great Britain; the owner, or where there are more owners, one or more of the owners, within twelve months, after the firſt of May next, making oath, that, at the time of ratifying the treaty of union in the parliament of Scotland, the ſame did, in whole or in part, belong to him or them, or to ſome other ſubject or ſubjects of Scotland, to be particularly named, with the place of their reſpective abodes; and that the ſame doth then, at the time of the ſaid depoſition, wholly belong to him or them; and that no foreigner, directly or indirectly, hath any ſhare, part, or intereſt therein: Which oath ſhall be made before the chief officer or officers of the cuſtoms in the port next to the abode of the ſaid owner or owners: And the ſaid officer, or officers, ſhall be impowered to adminiſtrate the ſaid oath; and the oath, being ſo adminiſtrated, ſhall be atteſted by the officer, or officers, who adminiſtrated the ſame: And, being regiſtered by the ſaid officer or officers, ſhall be delivered to the maſter of the ſhip, for ſecurity of her navigation, and a duplicate thereof ſhall be tranſmitted by the ſaid officer or officers, to the chief officer or officers of the cuſtoms, in the port of Edinburgh, to be there entered in a regiſter, and from thence to be ſent to the port of London, to be there entered in the general regiſter of all trading ſhips belonging to Great Britain.

VI. That all parts of the united kingdom, for ever, from and after the union, ſhall have the ſame allowances, encouragements, and drawbacks, and be under the ſame prohibitions, reſtrictions, and regulations of trade, and liable to the ſame cuſtoms and duties on import and export. And that the allowances, encouragements, and drawbacks, prohibitions, reſtrictions, and regulations of trade, and the cuſtoms and duties on import and export ſettled in England, when the union commences, ſhall, from and after the union, take place throughout the whole united kingdom: Excepting and reſerving the duties upon export and import of ſuch particular commodities, from which any perſons, the ſubjects of either kingdoms, are eſpecially liberated and exempted by their private rights, which, after the union, are to remain ſafe and entire to them in all reſpects as before the ſame. And that, from and after the union, no Scots cattle carried into England ſhall be liable to any other duties, either on the public or private accounts, than thoſe duties, to which the cattle of England are or ſhall be liable within the ſaid kingdom. And ſeeing by the laws of England there are rewards granted upon the exportation of certain kinds of grain, wherein oats grinded or ungrinded are not expreſſed, that, from and after the union, when oats ſhall be ſold at fifteen ſhillings Sterling per quarter, or under, there ſhall be paid two ſhillings and ſix-pence Sterling for every quarter of the oat-meal exported, in the term of the law, whereby, and ſo long as, rewards are granted for exportation of other grain; and that the beer of Scotland have the ſame rewards as barley: And in reſpect the importation of victuals into Scotland, from any place beyond ſea, would prove a diſcouragement to tillage, therefore that the prohibition, as now in force by law of Scotland, againſt importation of victuals from Ireland, or any other place beyond ſea into Scotland, do, after the union, remain in the ſame force as now it is, until more proper and effectual ways be provided by the parliament of Great-Britain for diſcouraging the importation of the ſaid victuals from beyond ſea.

VII. That all parts of the united kingdom be for ever, from and after the union, liable to the ſame exciſes upon all exciſeable liquors, excepting only, that the thirty-four gallons Engliſh barrel of beer or ale, amounting to twelve gallons Scots preſent meaſure, ſold in Scotland by the brewer at nine ſhillings and ſixpence Sterling, excluding all duties, and retailed, including duties and the retailers profit, at two-pence the Scots pint, or eighth part of the Scots gallon, be not, after the union, liable on account of the preſent exciſe upon exciſeable liquors in England to any higher impoſi-

paign ſo well, that it had every where a formidable appearance: And, if the execution had anſwered their ſcheme, it would have proved as glorious, as it was, in the concluſion, fatal to them. They reckoned the taking of Barcelona and Turin ſure; and, by that means, they thought the war, both in Spain and Italy, would be ſoon brought to an end. The knew they ſhould be ſuperior to any force, the prince of Baden could bring together, on the Upper Rhine; and they intended to have a great army in Flanders, where they knew our chief ſtrength would be, to act as occaſion or their other affairs ſhould require. But, how well ſoever their ſchemes might ſeem to be laid, they all proved unſucceſsful, and the events, as will be ſeen, happened quite contrary to all their views.

tion than two ſhillings Sterling upon the aforeſaid thirty-four gallons Engliſh barrel, being twelve gallons of the preſent Scots meaſure. And that the exciſe ſettled in England on all other liquors, when the union commences, take place throughout the whole united kingdom.

VIII. That, from and after the union, all foreign ſalt, which ſhall be imported into Scotland, ſhall be charged, at the importation there, with the ſame duties as the like ſalt is now charged with being imported into England, and to be levied and ſecured in the ſame manner. But, in regard the duties on great quantities of foreign ſalt imported may be very heavy on the merchants importers, that therefore all foreign ſalt, imported into Scotland, ſhall be cellared and locked up under the cuſtody of the merchants importers, and the officers employed for levying the duties upon ſalt; and that the merchant may have what quantities thereof his occaſions require, not under a weigh or forty buſhels at a time, giving ſecurity for the duty of what quantity he receives, payable in ſix months. But Scotland ſhall, for the ſpace of ſeven years from the ſaid union, be exempted from paying in Scotland, for ſalt made there, the duty or exciſe now payable for ſalt made in England, but, from the expiration of the ſaid ſeven years, ſhall be ſubject and liable to the ſame duties for ſalt made in Scotland, as ſhall be then payable for ſalt made in England, to be levied and ſecured in the ſame manner, and with proportionable drawbacks and allowances, as in England; with this exception, that Scotland ſhall, after the ſaid ſeven years, remain exempted from the duty of two ſhillings and fourpence the buſhel on home ſalt, imported by an act made in England in the ninth and tenth of king William the third of England. And, if the parliament of Great Britain ſhall, at, or before the expiration of the ſaid ſeven years, ſubſtitute any other fund in place of the ſaid two ſhillings and fourpence of exciſe on the buſhel of home ſalt, Scotland ſhall, after the ſaid ſeven years, bear a proportion of the ſaid fund, and have an equivalent in the terms of this treaty. And that, during the ſaid ſeven years, there ſhall be paid in England for all ſalt made in Scotland, and imported from thence into England, the ſame duties upon the importation, as ſhall be payable for ſalt made in England, to be levied and ſecured in England. And that, after the ſaid ſeven years, as long as the ſaid duty of two ſhillings and fourpence a buſhel upon ſalt is continued in England, the ſaid two ſhillings and fourpence a buſhel ſhall be payable for all ſalt made in Scotland, and imported into England, to be levied and ſecured in the ſame manner; and that, during the continuance of the two ſhillings and fourpence a buſhel upon ſalt made in England, no ſalt whatſoever be brought from Scotland to England by land in any manner, under the penalty of forfeiting the ſalt and the cattle and carriages made uſe of in bringing the ſame, and paying twenty ſhillings for every buſhel of ſuch ſalt, and proportionably for a greater or leſſer quantity, for which the carrier, as well as the owner, ſhall be liable, jointly and ſeverally, and the perſons bringing or carrying the ſame, to be impriſoned by any one juſtice of the peace, by the ſpace of ſix months, without bail, and until the penalty be paid. And, for eſtabliſhing an equality in trade, that all fleſh, exported from Scotland to England, and put on board in Scotland to be exported to parts beyond the ſeas, and proviſion for ſhips in Scotland, and for foreign voyages, may be ſalted with Scots ſalt, paying the ſame duty for what ſalt is ſo employed, as the like quantity of ſuch ſalt pays in England, and under the ſame penalties, forfeitures, and proviſions, for preventing of frauds, as are mentioned in the laws of England. And that, from and after the union, the laws and acts of parliament in Scotland for pining, curing, and packing of herrings, white fiſh, and ſalmon for exportation, with foreign ſalt only, without any mixture of Britiſh or Iriſh ſalt, and for preventing of frauds, and curing and packing of fiſh, be continued in force in Scotland, ſubject to ſuch alterations as ſhall be made by the parliament of Great-Britain; and that all fiſh exported from Scotland to parts beyond the ſeas, which ſhall be cured with foreign ſalt only, and without mixture of Britiſh or Iriſh ſalt, ſhall have the ſame eaſes, premiums, and drawbacks, as are or ſhall be allowed to ſuch perſons as export the like fiſh from England: And that, for encouragement of the herring-fiſhing, there ſhall be allowed and paid to the ſubjects, inhabitants of Great-Britain, during the preſent allowances for other fiſhes, ten ſhillings and fivepence Sterling for every barrel of white herrings, which ſhall be exported from Scotland; and that they ſhall be allowed five ſhillings Sterling for every barrel of beef or pork ſalted with foreign ſalt, without mixture of Britiſh or Iriſh ſalt, and exported for ſale from Scotland to parts beyond ſea, alterable by the parliament of Great-Britain. And, if any matters of frauds, relating to the ſaid duties on ſalt, hereafter appear, which are not ſufficiently provided againſt by this article, the ſame ſhall be ſubject to ſuch further proviſions as ſhall be thought fit by the parliament of Great-Britain.

IX. That whenever the ſum of one million, nine hundred and ninety-ſeven thouſand, ſeven hundred and ſixty-three pounds, eight ſhillings, and fourpence halfpenny, ſhall be enacted by the parliament of Great-Britain, to be raiſed in that part of the united kingdom now called England, on land and other things uſually charged in acts of parliament there, for granting an aid to the crown by a land-tax; that part of the united kingdom, now called Scotland, ſhall be charged by the ſame act with the further ſum of forty-eight thouſand pounds free of all charges, as the quota of Scotland to ſuch tax, and ſo proportionably for any greater or leſſer ſum raiſed in England by any tax on land, and other things uſually charged, together with the land: And that ſuch quota for Scotland, in the caſes aforeſaid, be raiſed and collected in the ſame manner as the ceſs now is in Scotland, but ſubject to ſuch regulations in the manner of collecting as ſhall be made by the parliament of Great-Britain.

X. That during the continuance of the reſpective duties on ſtamped paper, vellum, and parchment, by the ſeveral acts now in force in England, Scotland ſhall not be charged with the ſame reſpective duties.

XI. That, during the continuance of the duties payable in England on windows and lights, which determines on the firſt day of Auguſt 1710, Scotland ſhall not be charged with the ſame duties.

XII. That, during the continuance of the duties payable in England, on coals, culm, and cynders, which determines the thirtieth day of September 1710, Scotland ſhall not be charged therewith for coals, culm, and cynders conſumed there, but ſhall be charged with the ſame duties as in England for all coals, culm, and cynders not conſumed in Scotland.

XIII. That, during the continuance of the duty payable in England on malt, which determines the twenty-fourth day of June 1707, Scotland ſhall not be charged with that duty.

XIV. That the kingdom of Scotland be not charged with any other duties laid on by the parliament of England before the union, except theſe conſented to in this treaty; in regard it is agreed, that all neceſſary proviſion ſhall be made by the parliament of Scotland for the public charge and ſervice of that kingdom for the year 1707. 'Provided nevertheleſs,' That if the parliament of England ſhall think fit to lay any further impoſitions by way of cuſtoms, or ſuch exciſes, with which, by virtue of this treaty, Scotland is to be charged equally with England; in ſuch caſe Scotland ſhall be liable to the ſame cuſtoms and exciſes, and have an equivalent to be ſettled by the parliament of Great-Britain, with this further proviſion, that any malt to be made and conſumed in that part of the united kingdom, now called Scotland, ſhall not be charged with any impoſition on malt, during this preſent war. And ſeeing it cannot be ſuppoſed, that the parliament of Great-Britain will ever lay any ſort of burthens upon the united kingdom, but what they ſhall find of neceſſity at that time for the preſervation and good of the whole, and with due regard to the circumſtances and abilities of every part of the united kingdom; therefore 'it is agreed,' that there be no further exemption inſiſted upon for any part of the united kingdom, but that the conſideration of any exemptions beyond what is already agreed on in this treaty, ſhall be left to the determination of the parliament of Great-Britain.

XV. That whereas by the terms of this treaty, the ſubjects of Scotland, for preſerving an equality of trade throughout the united kingdom, will be liable to ſeveral cuſtoms and exciſes now payable in England, which will be applicable towards payment of the debts of England, contracted before the union; 'it is agreed,' that Scotland ſhall have an equivalent for what the ſubjects thereof ſhall be ſo charged towards payment of the ſaid debts of England in all particulars whatſoever, in manner following, viz. That, before the union of the ſaid kingdoms, the ſum of three hundred ninety-eight thouſand and eighty-five pounds, ten ſhillings, be granted to her majeſty by the parliament of England for the uſes after-mentioned, being the equivalent to be anſwered to Scotland for ſuch parts of the ſaid cuſtoms and exciſes upon all exciſeable liquors, with which that kingdom is to be charged upon the union, as will be applicable to the payment of the ſaid debts of England, according to the proportions which the preſent cuſtoms of Scotland, being thirty-thouſand pounds per annum, do bear to the cuſtoms in England, computed at one million, three hundred and forty-one thouſand, five hundred and fifty-nine pounds per annum. And which the preſent exciſes on exciſeable liquors in Scotland, being thirty-three thouſand and five hundred pounds per annum, do bear to the exciſes on exciſeable liquors in England, computed at nine hundred and ſo ty-ſeven thouſand, ſix hundred and two pounds per annum; which ſum of three hundred and ninty-eight thouſand eighty-five pounds, ten ſhillings, ſhall be due and payable from the time of the union. And in regard, that, after the union, Scotland becoming liable to the ſame cuſtoms and duties payable on import and export, and to the ſame exciſes on all exciſeable liquors as in England, as well upon that account, as upon the account of the increaſe of trade and people (which will be the happy conſequence of the union) the ſaid revenues will much improve beyond the before-mentioned annual values thereof, of which no preſent eſtimate can be made; yet nevertheleſs, for the reaſons aforeſaid, there ought to be a proportionable equivalent anſwered to Scotland; 'it is agreed,' that, after the union, there ſhall be an account kept of the ſaid duties ariſing, to the end it may appear what ought to be anſwered to Scotland as an equivalent for ſuch proportion of the ſaid increaſe, as ſhall be applicable to the payment of the debts of England. And, for the further and more effectual anſwering the ſeveral ends hereafter mentioned, 'it is agreed,' that, from and after the union, the whole increaſe of the revenues of cuſtoms and duties on import and export, and exciſes upon exciſable liquors in Scotland, over and above the annual produce of the ſaid reſpective duties as above ſtated, ſhall go and be applied for the term of ſeven years to the uſes hereafter mentioned, and that upon the ſaid account there ſhall be anſwered to Scotland annually, from the end of ſeven years after the union, an equivalent in proportion to ſuch part of the ſaid increaſe, as ſhall be applicable to the debts of England; and generally, that an equivalent ſhall be anſwered to Scotland for ſuch parts of the Engliſh debts as Scotland may hereafter become liable to pay by reaſon of the union, other than ſuch, for which appropriations have been made by parliament in England, of the cuſtoms or other duties on export and import, exciſes on all exciſeable liquors: In reſpect of which debts, equivalents are herein before provided. And as for the uſes, to which the ſaid ſum of three hundred and ninty-eight thouſand and eighty-five pounds, ten ſhillings, to be granted as aforeſaid, and all other monies, which are to be anſwered or allowed to Scotland as ſaid is, are to be applied, 'it is agreed,' that, in the firſt place, out of the aforeſaid ſum, what conſideration ſhall be found neceſſary to be had for any loſſes, which private perſons may ſuſtain, by reducing the coin of Scotland to the ſtandard and value of the coin of England, may be made good. In the next place, that the capital ſtock, or fund of the African and Indian company of Scotland, advanced together with the intereſt for the ſaid capital ſtock after the rate of five per cent. per annum, from the reſpective times of the payment thereof, ſhall be paid: Upon payment of which capital ſtock and intereſt, 'it is agreed,' the ſaid company be diſſolved and ceaſe; and alſo, that from the time of paſſing the act of parliament in England for raiſing the ſaid ſum of three hundred and ninety-eight thouſand and eighty-five pounds, ten ſhillings, the ſaid company ſhall neither trade, nor grant licence to trade, providing, that if the ſaid ſtock and intereſt ſhall not be paid in twelve months after the commencement of the union, that then the ſaid company may from thence forward trade, or give licence to trade, until the ſaid whole capital ſtock and intereſt ſhall be paid. And as to the overplus of the ſaid ſum of three hundred and ninety-eight thouſand and eighty-five pounds, ten ſhillings, after payment of what conſideration ſhall be had for loſſes in repairing the coin, and paying the ſaid capital ſtock and intereſt; and alſo the whole increaſe of the ſaid revenues of cuſtoms, duties, and exciſes, above the preſent value, which ſhall ariſe in Scotland during the ſaid term of ſeven years, together with the equivalent, which ſhall become due upon the improvement thereof in Scotland, after the ſaid term: And alſo as to all other ſums, which, according to the agreements aforeſaid, may become payable to Scotland, by way of equivalent for what that kingdom ſhall hereafter become liable, towards payment of the debt of England, 'it is agreed,' that the ſame be applied in manner following, viz. That all the public debts of the kingdom of Scotland, as ſhall be adjuſted by this preſent parliament, ſhall be paid: And that two thouſand pounds per annum, for the

The duke of Marlborough arived at the Hague the 25th of April, N. S. and, continuing there till the 9th of May, had repeated conferences with the deputies of the States and their generals, upon the neceſſary meaſures to be taken for opening the campaign. The duke, with monſieur Auverquerque, came to Maeſtricht on the 12th of May, and the next day they reviewed the army; and on the 21ſt, the Engliſh troops joined the Dutch between Borchloen and Groes-Waren. The confederate army then conſiſted of ſeventy-four battalions of foot, and one hundred and twenty-three ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, having with them an hundred canon, twenty hawbitzers, and forty-two pontoons.

The court of France, in the mean time, had information, that the confederate army in the Netherlands was not yet compleat; that the Danes refuſed to ſtir from their quarters till their arrears were paid; and that the Pruſſians, for other reaſons, were yet ſo far behind, that they could not join the duke of Marlborough in ſeveral weeks. It was ſaid, that the French king had penſioners in the courts of Denmark and Pruſſia, who had promiſed him to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to retard the march of their reſpective maſters forces (which were in the pay of England and Holland) to the general rendezvous; upon the confidence of which, the French king ſent ſuch poſitive orders to marſhal Villeroy to fight the allies, that the elector of Bavaria, who was then at Bruſſels, had juſt time enough to take poſt-horſes, to join the army, which paſſed the Deule the 19th of May, and poſted themſelves at Tirlemont, with the Gheet before them. This army, under the command of the elector of Bavaria and marſhal Villeroy, conſiſted of ſeventy thouſand men, and would have been ſuperior to the confederate army without the Danes.

The confederates, on their ſide, were no leſs eager for an engagement, but could hardly flatter themſelves with the hopes of having ſo early and ſo fair an opportunity for it. The duke of Marlborough being apprehenſive, that the French would take the ſame method over again, and keep behind the Deule, as they had done the year before, had ſeveral times expreſſed his concern about it to thoſe, who were ſpace of ſeven years, ſhall be applied towards encouraging and promoting the manufacture of coarſe wool within thoſe ſhires, which produce the wool; and that the firſt two thouſand pounds Sterling be paid at Martinmaſs next, and ſo yearly at Martinmaſs during the ſpace aforeſaid. And afterwards the ſame ſhall be wholly applied towards the encouraging and promoting the fiſheries, and ſuch other manufactures and improvements in Scotland, as may moſt conduce to the general good of the united kingdom. 'And it is agreed,' that her majeſty may be impowered to appoint commiſſioners, who ſhall be accountable to the parliament of Great-Britain, for diſpoſing the ſaid ſum of three hundred and ninety-eight thouſand and eighty-five pounds, ten ſhillings, and all other monies, which ſhall ariſe to Scotland upon the agreements aforeſaid, to the purpoſes before-mentioned: Which commiſſioners ſhall be impowered to call for, receive, and diſpoſe of the ſaid monies in manner aforeſaid; and to inſpect the books of the ſeveral collectors of the revenues, and of all other duties from whence an equivalent may ariſe, and that the collectors and managers of the ſaid revenues and duties be obliged to give to the ſaid commiſſioners ſubſcribed authentic abbreviates to the produce of ſuch revenues and duties ariſing in their reſpective diſtricts: And that the ſaid commiſſioners ſhall have their office within the limits of Scotland, and ſhall in ſuch office keep books, containing accounts of the amount of the equivalent, and how the ſame ſhall have been diſpoſed of from time to time, which may be inſpected by any of the ſubjects, who ſhall deſire the ſame.

XVI. That, from and after the union, the coin ſhall be of the ſame ſtandard and value throughout the united kingdom, as now in England, and a mint ſhall be continued in Scotland under the ſame rules as the mint in England, and the preſent officers of the mint continued, ſubject to ſuch regulations, as her majeſty, her heirs or ſucceſſors, or the parliament of Great-Britain ſhall think fit.

XVII. That, from and after the union, the ſame weights and meaſures ſhall be uſed throughout the united kingdom, as are now eſtabliſhed in England; and ſtandards of weights and meaſures ſhall be kept by thoſe burghs in Scotland, to whom the keeping the ſtandards of weights and meaſures, now in uſe there, does of ſpecial right belong. All which ſtandards ſhall be ſent down to ſuch reſpective burghs from the ſtandards kept in the Exchequer at Weſtminſter, ſubject nevertheleſs to ſuch regulations, as the parliament of Great-Britain ſhall think fit.

XVIII. That the laws concerning regulation of trade, cuſtoms, and ſuch exciſes to which Scotland is, by virtue of this treaty, to be liable, be the ſame in Scotland, from and after the union, as in England; and that all other laws in uſe within the kingdom of Scotland, do, after the union, and notwithſtanding thereof, remain in the ſame force as before (except ſuch as are contrary to, or inconſiſtent with this treaty) but alterable by the parliament of Great-Britain: With this difference betwixt the laws concerning the public right, policy, and civil government, and thoſe that which concern private right, that the laws, which concern public right, policy, and civil government, may be the ſame throughout the whole united kingdom; but that no alteration be made in laws which concern private right, except for evident utility of the ſubjects within Scotland.

XIX. That the court of ſeſſion, or college of juſtice, do, after the union, and notwithſtanding thereof, remain in all time coming within Scotland, as it is now conſtituted by the laws of that kingdom, and with the ſame authority and privileges as before the union, ſubject nevertheleſs to ſuch regulations, for the better adminiſtration of juſtice, as ſhall be made by the parliament of Great-Britain; and that hereafter none ſhall be named by her majeſty, or her royal ſucceſſors, to be ordinary lords of ſeſſion, but ſuch who have ſerved in the college of juſtice as advocates, or principal clerks of ſeſſion for the ſpace of five years; or, as writers to the ſignet, for the ſpace of ten years; with this proviſion, that no writer to the ſignet be capable to be admitted a lord of the ſeſſion, unleſs he undergo a private and public trial on the civil law, before the faculty of advocates, and be found by them qualified for the ſaid office, two years before he be named to be a lord of ſeſſion: Yet ſo, as the qualification made, or to be made, for capacitating perſons to be named ordinary lords of ſeſſion, may be altered by the parliament of Great-Britain. And that the court of juſticiary do alſo, after the union, and, notwithſtanding thereof, remain in all time coming within Scotland, as it is now conſtituted by the laws of that kingdom, and with the ſame authority and privileges as before the union, ſubject nevertheleſs to ſuch regulations as ſhall be made by the parliament of Great-Britain, and without prejudice of other rights of juſticiary; and that all admiralty juriſdictions be under the lord high-admiral, or commiſſioners for the admiralty of Great-Britain for the time being; and that the court of Admiralty, now eſtabliſhed in Scotland, be continued, and that all reviews, reductions, or ſuſpenſions of the ſentences in maritime caſes, competent to the juriſdiction of that court, remain in the ſame manner after the union, as now in Scotland, until the parliament of Great-Britain ſhall make ſuch regulations and alterations, as ſhall be judged expedient for the whole united kingdom, ſo as there be always continued in Scotland, a court of Admiralty, ſuch as is in England, for determination of all maritime caſes relating to private rights in Scotland, competent to the juriſdiction of the admiralty court, ſubject nevertheleſs to ſuch regulations and alterations, as ſhall be thought proper to be made by the parliament of Great-Britain; and that the heretable rights of admiralty and vice admiralties in Scotland be reſerved to the reſpective proprietors as rights of property, ſubject, nevertheleſs, as to the manner of exerciſing ſuch heretable rights, to ſuch regulations and alterations as ſhall be thought proper to be made by the parliament of Great-Britain. And that all other courts now in being within the kingdom of Scotland do remain, but ſubject to alterations by the parliament of Great-Britain; and that all inferior courts within the ſaid limits do remain ſubordinate, as they are now, to the ſupreme courts of juſtice within the ſame, in all time coming; and that no cauſes in Scotland be cognoſcible by the courts of Chancery, Queen's-Bench, Common-Pleas, or any other court in Weſtminſter-Hall; and that the ſaid courts, or any other of the like nature, after the union, ſhall have no power to cognoſce, review, or alter the acts or ſentences of the judicature within Scotland, or ſtop the execution of the ſame; And that there be a court of Exchequer in Scotland after the union, for deciding queſtions concerning the revenues of cuſtoms and exciſes there, having the ſame power and authority in ſuch caſes, as the court of Exchequer has in England; and that the ſaid court of Exchequer in Scotland have power of paſſing ſignatures, gifts, tutories, and in other things, as the court of Exchequer at preſent in Scotland hath, and that the court of Exchequer, that now is in Scotland, do remain until a new court of Exchequer be ſettled by the parliament of Great-Britain in Scotland after the union: And that, after the union, the queen's majeſty, and her royal ſucceſſors, may continue a privy-council in Scotland, for preſerving the public peace and order, until the parliament of Great-Britain ſhall think fit to alter it, or eſtabliſh any other effectual method for that end.

XX. That all heretable offices, ſuperiorities, heretable juriſdictions, offices for life, and juriſdictions for life, be reſerved to the owners thereof, as rights of property, in the ſame manner as they are now enjoyed by the laws of Scotland, notwithſtanding this treaty.

XXI. That the rights and privileges of the royal boroughs in Scotland, as they now are, do remain entire after the union, and notwithſtanding thereof.

XXII. That, by virtue of this treaty, of the peers of Scotland at the time of the union, ſixteen ſhall be the number to ſit and vote in the houſe of lords, and forty-five the number of the repreſentatives of Scotland, in the houſe of commons, of the parliament of Great-Britain; and that when her majeſty, her heirs or ſucceſſors, ſhall declare her or their pleaſure, for holding the firſt or any ſubſequent parliament of Great-Britain, until the parliament of Great-Britain ſhall make further proviſion therein, a writ do iſſue under the great ſeal of the united kingdom, directed to the privy council of Scotland, commanding them to cauſe ſixteen peers, who are to ſit in the houſe of lords, to be ſummoned to parliament; and forty-five members to be elected to ſit in the houſe of commons of the parliament of Great-Britain, according to the agreement in this treaty, in ſuch manner as by an act of this preſent ſeſſion of the parliament of Scotland is or ſhall be ſettled: which act is hereby declared as valid as if it were a part of, and engroſſed in this treaty: And that the names of the perſons ſo ſummoned and elected, ſhall be returned by the privy-council of Scotland, into the court from whence the ſaid writ did iſſue. And that if her majeſty, on or before the firſt day of May next, on which day the union is to take place, ſhall declare under the great ſeal of England, that it is expedient that the lords of parliament of England, and commons of the preſent parliament of England, ſhould be the members of the reſpective houſes of the firſt parliament of Great-Britain, for and on the part of England, then the ſaid lords of parliament of England, and commons of the preſent parliament of England ſhall be the members of the reſpective houſes of the firſt parliament of Great-Britain, for and on the part of England. And her majeſty may, by her royal proclamation, under the great ſeal of Great-Britain, appoint the ſaid firſt parliament of Great-Britain, to meet at ſuch time and place as her majeſty ſhall think fit, which time ſhall not be leſs than fifty days after the date of ſuch proclamation: And, the time and place of the meeting of ſuch parliament being ſo appointed, a writ ſhall be immediately iſſued under the great ſeal of Great-Britain, directed to the privy-council of Scotland, for the ſummoning the ſixteen peers, and for electing forty-five members, by whom Scotland is to be repreſented in the parliament of Great-Britain: And the lords of parliament of England, and the ſixteen peers of Scotland, ſuch ſixteen peers being ſummoned and returned in the manner agreed in this treaty; and the members of the houſe of commons of the ſaid parliament of England, and the forty-five members for Scotland, ſuch forty-five members being elected and returned in the manner agreed to in this treaty, ſhall aſſemble and meet reſpectively in their reſpective houſes of the parliament of Great-Britain, at ſuch time and place as ſhall be ſo appointed by her majeſty, and ſhall be the two houſes of the firſt parliament of Great-Britain; and that parliament may continue for ſuch time only, as the preſent parliament of England might have continued, if the union of the two kingdoms had not been made, unleſs ſooner diſſolved by her majeſty. And that every one of the lords of parliament of Great-Britain, and every member of the houſe of commons of the parliament of Great-Britain, in the firſt, and all ſucceeding parliaments of Great-Britain, until the parliament of Great-Britain ſhall otherways direct, ſhall take the reſpective oaths appointed to be taken, inſtead of the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, by an act of parliament made in England, in the reign of the late king William and queen Mary, entitled, 'An act for the abrogating of the oaths of ſupremacy and allegiance, and appointing other oaths;' and make, ſubſcribe, and audibly repeat the declaration mentioned in an act of parliament made in England, in the thirtieth year of the reign of king Charles II. entitled, 'An act for the more effectually preſerving the king's perſon and government, by diſabling papiſts from ſitting in either houſe of parliament;' and ſhall take and ſubſcribe the oath mentioned in an act of parliament made in the firſt year of her intimate with him; and was already taking meaſures how to prevent it, when an unexpected occaſion was thrown into his hands, of ſignalizing again his courage and conduct.

Upon the enemy's paſſing the Deule, the duke ſent orders to the Daniſh horſe, who were coming from their garriſons, to haſten their march; and, that there might not be the leaſt pretence of delay, he engaged his promiſe with the field deputies of the States, that their arrears ſhould be paid them. The duke of Wirtemberg, who commanded thoſe troops, and was well affected to the common cauſe, ſeeing every thing was complied with, that the king of Denmark inſiſted on, thought he needed not to ſtay till he ſent to that court, nor wait for expreſs orders; and therefore commanded his troops to march; and they made ſuch expedition, that, on the 22d of May, N. S. being the day before the battle, they came up within a league of the rear of the confederate army.

About the ſame time, the French having been joined by the horſe of marſhal de Marſin's army, and confiding in their ſuperiority of numbers, came out of their lines and encamped between Tirlemont and Judoigne.

The next day, being Whitſunday, about four o'clock in the morning, the confederate army marched in eight columns towards Ramillies, a village near which the Gheet takes its ſource, that they might avoid the inconveniency of paſſing that river [c]. They ſoon had information, that the enemy's army, having decamped from Tirlemont, was likewiſe on their march to meet them, their baggage and heavy cannon being left at Judoigne. The elector of Bavaria and marſhal de Villeroy, not in the leaſt ſuſpecting, that the Danes had joined the confederate army, were fully determined upon engaging them, either that day or the next, being apprehenſive, that the duke of Marlborough had formed a deſign of inveſting Namur. The enemy's army then conſiſted of ſeventy-ſix battalions of foot, and a hundred and thirty-two ſquadrons of horſe, having ſixty-two cannon, eleven mortars, and thirty-ſix pontoons. Their immediate deſign was to poſſeſs themſelves of Ramillies, and the ſtrong camp thereabouts, to prevent the confederates doing the ſame; and in this they ſo far ſucceeded, that, being nearer, they got there firſt. Their fears were however groundleſs concerning Namur; for the duke of Marlborough had no ſuch deſign. His reſolution was the ſame with theirs; and, had not they offered him battle that day, he would certainly have attacked them the next. The two armies met near the village of Ramillies, from whence the battle took its name. When the confederate army was advanced near this place, they found the enemy getting into the camp of mount St. André, and placing their right on the Mehaigne, where they had poſted a brigade of foot, and filled the ſpace between that and Ramillies, which is about half a league, an open and level ground, with near a hundred ſquadrons, among which were the troops of the king's houſhold. They had likewiſe above twenty battalions of foot, with a battery of about twelve pieces of cannon, at Ramillies.

About one in the morning, the duke of Marlborough ſent the quarter-maſter general with the camp colours, and a few ſquadrons towards Ramillies, to make a feint, as if they deſigned to form a camp there, the better to penetrate into the enemy's deſigns: and, about three, the duke and monſieur Auverquerque decamped with the whole army, and advanced in eight columns in a great fog. A little after eight, the advanced guard of the confederates, which conſiſted of ſix hundred horſe, and had been ſent with all the quarter-maſters of the army, to view the ground, arrived at the height of Merdorp (or Merdan) from whence they perceived, that the enemy were in motion, and marched in the plain of mount St. André, extending themſelves as far as the tomb of Hottomont, towards the Mehaigne. Hereupon they halted, and ſent intelligence to the duke of Marlborough and monſieur Auverquerque, who being advanced about ten to view the the enemy, they could not at firſt judge, whether thoſe ſquadrons they ſaw were only to cover their march into their lines, or whether they were the van of the enemy, that came to offer battle. The duke therefore gave orders to the horſe to haſten their march, reſolving, if thoſe he ſaw had been only covering ſquadrons, to attack them with his cavalry only. But, the fog being ſoon diſperſed, and the army being then in full view of the enemy, the duke found their whole army approach, with an apparent reſolution to fight, upon which he made all the neceſſary diſpoſitions to receive them. The enemy, ſeeing the confederates ſo near them, poſſeſſed themſelves of a very ſtrong camp; placing their right near the tomb of Hottomont, againſt the Mehaigne, and their left at Anderkirk, and poſted a good number of their infantry in the villages of Anderkirk, Offuz, and Ramillies, which laſt was near their center; beſides which, they put five battalions near the hedges of the village of Franquenies, which was on their right. The confederate army was at the ſame time drawn up in order of battle, the right wing being poſted near Foltz, on the rivulet Yauſe, with a little moraſs in front; and the left near the village of Franquenies on the Mehaigne; where, beſides the number of the horſe belonging to that wing, the duke of Marlborough ordered the Daniſh ſquadrons, being twenty-one in number, to be poſted; rightly judging, by the ſituation of the ground, that the ſtreſs of the action would be on that ſide. All things being thus diſpoſed, it was reſolved to attack the village of Ramillies, which was the enemy's principal poſt, and from thence to Anderkirk, had formed a line of foot along the Gheet, and a line of horſe behind them. In order to this attempt, twenty pieces of cannon of twenty-four pounders, and ſome hawbitzers, were brought up, and twelve battalions, which were to be ſupported by the whole line, were ordered to make the firſt onſet, under the command of lieutenant-general Schultz.

About half an hour paſt one, the artillery of the confede-her majeſty's reign, entitled, 'An act to declare the alterations in the oath appointed to be taken by the act entitled, an act for the further ſecurity of her majeſty's perſon, and the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, and for extinguiſhing the hopes of the pretended prince of Wales, and all other pretenders, and their ſecret abettors;' and for declaring the aſſociation to be determined at ſuch time, and in ſuch manner, as the members of both houſes of parliament of England are, by the ſaid reſpective acts, directed to take, make, and ſubſcribe the ſame, upon the penalties and diſabilities in the ſaid reſpective acts contained. And it is declared and agreed, that theſe words, 'This Realm, The Crown of this Realm, and The Queen of this Realm,' mentioned in the oaths and declaration contained in the aforeſaid acts, which were intended to ſignify the crown and realm of England, ſhall be underſtood of the crown and realm of Great-Britain; and that, in that ſenſe, the ſaid oaths and declaration be taken and ſubſcribed by the members of both houſes of the parliament of Great-Britain.

XXIII. That the aforeſaid ſixteen peers of Scotland, mentioned in the laſt preceding article to ſit in the houſe of lords of the parliament of Great-Britain, ſhall have all privileges of parliament, which the peers of England now have, and which they, or any peers of Great-Britain, ſhall have after the union, and particularly the right of ſitting upon the trials of peers: And in caſe of the trial of any peer, in time of adjournment, or prorogation of parliament, the ſaid ſixteen peers ſhall be ſummoned in the ſame manner, and have the ſame powers and privileges at ſuch trial, as any other peers of Great-Britain; and that, in caſe any trials of peers ſhall hereafter happen, when there is no parliament in being, the ſixteen peers of Scotland who ſate in the laſt preceding parliament, ſhall be ſummoned in the ſame manner, and have the ſame powers and privileges at ſuch trials, as any other peers of Great-Britain: And that all peers of Scotland, and their ſucceſſors to their honours and dignities, ſhall, from and after the union, be peers of Great-Britain, and have rank and precedency next and immediately after the peers of the like orders and degrees in England at the time of the union; and before all peers of Great-Britain, of the like orders and degrees, who may be created after the union, and ſhall be tried as peers of Great-Britain, and ſhall enjoy all privileges of peers, as fully as the peers of England do now, or as they, or any other peers of Great-Britain, may hereafter enjoy the ſame, except the right and privilege of ſitting in the houſe of lords, and the privileges depending thereon, and particularly the right of ſitting upon the trials of peers.

XXIV. That, from and after the union, there be one great ſeal for the united kingdom of Great-Britain, which ſhall be different from the great ſeal now uſed in either kingdom; and that the quartering the arms, and the rank and precedency of the lion king of arms of the kingdom of Scotland, as may beſt ſuit the union, be left to her majeſty: And that, in the mean time, the great ſeal of England be uſed as the great ſeal of the united kingdom; and that the great ſeal of the united kingdom be uſed for ſealing writs to elect and ſummon the parliament of Great-Britain, and for ſealing all treaties with foreign princes and ſtates, and all public acts, inſtruments, and orders of ſtate, which concern the whole united kingdom, and in all other matters relating to England, as the great ſeal of England is now uſed; and that a ſeal in Scotland, after the union, be always kept and made uſe of in all things relating to private rights or grants, which have uſually paſſed the great ſeal of Scotland, and which only concern offices, grants, commiſſions, and private rights within that kingdom; and that, until ſuch ſeal be appointed by her majeſty, the preſent great ſeal of Scotland ſhall be uſed for ſuch purpoſes; and that the privy-ſeal, ſignet, caſſet, ſignet of the juſticiary court, quarter ſeal, and ſeals of courts now uſed in Scotland be continued: But that the ſaid ſeals be altered and adapted to the ſtate of the union, as her majeſty ſhall think fit; and the ſaid ſeals, and all of them, and the keepers of them ſhall be ſubject to ſuch regulations, as the parliament of Great-Britain ſhall hereafter make. And that the crown, ſcepter, ſword of ſtate, the records of parliament, and all other records, rolls, and regiſters whatſoever, both public and private, general and particular, and warrants thereof, continue to be kept as they are within that part of the united kingdom now called Scotland; and that they ſhall ſo remain in all time coming, notwithſtanding of the union.

XXV. That all laws and ſtatutes in either kingdom, ſo far as they are contrary to, or inconſiſtent with the terms of theſe articles, or any of them, ſhall, from and after the union, ceaſe and become void, and ſhall be ſo declared to be by the reſpective parliaments of the ſaid kingdoms.

[c] Ramillies is a village (ſurrounded with a ditch) in Brabant, in the diſtrict of Louvain, by the ſkirts of the province of Namur, rendered famous to all poſterity by the glorious victory obtained there by the duke of Marlborough and monſieur D' Auverquerque, over the elector of Bavaria and marſhal Villeroy, which was followed by the reduction of almoſt all the Netherlands in two months time. It lies at the head of the Gheet, about a mile and a half north from the ſide of the Mehaigne, that interval being the narrow aperture where that glorious battle was fought. It is ſix miles almoſt ſouth from Judoigne, twelve miles ſouth from Tirlemont, fourteen miles weſt-north-weſt from Huy, and eleven miles north from Namur.

The

rates began to play. It was immediately anſwered by the enemy's cannon; and both continued firing with conſiderable execution. Whilſt the duke of Marlborough was at the head of the lines, to give the neceſſary orders every where, velt-marſhal Auquerque repaired to the left, where perceiving, that the enemy's foot poſted in the hedges of Franquenies, galled the horſe of that wing, he commanded four battalions, with two pieces of cannon under colonel Wertmuller, to diſlodge them from thence, which they performed with great vigour and reſolution. Hereupon the enemy detached two battalions and fourteen ſquadrons of dragoons on foot, to regain that important poſt; but Auverquerque commanded, at the ſame time, the whole wing of the Dutch horſe, to attack the enemy; which not only prevented their deſign, but put thoſe dragoons into ſuch diſorder, that they were not able, either to reach the village, or recover their horſes, which they had left a good way behind the tomb of Hottomont, and were moſt of them cut in pieces, and taken priſoners. The Dutch cavalry charged with a good deal of bravery, ſword in hand, and ſoon after the engagement were ſuſtained by the Daniſh ſquadrons; but having to deal with the French king's houſhold, the muſquetaires, gens-d'armes, guarde de corps, horſe grenadiers, and other choice troops which were in the enemy's right, the conflict was obſtinate, and the ſucceſs doubtful for above an hour. The Daniſh horſe which fought on the left of all, behaved themſelves with ſuch gallantry, that they forced the enemy to give ground, and broke ſeveral of their ſquadrons; but, at the ſame time, the French had almoſt an equal advantage againſt the Dutch horſe of the right of the left wing, whom they put into great confuſion. To remedy this, the duke of Marlborough, who was advanced that way, ſent for twenty ſquadrons of horſe from the right wing, where they could not engage the enemy's left, by reaſon of a moraſs, which ſeparated them; and with theſe he reinforced his left, adding to them his body of reſerve [d].

The duke, while theſe troops were advancing from the right, rallied ſome of the broken ſquadrons, and gave his orders for others to charge. In this place he was in the extremity of danger; for, being ſingled out by ſeveral of the moſt reſolute of the enemy, and having the misfortune, as he was leaping a ditch, to fall from his horſe [e], he had been either killed or taken priſoner, if ſome of the confederate foot, that were near at hand, had not come very ſeaſonably to his aſſiſtance. After this, he had ſtill a narrower eſcape, a cannon-ball taking off the head of colonel Brienfield, his gentleman of the horſe, as he was holding the ſtirrup for the duke to remount.

The twenty ſquadrons, which the duke had ſent for from the right to reinforce the left, had but little ſhare in the defeat of the enemy's right; for, by that time they were come up, the Dutch and Danes, having charged them both in front and flank, had almoſt compleated that ſignal piece of ſervice, cutting in pieces the beſt part of the French king's houſhold troops, ſo that they could never be fully re-eſtabliſhed during the remainder of the war. In the mean time, the village of Ramillies was vigorouſly attacked by general Schultz, with the twelve battalions under him. The enemy, having the advantage of the ground, defended themſelves with great reſolution and obſtinacy, till, ſeeing the whole line of the confederate infantry in motion to ſupport general Schultz, and the Dutch and Daniſh horſe advancing to ſurround them, they thought of making their retreat; but found it was too late; for they were intercepted by the victorious horſe, and moſt of them either killed or taken priſoners.

The reſt of the enemy's infantry endeavoured likewiſe to make their eſcape, which they did in better order, being favoured by the horſe of their left wing, who, being covered by a rivulet and moraſs, had not yet been attacked, and formed themſelves in three lines between Offuz and Anderkirk. But the Engliſh horſe, having found means to paſs the rivulet, charged the enemy with ſuch unparallelled briſkneſs and courage, that they entirely abandoned their foot; and our dragoons, puſhing into the village of Anderkirk, made a terrible ſlaughter of them. The reſt of the enemy, who were at the ſame time attacked by the Engliſh and Dutch foot with equal bravery, gave way on all ſides. Their horſe rallied again in the plains, to cover the diſorderly retreat of their foot; but they were ſo cloſely purſued by the confederate cavalry, that they were forced to divide themſelves into three ſmall bodies, that they might fly the better three different ways. Thoſe, that took to the left, were purſued by the Dutch and Danes, who made great ſlaughter amongſt them, and took abundance of priſoners; and thoſe, that fled to the right, were chaced by the regiments of Lumley, Hay, and Roſs; which two laſt fell in with the foot regiment du roy, of whom having killed many, the reſt threw down their arms, and begged quarter, which was immediately granted. Upon this, they delivered their arms and colours to the lord John Hay's dragoons; but, when theſe dragoons faced about, in order to purſue the enemy, they treacherouſly attempted to take up their arms again; in which, however, they were prevented, and ſuffered ſeverely for their perfidy.

The foremoſt regiments of the Engliſh horſe, that purſued the enemy's center, were that of lieutenant-general Wood, commanded by himſelf, and Wyndham's (afterwards Palmes's) carabineers, headed by major Perry. When they came upon a riſing ground, they ſaw ſeven ſquadrons of the Spaniſh and Bavarian guards, among whom was the elector himſelf, and Villeroy, who hoped, with theſe few choice troops, to make good their retreat, and ſave their cannon, which was marching in a line before them. General Wood galloped with his own regiment upon the enemy's left, and charged them ſo vigorouſly, that he broke them entirely, killing many of them, and taking not a few priſoners, among whom were two lieutenant-colonels, one major, four captains, and ſeveral ſubaltern officers. He alſo took the ſtandard of the elector's guards, two of his own troopers, and killed his kettle-drummer; the elector himſelf and Villeroy very narrowly eſcaping. Major Perry, at the head of Wyndham's carabineers, fell upon the enemy with equal briſkneſs and reſolutions; put many of them to the ſword, and took ſeveral priſoners, particularly the major of the Spaniſh guards, monſieur de la Guertiere, and monſieur de Bruan, cornet of the ſame, beſides four officers, and forty-ſix private men of the royal bombardiers, with their colours. The Engliſh horſe and dragoons followed the chace through and by Judoigne, till two o'clock in the morning, as far as Meldert, being five leagues from the place, where the action happened, and two from Louvain. During this retreat, a misfortune happened to the enemy, which contributed not a little to compleat the victory. Several waggons of their van-guard breaking down ſtopped the way, ſo that their baggage artillery, which followed, could not paſs, nor could their troops defile in good order. Perceiving, that the confederate horſe, having got intelligence of this accident, purſued them cloſe, they threw down their arms, that they might eſcape with the more eaſe, and retreated in the greateſt confuſion. Here it was, that the moſt priſoners were taken; for, in the action, little or no quarter was given, the confederate horſe having been highly provoked by the idle gaſconades of the French muſquetaires and gens d'armes, of which they were very full when they came to the attack, but paid dearly for it in the ſequel. In ſhort, never was victory more complete; the confederates made themſelves maſters of all the enemy's cannon, except two or three, to the number of about fifty pieces; moſt of their baggage; about a hundred and twenty colours, or ſtandards, and ſeveral pair of kettle-drums. The enemy's loſs of men, according to the moſt general computation, amounted to eight thouſand ſlain, and among them, prince Maximilian and prince Monbaſon; and about ſix thouſand private ſoldiers, and near ſix hundred officers taken priſoners; which, with their deſerters and wounded, made their loſs not leſs than twenty thouſand men [f]. Some accounts make the number of de-

[d] The French writers, who have given a deſcription of this battle, allow of this as a very prudent part of the duke of Marlborough's conduct; but, to cover the diſgrace of their favourite troops, pretend, that the duke ſent fifty, and not twenty ſquadrons from his right, and made four lines of them, beſides a column compoſed of the body of reſerve. "Thus, ſays father Daniel, the whole weight of the battle fell upon the right wing of the French army, where the troops of his majeſty's houſhold were placed. The body, which had hitherto been invincible, entered the enemy's troops, and overthrew the three firſt lines, but, finding a fourth, and the column abovementioned, which was moving to fall upon them in flank, they were obliged to give way, and retire to rally behind the troops, which followed them, and who, inſtead of ſuſtaining them, retreated without coming to the battle. Matters being in this ill ſituation, the left wing of the French, which had not been able to engage by reaſon of the moraſs, which lay between them and the enemy, drew up in order upon a riſing ground, as was well judged by the marquis de Meſiers lieutenant-general, and ſtopped the progreſs of the enemy's horſe, which preſſed the houſhold troops very cloſely, and, by this means, gave them an opportunity to rally, and make their retreat in good order. The moſt part of the troops diſbanded themſelves before the retreat; and this cauſed the diſorders, which followed; for we had not above three or four thouſand men ſlain in the battle."

[e] Some officers, who were in the engagement, ſaid, the duke was borne down by ſome of the diſordered Dutch horſe. Poſſibly both may be true.

[f] The duke of Marlborough ſaid to biſhop Burnet, the French army looked the beſt of any he had ever ſeen: But that their officers did not do their part, nor ſhew the courage that had appeared among them on other occaſions. And, when the biſhop aſked him the difference between the actions at Hochſtedt and at Ramillies, he ſaid, The battle of Hochſtedt laſted between ſeven and eight hours, and we loſt above twelve thouſand men; whereas the battle of Ramillies laſted not above two hours, and we loſt not above two thouſand five hundred men. Vol. II. 451.

The

ferters ſo great; that ſcarce half of their army muſt have ever returned to their colours. The perſons of note among the priſoners were meſſieurs Palavicini and Miziere, major generals; the marquis de Bar, brigadier general of horſe; the marquis de Nonant, brigadier general of foot; the marquis de la Baume, ſon of the marſhal de Tallard; monſieur de Montmorency, nephew to the late duke of Luxemburg; a nephew of lord Clare, and ſeveral others [g].

The elector of Bavaria and marſhal de Villeroy, with the greateſt part of the broken remains of their army, continued their precipitate flight till they reached Louvain; where having held (by torch-light, in the market-place) a council of war, they reſolved to abandon that place, and retire towards Bruſſels. On the other hand, the confederates, having halted at Beveſheim the 24th of May, for the refreſhment of their troops, diſpoſed all things for their march early the next morning, in order to force the paſſage of the Deule; but received advice in the night, that the enemy had quitted their camp, and abandoned Louvain. Whereupon bridges being laid over that river, a detachment of five hundred men was ſent to take poſſeſſion of the place, and the whole army paſſed the river the next day, about noon, and encamped at Bethlem [h].

After the battle of Ramillies, there was nothing to be ſeen in the Low-Countries, but a general revolution: and the allies were attended with a continued courſe of conqueſt. The inhabitants of thoſe parts, weary of the French government, received the confederate generals every where as their deliverers, who had redeemed them from ſlavery, and recovered their ancient liberty. The cities of Louvain, Mechlin, and Bruſſels ſubmitted, beſides many leſſer places. Antwerp made a ſhew of ſtanding out, but ſoon followed the example

[g] The marquis de Feuquieres repreſents this battle 'as fatal to the two crowns,' and obſerves, that 'this deciſive action was reſolved upon without any of thoſe inducements, by which a general ought to be conducted, when he determines to engage an enemy.' He lays it down as a maxim with relation to battles, that a general ſhould never be diſpoſed, either to offer or receive battle, except in thoſe conjunctures, wherein the benefits, that will redound to his prince from a proſperous event, will be much greater than any diſadvantage he can poſſibly ſuſtain by a defeat. "This firſt maxim, ſo inconteſtable in its own nature, and ſo neceſſary to be obſerved, was entirely diſregarded on this occaſion by marſhal de Villeroy. Notwithſtanding the fatal event of the battle of Hochſtedt, the war, that rekindled on the Rhine, was ſuſtained with equality. It was carried on to advantage in Italy, where the duke of Vendoſme, who oppoſed prince Eugene, gave monſieur de Feuillade an opportunity to form the ſiege of Turin. The duke of Berwick ſuſtained a very difficult war with Spain, after marſhal de Theſſe had quitted the ſiege of Barcelona in ſo puſillanimous a manner. The confederate crowns therefore ſhould have only maintained a defenſive war in Flanders during this campaign, and for which we were effectually prepared by forming a new line along the Deule. Our reſolution therefore to open the campaign with a general action, the ſucceſs of which would have been but inconſiderable on our part, in that early ſeaſon, was a remarkable error in that general ſtate of affairs; and reſulted from a preſumptive vanity, and a perfect inattention to the general plan of the war. Marſhal de Villeroy was determined, without the leaſt reaſon, to open the campaign out of his lines. With this view he marched to Tirlemont; but he ſhould have thought this motion ſufficient, and he might poſſibly have had juſt inducements to make it. An army, which is only charged with a defenſive war in its lines, ought to be aſſembled ſooner than the enemy, in order to gain ſome days, at leaſt, for the conſumption of the forage near the lines; and, had we purſued this cautious conduct, it would have been difficult for the enemy to approach our lines; and their continuance in the adjacent country would have been deſtructive to their cavalry and equipage. If marſhal de Villeroy had been content with his advance to Tirlemont, and had cauſed his army to conſume the forage between his camp and the Deule, he might have effected the preſervation of the Netherlands, and the ſecurity of his lines, without hazarding any engagement. But he thought this firſt march inſufficient, though it might have produced a very judicious effect; and inſtead of waiting for the elector of Bavaria, with whom, in mere deference to his rank, he ought, at leaſt, to have acted in concert, he decamped from Tirlemont, and advanced to Ramillies, without acquiring any intelligence of the motions formed by the enemy, who were then aſſembled near Tongres. When the van of his march began to appear at the head of the Little Gheet, where Ramillies is ſeated, he was informed, that the enemy were advancing to him, and that their front already began to be diſcovered. He then prepared to form his troops in order of battle, with a full perſuaſion, that the enemy would not preſume to attack ſo formidable an army as his. Had his diſpoſition been regular, the bravery of his troops might have rendered the action ſucceſsful; but it was ſo extremely injudicious and ill-precautioned againſt the order, in which he ſaw the enemy ranged, that it can be hardly thought ſurpriſing, that the event of this battle was ſo fatal, as it really proved. I ſhall now repreſent the errors committed by marſhal de Villeroy with reſpect to his particular diſpoſition, which I ſhall deſcribe from the left of the army, and through the extent of the line to the extremity of the right. I ſhall then proceed to the ſecond line; and from thence to the rear, to make it evident, that the diſpoſition was every where irregular, and contrary to all juſt rules. The left wing of the cavalry was covered by the Gheet, and the marſhes that bounded it; and where the troops could neither charge the enemy, nor be charged by them; and conſequently they continued uſeleſs during the engagement. The village of Ramillies, which was ſeated in a plain beyond the ſource of the Gheet, fronted the right of the infantry, and marſhal de Villeroy had poſted ſome battalions there; but the village was too diſtant from our line, to be ſupported to any effect, when it ſhould happen to be attacked by the enemy. We even neglected to open the hedges towards the line, in order to advance with a more extended front, in caſe it ſhould be neceſſary to ſupport the infantry in the village, who had not the precaution to accommodate that place, either to their front or flanks, nor even to form a communication between their ſeveral battalions, ſo that they were only poſted in the incloſures and gardens. But the moſt extraordinary circumſtance of all was, that, in order to defend the village, which, it was imagined, would coſt the enemy very dear to ſurprize, though it was too remote from the line, to produce any ſuch effect, we poſted there all the uſeleſs infantry of the army, compoſed, for the greateſt part, of foreign battalions and recruits, and even priſoners taken from the enemy. When the village therefore was attacked, the aſſailants only engaged a ſet of inconſiderable troops, who were ill-diſpoſed, and not ſupported either in time, or from any ſituation near enough to have any effect; and the village was forced by an attack upon the flanks, which were entirely unprotected. The diſpoſition of our right was ſtill worſe than that of our left of the center. The village of Taniers on the bank of the Mehaigne ought to have ſupported our right, and reſerved a conſiderable body of infantry to guard it; but marſhal de Villeroy contented himſelf at firſt with detaching a regiment of dragoons thither, who were very ſeverely treated by the enemy's infantry; and he afterwards ſupplied it with a brigade and four battalions, who were overwhelmed by the ſuperior fire of the enemy's infantry, who were already maſters of the village. I ſhall add to all this inconſiderate diſpoſition of the front a particular neglect, which contributed likewiſe to the loſs of the battle. I have already obſerved, that marſhal de Villeroy received intelligence in the morning, that the enemy were advancing towards him; and, yet in all the courſe of time he then had to diſengage his troops from the impediments of their baggage, he never thought of that precaution; ſo that the greateſt part of it was heaped up between the two lines, and embarraſſed their motions, eſpecially to the right, where the action was ſuſtained. Such were the principal defects in our diſpoſition; and they were all ſo very conſiderable and eſſential, that one alone would have been ſufficient to have loſt us the battle. The enemy, who were ſenſible of our injudicious arrangement, were above five hours in changing their order of battle, in order to form another, that might be more advantageous to them in that conjuncture. In all that length of time our troops continued under arms, without forming any motion; and whatever inſtances could poſſibly be made to marſhal de Villeroy to adjuſt his order of battle by that, which he ſaw the enemy forming, in order to attack us, it was impoſſible to prevail upon him to vary his firſt diſpoſition. Our whole army beheld the enemy unguarding their right, becauſe it would have been in vain for them to have attacked our left, which was covered by the Gheet. The lieutenant-general, who commanded on the left, ſent frequent intelligence to marſhal de Villeroy of the enemy's motions, which he had obſerved, and propoſed to him, not to leave any more cavalry on the left, than would be proportionable to what the enemy reſerved at their right, and to double the reſt behind the left. But monſieur de Gaſſion recommended this ſalutary and judicious advice in vain. It was likewiſe obſerved, that the enemy ſtill drew off part of their infantry from their right, and formed ſeveral lines before the village of Ramillies, and the right of our infantry; and we might naturally imagine they intended to make a powerful effort againſt that village, and the right of our infantry. But whatever remonſtrances could be made to marſhal de Villeroy, to induce him to approach the village, and double part of the infantry of the left behind that of the right and center, as he ſaw performed by the enemy, he continued inflexible, though he had all imaginable reaſon to conform the diſpoſition for his defence to the enemy's preparations for attacking him. It was likewiſe obſerved, that the enemy drew off a body of infantry from their ſecond line, and marched them to Taniers; and it was repreſented, though ineffectually, to marſhal de Villeroy, that the enemy poured all their force to their left, and that it would be impoſſible for our right to ſuſtain ſo formidable an effort; but no conſideration could induce him to act conſiſtently with the enemy. In fine, when above five hours had been employed by the enemy in forming the diſpoſition I have deſcribed; while marſhal de Villeroy, in all that length of time, never made the leaſt proviſion for enabling the right to ſupport the ſhock with which they were threatened, the enemy attacked the village of Taniers; and, when they had entirely carried it, and improved it to ſupport their left, they advanced in four lines to our right wing of cavalry, and in ſeveral lines and columns to our infantry, who were poſted in the village of Ramillies. As they approached our right, they advanced their ſecond and fourth lines into the intervals of their firſt and ſecond lines; ſo, that when they made their advance upon us, they formed only one front, without any intermediate ſpaces. This motion was performed ſo near us, that our right had no time either to cloſe themſelves, in order to fill their intervals by that contraction, or to ſupply them with the ſecond line, which, beſides their immoderate diſtance from the firſt line, were incapable of making that advance with freedom, on account of the ſeveral equipages, which, as I have already intimated, were left, through mere negligence, between the two lines. Our right therefore was charged by one contiguous front, whoſe ſquadrons, that forced our intervals, penetrated without oppoſition, and then wheeled about to charge the ſquadrons of our firſt line in the rear, who, though they had almoſt defeated all the ſquadrons that attacked them, were now thrown into a general diſorder by the ſquadrons of the enemy's ſecond line, and by thoſe, who charged them in the rear. The enemy conducted the attack of the village differently from that of the cavalry on the right. They advanced to it in four columns; but, when they approached the front of that village, they were convinced, that our line of foot was too remote to protect it with their fire, and that the flank of the village was not guarded by troops, becauſe their number in that place was too inconſiderable. From this bad diſpoſition on our part they derived one, that was advantageous to themſelves; for they advanced one of their laſt lines into the front of the firſt; and, when they were marching up to the village, this front extended in an angle to the flank of that village, and eaſily forced it, while the other troops ſuſtained the attack from the front of that place. All this diſorder of our right was not to be retrieved, either by the preſence of the general himſelf, or the ſeveral general officers in that quarter. The bravery, both of officers and ſoldiers, was incapable of reinſtating an action, that was loſt by a bad diſpoſition; ſo that a general confuſion was communicated through all our right, who abandoned the field of battle and their cannon. The left of the cavalry, and ſome battalions of the left, who had not ſhared the engagement, retired without any moleſtation, till the approach of night, when the flight and diſorder became univerſal.

"Thus did the enemy, in the ſpace of one quarter of an hour, defeat an army of eighty thouſand men, while their own loſs did not amount to two thouſand. They took eighty pieces of cannon, and a prodigious quantity of baggage; and conquered all the Spaniſh Netherlands, which our general had abandoned."

[h] Louvain is a very large and pleaſant city of the Low-Countries; the French abandoned it May 24, 1706, the next day after the memorable battle of Ramillies, and the duke of Marlborough took poſſeſſion of it on the 25th. It ſtands on the river Deule, eleven miles ſouth-eaſt of Mechlin, fifteen north eaſt of Bruſſels, twenty-ſeven north of Namur, and thirty-eight north eaſt of Mons.

of the reſt. Ghent and Bruges did the ſame. In all theſe king Charles was proclaimed. Upon this unexpected rapidity of ſucceſs, the duke of Marlborough went to the Hague on the 9th of June, to concert meaſures with the States; where he ſtaid but a few days, for they agreed to every thing he propoſed, and ſent him back with full powers. The firſt thing he undertook was the ſiege of Oſtend, a place famous for its long ſiege in the laſt age. The natives of the place were diſpoſed to return to the Auſtrian family; and the French, who were in it, had ſo loſt all heart and ſpirit, that they made not the reſiſtance, which was expected. In ten days after, the confederates ſat down before it, and within four days after the batteries were finiſhed, the place capitulated [i]. From thence they proceeded to Menin, which was eſteemed the beſt finiſhed fortification in all thoſe parts. It was built after the peace of Nimeguen; nothing, that art could contrive, was wanted to render it impregnable; and it was defended by a garriſon of ſix thouſand men; ſo that many thought it was too bold an undertaking to ſit down before it. The French army was became conſiderable by great detachments brought from the Upper Rhine, where marſhal Villars was ſo far ſuperior to the Germans, that if it had not been for this revulſion of his forces, the circles of Swabia and Franconia would have been much expoſed to pillage and contribution [k].

The duke of Vendoſme's conduct in Italy had ſo raiſed his character, that he was thought the only man fit to be at the head of the army in Flanders; and was accordingly ſent for, and had that command given him with a high compliment, which was very injurious to the other officers, ſince he was declared to be the ſingle man, on whom France could depend, and by whom it could be protected in that extremity. The ſiege of Menin was carried on ſo ſucceſsfully, that the trenches were opened on the 24th of July, and the batteries finiſhed on the 29th; and the place was ſo warmly preſſed, that it capitulated on the 11th of Auguſt, and, on the 14th, being St. Louis's day, four thouſand men marched out of the town. It ſeemed ſtrange, that a garriſon, which was ſtill ſo numerous, ſhould ſurrender in ſo ſhort a time a place, which was both ſo ſtrong and ſo well furniſhed. But as the French were much ſunk, ſo the allies were now become very expert at carrying on of ſieges, and ſpared no coſt, that was neceſſary for diſpatch. Dendermonde had been for ſome weeks under a blockade [l]. This the duke of Marlborough ordered to be turned into a formal ſiege. The place was ſo ſurrounded with water, that the French king, having once begun a ſiege there, was forced to raiſe it; yet it was now ſo preſſed, that the garriſon offered to capitulate; but the duke would give them no other terms, but thoſe of being priſoners of war, to which they were obliged to ſubmit. Aeth was next inveſted; it lay ſo inconveniently between Flanders and Brabant, that it was neceſſary to clear that communication, and deliver Bruſſels from the danger of that neighbourhood. In a fortnight's time it was alſo obliged to capitulate; and the garriſon were made priſoners of war [m].

During theſe ſieges, the duke of Vendoſme, having fixed himſelf in a camp that could not be forced, did not think fit to give the duke of Marlborough any diſturbance, while he lay with his army covering the ſieges. The French were jealous of the elector of Bavaria's heat, and, though he deſired to command an army apart, yet it was not thought fit to divide their forces, though now grown to be very numerous. Deſerters ſaid, that the panic was ſtill ſo great in the army, that there was no appearance of their venturing on any action. Paris itſelf was under no little conſternation; and, though the king carried his misfortunes with an appearance of calmneſs and compoſure, yet he was often let blood, which was thought an indication of a great commotion within; and this was, no doubt, the greater, becauſe it was ſo much diſguiſed. No news was talked of at that court; all was ſilent and ſolemn; ſo that even the ducheſs dowager of Orleans knew not the true ſtate of their affairs; which made her write to her aunt, the electreſs of Hanover, to learn news of her.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in Flanders, the courts of Spain and France took ſuch early meaſures to attack king Charles both by ſea and land, before he could be relieved by the maritime powers, that his affairs were reduced to the laſt degree of deſpair. King Philip ſet out in February from Madrid, in order to open the campaign with the ſieges of Valencia and Gironne. He was adviſed to begin with the reduction of Valencia; not only as it lay nearer, and was eaſier come at, but as, by that means, the diſpoſition to revolt would be checked, which might otherwiſe encreaſe and ſpread farther. This advice, however, was over-ruled by France, where little regard was had to the Spaniards. It was therefore reſolved (upon the arrival of a courier from France) to begin with the ſiege of Barcelona. There king Charles himſelf lay; and, on taking it, all the reſt, it was reckoned, would fall. Purſuant to this ſcheme, the French reſolved to ſend every thing neceſſary for the ſiege, and the count of Toulouſe was ordered to lie with the fleet before the place, whilſt it was beſieged by land. It was concerted to begin the ſiege in March; for they knew, that, if they began it ſo early, our fleet could not come in time to relieve the town. But two great ſtorms, that came ſoon after one another, did ſo ſcatter their tartanes, and diſable their ſhips of war, that, as ſome were caſt away, and others much damaged, ſo they all loſt a month's time; and it was not till the 6th of April, that king Philip's army (conſiſting of thirty-ſeven battalions, and thirty-one ſquadrons) opened the trenches before Montjuic; which, through the obſtinate reſiſtance of the Engliſh and Dutch garriſon, and the ſlowneſs of the attack, occaſioned by the death of the French engineer Lapara, held out twenty-two days. The French ſeemed to think, there was no danger of raiſing the ſiege, and that therefore they might proceed as ſlowly as they pleaſed. The town was under ſuch a conſternation, that nothing but king Charles's preſence could have kept them from capitulating the firſt week of the ſiege. There were ſome mutinies raiſed, and ſome of the magiſtrates were killed in them. But the king came among them on all occaſions, and both quieted and animated them. After Montjuic was taken, the city was ſtill more preſſed. The earl of Peterborough came from Valencia, and was upon the hills, but could not give them any great aſſiſtance [n]. Some few from Gironne and other places got into the town. The French engineers (after Lapara's death) performed their part with little ſkill and ſucceſs. The Levant winds were all this while ſo ſtrong, that it was not poſſible for ſir John Leake, with the confederate fleet, to come up ſo ſoon as was deſired. Leake ſailed from Lisbon in the end of March. He very narrowly miſſed the galleons, but he could not purſue them, for he was to loſe no time, but haſte to Barcelona. His fleet was encreaſed to thirty ſhips of the line, by the time he got to Gibraltar; but, though twenty more were following him, he would not ſtay, but haſted on to the relief of the place, as faſt as the wind ſerved. But, when their ſtrength, as well as patience, was almoſt quite exhauſted, the wind turned, and Leake arrived on the 8th of May, N. S. As ſoon as the count de Toulouſe, who with his ſquadron had kept the city blocked up by ſea, had intelligence that Leake was near him, he ſailed back to Toulon. Marſhal de Theſſé, with king Philip, who was in the camp, but not once named in any action, continued three days before Barcelona, after their fleet ſailed away. They could then have no hopes of carrying it, unleſs a ſtorm at ſea had kept the confederate fleet at a diſtance. At laſt, the ſiege was raiſed on the 12th of May, N. S. with great precipitation, and in much diſorder. Their camp was left well fur-

[i] Oſtend is a very ſtrong and fine ſea-port of the Low-Countries, in the earldom of Flanders, the marquiſate of the territory of Vianden-Urien. It was inveſted by the confederates both by ſea and land, June 25, 1736, and obliged to ſurrender, July 6. It ſtands about nine miles north-eaſt of Newport, eleven weſt of Bruges, twenty ſouth-weſt of Sluys, twenty-four north-eaſt of Dunkirk, and thirty-five almoſt weſt of Ghent.

[k] Menin, a town of the Low-countries, in the earldom of Flanders, one of the ſtrongeſt and moſt regular fortifications in Europe; notwithſtanding which (together with the vigorous reſiſtance of a numerous garriſon, and a reſolute commander) the confederates made themſelves maſters of it in eighteen days after the opening of the trenches. It ſtands on the river Lys, five miles ſouth-weſt of Courtray, nine almoſt north of Liſle, and twelve almoſt ſouth-eaſt of Ypres.

[l] Dendermonde, a ſtrong town of the Low Countries, in the earldom of Flanders. It was blocked up by the confederates ſoon after the battle of Ramillies, and ſurrendered to the duke of Marlborough after a formal ſiege the beginning of Auguſt. It ſtands on the river Scheld, and Dender, twelve miles eaſt of Ghent, fourteen ſouth-weſt of Antwerp, and ſeventeen north-weſt of Bruſſels.

[m] Aeth, a ſtrong frontier town of the Low Countries, in the earldom of Hainault, the marquiſate of the territory of Brabant. The French took it in 1697, but reſtored it to the Spaniards the ſame year by the peace of Ryſwick: And the confederates (under the command of monſieur de Auverquerque) took poſſeſſion of it the preſent campaign. It ſtands on the river Dender, fourteen miles almoſt north-weſt of Mons, twenty two almoſt ſouth weſt of Bruſſels, and twenty-four ſouth of Ghent.

[n] Dr. Friend, in his Account of the earl of Peterborough's conduct in Spain, p. 53. obſerves, "That the earl's conduct was as ſteady in the relief of Barcelona, as it was in the taking of it; and that in this, as in moſt of the events of the war, his lordſhip overcame all the obſtacles, that could be thrown in his way by the miniſters of the Spaniſh court. As ſoon as his lordſhip perceived, that the enemy's deſign was upon Barcelona, he ordered ſome of the troops in Lerida to march, and reinforce that garriſon. The king, who was perſuaded they would rather make an attempt upon Lerida, countermanded thoſe orders of my lord, and was ſo little apprehenſive of Barcelona's being in danger, though ſufficiently warned of it by letters from his lordſhip, that, when the enemy was within five leagues of the town, his majeſty had but five hundred men in it. My lord, in like manner, was ſolicited by the court to abandon Valencia, in order to ſecure Catalonia, and by the moſt preſſing letters and commands he was urged to ſuch raſh and impoſſible attempts, as muſt have proved the certain ruin of the forces under his command, and the loſs of the king's perſon. But, in all theſe diſtracting and deſperate niſhed, and the ſick and wounded could not be carried off. On the day of raiſing the ſiege, as the French army was marching off, the ſun was eclipſed, and it was total in thoſe parts. And, though no weight is to be laid on ſuch things, yet, the vulgar being apt to look on them as ominous, it was cenſured as a great error in marſhal Theſſé, not to have raiſed the ſiege a day ſooner; and that the rather, becauſe the French king had made the ſun, with a motto, 'Nec pluribus impar,' his device. King Philip made all the haſte he could to Perpignan: but his army was almoſt entirely ruined before he got thither.

At the ſame time the campaign was opened in Catalonia, it was alſo begun on the ſide of Portugal. The earl of Galway had full powers, and a brave army of about twenty thouſand men, well furniſhed in all reſpects: He left Badajox behind him, and marched on to Alcantara. The duke of Berwick had a very ſmall force left him, to defend that frontier: It ſeems, the French truſted to the intereſt, they had in the court of Portugal: The duke's troops were ſo bad, that he ſaw, in one ſmall action, that he could not depend on them: He put a good garriſon in Alcantara; where their beſt magazine was laid in. But when the earl of Galway came before the town, within three days the garriſon, conſiſting of four thouſand men, delivered up the place, and themſelves as priſoners of war: The Portugueſe would have ſtopped there, and thought they had made a good campaign, though they had done no more: But the Engliſh embaſſador at Liſbon went to the king of Portugal, and preſſed him, that orders might be immediately ſent to the earl of Galway to march on: And, when he ſaw great coldneſs in ſome of the miniſters, he threatened a preſent rupture, if it was not done: And he continued waiting on the king, till the orders were ſigned, and ſent away. Upon receipt of theſe, the earl of Galway advanced towards Placentia, all the country declaring for him, as ſoon as he appeared; and the duke of Berwick ſtill retiring before him, not being able to give the leaſt interruption to his march. But, as there was no manner of communication over land between Barcelona and Portugal, when the earl of Galway had forced a paſs at Maſſagona, where the enemy had intrenched themſelves, and was advanced as far as the bridge of Almaras, the Portugueſe, doubting the iſſue of the ſiege of Barcelona, unanimouſly reſolved to engage no farther, till they ſaw how that ſiege ended. Accordingly, they ordered their army to march aſide to Ciudad Roderigo, on pretence that it was neceſſary to ſecure their frontier, by taking that place. From thence they advanced to Salamanca. But, upon the news of the raiſing the ſiege of Barcelona, they marched on towards Madrid, the duke of Berwick only obſerving their motions, and ſtill retiring before them. King Philip went with great expedition, and a very ſmall train from Perpignan to Navarre; and from thence poſt to Madrid, on the 6th of June; but finding, that he had no army, which he could truſt to, the grandees being now retired, and looking as ſo many dead men; and he ſeeing, that the Portugueſe were ſtill advancing, ſent his queen to Burgos, and followed her in a few days, carrying with him what was valuable in his palace; and, it ſeems, he deſpaired of ever returning thither again, ſince he deſtroyed all that he could not carry away; in which he acted a very extraordinary part, for he did ſome of this with his own hand, as was univerſally believed at Madrid.

The capital city being thus abandoned, the earl of Galway came to it by the end of June. He met with no reſiſtance indeed, but with as little welcome. An army of Portugueſe with an heretic at their head, was certainly a very ſtrange ſight to the Caſtilians, who retained all the pride, without any of the courage of their anceſtors. They thought it below them, to make their ſubmiſſions to any but king Charles himſelf; and if he had come thither immediately, it was believed, that the entire reducted of Spain would have been ſoon effected. It is not certain what made him ſtay ſo long as he did at Barcelona, from the beginning of May till near the end of July [o]. Thoſe about him pretended, that it was not fit to go to Madrid, till he was well furniſhed with money to make a decent entry. General Stanhope offered to furniſh him with what was neceſſary for the journey, but could not afford a magnificent equipage for a ſolemn entry. The king wrote a very preſſing letter to the duke of Marlborough, repreſenting his great neceſſities, and deſiring greater ſupplies. The duke ſent over this letter to the lord-treaſurer; but little regard was had to it, becauſe it was ſuggeſted from many different hands, that the prince of Lichtenſtein was inriching himſelf, and keeping his king poor. Others pretended that the true cauſe of the delay was a ſecret amour of the king's at Barcelona. But whatever the cauſe was, the effects proved fatal. It was firſt propoſed, that he ſhould deſperate caſes, his lordſhip, not only took the proper reſolutions, but, with a prudence fortunate to himſelf as well as the public, never omitted to ſecure the unanimous conſent of all in councils of war, and gave in writing beforehand the reaſons, which never failed of being juſtified by the events. Whilſt Barcelona was encompaſſed by land and ſea (after the loſs of fort Montjuic) his lordſhip found methods to fling five hundred men into the town, which was thought humanly impoſſible. And he brought the forces, which ſo much contributed to the relief of the city, without abandoning Valencia, or any foot of ground, that he had gained in Spain. He maintained his poſt upon the hills for near a fortnight, with about two thouſand five hundred men, never above a league or two from the enemy, whom he kept in perpetual alarms. And by the conſtant vigilance he uſed, and the exact intelligences he procured, he continued in the neigbourhood of ſuch an army to the laſt, till he made a march of about ſeven leagues, with ſo critical a diſpoſition, that all his foot came in a fleet of boats he had prepared, to the number of three or four hundred, and landed at the ſame time with the troops, that were on board the navy. The throwing in of ſo ſeaſonable a reinforcement into Barcelona, under ſuch circumſtances, was as great a diſgrace, as happened to the French, except that of their riſing from before the town immediately after. For the garriſon, even with this addition, was not ſtronger, than when my lord Peterborough took it with little more than a third part of their army. In order to ſecure this great advantage, when it ſhould happen, the earl of Peterborough, notwithſtanding all the haſte he made from Valencia to Barcelona, had viſited, fortified, and ſecured all the paſſes behind him, ſo as to oblige (with an inconſiderable number of regular troops, and the country-people) the whole army of marſhal de Theſſé entirely to abandon Spain, into which, had my lord's advice been followed, they had never to this day returned.

In oppoſition to this account of Dr. Friend, the author of the 'Impartial Inquiry into the management of the war in Spain,' p. 81. obſerves, that however the doctor boaſts of the earl of Peterborough's intelligence, yet it does not appear, from his orders or letters of that date, that he was under any apprehenſions for Barcelona, on the 19th of March 1705-6, O. S. though the enemy inveſted it within three days after; the earl's orders being for the fleet and forces to come to Altea or Denia; though, before the admiral received thoſe orders, he received letters from the king of Spain and prince Lichtenſtein, of the 26th of March, of a very different import; wherein the admiral is deſired to come to Barcelona with all poſſible diligence with the ſhips, troops, and money, which the queen of Great-Britain deſigned for king Charles's ſervice and the relief of Catalonia. But, by the 7th of April, N. S. the earl's eyes ſeem likewiſe to have been opened; but the news appeared to have been a perfect ſurprize to him; for, in his letter to ſir John Leake from Valencia of that date, he talks of the relief of Barcelona as a matter deſperate, and would compound for the ſafety of the king's perſon. It appears likewiſe, that his lordſhip was ſtill of opinion, that all the forces, ammunition, and money ſhould be landed at Denia, Altea, or the grove of Valencia; and his letter to ſir John Leake, of the 22d of April, ſhews, that he was even then of opinion, that the forces ſhould be landed no nearer than Tarragona, except a thouſand men to be put on board the men of war, in order to be thrown into Barcelona by ſea, if it ſhould be requiſite; ſo that it might juſtly be ſaid, that the admiral relieved Barcelona, if not contrary, at leaſt not purſuant, to the earl's method. It cannot indeed be denied, that his lordſhip had got ſome troops ready in ſmall embarkations off of Vinetos or Mattero, to take the opportunity of ſlipping them into the town under the protection of the fleet; and that he came on board ſir John Leake from the ſame place, and hoiſted his union flag at the main-topmaſt-head; but all the meaſures, for the relief of Barcelona, had already been concerted, and in a manner executed. For ſir George Byng, ſir John Jennings, and admiral Waſſenaer made ſail before the fleet, caſt anchor in the road, and by ſir George Byng's order a good body of forces were actually thrown into the town, before one half of the fleet knew, that the earl of Peterborough was aboard, who indeed, upon his arrival at Barcelona, thought proper to approve of what ſir George Byng had directed. Upon the whole, the author of the 'Impartial Inquiry' concludes, that notwithſtanding Dr. Friend "has attributed ſo great a ſhare of the relief of Barcelona to the earl of Peterborough; it is evident he knew nothing of the enemy's deſign upon that place 'three days' before they had actually inveſted it: 'Five days' after he knew the town was beſieged, his lordſhip was of opinion for landing all the ſuccours in the kingdom of Valencia; and 'twenty days' after, no nearer than Tarragona. Now to ſay nothing of the unparalleled diſpatch made by ſir John Leake and ſir George Byng in bringing the fleet and ſuccours to the relief of Barcelona in ſo critical a time, contrary to my lord Peterborough's opinion; let any indifferent perſon judge, whether that place had ever been taken, if his lordſhip's opinion in the fleet to deny the aſſiſtance of the ſeamen, and his haſte to be going into Italy, had been complied with; or, if it had ever been relieved, if his lordſhip's orders had been obeyed, which were directly oppoſite to the king of Spain's intereſt and deſires."

[o] The earl of Galway in his narrative, obſerves, that, if the Portugueſe had marched directly to Madrid from the bridge of Almaras, after they had forced a paſs at Maſſagona, where the enemy had intrenched themſelves, as the generals of the allies would have perſuaded them, "in all probability, ſays he, we ſhould have arrived there at the ſame time with the news of the duke of Anjou's being returned to France; the ducheſs muſt have been obliged to eſcape alone, and, the tribunals being ſtill there, it is very likely the war would have been over. Some of the Portugueſe were willing to go back, and beſiege Badajox, which was entirely laying aſide all thoughts of Madrid; but others for attacking Ciudad Roderigo; and by joining with thoſe, I engaged them, after the taking of that place, to go to Madrid. But the time, which was loſt on this occaſion, had given the duke of Anjou an opportunity of returning from France to Madrid, from whence he withdrew the court, and all the tribunals, before the army could reach that place; ſo that, upon our arrival there, we found Madrid an open village; and the troops having been extremely weakened by ſo long a march, were not above forty thouſand horſe and eight or ten thouſand foot. The Portugueſe generals, and thoſe of the allies, thought it highly neceſſary the king of Spain ſhould come to Madrid as ſoon as poſſible. For, beſides the advantage his preſence might have been to his own affairs, it was of the laſt importance to us, to be immediately joined by the forces with the king, and under the earl of Peterborough's command, not being ſtrong enough without them to attack the duke of Anjou, who had already received ſome ſuccours from France, beſides the five thouſand five hundred horſe and eight thouſand foot, of which the duke of Berwick's army conſiſted, after he had been joined by the Conde de las Torres. Being perfectly informed of the enemy's march through Valencia, as the neareſt and much the ſafeſt way; and he came on that deſign as far as Tarragona. But, advice being brought him there, that the kingdom of Arragon was in a good diſpoſition to declare for him, he was diverted from his firſt intentions, and prevailed on to go to Saragoſſa, where he was acknowledged by both kingdoms: But he loſt much time, and more in the reputation of his arms, by delaying ſo long to move towards Madrid; ſo that king Philip recovered his ſpirits, and returned from Burgos to Madrid. The earl of Galway was very uneaſy at this ſlow motion, which king Charles made. King Philip had ſome more troops ſent him from France; and, the broken bodies of his army being now brought together, he had an army equal in numbers to the earl of Galway, and marched up to him; but, ſince ſo much depended upon the iſſue of an action, the earl of Galway avoided it, becauſe he expected every day reinforcements to be brought him, both by king Charles, and by the earl of Peterborough from Valencia. In order therefore to facilitate this conjunction, he moved towards Arragon; ſo that Madrid was again left to be poſſeſſed by king Philip. At laſt, in the beginning of Auguſt, king Charles came up, but with a very inconſiderable force. A few days after, the earl of Peterborough came alſo with an eſcorte, rather than any ſtrength, for he had not with him above five hundred dragoons. He was now uneaſy, becauſe he could not have the ſupreme command, both the earl of Galway and count Noyelles being much ancienter officers than he was. But, to deliver him from the uneaſineſs of being commanded by them, the queen had ſent him the powers of an embaſſador extraordinary; and he took that character on him for a few days. His complaining ſo much as he did, of the prince of Lichtenſtein and the Germans, who were ſtill poſſeſſed of king Charles's confidence, made him very unacceptable to that king; ſo that he, without waiting enemy's ſtrength and motions, and having great reaſons to believe, that if we were joined in time by all the forces with the king and the earl of Peterborough, we might, in this favourable conjuncture, drive the duke of Anjou entirely out of Spain, make ourſelves abſolute maſters of that kingdom, and put an end to an expenſive war; all the while we lay at Madrid and Guadalaxara, I diſpatched every day one or more expreſſes, and the greateſt part of them officers, with letters to the king of Spain and to my lord Peterborough, repreſenting to them both the importance of our being joined forthwith, and earneſtly deſiring that no time might be loſt in improving ſo critical a juncture. As the next beſt method to adviſe our friends of our arrival at Madrid, the firſt Gazette day after we got thither, I cauſed it to be publiſhed in the Gazette, that we were there, and expected in a very few days to be joined by the king and the earl of Peterborough, hoping, that the natural curioſity of the Spaniards would give a printed news-paper a free paſſage. But, notwithſtanding all the diligence, that was uſed in this matter on our part, near ſix weeks were elapſed at Madrid and Guadalaxara, before we received any advice, that the king was upon his march to join us, and, in the mean time, the duke of Anjou's army was ſo much increaſed by daily reinforcements from ſeveral parts, that he was now become ſuperior in number to us, even after we were joined by thoſe forces, which the king and my lord Peterborough brought along with them. And I muſt ſay, that it is the general opinion, and I do verily believe, as the Portugueſe loſt one fair opportunity of putting an end to the war, by not marching directly from the bridge of Almaras to Madrid; ſo we loſt another, for want of being joined in time by the forces under the command of the king of Spain and the earl of Peterborough. And whereas that noble lord is pleaſed to aver, that he never received any advice from me of my arrival at Madrid with the Portugueſe; and as an argument of my neglect of him on that ſubject, produces an inſtance of one officer, that happened to paſs through his quarters with letters from me to the king, and none for his lordſhip, I am obliged to obſerve, that I gave this officer an hundred piſtoles, and ordered him to go directly to the king of Spain, who then lay at Saragoſſa; but he was accidentally forced to go out of his way to avoid one of the enemy's parties, which was the true occaſion of his paſſing thro' the earl of Peterborough's quarters at Valencia, contrary to his firſt intention. But ſeveral other officers, who were diſpatched by me to the earl, aſſured me, they had the honour to deliver him thoſe letters, which I writ his lordſhip from Madrid and Guadalaxara. And, even taking the fact to be as the earl of Peterborough is pleaſed to ſtate it himſelf, it is plain, his lordſhip had at leaſt ſome verbal informations from that very officer, that paſſed thro' his lordſhip's quarters, and conſequently could not be altogether ignorant, either of the place, where the Portugueſe army lay, or of the neceſſity of joining them without loſs of time. After the general had got king Charles proclaimed at Madrid, it was thought fit to advance to Guadalaxara, where we had at laſt advice, that the king was coming to join us; and, at the ſame time were informed, that the duke of Anjou was at Guadalaxara, to which place we marched to prevent the enemy from intercepting the king. Upon our approach the duke of Anjou repaſſed the river; which little advantage we contented ourſelves with, for it was not thought adviſable to follow and attack him on the other ſide, being advantageouſly poſted, and ſtronger than we. We ſtaid here two days, and, when we thought the king was out of danger, we again retired to Guadalaxara, where we were joined by his majeſty and my lord of Peterborough, with two regiments of Spaniſh dragoons, and part of Pierce's; for his lordſhip had left behind him, in ſeveral places, thirteen battalions of Pierce's, and two other entire regiments of dragoons. So ſoon as the armies were joined (having, upon my arrival at Madrid, ſent captain Montague, to give the queen an account of our march, and to deſire her majeſty's leave to retire) I waited upon my lord Peterborough, offering him the command of the Engliſh, and to receive his orders, till I ſhould have the queen's leave to go home. But, becauſe the marquis das Minas would not do ſo too, my lord Peterborough choſe not to ſtay with the army, and within a few days after went away." But let us ſee what the earl of Peterborough ſays on his part, in his anſwer to the 'ſecond queſtion' propoſed to him by the houſe of lords on the 5th of January 1710-11, in theſe terms, 'That the earl of Peterborough may acquaint the houſe of what he knows of the earl of Galway's proceedings, during his ſtay with the army at Madrid, his march to Guadalaxara, and his retreat to Valencia; and, if he knows any thing of the oppoſition made by the king of Spain, the count de Noyelles, and the Spaniſh miniſters and generals, to theſe meaſures?'

To this the earl anſwered, "That, from the time the earl of Galway came firſt into Spain as far as Almaras, and thence returned back into Portugal, the earl of Peterborough had no advices from the earl of Galway, no account of the motives of that retreat, or any hopes given him of the return of the Portugueſe into Spain. That, after the raiſing the ſiege of Barcelona, and the retreat of the French army out of Catalonia, the earl of Peterborough received no letter or meſſage from the earl of Galway after his ſecond entrance into Spain, nor had the leaſt notice of his ſituation, circumſtances, or deſigns, till he ſaw his troops retreating from the enemy to take the ſtrong camp of Guadalaxara; though the marches of the king from Arragon, and thoſe of the earl of Peterborough from Valencia, were well known in the Portugal camp. That two ſeveral officers, ſent by my lord Galway, came to Valencia, and brought no letters to the earl of Peterborough, one of them demanding money for the purſuit of his journey. That, as to the perſons, who adviſed the king to go by Arragon, and not by Valencia, he knows no farther (being at that time abſent from his majeſty) but that, having ever extremely oppoſed it, and having writ to the ſecretary of ſtate at his firſt coming to Valencia againſt it, he received an anſwer to this purpoſe, that he hoped the earl of Peterborough would bear the mortification and diſappointment with patience, ſince the king was ſo reſolved; and a meſſenger by the appointed token, known to be ſent by my lord Galway, had given notice, that the ſaid earl expected the king by the way of Arragon, and had given to underſtand how every thing was prepared for his reception that way." The third queſtion propoſed to the earl of Peterborough was in theſe terms, 'That the earl of Peterborough acquaint the houſe what advices his lordſhip received from the earl of Galway at Madrid, in order to concert any public meaſures? And what his lordſhip knows of the reaſons, that induced the king of Spain to go by Arragon towards Madrid, and not by Valencia? To which he anſwered, "That the earl of Galway continued about forty days at Madrid, without making any endeavours to augment his troops, or provide any magazines for the ſubſiſtence of his army. That, meeting the enemy unexpectedly, and retreating to the camp of Guadalaxara, the troops were without proviſions, and in the greateſt diſorder. That the meaſures taken in that retreat, where five thouſand men were loſt without a blow, and their whole cavalry ruined, were all poſitively againſt the king's opinion, and that of all officers and miniſters. That the earl of Peterborough had the accounts he gives from the king of Spain's own mouth, and ſeveral of his generals; and it will particularly appear by letters from count Noyelles, velt-marſhal of the emperor, and general to the king of Spain, and from Mr. Stanhope; which letters the earl is ready to produce. And that it is notorious to the whole world, that if the earl of Galway had purſued the enemy ten days longer towards the Ebro, all the horſe under the marſhal of Berwick had deſerted to king Charles, and the French could never have returned to Spain.

The earl of Galway, in his reply to the earl of Peterborough's anſwers to the five queſtions propoſed to him by the lords, ſpeaks thus, "In his lordſhip's anſwer to the ſecond queſtion, he is pleaſed to aver, 'That from the time the earl of Galway came firſt into Spain as far as Almaras, and thence returned back into Portugal, the earl of Peterborough had no advices from the earl of Galway, no account of the motives of that retreat, or any hopes given him of the return of the Portugueſe into Spain.' What his lordſhip ſays upon this occaſion is very true: for, whilſt he was at ſo great a diſtance beſieged in Barcelona, and the duke of Berwick with a conſiderable body of horſe between him and us, it was to no purpoſe to think of ſending diſpatches by land: Neither was it neceſſary to inform the enemy that way, that the Portugueſe were reſolved, (notwithſtanding the repeated inſtances of the foreign generals to the contrary) to return back again to their own country, after their army had advanced as far as the bridge of Almaras. But when we got to Madrid, I immediately ſent ſo many expreſſes with letters, both to the earl of Peterborough and the king of Spain, that it was morally impoſſible his lordſhip could have been ignorant above eight days of our arrival there. And I have ſince been aſſured by the inhabitants of Barcelona, that they were all informed of it by that time; from whence I muſt conclude, that his lordſhip's delays in joining with us were 'voluntary,' and not occaſioned by want of intelligence.' I have aſſerted in the narrative which I delivered in to this moſt honourable houſe, that I do verily believe, if the Portugueſe army had been joined in time, after their arrival at Madrid, by the forces with the king of Spain, and under the command of the earl of Peterborough, we might have been able to have driven the duke of Anjou out of Spain, and have put an end to an expenſive war. Nor was this my opinion only, but that of all the world at that time. And I find his lordſhip thinks it ſo far imports him to be clear of this imputation, that he is reſolved to be rid of it at any rate. For certainly nothing leſs than an apprehenſion of this nature could have made him aver a fact ſo improbable as that, where, in his farther anſwer to the ſame queſtion, he ſays, 'That he received no letter, no meſſage from the earl of Galway,—after his ſecond entrance into Spain: nor had the leaſt notice of his ſituation, circumſtances or deſigns, till he ſaw his troops retreating from the enemy, to take the ſtrong camp of Guadalaxara. Now what could be the deſign of his lordſhip's marching to Guadalaxara with ſo ſmall a body of troops, as is mentioned in my narrative, unleſs he knew he was to meet us there? Beſides, his lordſhip forgets, that he came not to Guadalaxara, till ſome days after the Portugueſe had been actually encamped there, as I can make appear by the oath of ſeveral officers; and conſequently it was impoſſible for him to have ſeen us retreating thither. I believe it may be neceſſary upon this occaſion to repeat, that, when his lordſhip did join us, he brought no more Engliſh troops with him than one regiment of dragoons, and a detachment of another, though he had actually at that time under his command in Spain thirteen Engliſh battalions and four regiments of dragoons; as likewiſe, that the officer, who (his lordſhip ſays) paſſed through his quarters with letters for the king of Spain, and none for him, was never deſigned to have gone within ſeveral leagues of his lordſhip, unleſs he had been obliged to it by a party of the enemy, as I have already explained more at large in my narrative. And I cannot help obſerving, it is very improbable, that that officer ſhould have had occaſion to apply to the earl's ſecretary for money, becauſe I gave him an hundred piſtoles at the time I diſpatched him. In his lordſhip's anſwer to the third queſtion, he is pleaſed to ſay, 'That the earl of Galway continued about forty days at Madrid, without making any endeavours to augment his troops, or provide any magazine, for the ſubſiſtence of his army; that meeting the enemy unexpectedly, and retreating to the camp of Guadalaxara, the troops were without proviſions, and in the greateſt diſorder.' In reply to this paragraph, I do affirm, that the Portugueſe ſtaid no longer time at Madrid than was neceſſary to get the king proclaimed there, which did not exceed ten days; then advancing as far as Guadalaxara, and afterwards to Gaudafor orders from the queen, withdrew from the camp, and ſailed away in one of the queen's ſhips to Genoa. The Engliſh fleet lay all the ſummer in the Mediterranean, which obliged the French to keep theirs within Toulon. Carthagena declared for king Charles, and was ſecured by ſome of our ſhips. The fleet came before Alicant: The ſeamen landed and ſtormed the town: The caſtle held out ſome weeks; but then capitulated, and the ſoldiers, by articles, were obliged to march to Cadiz. Soon after that, our fleet ſailed out of the Streights, one ſquadron was ſent to the Weſt-Indies; another was to lie at Liſbon, and the reſt were ordered home. After king Charles had joined the earl of Galway, king Philip's army and his looked on one another for ſome time, but without venturing on any action. They were near an equality, and both ſides expected to be reinforced; ſo that, in this uncertainty, neither ſide would put any thing to the hazard.

Notwithſtanding his diſgraces both in Spain and the Netherlands, the king of France was reſolved to purſue his deſigns in Italy, where the duke of Orleans (upon Vendoſme's being placed at the head of the French army in Flanders) was ſent to command, with marſhal Marſin to aſſiſt, or rather to govern him. As all the preparations for the ſiege of Turin were made, and it was thought impoſſible for Prince Eugene to attempt the relief of that place, the ſiege was begun in May, and continued till the beginning of September [P]. The French were in hopes, that the taking of Turin, with the entire reduction of Piedmont, of which they ſeemed ſecure, would compenſate their other loſſes. They boaſted they had formed an army, under the duke de la Feuillade, for that enterprize, conſiſting of ſixty-eight battalions and eighty-eight ſquadrons, two hundred and fifty officers of artillery, eight hundred gunners, two hundred and fifty bombardiers and miners, and four thouſand pioneers; and that they had alſo provided for the ſiege a hundred and ſixty pieces of heavy cannon, eighty mortars, a hundred thouſand bullets, twenty-ſeven thouſand bombs, one million and one hundred thouſand pounds weight of powder, three hundred thouſand weight of lead, eighty thouſand grenadoes, &c. all which were laid up in the magazines of Caſal, Creſcentino, and Chivas. On the other hand, the duke of Savoy, who was reſolved to defend the place to the laſt extremity, added new works to the fortifications. The French king, at the ſame time, uſed all poſſible methods to induce him to aban-

Guadaraxa, about ſixty miles beyond Madrid, where we obliged part of the duke of Anjou's troops to repaſs the river, but were not willing to engage them at a time, when we had reaſon to expect we ſhould have been joined in a very few days by the forces with the king of Spain and earl of Peterborough, which was the only ſecure method left us to augment our troops; for it would have been very imprudent to have attempted to form corps of the Caſtilians, who were entirely devoted to the duke of Anjou's intereſt. But all the officers of the army knew we were ſo far from wanting proviſions ourſelves, that we ſent a convoy of eight thouſand livres to meet the king and earl of Peterborough, which, by their delay in not advancing faſt enough grew mouldy, and was afterwards pillaged by the peaſants. His lordſhip's information of our want of intelligence of the enemies motions, and of our diſorder upon the retreat, are as great miſtakes as the former; for the occaſion of our advancing to Guadaraxa was purely to poſt ourſelves in ſuch a manner, as to prevent the enemy from marching or ſending detachments to intercept the king of Spain; and, when we had reaſon to believe him out of danger, we returned to Guadalaxara, there to be joined by the king and earl of Peterborough. Nor was it poſſible for his lordſhip to have ſeen our diſorder, had there been any, becauſe, as I have already obſerved, he came not to Guadalaxara himſelf, till ſome days after we had been encamped there. Notwithſtanding the earl of Peterborough is pleaſed to ſay, 'That we loſt five thouſand men in the return to Valencia, without a blow, and entirely ruined our whole cavalry;' it is certain, our loſs upon that occaſion was very inconſiderable, if any; and the retreat made in ſo good order, that the enemy (ſuperior as they were in number) never durſt venture to attack us, after the warm reception twenty-two of their ſquadrons met with from two battalions under the command of Colonel Wade, in the town of Villa Nova, notwithſtanding we were obliged to croſs plains and rivers in their view. And though his lordſhip avers, in his anſwer to this queſtion, 'That this retreat was made againſt the king's opinion, and that of all his officers and miniſters,' it is certain, the retreat was concerted and agreed upon in a council of war. It is true, ſome perſons about the king ſeemed at firſt inclinable to have taken quarters in Caſtile; but that was ſoon after found impracticable; for none of thoſe ſquadrons, who were beſt acquainted with the country, could make a diſpoſition of quarters, where the troops could be ſecure; and therefore it was reſolved immediately to croſs the Tagus, before the approaching rains ſhould have rendered the fords impracticable; which being done, our next deſign was to have lodged ourſelves behind the river Xucar. But neither could this be done without taking a ſmall caſtle upon that river, that commanded a bridge, where the enemy had a garriſon; and therefore a diſpoſition was made for attacking this town: But, by the delay of the king's generals, the execution of this matter was ſo long deferred, that the enemy had already reinforced their garriſon, and were advanced ſo near with a ſuperior force, that it was not thought adviſeable to attempt the place. Thus the only reſource left us was the kingdom of Valencia, whither we were abſolutely obliged to retreat, that we might preſerve our communication with the ſeas, and canton with ſecurity. Nor is it to be wondered, that count Noyelles, in his letter to the earl of Peterborough, ſhould ſeem diſſatisfied with the meaſures, that were then taken, ſince it is well known, that general uſed underhand to ridicule thoſe very opinions in councils of war, to which he had given his own aſſent. For being diſappointed of the command of the army (which was what he expected at his firſt arrival) he ſeemed reſolved that no other general ſhould have an army to command."

The reader, who has an inclination to ſee a larger detail of the conduct of the earls of Peterborough and Galway, may compare Dr. Friend's Account of the former with the 'Impartial Enquiry into the Management of the War in Spain;' which latter piece is a confutation of the earl of Peterborough's hiſtorian, ſupported by a great number of original papers; among which, is a Memorial of count Galas to queen Anne, dated Auguſt 22d, 1706, ſhewing the true and principal reaſon, why his catholic majeſty was ſo long detained at Barcelona, and obliged to chuſe the way of Saragoſſa, rather than that of Valencia, in order to his going to Madrid, and to expoſe himſelf to all the inconveniences, which the delay of his arrival in the ſaid city might have occaſioned." Which reaſon is charged upon the earl of Peterborough. For, after it had been agreed, that the earl ſhould embark ſome troops, and tranſport them to Valencia, whither his majeſty would go by land with the reſt of the forces deſigned for that diſpoſition, after which they would march jointly to Madrid, the earl, inſtead of giving the king any aſſiſtance or relief, repreſented the way by Valencia to be almoſt impracticable, and intimated that by Saragoſſa; ſo that his majeſty, having nothing to hope for from the earl, and finding it impoſſible for him to carry his troops ſo far through an enemy's country, without any means of ſubſiſting them, was obliged to accept of the offer of the inhabitants of Arragon, who had newly declared for him, and invited him thither. "It is true, ſays the Memorial, that my lord Peterborough, when he had warning given him, that he could become anſwerable for the inconveniencies, that ſuch an alteration of the route might produce, afterwards wrote to the king, as appears by his letter of the 5th of July, that he had found all that was neceſſary for his majeſty's occaſions: But he did not do it before it was too late, and till ſuch time as his majeſty was already upon the road to Saragoſſa; which obliged him to return the following anſwer to the ſaid lord:

"You repreſent to me the importance of my going immediately to Madrid, and propoſe to me the way to Reguena, as the ſhorteſt and ſecureſt from inſults. You tell me the diſpoſitions, both of men and money, you have now made for accompanying my perſon; and further offer me to come to me to concert the reſt, which might contribute to the good ſucceſs of this undertaking; for which I am very much obliged to you. But, being upon the road to Arragon, and engaged to purſue my march that way, I am willing to tell you the chief reaſons that have induced and obliged me to take ſuch a reſolution. Several of your former letters mention the concern you were in, that you could not ſupply me with any money: That your foot was almoſt entirely ruined and uſeleſs: That you could not find mules for the baggage: And that, in ſhort, you could not make one ſtep in ſuch a juncture for my ſervice. To this you further added an account, that, in my paſſage through the kingdom of Valencia, I ſhould want every thing; and therefore, having not the neceſſary funds to defray the expence of the journey, the troops I ſhould bring would be ruined in a ſhort time, and my perſon expoſed to great inconveniencies and diſadvantages. So that, ſeeing the inclination and fidelity, which the kingdom of Arragon began to ſhew towards us, I took the reſolution, out of neceſſity, to turn this way, where I hope, from a country abounding in proviſions, for a ſubſiſtence for my retinue and my troops, beſides the ſupplies, which my faithful ſubjects may preſent me. With this proſpect I ordered ſome regiments to march to the frontiers, where I now am; and the province having ordered it ſo, that Saragoſſa, the capital, has openly declared for me; it ſeems becoming my royal dignity to go myſelf, and take poſſeſſion of that crown; and the rather, ſince by the ſame way I can advance towards Madrid, and, making uſe of the favourable conjuncture, join with the king of Portugal's army; not doubting but the generals of the allies, that command it, will ſend ſome detachments forward to cover, as I deſire, my march to that capital, being reſolved to make but a ſhort ſtay at Saragoſſa, and then to march that way, which will be thought moſt ſecure and practicable; whereof I ſhall forthwith give you notice, in order to regulate afterwards the route, which the troops from Reguena, or the neighbourhood, are to take, in order either to meet me, or to ſecure elſewhere my paſſage. I am willing to believe the road by Reguena is free; but yet I wonder, that by ſo eaſy a way you receive no news from my lord Galway, ſince there is nothing, that can hinder the communication on that ſide.

"Beſides the reaſons contained in this anſwer, there was yet another, which does not carry leſs force in it than thoſe, viz. That his catholic majeſty could repoſe little confidence in theſe promiſes, having freſh in his memory the example of what happened at his departure from Liſbon, when the earl, to engage his catholic majeſty to leave that place, aſſured him, that he ſhould want for nothing: That he had forty thouſand piſtoles, whereof eight thouſand had been given him by your majeſty; the remainder being his own money, beſides an unlimited credit upon Genoa and Leghorn. But ſcarce were they arrived in Catalonia, when his lordſhip, inſtead of giving any money, demanded ſome, and obliged his catholic majeſty to borrow, and advance to him wherewithal to make his firſt expedition into Valencia. His catholic majeſty hopes, that your majeſty will be fully convinced by this relation, the truth of which is made evident by the ſaid lord's own letters hereto annexed, and by the king's anſwers, that it was through mere unavoidable neceſſity, that his catholic majeſty did not ſet out ſooner from Barcelona, and took the way by Saragoſſa, inſtead of that by Valencia."

The earl of Sunderland likewiſe, in a letter to the earl of Peterborough, dated at Whitehall, December 18, 1707, has the following paſſage:

"As to your lordſhip's anſwer to the ſecond head, her majeſty is by no means ſatisfied with it, becauſe it does appear by the date of your letter to the king of Spain, and from Mr. Stanhope's letter to you, to which you refer, that you did not, after coming to Barcelona, ſollicit or preſs the king of Spain to go by way of Valencia till after he had taken the reſolution of going by Saragoſſa, which reſolution was alſo 'occaſioned by the diſcouragements you had given him' from going by way of Valencia for want of money, carriages, and all neceſſaries for the army."

[P] Turin, a ſtrong and ſplendid city of Italy, with a fine caſtle; the marquiſate of the principality of Piedmont, in the territory of Turin; an archbiſhoprick and univerſity, ſubject to the duke of Savoy, and his ſeat. The French beſieged it very vigorouſly the preſent campaign, and reduced it to great extremities: But, September the 7th, the duke of Savoy, and prince Eugene, relieved it, gaining a complete victory over their enemies. It ſtands in a very fruitful pleaſant plain, on the river Po, twenty miles near eaſt of Pignerol, ſeventy-eight almoſt weſt of Genoa and Milan, a hundred almoſt eaſt of Grenoble and Cambray, a hundred and twenty ſouth-eaſt of Geneva, a hundred and fifty-four almoſt ſouth of Lyons, two hundred and fifty weſt of Venice, three hundred and ſixty ſouth-eaſt of Paris, three hundred and forty north-weſt of Rome, and four hundred and ſixty ſouth-weſt of Vienna.

don the allies, by not only offering him the government of the Milaneſe for his life, but ſeveral millions of livres for repairing his fortified places, that had been demoliſhed. But he rejected thoſe propoſals, and declared his reſolution to adhere firmly to the grand alliance. The French king therefore determined to reduce him (if poſſible) by force, and immediately diſpatched his orders to the duke de la Feuillade, to form the ſiege of Turin with the utmoſt diligence. Accordingly, he cauſed the lines of circumvallation and contravallation to be carried on; and the latter being finiſhed by the 30th of May, N. S. and the other on the 2d of June, the trenches were opened the ſame night, both againſt the town and citadel. The duke, having the next day viewed the enemy's works, ordered the guards in the citadel, and at the gate Suza, to be doubled, and gave other neceſſary directions for the defence of the place; and, on the 6th of June, gave orders for the planting of ſixty pieces of cannon on the baſtion de la Conſolare, near the citadel, and upon ſome other works. The next day, the duke de la Feuillade ſent monſieur de Marignan, his quarter maſter general, with a trumpet to the grand guard, to acquaint the duke, "That he had received orders from court, to form the ſiege of Turin; and, at the ſame time, to have all imaginable regard to the royal family there, and offer to them paſſports, with a guard, before the ſiege was begun." In anſwer to which, the duke ſent word, "That he was very much obliged to the king for his offer: That he did not think at preſent to remove his family: That whenever he ſhould remove them, he ſhould have no occaſion for a paſs or a guard: And that he might execute his maſter's orders, and begin the ſiege when he thought fit." On the 8th of June, therefore, the beſiegers began to bombard the citadel and town, and continued the three following days without doing any conſiderable damage; and, at the ſame time, the beſieged fired inceſſantly from their mortars, cannon, and ſmall arms, which very much diſturbed the enemy in their works, who, on the 15th at night, began to fire on the beſieged red hot bullets, moſt of which fell near the duke's palace, but did very little harm. The next day, the two ducheſſes, with the young prince and princeſſes left Turin, and went to Quieraſco; and the duke of Savoy having received advice, that the enemy were marching towards Montcalier, in order entirely to ſurround Turin, he left his capital on the 18th, and going to Carmagnole, put himſelf at the head of his horſe, whence he ſent ſix hundred of them under general Marigni to Montcalier; but, on the 20th, the enemy's forces on this ſide the Po advancing thither, that general was forced to retire. On the 21ſt, Mr. Methuen, envoy extraordinary from the queen of Great-Britain to the duke of Savoy, came from Genoa by the way of Oneglia to Carmagnole, where he had audience of the duke. But that night, the duke receiving advice, that the enemy had laid a bridge over the Po at Montcalier, and intended to march that way the next morning, orders were given for decamping by break of day; and the duke marched from Carmagnole to Quieraſco, and there paſſed the Stura, being cloſely purſued by the enemy, who attempted ſeveral times to put his rear into diſorder, but were as often repulſed, and the duke made an orderly retreat. Soon after, he received intelligence, that the enemy were advancing to attack Quieraſco, whereupon he removed the ducheſſes and princes to Mondovi, being accompanied, at the duke's requeſt, by the Sieur Vander Meer, envoy extraordinary from the States General. From thence they removed to Ceva; but, the duke imagining they were not ſafe there, he ordered them to retire into the territories of Genoa, where, after many inconveniencies and dangers, they ſafely arrived about the middle of July.

The duke de la Feuillade, being wearied in the purſuit of the duke of Savoy, returned, the 5th of July, to the camp before Turin, to receive the duke of Orleans (who was come to take the command) leaving forty-five ſquadrons, under the count d'Aubeterre, with orders to purſue the duke of Savoy: Which purſuit proved advantageous to his royal highneſs; for, from the 10th of June to the 5th of July, great part of the forces, employed in the ſiege of Turin, being engaged in this ſervice, it not only very much retarded the progreſs of the ſiege, but gave prince Eugene an opportunity at laſt to come up time enough to relieve the place, in hopes of which relief, though the ſiege was vigorouſly puſhed on, it was as bravely defended. However, on the 4th of Auguſt, the enemy attacked the firſt counterſcarp of the citadel, and took it after a ſtout reſiſtance, which laſted for about three hours, having twenty officers, three engineers, and three hundred men killed, beſides four hundred wounded in the action. After this, they continued to perfect their lodgments and batteries; but the beſieged ſprung ſo many mines, that they had no batteries ready till the 21ſt. On the 25th, in the morning, the beſieged ſprung a mine, which buried ſeveral men, blew up nine pieces of cannon, and threw down three out of five batteries, which were on the covered way. On the 26th, in the night, the half-moon and counter-guards were attacked and carried by the beſiegers; but thoſe, who defended the half-moon, retired into a walled redoubt at the neck of it, and from thence to the flank of the baſtions, and made ſuch a terrible fire upon the enemy for three hours together, that, the next morning, they drove them from the counter-guards with ſuch ſlaughter, that they owned themſelves, they had in thoſe attacks near five hundred men killed. On the 28th of Auguſt, the duke of Orleans arrived in the camp with forty ſquadrons, eleven regiments of dragoons, and forty battalions. The beſiegers, encouraged by theſe reinforcements, on the laſt of Auguſt, made a ſecond aſſault upon the half-moon, and the two counter-guards before the citadel, but were repulſed with greater loſs than before; the beſieged making a terrible fire with their ſmall arms, and ſpringing ſeveral mines with extraordinary ſucceſs; for, of ſeven batteries, ſome of five, others of ſix pieces of cannon, which the beſiegers had on the covered way, not one was left, the mines of the beſieged having ruined them all. But, though the French loſt about fourteen thouſand men before the place, yet the ammunition of the beſieged was now ſo far ſpent, that they muſt have capitulated within a day or two, if they had not been relieved by prince Eugene, who made all poſſible haſte for that purpoſe. The court of Vienna had not given due orders, as they had undertaken, for the proviſion of the troops, which were to march through their country to join him. This occaſioned many complaints and ſome delay. The truth was, that court was ſo much ſet on the reduction of Hungary, that all other things were much neglected, while that alone ſeemed to poſſeſs them. A treaty was ſet on foot with the malecontents there by the mediation of England and the States-General; and a ceſſation of arms was agreed to for two months. All, who belonged to that court, were very uneaſy, while the ceſſation continued: They had ſhared among them the confiſcations of all the great eſtates in Hungary; and they ſaw, that, if a peace were made, all theſe would be vacated, and the eſtates would be reſtored to their former owners; for which reaſon, they took all poſſible means to traverſe the negotiation, and inflame the emperor. There ſeemed to be ſome probability of bringing things to a ſettlement; but that could not be brought to any concluſion, during the term of the ceſſation; and, when that was elapſed, the emperor could not be prevailed on to renew it. He recalled his troops from the Upper Rhine, though that was contrary to all his agreements with the empire. Notwithſtanding all this ill management of the court of Vienna, prince Eugene got together the greateſt part of thoſe troops, which he expected in the Veroneſe, before the beginning of June. They were not yet all come up; but he, believing himſelf ſtrong enough, reſolved to advance; and he left the prince of Heſſe with a body to receive the reſt, and by them to force a diverſion, while he was going on. The duke of Vendoſme had taken care of all the fords of the Adige, the Mincio, and the Oglio; and had caſt up ſuch lines and entrenchments every where, that he had aſſured the court of France it was not poſſible for prince Eugene to break through all that oppoſition, at leaſt to do it in any time to relieve Turin. By this time the duke of Orleans was come to take the army out of the duke of Vendoſme's hands; but, before Vendoſme had left it, they ſaw, that he had reckoned wrong in all thoſe hopes, which he had given the court of France of ſtopping prince Eugene's march. For, in the beginning of July, that prince ſent a few battalions over one of the fords of the Adige, where the French were well poſted, and double their number, who yet ran away with ſuch precipitation, that they left every thing behind them. Upon that the prince paſſed the Adige with his whole army, and the French in a conſternation retired behind the Mincio. After this the prince ſurprized the French with a motion, which they had not looked for, nor prepared againſt, for he paſſed the Po. The duke of Orleans followed him, but declined an engagement; whereupon prince Eugene wrote to the duke of Marlborough, that he felt the effects of the battle of Ramillies, even in Italy, the French ſeeming to be every where diſpirited with their misfortunes. Prince Eugene, marching nearer the Appennines, had gained ſome days march of the duke of Orleans, who, upon that, repaſſed the Po, and advanced with ſuch haſte towards Turin, that he took no care of the paſs at Stradella, which might have been kept and diſputed for ſome days. Prince Eugene found no oppoſition there; nor did he meet with any other difficulty, but from the length of the march, and the heat of the ſeaſon, for he was in motion all the months months of July and Auguſt. At laſt, after having paſſed four great rivers, which ſerved for ditches to the four intrenchments, which the enemy had made to hinder his paſſage, and, after thirty four marches, his army arrived near Turin on the 30th of Auguſt.

On the 1ſt of September, prince Eugene, joined by the duke of Savoy with his horſe, and the whole army, paſſed the Po, on the 4th, between Montcalier and Carignan towards Quiers; and four battalions and ten thouſand militia were left under the command of count Santena, with a certain quantity of powder to be thrown into Turin, in caſe the enemy ſhould quit the hill, to oppoſe the confederate army with all their forces. On the 5th, the confederates encamped near the Doria, and, the duke of Savoy having intelligence, that a convoy of one thouſand three hundred mules was coming from Suza, he cauſed the marquis de Viſconti to paſs the ford of Elpignan with the firſt line of the left wing, and the marquis de Langallerie to paſs below Pianeſſa with the horſe of the ſecond line of the ſame wing, and ſo the convoy, being then come into the neighbourhood of that town, was incloſed between them. Monſieur de Bonel, who commanded the guard of the convoy, was beaten, and the regiment of Chatillon entirely defeated. That day eight hundred loaded mules were taken; and at night the caſtle of Pianeſſa, into which the reſt of the convoy, and of the regiment of Chatillon, had eſcaped, ſurrendered with its garriſon (conſiſting of eighty foot) at diſcretion. On the 6th, the confederates paſſed the Doria, and incamped with the right on the bank of that river before Pianeſſa, and the left on the Stura before the Venerie. At night all the troops were ordered to be ready to fight the next day, which order was received with inexpreſſible joy. On the 7th, at day-break, they marched to the enemy, who were intrenched up to the teeth, having the Stura on their right, the Doria on their left, and the convent of Capuchins de Notre Dame de la Campagne in the center; beſides Luſcingo and ſeveral other fortified caſcines flanked their entrenchment. The confederate foot marched in eight columns, four in the firſt line, and as many in the ſecond, and all the grenadiers of each column in the van. The artillery was divided in proportion among the foot. The right moved along the ſide of the Doria, and the left along the Stura. Behind the foot marched the horſe; the firſt line in ſix columns, and the ſecond in brigades. Never was any thing ſeen ſo bold and terrible as this march. The enemy fired continually with forty pieces of cannon; but all the fire ſerved only the more to inflame the confederate ſoldiers, who, within half cannon ſhot, formed into battalia; all their generals took their poſts, their cannon began to fire, and all the inſtruments of war to ſound. They left a proper diſtance betwixt the brigades of their foot, by which they might march their horſe in caſe of need, which precaution was of great uſe to them afterwards. Upon notice, that all was in order, the whole army moved in a moment. The infantry marched up with their muſkets on their ſhoulders to the foot of the entrenchment. Then the great fire of the muſkets began; and, as, by the unequal ſituation of the ground, the confederate left wing ſuſtained alone for ſome time the efforts of the enemy, that ſtopped them a little, but without making them give ground. At the ſame time prince Eugene came up, drew his ſword, and putting himſelf at the head of the battalions on the left, broke into the enemy's entrenchments in an inſtant. The duke of Savoy did the like in the centre, and the right near Luſcingo. In concluſion, the confederates triumphed on all ſides, and their horſe advancing through the intervals left for them, it was no longer a fight, but a purſuit. By noon the victory was complete, and the city entirely delivered, for the enemy abandoned the attack, and the remains of their army retired to the other ſide of the Po. The reſt of the day was ſpent in taking ſeveral caſcines and redoubts poſſeſſed by the enemy, who all yielded themſelves priſoners; and the duke of Savoy triumphantly entered his capital that evening.

The duke of Orleans, though he loſt the day, yet gave great demonſtrations of courage, and received ſeveral wounds. Marſhal Marſin fell into the enemy's hands, but died of his wounds in a few hours. Upon him the errors of this dreadful day were caſt; the duke of Orleans, with moſt of the chief officers, having declared for marching out of their trenches; but the marſhal was of another mind, and, when he found it hard to maintain his opinion, produced poſitive orders for it, which put an end to the debate. But the greateſt part of the cenſure fell on monſieur Chamillard, who was then in the ſupreme degree of favour at court, and was entirely poſſeſſed of madam de Maintenon's confidence. The duke de la Feuillade had married his daughter; and, in order to the advancing him, he had the command of this ſiege given him, which was thus obſtinately purſued, till it ended in this fatal manner. The obſtinacy continued; for the French king ſent orders, for a month together, to the duke of Orleans, to march back into Piedmont, when it was abſolutely impoſſible; and the reaſon of this was underſtood afterwards. Madam de Maintenon (it ſeems) took that care of the king's health and humour, that ſhe did not ſuffer the ill ſtate of his affairs to be fully told him. He, all that while, was made to believe, that the ſiege was only raiſed upon the advance of prince Eugene's army, and knew not, that his own was defeated and ruined [b].

While this was done at Turin, the prince of Heſſe advanced to the Mincio, which the French abandoned; but, as he went to take Caſtiglione, Medavi, the French general, ſurprized him, and cut off about two thouſand of his men; upon which he was forced to retire to the Adige. The French magnified this exceſſively, hoping, with the noiſe they made about it, to balance their real loſs at Turin; and they continued ſome time about Feneſtrelles and Briançon, as if they had a deſign to return with their army into Piedmont, and, to give an air of truth to their pretences, made ſome preparations and unſucceſsful attempts to paſs through the valley of Aoſta. But the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene, diſregarding the reports ſpread by the French, were only intent upon improving their late advantages and preſent opportunities. All the places, poſſeſſed by the enemy in Piedmont, Montſerrat, the Milaneſe, and the neighbouring provinces, were reduced one after another, ſome voluntarily, as Milan; others by force, and among the reſt Pavia, Mortara, Alexandria, Pizzighitone, Tortona (the garriſon of which was put to the ſword) and Caſal, the garriſon of which was made priſoners of war, as well as thoſe of many others; ſo that, except Cremona, Valenza, and the caſtle of Milan, which were blocked up, France loſt at the concluſion of the campaign a vaſt country, the invading and keeping of which had coſt prodigious ſums of money, by a revolution no leſs ſurpriſing than that which happened in the beginning of the campaign in the Netherlands.

There was another alarm given the French this ſummer, which heightened the diſorder they were in after the battle of Ramillies. The queen and the States made great preparations for a deſcent in France [a], which was projected by the abbot de la Bourlie, brother to the count de Guiſcard, lieutenant-general in the army of France, and governor of Namur when taken by king William. This abbot, upon a family diguſt, having thrown up his abby, formed the airy deſign of reſtor-

[a] The loſs of the enemy amounted to four thouſand ſeven hundred and ſix killed in battle, beſides thoſe ſlain in their retreat, and by the Vaudois. Count Marce, lieutenant general; monſieur la Bretonniere, general of the horſe; meſſieurs de Senneterre and Villars (marſhals de Camp) the marquis de Bonneval, brigadier, taken by his own brother, who left the French ſervice, with the marquis de Langallerie, were made priſoners; as were likewiſe eight colonels, twelve lieutenant colonels, ſix majors, ninety-eight captains, a hundred and eleven lieutenants, thirty-four cornets and enſigns, thirty engineers and commiſſaries of the artillery, and ſeven thouſand ſix hundred and forty private men, including thoſe taken in Chivas; the whole amounting to twelve thouſand ſix hundred and ſeventy men. In the enemy's works the Germans found two hundred and fifty-five pieces of cannon, a hundred and eight mortars, ſeven thouſand eight hundred bombs, thirty-two thouſand royal grenadoes, forty-eight thouſand cannon-balls, beſides a prodigious number in the ditches, &c. four thouſand cheſts of muſket-ſhot, and eighty-ſix thouſand barrels of gunpowder. They took all their tents and baggage, five thouſand horſes, mules, and oxen, twenty-ſeven large boats loaded with ammunition, all their pontoons, four pictures of the French king ſet with diamonds, valued at four thouſand piſtoles. And monſieur de Carreſt, commiſſary general of the army, was taken, with all his mules ſo richly laden, that that part of the booty alone was valued at three millions of livres; to which muſt be added ten thouſand horſes of thirteen regiments of dragoons, which ſerved for a very ſeaſonable recruit to remount the confederate cavalry, but was ſuch a loſs to the enemy, as could neither ſoon nor eaſily be retrieved.

Count Daun, general of the artillery, had defended the city of Turin with all imaginable conduct and bravery; but the garriſon ſuffered very conſiderably in the ſiege, which laſted near four months; during which time, the enemy made ſuch a terrible fire upon them, as can ſcarce be paralleled in any age. Out of the imperialiſts in garriſon, during the ſiege, three hundred and eleven were killed, five hundred and eighty-nine wounded, and a hundred and twenty-two taken priſoners; in all one thouſand and twenty-ſix. Out of the troops of Savoy thirteen hundred and three were killed, ſeventeen hundred and twenty-two wounded, nineteen hundred and fifty-eight deſerters; the whole five thouſand and ninety-three. Out of the diſmounted horſe a hundred and forty-one killed, and a hundred and fifty-four wounded. Out of the men belonging to the artillery there were ſeventy-one killed, ſeventy-five wounded, and forty-ſeven deſerted; the whole loſs amounted to ſix thouſand ſix hundred and ſeven, beſides near three thouſand of the confederates killed or diſabled in the battle.

[b] Burnet ſays, the account of this deſcent, and the campaigns in Spain from 1706 to 1712, are chiefly taken from a manuſcript narrative, by a chaplain in the army, who was on the ſpot.

The

ing the civil and religious liberties of France, which the low condition of that kingdom, the general diſcontent of the people, and the united power of the allies ſeemed to encourage. In purſuance of his deſign, the abbot repaired to the ſouthern provinces of France, where he ſettled a correſpondence with ſeveral perſons of note, eſpecially among the Camiſars, who had then taken up arms.

From thence he went to Turin, where he aſſumed the title of marquiſs de Guiſcard. He was well received by the duke of Savoy, who honoured him with the rank of a general officer in his army, and gave him a recommendatory letter to the emperor. Pleaſed with this ſucceſs he haſtened to Vienna, and applying himſelf to prince Eugene (with whom he had been intimate in his youth) was by the prince's means made a lieutenant-general in the emperor's army, which ſerved to give him credit and confidence with the maritime powers ſo abſolutely neceſſary to his projects.

From Vienna the marquis came to the Hague, where he prevailed with penſionary Heinſius to hearken to his propoſals, and to give him ſuch credentials, as gained him an eaſy admiſſion to the duke of Marlborough, when he came over in the winter 1705-6. Whilſt in Holland, the marquis publiſhed (as he had done at Turin) letters of exhortation to his countrymen, which he found means to diſperſe over France by way of manifeſto's. Theſe were all penned in the ſtyle of enthuſiaſm, of which he ſeemed to have a great tincture.

Thus ſupported and recommended he came into England, where he was favourably received, and grew into the good opinion and intimacy of Mr. Henry St. John, ſecretary of war (which continued till within a ſhort time of his death) and of other eminent perſons. Never was an affair of ſuch importance concerted and ſettled in ſo ſmall a time. Guiſcard was made lieutenant-general, and had the command of a regiment of dragoons, conſiſting of twelve troops, with the direction of ſix regiments of foot, all formed out of the French refugees on the Iriſh eſtabliſhment, at leaſt as to the officers. The marquis, on account of his religion, bore only the name of lieutenant-colonel. To theſe regiments were added as many Engliſh foot and dragoons, as amounted in the whole to ten thouſand foot and one thouſand two hundred horſe. A report of Guiſcard's commanding in chief cauſed two refugee general officers to deſire to be excuſed ſerving in the expedion. But this report was without any ground, for the command of the land-forces was conferred on earl Rivers, and of the fleet on ſir Cloudeſley Shovel. It was the 30th of July before the forces and a large train of artillery, under the command of colonel Richards, were all embarked. Earl Rivers went on board the Barfleur that day, and fell down with the fleet to St. Helen's to wait the coming of the Dutch, who were detained in the Downs by contrary winds, and did not join the fleet till the 13th of Auguſt near Plymouth. Next day the whole fleet, conſiſting of one hundred and fifty ſail, was forced into Torbay, where a council of war was held on board the admiral. At this council Guiſcard, who, the moment the fleet put to ſea, had been acknowledged lieutenant-general, had the mortification to ſee the project he had been ſo long contriving entirely demoliſhed. Earl rivers, who had opened his orders the day before he got into Torbay, found himſelf authoriſed to examine Guiſcard very ſtrictly concerning the deſcent, and, to the great ſurprize of the board, he had nothing but probabilities and a few correſpondents to go upon, and therefore the council came to ſome reſolutions very diſadvantageous to Guiſcard, which were immediately ſent up to court by an expreſs. The politicians were at a loſs, nor is it known to this day what could induce England and Holland to make ſuch an armament upon ſo weak a foundation. Indeed, if a diverſion was only aimed at by alarming the coaſts of France, the deſign was in great meaſure anſwered. For the alarm was general. It put all the maritime counties of France to a vaſt charge, and under diſmal apprehenſions. Officers were ſent from the court to exerciſe them, but they ſaw what their militia was, and that was all their defence [r].

About the ſame time that the expreſs came from the fleet, another arrived from the lord Galway, after his retreat from Madrid into Valencia, to ſolicit for ſuccours, and the court was not long in ſuſpence what to order. Inſtead of carrying on the alarm to France, the reduction of Spain was thought of much greater conſequence, and therefore new orders were ſent to the fleet to ſail firſt to Liſbon, and there to take ſuch meaſures, as the ſtate of affairs in Spain ſhould require. At the ſame time Guiſcard was ſent back to London, as were the officers of three of the French regiments of foot, the ſoldiers being left to compleat the reſt; and rear admiral Dilks was ordered to Portſmouth, with ſix of the largeſt men of war. In their ſhort voyage they met with ſuch a violent ſtorm, that they were all ſix in danger of being loſt, two of them being forced through the Needles, a thing unheard of, and very hazardous for firſt rate ſhips.

The fleet, after having been detained near ſeven weeks in Torbay, by contrary and ſtormy winds, ſailed at laſt the 1ſt of October, and arrived in three weeks at Liſbon. Earl Rivers went, November 3, to wait on the king at a little houſe at Alcantur, which, it was ſaid, he hired for his health, but more probably, to be near a convent of Nuns, which was over againſt this little houſe, where a beautiful Engliſh lady, ſiſter to a conſiderable merchant was ſhut up by her huſband, a Portugueſe of a great eſtate, upon the account of an intrigue with the king. In this houſe the king lived very privately, four or five ſtraggling ſoldiers being about the gate, in different coloured cloaths, without any regular centry without or within, nor any other appearance of a king than a canopy he ſtood under, with only four perſons with him very indifferently dreſſed, when he gave audience to the general. He received the earl with his hat off, and with great civility, ſaying, he was glad to ſee him, and approved much of his going to join the king of Spain. In this he was not thought ſincere, for he would fain have kept the army in Portugal. He ſpoke always to ſtrangers by an interpreter, for the palate of his mouth was ſo much damaged, that even the Portugueſe, that were not admitted to a great familiarity, could not underſtand him without great difficulty [s].

In leſs than a month after the audience, the king died on the 28th of November. When he was opened, his body was found to be entirely decayed within. During his three days illneſs, all the wonder working relics of Liſbon were carried to him, and continual proceſſion made in the city for his recovery, but all to no purpoſe. The very day after his deceaſe, the young king, his eldeſt ſon, who was then eighteen years old, took the adminiſtration into his hands and ſigned a treaty of alliance, expreſſing great heartineſs in it.

About the middle of December, the ſecretary of ſtate deſired a conference with earl Rivers, in which he preſſed him very much from the king, to ſtay in Portugal with the army under his command, but his ſollicitations proved fruitleſs: For the earl ordered, two days after, the horſes to be embarked, which were almoſt all on board, when an expreſs arrived from England, with orders to ſtay in Portugal, which put a ſtop to the embarkation. Ten days after, earl Rivers had an audience of the king, and laid before him ſeveral demands in writing, particularly about furniſhing mules for drawing the artillery, and for the officers baggage, as it was practiſed in Spain. The anſwer was to be returned in three days, and to determine the earl's ſtaying or going. But when it came, orders were immediately given to embark the remainder of the [r] The manuſcript narrative ſays, the duke of Roquelaure had an army of no leſs than forty thouſand men to defend Guieur, and would have been ready to receive us, if we had gone to the intended place. Theſe troops, he obſerves, would have been of great ſervice to the French in Flanders. Burnet ſays, he ſaw one of the manifeſto's that earl Rivers was ordered to publiſh upon his landing: He declared, that he was come neither to pillage the country, nor to conquer any part of it: He came only to reſtore the people to their liberties, and to have aſſemblies of the States, as they had anciently, and to reſtore the edicts to the proteſtants, promiſing protection to all that ſhould come and join him.

[s] November 12, earl Rivers and the admiral, attended by ſeveral officers, went to wait on the young princes, the king's ſons, at the Royal palace, and were received in the moſt uncivil formal manner ever I ſaw, or heard of: After waiting about ſix minutes, we were conducted through three rooms to a fourth, where, on a Turkey carpet, and under a canopy, were the four young princes drawn up in exact rank; the eldeſt on the right, and next to him, according to their ages. As ſoon as within the room we all bowed very low: Then, going near them, the earl Rivers bowed again low; firſt to the eldeſt, then to each particularly: All our officers doing the ſame. But they ſtood ſtiff like ſtatues, with their hats on, not ſhewing the leaſt notice or civility either with their bodies or hands. The earl Rivers ſpoke twice to the ſecretary of ſtate, who was near him, to interpret ſomething to the eldeſt prince, who made anſwers by the ſecretary, and then waved his hand for us to go: So we all bowed low, then went backwards, with our faces to them till near the door, then bowed again, and ſo went out, without the leaſt notice, or return of civility: Which was a moſt offenſive and odious piece of ſtate. The three eldeſt were in black with large bands, and large Holland ruffles, and black cloaks. Their right hands in or near the coat pocket; and left hands in their breaſt: Full bottomed perukes hanging before, of an ankward length, ſhorter by much than thoſe worn at our court: Their hats looped up very low, ſo that both hat and peruke looked ungenteel. The youngeſt was in a purple coat faſhionably made, with a cravat tucked as ours, and looked very well. The eldeſt is eighteen years of age; their perſons are indifferently good, except the ſecond ſon, who has an ill-favoured ſullen face; he is the talleſt: The others promiſe to be but of a little ſtature. Their court was thin, and almoſt half of prieſts of ſeveral orders, ſome in comical dreſſes. In the room with the princes, except the ſecretary of ſtate, the company ſtood up againſt the walls, as immoveable as the princes: No guard, armed men, or centry without, or within the palace; in the firſt hall below ſtairs, about eight halbards were ſet up againſt the wall near the door that leads to the great ſtair-caſe.

The

horſes. The general and all the officers went on board; and, on the 2d of January, the fleet ſailed for Alicant, where they arrived on the 28th of the ſame month.

At Alicant, earl Rivers found an Aid de Camp from the lord Galway, waiting for his arrival with a letter, to deſire that he would aſſiſt at a general council of war, which was to be held in the city of Valencia. Accordingly, about the middle of February, the earls Rivers and of Eſſex went to Valencia, where the grand council was held to determine the operations of the campaign; the reſult of which was, that they ſhould act offenſively, ſeek out the enemy, and endeavour to bring them to a battle, conſidering the great reinforcement ſent from England. Here no leſs than four Engliſh generals met together; the earls of Peterborough, Galway, and Rivers, and general Stanhope, the queen's envoy extraordinary to the king of Spain. The earl of Peterborough was recalled, ſo the command of the forces was to remain either with lord Galway or lord Rivers. The earl of Galway uſed many arguments to perſuade earl Rivers to take it upon him, notwithſtanding the orders he had received from England to ſtay and command. But earl Rivers, not liking the country, or for ſome other reaſon, choſe to return to England, which he and the earl of Eſſex did a few days after, and ſir Cloudeſley Shovel ſailed back with the fleet to Liſbon.

In the end of the campaign, in which Poland had been harraſſed with the continuance of the war, but without any great action; the king of Sweden ſeeing, that king Auguſtus ſupported his affairs in Poland, by the ſupplies both of men and money, that he drew from his electorate, reſolved to ſtop that reſource. He marched therefore in the beginning of September through Luſatia into Saxony, and quickly made himſelf maſter of an open country, that was under no apprehenſions of ſuch an invaſion, nor in any ſort prepared for it, and had few ſtrong places in it capable of making reſiſtance. The rich town of Leipſick, and all the reſt of the country, was without any oppoſition put under contribution. All the empire was alarmed at this; and it was firſt apprehended, that it was owing to French counſels, in order to raiſe a new war in Germany, and put the north all in a flame. Robinſon and Haerſolet, envoys from England and Holland, were ordered to attend the king of Sweden, and deſire him to declare his true intentions. The king gave it out, that he had no deſign to give any diſturbance to the empire, and intended by this march only to bring the war of Poland to a ſpeedy concluſion. Accordingly king Auguſtus, ſeeing his hereditary dominions in the hands of his enemy, ſoon found he could no longer maintain the war in Poland, and therefore a treaty was ſet on foot with ſuch ſecrecy, that it was concluded before it was thought to be in agitation. Auguſtus was only waiting for a fit opportunity to diſengage himſelf from his Polanders and from the Muſcovites; but an incident happened, that had almoſt imbroiled all again. For, before the ratifications of the treaty were exchanged, the armies being near one another in Great Poland at Kaliſh, the Polanders and Muſcovites attacked the Swedes at a great diſadvantage, being much ſuperior in number, and almoſt cut them in pieces. King Auguſtus had no ſhare in this, and did all he durſt to avoid it. He made all the haſte he could out of Poland, and, immediately after the battle, the peace, to the great ſurprize of all Europe, was publiſhed, having been ſigned, the 24th of September, above a month before the engagement. By the treaty king Auguſtus reſigned the kingdom of Poland, and the great dukedom of Lithuania, and acknowledged Staniſlaus as true, rightful king of Poland. He was contented with the empty name of king, though that ſeemed rather to be a reproach than any acceſſion of honour to his electoral dignity; but he thought otherwiſe, and ſtipulated, that it ſhould be continued to him. He was at mercy, for he had neither forces nor treaſure. It was thought the king of Sweden treated him with two much rigour, when he had ſo entirely maſtered him; but he was as little pitied as he deſerved to be, for, by many long practices, he had drawn all his misfortunes upon himſelf. The king of Sweden, being thus in the heart of Germany in ſo formidable a poſture, gave great apprehenſions to the allies. The French made ſtrong applications to him, but the courts of Pruſſia and Hanover were in ſuch a concert with that king, that they gave the reſt of the allies great aſſurances, that he would do nothing to diſturb the peace of the empire, nor to weaken the alliance. The court of France preſſed him to offer his mediation for a general peace; all the anſwer he gave was, that, if the allies made the like application to him, he would interpoſe and do all good offices in a treaty, but refuſed to enter into any ſeparate meaſures with France.

This was not the only application the French king made for a treaty. Soon after the battle of Ramilies, the elector of Bavaria gave out hopes of peace. He writ a letter from Mons, the 21ſt of October, N. S. to the duke of Marlborough, and another of the ſame date to the deputies of the States, with propoſals from the court of France for holding of conferences in ſome place between the two camps, or between Mons and Bruſſels, to treat of a peace. The deputies of the States had ſent the elector's letter to the Hague, and the duke had alſo communicated his to the queen his miſtreſs. When the army ſeparated in the Netherlands, and the winter-quarters were ſettled, the duke came to the Hague, the 9th of November, N. S. The next day the deputies of the States came and held a long conference with him, chiefly upon the ſubject of the elector's letters. It was agreed, that the ſteps, which France had made towards a peace, ſhould be communicated to the miniſters of the allies, in order to remove all ſuſpicions of clandeſtine negotiations, and encourage the ſeveral members of the grand alliance to redouble their efforts againſt the next campaign. This being concerted, as well as the draughts of the reſpective anſwers to the elector of Bavaria, the States deſired the miniſters of the allies, reſiding at the Hague, to be preſent, on the 21ſt of November, at an extraordinary congreſs, when the deputies for foreign affairs made the following notification to them. They owned, "That France had formerly, by ſome private perſons, made general intimations of their willingneſs to treat of peace, and that, laſt winter, the marquis d'Alegre had preſented the States a formal memorial on the ſame ſubject (the ſubſtance of which was read in the congreſs) but they had given no ear to thoſe advances, nor communicated them to the allies, becauſe they did not judge them worth imparting to them. But that, in October laſt, the elector of Bavaria had writ a letter to the duke of Marlborough, and another to the field-deputies of the States, which letters, with the draughts of the anſwers, were alſo communicated to the congreſs [t]."

Then the deputies of the States declared to the aſſembly, "That their high-mightineſſes were reſolved not to enter in-

[t] The elector's letter to the duke of Marlborough was as follows:

"The moſt chriſtian king, ſir, finding, that ſome overtures of peace, which he had cauſed to be made in a private manner, inſtead of producing the effect of making known his diſpoſitions towards procuring a general peace, have been looked upon, by ill-deſigning perſons, as an artifice to diſunite the allies, and make an advantage of the miſunderſtanding, that might be created among them; has reſolved to ſhew the ſincerity of his intentions, by renouncing all ſecret negotiations, and openly propoſing conferences, in which, means may be found for the re-eſtabliſhing the tranquillity of Europe.

"The moſt chriſtian king is pleaſed to charge me to inform you of this, and to deſire you to acquaint the queen of England with it.

"I give the like notification on the part of the moſt chriſtian king to the States-General, by a letter, that I have written to the field-deputies; and he would do the like with regard to the other potentates, that are at war with him, had they miniſters near at hand, as you are, to receive the like intimation, he having no deſign to exclude any of the ſaid potentates from the negotiation, that ſhall be begun in the conferences he propoſes. Moreover, for advancing a good ſo great and neceſſary to Europe, which has too long ſuffered the inevitable calamities of war, he conſents that a place may forthwith be choſen between the two armies; and after their being ſeparated, between Mons and Bruſſels, in which you, ſir, with whom the intereſts of England are ſo ſafely intruſted, the deputies, which the States ſhall pleaſe to nominate, and the perſons, whom the king of France ſhall impower, may begin to treat upon ſo important an affair.

"I am extremely pleaſed, ſir, to have ſuch an occaſion to write you this letter, being perſuaded it will leave no room to doubt of the ſentiments of his moſt chriſtian majeſty, which may be ſo beneficial to all Europe.

"You will be glad to give an account of it to the queen of England without loſs of time, and to whomſoever elſe you ſhall think fit. I ſhall expect your anſwer, ſir, to acquaint the moſt chriſtian king of it; and ſhall be always ready, ſir, to do you ſervice."

Mons, Octob. 21, 1706. M. Emanuel, Elector.

The duke of Marlborough's anſwer was in theſe terms:

Sir,

"Having communicated to the queen, my miſtreſs, what your electoral highneſs did me the honour to write to me in your letter of the 21ſt of laſt month, of the intentions of the moſt chriſtian king to endeavour to re-eſtabliſh the tranquillity of Europe, by conferences to be held for that purpoſe between deputies on both ſides; her majeſty has commanded me to anſwer your electoral highneſs, that as ſhe received with pleaſure the notice of the king's inclination to agree to the making of a ſolid and laſting peace with all the allies, being the ſole end, that obliged her majeſty to continue this war till now; ſo ſhe will be very glad to conclude it, in concert with all her allies, on ſuch conditions, as may ſecure them from all apprehenſions of being forced to take up arms again, after a ſhort interval, as has ſo lately happened. Her majeſty is alſo willing I ſhould declare, that ſhe is ready to enter, jointly with all the high allies, into juſt and neceſſary meaſures for attaining ſuch a peace; her majeſty being reſolved not to enter upon any negotiation, without the participation of her ſaid allies. But the way of conferences, that is propoſed, without more particular declarations on the part of his moſt chriſtian majeſty, does to any negotiation of peace, but jointly with their allies, and faithfully to communicate to them the propoſals, that might be made to them, expecting that the allies would do no leſs on their part."

The duke of Marlborough and the penſionary ſpoke very prudently on this occaſion in the congreſs, and both concluded for the continuation of the war. The miniſters were likewiſe deſired to write to their reſpective courts to exhort them to follow the example of England and Holland, who were reſolved to make a vigorous campaign. The aſſembly was extremely pleaſed with the ſincerity and fairneſs wherewith this communication was made.

The States and the duke had ſeveral weighty reaſons for the communicating theſe proceedings to the miniſters of the allies, ſome of whom were very uneaſy on the apprehenſion, that ſome ſecret negotiation was tranſacting without their knowledge. Beſides, it was ſpread about in Holland by the emiſſaries of France, that the duke of Marlborough, finding his account in continuing the war, would induce the queen of Great-Britain to refuſe to hearken to a reaſonable peace. The ſame thing had been inſinuated in England, and therefore it was proper to demonſtrate the contrary, and to ſhew, that the refuſing to enter into conferences with France was owing to a belief, that a ſolid and laſting peace could not be expected from thence.

However the court of France did not ſtop here, but, finding they could not prevail with the king of Sweden, they made a public application to the pope for his mediating a peace. The ſum of their offers, for that purpoſe, was to give up to king Charles either Spain and the Weſt-Indies, or Milan, Naples, and Sicily, with a barrier for the Dutch, and a compenſation to the duke of Savoy for the waſte made in his country. But theſe offers were rejected [u]. The court of Vienna was ſo alarmed at the inſinuations ſome had expreſſed towards the entertaining this project, that this was believed to be the ſecret motive of the treaty, the ſucceeding winter, for evacuating the Milaneſe, and of their obſtinately perſiſting, the ſummer after, in their deſigns upon Naples; for by this means they became maſters of both.

The duke of Marlborough having now ſettled ſeveral important affairs with the States, particularly the continuing the Heſſian troops in Italy, according to the duke of Savoy's deſire, he embarked for England, and arrived at London the 18th of November, O. S.

As the duke had by the emperor been inveſted with the principality of Mildenheim, for delivering the empire from the arms of France; ſo he was now no leſs diſtinguiſhed at home by the queen and parliament. For, ſoon after his return, he received the thanks of both houſes for his eminent ſervices, and the lords addreſſed the queen to ſettle his honours on his poſterity. This was readily complied with; and an act paſſed to limit his titles and honours to his eldeſt daughter, and her male heirs, and then to all his other daughters ſucceſſively, according to their priority of birth, and that Woodſtock-Manor and Blenheim Houſe ſhould always go with the titles. And, a few days after, upon the commons not ſeem to her to be proper for obtaining a truly ſolid and laſting peace. The States General are of the ſame opinion. Wherefore your electoral highneſs will rightly judge, that other more ſolid means muſt be thought on to obtain ſo great an end, to which her majeſty will contribute, with all the ſincerity that can be wiſhed, having nothing ſo much at heart, as the relief of her ſubjects, and the tranquillity of Europe. Your electoral highneſs will always do me the juſtice to be perſuaded of the reſpect, with which I have the honour to be, &c.

Hague, Novemb. 20, 1706.

The letters between the elector and the field-deputies were of much the ſame tenor.

[u] Dr. Hare, in his piece, entitled, 'The management of the war in a letter to a tory member, takes notice of the objection, which had been urged by the tories, 'That a good peace might have been had at the end of the Ramillies campaign.' "Now to decide this queſtion, ſays he, we muſt firſt ſettle what a good peace is; and, in order to that, muſt conſider, what it was we went into the war for. Nobody wants to be told, that this was chiefly to obtain theſe two ends, the reſtitution of the Spaniſh monarchy to the houſe of Auſtria, and the procuring of a good barrier againſt France, on the ſide of the Netherlands; without which two points there can be no ſecurity for Great-Britain, that their beſt trade will not be loſt, and with it their religion and government, and every thing that is dear to them. For we ſhould every minute be in danger of having the bigotry, ſlavery, and poverty of France forced upon us by the exorbitant power of that moſt arbitrary prince, if he ſhould be ſuffered to ſtrengthen himſelf with the addition of that vaſt monarchy, who was before much too great for his neighbours; to ſay nothing of the ſafety of the Dutch, or the liberty of Europe.——Now the Spaniſh monarchy, the reſtitution of which is the firſt article of the grand alliance, is known by every body to conſiſt, beſides the Spaniſh Netherlands, of theſe two great parts, of Spain and the Indies; and of Milan, Naples, and Sicily, with Sardinia and the adjacent iſles. And a good barrier againſt France means, at leaſt, a better than the Dutch had before, which, by the experience of fifty years, has been found to be much too weak for ſo large a frontier; the Spaniſh Flanders, and its capital city, Ghent, having in truth no cover at all, and Brabant but a very poor one; while, the French being entire maſters of the Lys and Scheld, both provinces lie expoſed to their invaſions. Look but on ſome large maps of theſe provinces, ſuch as have been printed of late years, and your eyes will preſently convince you of the truth of this. But, if this reſtitution and this barrier were thought neceſſary, at our entering into the war, nobody, I preſume, will ſay, they are leſs neceſſary now, when ſo much more has been done to gain theſe ends, than any body at the beginning could ever hope to ſee. And, if theſe two points are neceſſary, then no peace without them can be a good peace. Let us then compare this good peace with what the French offered at the end of the Ramillies campaign——which, in ſhort, was no more than this, to give up to the allies which of thoſe two they liked beſt, either Spain and the Indies, or Milan, Naples, and Sicily, &c. which offer was unanimouſly rejected. I ſuppoſe, there is no need of proving, that the allies ought not to have accepted either part of this alternative, it being ſo ſhort of what, upon our entrance into the war was thought neceſſary. To have been content with a moiety of what we went into the war for, after ſo many ſucceſſes, and not a few ſurprizingly great, would have rendered us inexcuſable to all poſterity; and ſome body, who, we are now told, prolongs the war, would have been ſaid to have been well paid for ſuch a peace. It would have been, in the language of the faction, a plain caſe, we were ſold to France, and nothing leſs than his head could have atoned for it. But, inſtead of proving the abſurdity of accepting ſuch a peace, I ſhall ſhew you rather, what to every body is not ſo plain; and that is, that the French were not ſincere; They meant nothing by their offer, but to amuſe the allies, and knew they could not all agree to accept either part of the alternative; and that England and Holland without the emperor, could not take Spain and the Indies, were they never ſo much inclined to it. For, had the allies hearkened to this propoſal, it had been in the power of the French to have cloſed with which they would. Now it is eaſy to ſee, what this muſt have ended in. For in ſuch partition there is no doubt but, as the Dutch and we ſhould have been for Spain and the Indies, the emperor would have made the other part his choice, which is evidently left for him. Which part now of the allies in this diviſion would France be moſt willing to comply with? Or, in other words, which part of the monarchy would they chooſe of the two to quit? A man muſt be blind not to ſee, that the part the emperor would like beſt to have, the ſame France would like beſt to part with. Behold then the neceſſary conſequence of hearkening to ſuch terms: The confederacy broken, and the maritime powers left to ſhift for themſelves, without being able to obtain either of the parts, when they ought to be content, according to the terms of the grand alliance, with nothing leſs than both. Who now, I would fain know, have moſt reaſon to complain, that theſe offers were rejected, the people of London or Vienno? They, who might have had the part they had moſt mind to, if they would have abandoned their allies? Or we, who it is certain, beſides the infamy of ſo baſe an action, could have had nothing? Had the writers, who are ſo able at making ſomething out of nothing, had their lot in Auſtrian ground, what a field had there been for them? What rare matter to ſhew their ſkill in? What ſpecious pretences, without the help of ſecret hiſtory, to give out, that the emperor was ill-adviſed? What! reject ſo advantageous an offer, by which ſo great an addition of real ſtrength would have been made to the houſe of Auſtria; and that, at a time, when they were ſo unable to carry on the war, when the people have been exhauſted with continual wars for more than thirty years!——Would not this be the language of the faction, if the ſcene were changed from London to Vienna? And yet we do not hear that either the emperor, or his people, have hitherto thought it any crime in the miniſters, who would not hearken to thoſe terms. Inſtead of that, all the world think it much for their honour, that they have appeared true to themſelves, and faithful to their allies, in rejecting ſo pitiful and inſecure a peace. And is not this a reproach to us, who ſuffer ourſelves to be deluded by ſuch vile impoſtors, who would perſuade us out of our ſenſes, that half the Spaniſh monarchy is as good as the whole, and that nothing is as good as half. For I have ſhewn, that one half only was offered, and that even that could not be had. It muſt, ſure, to all thinking men be very ſurpriſing, that we only, of all the allies, ſhould complain, that this ridiculous offer of the French was rejected, when we, of all of them, have moſt reaſon to be pleaſed with it.——I muſt beg leave to obſerve one thing further, which is of too much moment to be paſſed over; and that is, that they, who have done their country ſo much ſervice in rejecting this offer from the French, would have done it ſtill much greater, could they have prevented any regard being given to it. For, though the refuſing theſe terms could do no harm, the hearkening to them, I will ſhew you, did a great deal. The inclination ſome people, of the ſame complexion with the author of the Secret Hiſtory, expreſſed to come to a treaty with the French upon the terms offered, raiſed in the Imperial court a jealouſy, that the maritime powers were tampering with France, and making terms for themſelves, to which the intereſt of the houſe of Auſtria was to be ſacrificed. This put that court upon meaſures, that had a fatal influence on the next campaign, and occaſioned the two moſt unfortunate events, that had happened all this war. Firſt, this ſuſpicion made them begin and conclude a treaty with the French for evacuating the Milaneſe, without the privity of England and Holland, who did not know one word of the matter. And what do you think was the conſequence of this? Why, it gave the French an opportunity of ſending immediately into Spain a great body of good veteran troops. And it is to this reinforcement ſent the duke of Anjou, that we owe the loſs of the battle of Almanza, which proved ſo fatal to our own affairs on that ſide.—— And the ſame jealouſy put the Imperial court upon taking another ſtep, no leſs prejudicial to the common cauſe, and that was the expedition to Naples, which they could not be prevailed with to defer upon the repeated and moſt preſſing inſtances, that the maritime powers made to them by their miniſters both at Vienna and Italy. And the conſequence of the expedition was, that it not only diverted a great part of the troops, that were to execute the project on Toulon, but retarded, for a conſiderable time, the march of the reſt. And this loſs of time, and leſſening of their numbers, ſeem to have been the chief occaſion of the miſcarriage of that glorious enterprize. Nothing made the Imperial court ſo obſtinately bent on that unhappy expedition, but the fears they had, that Naples, as well as Milan, would at the Hague be given up to facilitate a peace, which they were reſolved to prevent, by getting poſſeſſion as ſoon as they could. This is all we have got by hearkening to thoſe offers, which it is now thought a great crime we did not cloſe with; the loſs of the battle of Almanza, and the miſcarriage of the project on Toulon, the greateſt, moſt important, beſt concerted enterprize, that was ever entered on. And both theſe misfortunes had, in all probability, been prevented, had the offers of the French been roundly rejected at the firſt, and no occaſion of jealouſy had, by liſtening to them, been given the Imperial court.——After ſaying ſo much of that part of the offer the French made, which concerns the partition they propoſed of the Spaniſh monarchy, which we ought, not to have accepted, if we could, and could not, if we would; there is no need of telling you, what ddreſs, the queen agreed, that the five thouſand pounds penſion out of the Poſt-office ſhould be ſettled on him and his poſterity, in the ſame manner as the town of Woodſtock and the houſe of Blenheim [w].

what barrier was offered for the Netherlands, which the Dutch were moſt concerned in, who do not uſe to neglect good offers to come at a peace, if we may believe the faction, who have for a long time pretended to fear nothing ſo much as their quitting the alliance for their own ſeparate intereſt. Though now the noble firmneſs they have ſhewn in adhering to it, till terms may be had to the ſatisfaction of all parties, is by theſe ill-deſigning politicians, who can take every thing by a wrong handle, imputed to them for a crime.——That this is the whole truth of this matter; that theſe, and no other, were the offers the French made after the Ramillies campaign; I will give you, beſides theſe already hinted, one plain authentic proof, which is as good as a thouſand demonſtrations; and that is a letter of the French king to the pope on this ſubject, writ in the following ſpring, when all thoughts of peace were at an end, and a new campaign was entering upon.

This letter was dated at Verſailles, February 15, 1707, and was as follows:

"The care, which your holineſs continues to take for procuring the peace of Europe, is always equally agreeable to us. We have nothing more at heart than to ſecond your endeavours; and we would even prevent you in any thing we could do to make them effectual. As it was not our fault, that the war was begun, ſo we ſhall ſeek occaſions to end it, by the moſt ready and eaſy methods. Your Holineſs has been informed, that we have already made frequent advances to come to ſo wholeſome an end. It can be attributed only to the misfortune of the times, that catholic princes, ſtruck with fear of diſpleaſing the allies, ſhould yet refuſe to hear the holy exhortations of the vicar of Jeſus Chriſt. When we left it to the arbitration of your holineſs to ſatisfy the rights and demands of the emperor, by a valuable compenſation upon ſome parts of the Spaniſh monarchy; the miniſtry of your holineſs were charged with the care of making the propoſal of it to that prince. But with what haughtineſs did he reject it! Having ſaid things exorbitant, and inſolently demanded, that our grandſon ſhould be recalled. Who could have thought, moſt holy father, that he would have made ſo arrogant a return to an inſulted king, to a miniſter of your holineſs, and to our love of peace? For the conjuncture, far from being favourable to the houſe of Auſtria, ſeemed then to threaten it by the ſuperiority of our forces, and by our gaining the battle of Caſſano. But God, who is the maſter of events, changed the poſture of our affairs. Yet, though we were employed with the cares of repairing our loſſes, we had ſtill in our minds the idea we had conceived of peace, at the time even of our greateſt proſperity. We renewed to Holland the offer of a barrier for their ſtate, and of the ſecurity demanded for their trade; reſerving it ſtill to ourſelves to treat with the emperor about a compenſation. Propoſitions ſo reaſonable were again rejected by the intrigues of that party, which had ſhewed itſelf averſe to the advancement of our grandſon. And then we employed all our thoughts to encreaſe our preparations for a war, which had been violently and unjuſtly declared againſt us. Nevertheleſs, as it becomes us to be obedient to the pious exhortations of your holineſs; and, to the end that our enemies may have no pretence to impute to us the loſs of ſo much Chriſtian blood, as is already ſpilt, and now going to be let out, we will give your holineſs a plain and frank account of the diſpoſition we are in for peace. We will therefore acquaint your holineſs, that the king, our grandſon, has entruſted us with full power to convey the archduke a part of thoſe eſtates, that compoſe the Spaniſh monarchy. The catholic king has the hearts of the true Spaniards, and is content to reign over them. It only depends therefore on the emperor to explain himſelf at this time, who may have, if he pleaſes, for ever re-united to his family the Milaneſe, Naples, and Sicily, with the other iſlands belonging to Spain, that are ſituated in the Mediterranean ſea.

"We ſhould eaſily agree about a barrier for the republic of the United Provinces. And, the two pretences of the war being thus removed, it would not be difficult to put an end to theſe misfortunes, which Europe has been ſo long oppreſſed with.

"We pray God, that he will preſerve your Holineſs a great many years, in the government of his church."

Your devoted ſon,

The king of France and Navarre,

LEWIS.

The author of the 'Military Hiſtory of the late prince Eugene of Savoy, and the late John duke of Marlborough,' Vol. II. p. 18, tells us, "That it is not certain, what were the true reaſons, why the confederates did not liſten at this time to the propoſals of peace, ſince there are juſt reaſons to believe, that his moſt chriſtian majeſty would have conſented to any thing, that could have been demanded, leſs than an entire renunciation of Spain. Nay, it is to be wondered, that the alliance itſelf was not broke at this time, great jealouſies ariſing between the imperialiſts and the Dutch, about the conqueſts in the Netherlands, the juriſdiction being claimed by the former, and exerciſed very deſpotically by the latter. The ſource of this difference lay here: It was ſtipulated in the grand alliance, that the Dutch ſhould firſt have a barrier, and, when they were ſafe, the Spaniſh provinces were to be delivered up to the emperor or the king of Spain. The imperialiſts were of opinion, that the Dutch were now ſafe; and demanded therefore, that the province of Limburgh, which had been reduced the laſt campaign, ſhould be delivered up: To which the States returned general anſwers, and continued to exerciſe their juriſdiction as formerly. Count Zinzendorf was pitched on therefore by his imperial majeſty, to go firſt to the camp, and then to the Hague, in order to regulate all things with the allies. The duke of Marlborough entertained this miniſtry very agreeably; they converſed together on the ſubject of the overture made for peace, and canvaſſed the ſeveral neutral powers of Europe, in order to find out the proper mediation, under the auſpice of which a negotiation might be commenced. The pope was by no means grateful to the proteſtant powers, nor a grain more in the good graces of his imperial majeſty. The Venetians expreſſed no great inclination to concern themſelves in ſuch a buſineſs; and it was thought the emperor would not accept the mediation of the Swiſs Cantons. In the north, the king of Denmark might have been influenced to take on him ſuch a part; but, in regard, that he himſelf had ſome differences to adjuſt, it was doubted, whether a negotiation could be properly carried on through his mediation. Beſides, the only plan, that

The affairs of Scotland were all this while in a very dangerous ſituation. The intereſt of the pretender (it is ſaid) increaſed to ſuch a degree, that four parts in five of the nobility and gentry, and above half of the commons over the whole was talked of on the ſide of the confederates, was the abſolute ceſſion of Spain, and its dependencies, to the houſe of Auſtria, and the erecting the duchy and county of Burgundy into a kingdom, which was to be given to king Philip. The Dutch in general were very much diſpoſed to a peace; but the duke of Marlborough and the imperial miniſter were for continuing the war, that France might be obliged to accept ſuch terms, as would leave it no longer in her power to terrify her neighbours. The anſwer the duke of Marlborough gave to the elector of Bavaria was concerted with, and approved by the imperial miniſter. And thus all the intrigues of France, for bringing on a negotiation ſomewhere, were abſolutely defeated, though ſhe ſpared no pains to bring them to bear. His moſt chriſtian majeſty, however, did not fail to make the moſt he could of a very indifferent game. He applied himſelf aſſiduouſly to the re-eſtabliſhment of his troops, and to the raiſing money by every method he could take; at the ſame time that his emiſſaries gave out every where, that the preſent war was a war merely of intereſt. That his imperial majeſty carried it on, becauſe he had all things to hope from it, and nothing either to fear or pay: That the leading people in Great Britain were ſuch, as gained titles and eſtates by the war: And that, in Holland, the penſionary Heinſius, who did all things, was entirely directed by the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene. If theſe ſuggeſtions were neither agreeable to truth nor to the ſentiments of the people, at the time they were thrown out, yet, by being often repeated, they gained credit at laſt, and occaſioned ſome diſturbances in Holland, and greater in England."

[a] Six days after his arrival, the duke coming to the houſe of peers, the lord keeper, by direction, made the following ſpeech to him:

My lord duke of Marlborough,

"I am commanded by this houſe to give your grace their acknowledgment and thanks for the eminent ſervices you have done, ſince the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, to her majeſty and your country, together with their confederates, in this juſt and neceſſary war. Though your former ſucceſſes againſt the power of France, while it remained unbroken, gave moſt reaſonable expectation, that you would not fail to improve them; yet what your grace hath performed, this laſt campaign, has far exceeded all hopes, even of ſuch as were moſt affectionate and partial to their country's intereſt and your glory. The advantages you have gained againſt the enemy, are of ſuch a nature, ſo conſpicuous in themſelves, ſo undoubtedly owing to your courage and conduct, ſo ſenſibly and univerſally beneficial in their conſequences to the whole confederacy, that to attempt to adorn them with colouring of words would be vain and inexcuſable, and therefore I decline it; the rather, becauſe I ſhould certainly offend that great modeſty, which alone can, and does add luſtre to your actions, and which, in your grace's example, has ſucceſsfully withſtood as great trials, as that virtue has met with in any inſtance whatſoever. And I beg leave to ſay, that, if any thing could move your grace to reflect with much ſatisfaction on your own merit, it would be this: That ſo auguſt an aſſembly does, with one voice, praiſe and thank you; an honour, which a judgment ſo ſure, as that of your grace's, to think rightly of every thing, cannot but prefer to the oſtentation of a public triumph."

The duke's anſwer to this ſpeech was: "I eſteem this as a very particular honour, which your lordſhip's are pleaſed to do me. No body in the world can be more ſenſible of it than I am, nor more deſirous to deſerve the continuance of your favour and good opinion."

The day before a committee, appointed by the commons, having attended the duke with the thanks of that houſe for his eminent ſervices to her majeſty and this kingdom in the laſt campaign, the duke told them, "If any thing could add to my ſatisfaction in the ſervices I have endeavoured to do the queen and my country, it would be the particular notice, which the houſe of commons is pleaſed to take of them ſo much to my advantage." A little after the lords waited on the queen with an addreſs, importing, "That having conſidered the many great actions, which the duke of Marlborough had performed in her majeſty's ſervice, ſuch actions, as the wiſeſt and greateſt of people had rewarded with ſtatues and triumphs; they were extremely deſirous to expreſs the juſt ſenſe they had of his merit, in a peculiar and diſtinguiſhing manner; and, in order to perpetuate the memory thereof, to ſettle and continue his titles and honours, with his right of precedence, in his poſterity by act of parliament. But, having a juſt regard for the prerogative of the crown, they thought it their duty, in the firſt place, to have recourſe to her majeſty for her royal allowance, before any order given for bringing in a bill of ſuch a nature; and to deſire her majeſty to let the houſe know in what manner it would be moſt acceptable to her, that theſe titles and honours ſhould be limited." Her majeſty's anſwer to this addreſs was as follows:

ANNE R.

"Nothing can be more acceptable to me than your addreſs. I am entirely ſatisfied with the ſervices of the duke of Marlborough, and therefore cannot but be pleaſed you have ſo juſt a ſenſe of them.

"I muſt not omit to take notice, that the reſpectful manner of your proceeding, in deſiring my allowance for bringing in the bill, and my direction for the limitation of the honours, does give me great ſatisfaction.

"My intention is, that, after the determination of the eſtate, which the duke of Marlborough now has in his titles and honours, the ſame ſhould be limited to his eldeſt daughter, and the heirs male of her body, and then to all his other daughters, ſucceſſively, according to their priority of birth, and the heirs male of their reſpective bodies, and afterwards in ſuch manner, as may effectually anſwer my deſign and yours, in perpetuating the memory of his merit, by continuing, as far as may be done, his titles and name to all his poſterity.

"I think it would be proper, that the honour and manor of Woodſtock, and the houſe of Blenheim, ſhould always go along with the titles; and therefore I recommend that matter to your conſideration."

Then the duke of Marlborough, on this occaſion, ſpoke to the lords in theſe words:

"My Lords,

"I cannot find words ſufficient to expreſs the ſenſe I have of the great and diſtinguiſhing honour, which the houſe has been pleaſed to do me in their reſolution, and their application to her majeſty. The thoughts of it will be a continual kingdom, expreſſed, on all occaſions, their inclination and readineſs to ſerve that cauſe. Accounts of this were from time to time tranſmitted to the court of France, who, being much ſtraitened by the ſucceſſes of the confederates, ſeemed more ſincere and hearty than formerly, in promoting the intereſt of the pretender. Colonel Hookes was ſent to Edinburgh in 1705, with letters from the French king and the pretender to the duke of Hamilton, and the earls of Errol, Mariſchal, and Hume, exhorting them to concert meaſures for the reſtoration of the exiled royal family; promiſing to aſſiſt the Scots nation in ſo good a deſign, impowering the colonel to receive propoſals, and deſiring them to ſend over to France one fully inſtructed to treat for that purpoſe. This Hookes had been a preſbyterian, and one of the duke of Monmouth's chaplains, when he invaded England; but, whether he was taken priſoner and pardoned, or made his eſcape, it is certain, that, having afterwards turned Roman catholic, and entered into the French ſervice, he had, by this time, raiſed himſelf there to the command of a regiment of foot, and gained ſuch credit at the court of France, as to be appointed to manage their correſpondence with Scotland. In converſation he appeared to be a man of tolerable good ſenſe, and quick parts, but, being withal extremely vain and haughty, and not very circumſpect, the cavaliers and country party declined admitting him into their private meetings, to propoſe, as he deſigned, their owning the pretender's intereſt, and moving his reſtoration in parliament. They were cautious of confiding in him, becauſe, in all his propoſals, he ſeemed more intent upon raiſing a commotion in the kingdom, and ſo giving a diverſion to the enemies of France, than upon what really tended to advance the pretender's affairs. However, the cavaliers, to whom he delivered his letters and meſſages, told him in general terms, "That they were willing to do every thing, that could in reaſon be expected from them; and would, as they were deſired, in a ſhort time, ſend over one to confer with king James (for ſo they ſtiled the pretender) and the king of France." With this anſwer Hookes returned to France; and the cavaliers, having reſolved to ſend one over, to ſee what aſſiſtance they could depend upon from thence, unanimouſly made choice of captain Henry Stratton, who embarked for France, the very next day after Lockhart returned to Edinburgh, having waited for him, to get a full account of what paſſed at London, in relation to the intended union. Beſides what concerned that treaty, Lockhart was employed to ſift the tories in England, and endeavour to know what they would do, in caſe the pretender came over, and the Scots declared for him; and, having accordingly found means to underſtand the ſentiments of the duke of Leeds, the lord Granville, and ſeveral others, he informed captain Stratton, that the Engliſh tories were much more cautious than the Scots cavaliers; the former being all of opinion, 'That no attempt ought to be made during the queen's life.' Captain Stratton was kindly received in France, but could bring nothing to a concluſion; the battles of Ramillies and Turin having ſo diſconcerted the French king's meaſures, that he was not in a condition to ſpare either men or money for the ſervice of the pretender. However, the pretender told Stratton, "That he longed extremely to be amongſt his Scots friends;" and obliged him to give him in writing a character of every member of the Scots parliament, as they ſtood affected to him. After this Stratton was diſmiſſed, with fair promiſes from the French king, of doing all in his power in a more favourable conjuncture, and with letters from the pretender to the duke of Hamilton, the earls of Errol and Mariſchal, and the viſcount Stormount. The viſcount had two letters encloſed in his, one to the duke of Athol, the other to the marquis of Montroſe; the firſt of which was delivered, and kindly received; but, the marquis having left the cavaliers, it was thought to no purpoſe to make any attempt upon him, and dangerous to truſt him with ſecrets, which he might diſcover to the miniſters of ſtate; for which reaſon the pretender's letter was not delivered to him.

Upon this encouragement from France, the cavaliers reſolved to ſtand firm, and to exert their utmoſt efforts in the enſuing ſeſſion of parliament, againſt the ratification of the treaty of union; though, about this time, they ſuſtained a great loſs in the death of the earl of Hume, who was more relied on than any other of his party.

Before the parliament met in Scotland, the miniſtry there gave ſuch a fair repreſentation of the union, that it was generally reliſhed by the people; but no ſooner did the articles appear in print, but they were as univerſally diſliked. It was viſible, that the nobility of that kingdom ſuffered a great diminution by it; for, though it was agreed, that they ſhould enjoy all the other privileges of the peers of England, yet the greateſt of them all, which was voting in the houſe of lords, was reſtrained to ſixteen to be elected by the reſt every new parliament; yet there was a greater majority of the nobility that concurred in voting for the union, than in the other ſtates of that kingdom.

On the 3d of October, the parliament being met, the duke of Queenſbury, the high commiſſioner, went thither, attended by moſt of the nobility, barons, and other members; and the queen's letter was read as follows:

ANNE R.

My lords and gentlemen,

"SINCE your laſt meeting, we did nominate commiſſioners to treat of an union between our two kingdoms of Scotland and England, and by their great care and diligence a treaty is happily concluded and laid before us.

"We have called you together as ſoon as our affairs could permit, that the treaty may be under your conſideration, in purſuance of the act made in the laſt ſeſſion of our parliament there; and we hope the terms will be acceptable to you.

"The union has long been deſired by both nations, and we ſhall eſteem it the greateſt glory of our reign to have it now perfected being fully perſuaded, that it muſt prove the greateſt happineſs of our people.

"An entire and perfect union will be the ſolid foundation of a laſting peace: It will ſecure your religion, liberty, and property; remove the animoſities among yourſelves, and the jealouſies and differences betwixt our two kingdoms. It muſt increaſe your ſtrength, riches, and trade: And by this union the whole iſland being joined in affection, and free from all apprehenſion of different intereſts, will be enabled to reſiſt all its enemies, ſupport the proteſtant intereſt every where, and maintain the liberties of Europe.

"We do, upon this occaſion, renew the aſſurances we have continual ſatisfaction to me, and the higheſt encouragement; and the thankful memory of it muſt laſt as long as any poſterity of mine.

"I muſt beg leave to ſay a word to the houſe in relation to that part of her majeſty's moſt gracious anſwer, which concerns the eſtate of Woodſtock, and the houſe of Blenheim. I did make my humble requeſt to the queen, that thoſe might go along with the titles; and I make the like requeſt to your lordſhips, that after the ducheſs of Marlborough's death (upon whom they are ſettled in jointure) that eſtate and houſe may be limited to go always along with the honours."

The lords readily complied with the queen's and the duke's deſires, and the bill, which was brought in for that purpoſe, had a quick paſſage through both houſes.

On the 7th of January, the commons alſo having taken into conſideration, "The eminent ſervices of the duke of Marlborough, whereby the glory of her majeſty's government, the honour and ſafety of the kingdom, and the intereſt of the common cauſe had been ſo highly advanced," they agreed upon an addreſs to the queen, wherein they humbly deſired, "That as her majeſty was, at her expence, graciouſly pleaſed to erect the houſe of Blenheim as a monument of his glorious actions; and the houſe of peers, by her majeſty's permiſſion, had given riſe to a law for continuing his honours to his poſterity; the moſt obedient commons might be permitted to expreſs their ſenſe of diſtinguiſhing a merit, and their ready diſpoſition to enable her majeſty to make ſome proviſion for the more honourable ſupport of his dignity in his poſterity, in ſuch manner, as ſhould be moſt agreeable to her majeſty:" Concluding, "That thus the gratitude of the whole kingdom would remain upon record to after-ages, and encourage others to follow his great example." This addreſs being the next day preſented to the queen by the whole houſe, her majeſty was pleaſed to tell the commons, "That ſhe was very glad they had ſo juſt a ſenſe of the repeated ſervices of the duke of Marlborough, and would conſider of their addreſs, and return an anſwer very ſpeedily."

Accordingly, on the 9th of January, Mr. ſecretary Hedges delivered to the houſe a meſſage ſigned by her majeſty, importing, "That her majeſty in conſideration of the great and eminent ſervices, performed by the lord Marlborough in the firſt year of her reign, as well by his prudent negotiation as her plenipotentiary at the Hague, as by his valour and good conduct in the command of the confederate armies abroad, thought fit to grant to him, and the heirs male of his body, the title of a duke of this realm; and as a farther mark of her favour and ſatisfaction with his ſervices, and for the better ſupport of his dignity, her majeſty granted to the ſaid duke, and the heirs male of his body, during life, a penſion of five thouſand pounds per annum, out of the revenue of the Poſt-office: and an act having paſſed this ſeſſion, for ſettling the honours and dignities of the duke of Marlborough upon his poſterity, and annexing the honour and manor of Woodſtock and houſe of Blenheim, to go along with the ſaid honours; It would be very agreeable to her majeſty, if the penſion of five thouſand pounds per annum were continued and limited by act of parliament to his poſterity, for the more honourable ſupport of their dignities, in like manner as his honours, and the honour and manor of Woodſtock, and houſe of Blenheim, were already limited and ſettled." The commons very readily complied with this meſſage, and an act paſſed for that purpoſe.

However, a little after, the queen having given him the grant of the royal Mews at Charing Croſs (where a ſquare was deſigned to be built and called after his name) the commons, upon a motion, being made to confirm this grant, refuſed to do it.

formerly given you, of our reſolution to maintain the government of the church as by law eſtabliſhed in Scotland; and the acts of both parliaments, upon which this treaty proceeded, having reſerved their reſpective governments of the church in each kingdom, the commiſſioners have left that matter intire; and you have now an opportunity for doing what may be neceſſary for the ſecurity of your preſent church government, after the union, within the limits of Scotland. The ſupport of our government and your own ſafety does require, that you do make neceſſary proviſion for maintaining the forces, ſhips and garriſons, untill the parliament of Great-Britain ſhall provide for theſe ends in the united kingdom.

"We have made choice of our right truſty and right intirely beloved couſin and counſellor, James duke of Queensberry, to be our commiſſioner, and repreſent our royal perſon; being well ſatisfied with his fitneſs for that truſt, from the experience we have of his capacity, zeal, and fidelity to our ſervice, and the good of his country; which, as it has determined us in the choice, we doubt not but will make him acceptable to you.

"We have fully inſtructed him in all things we think may fall under your conſideration, and ſeem to be neceſſary at preſent: Therefore we deſire that you may give truſt and credit to him.

My lords and gentlemen,

"It cannot but be an encouragement to you to finiſh the union at this time, that God Almighty has bleſſed our arms, and thoſe of our allies, with ſo great ſucceſs; which gives us the nearer proſpect of a happy peace, and with it you will have the full poſſeſſion, of all the advantages of this union. And you have no reaſon to doubt, but the parliament of England will do what is neceſſary on their part, after the readineſs they have ſhewn to remove what might obſtruct the entering on the treaty. We moſt earneſtly recommend to your calmneſs and unanimity, in this great and weighty affair, that the union may be brought to a happy concluſion, being the only effectual way to ſecure your preſent and future happineſs, and to diſappoint the deſigns of our and your enemies, who will, doubtleſs, on this occaſion, uſe their utmoſt endeavours to prevent or delay this union, which muſt ſo much contribute to our glory, and the happineſs of our people. And ſo we bid you heartily farewel."

Given at our court at Windſor-Caſtle, the 31ſt day of July 1706, and of our reign the 5th year.

By her majeſty's command,

MAR.

This letter was enforced by the ſpeeches of the duke of Queenſberry, and the lord-chancellor Seafield, after which the treaty of union was read, and ordered to be printed, together with the proceedings of the lords commiſſioners of both kingdoms in relation to that matter; and then the parliament was adjourned to that day ſe'ennight.

Her majeſty's miniſters were not inſenſible of the difficulties, which they had to encounter in the affair of the union, againſt which, the dukes of Hamilton and Athol, the marquis of Annandale, the earls of Errol, Mareſchal, and Buchan, the lord Belhaven, Mr. Fletcher of Salton, and ſome others, had formed a powerful party. The commiſſioners from the ſhires and boroughs were almoſt equally divided, though, it was evident, they were to be the chief gainers by it. Among theſe the union was agreed to by a very ſmall majority. It was the nobility, that in every vote turned the ſcale for the union. They were ſeverely reflected upon by thoſe who oppoſed it; and it was ſaid, many of them were bought off, to ſell their country and their birthright. All thoſe, who adhered inflexibly to the Jacobite intereſt, oppoſed every ſtep that was made with great vehemence, for they ſaw that the union ſtruck at the root of all their deſigns for a new revolution. Yet all theſe could not have raiſed or maintained ſo great an oppoſition as was made, if they had not prepoſſeſſed with fears and jealouſies the minds of many among the preſbyterian clergy, who had the greateſt aſcendant over the generality of the laity in Scotland. Among other indications of this temper of the Scots miniſters at this critical juncture, it was taken notice, that, ſome days before the meeting of the parliament, one of duke Hamilton's chaplains propoſed in the general aſſembly of the clergy, "That, before an affair of ſo great importance, as the union was, came to be debated before the eſtates of the kingdom, they ought to enter into an Aſſociation for the preſervation of the preſbyterian diſcipline, if the treaty concluded by the commiſſioners of both kingdoms was ratified by the reſpective parliaments." Another miniſter moved, "That a day of faſting and humiliation ſhould be appointed to ſeek the lord for counſel in this arduous affair and time of danger." But theſe two motions were rejected by the majority of voices. Theſe jealouſies of the preſbyterians, leſt their church ſhould ſuffer a change, and be ſwallowed up by the church of England, were infuſed into them chiefly by the old ducheſs of Hamilton, who had great credit with them: And it was ſuggeſted, that ſhe and her ſon had particular views, as hoping, that, if Scotland ſhould continue a ſeparated kingdom, the crown might come into their family, they being the next in blood after king James's poſterity. The infuſion of ſuch apprehenſions had a great effect on the main body of that party, who could ſcarce be brought to hearken to, but never to accept of, the offers, that were made for ſecuring their preſbyterian government. On the other hand, a great part of the gentry of Scotland, who had been often in England, and had obſerved the protection, which all men had from a houſe of commons, and the ſecurity, which it procured againſt partial judges and a violent miniſtry, entered into the union with great zeal. The opening a free trade, not only with England, but with the plantations, and the protection of the fleet of England, drew in thoſe, who underſtood theſe matters, and ſaw there was no other way in view, to make the nation rich and conſiderable. Thoſe, who had engaged far into the deſign of Darien, and were great loſers by it, ſaw now an honourable way to be reimburſed; which made them wiſh well to the union, and promote it. But, that, which advanced it moſt effectually, and without which it could not have ſucceeded, was, that a conſiderable number of noblemen and gentlemen, who were in no engagements with the court (on the contrary, had been diſobliged and turned out of great poſts, and ſome very lately) declared for it. Theſe kept themſelves very cloſe and united, and ſeemed to have no other intereſt but that of their country, and were for that reaſon called the Squadrone. The chief of theſe were the marquis of Tweedale, the earls of Rothes, Roxburgh, Hadington, and Marchmont. They were in great credit, becauſe they had no viſible biaſs on their minds. Ill uſage had provoked them rather to oppoſe the miniſtry, than to concur in any thing, where the chief honour would be carried away by others. When they were ſpoke to by the miniſtry, they anſwered coldly, and with great reſerve; ſo that it was expected they would have concurred in the oppoſition; and, they being between twenty and thirty in number, if they had ſet themſelves againſt the union, the deſign muſt have miſcarried. But they continued ſilent, till the firſt diviſion of the houſe obliged them to declare; and then they not only joined in it, but promoted it effectually and with zeal.

There were great and long debates managed on the ſide of the union by the earls of Seafield and Stair for the miniſtry, and of the Squadrone by the earls of Roxburgh and Marchmont; and againſt it by the dukes of Hamilton and Athol, and the marquis of Annandale. The duke of Athol was believed to be in a foreign correſpondence, and was much ſet on violent methods. The duke of Hamilton managed the debate with great vehemence, but was againſt all deſperate motions. He had much to loſe, and was reſolved not to venture all with thoſe, who ſuggeſted the neceſſity of running, in the old Scots way, into extremities.

The topics [x] from which the arguments againſt the union were drawn, were the antiquity and dignity of their kingdom, which was offered to be given up, and ſold: They were departing from an independent ſtate, and going to ſink

[x] The proceedings more at large upon the three firſt articles, and ſome other particulars, are contained in the following extract:

The parliament having gone through the firſt reading of the articles, the court party moved, on the 1ſt of November, for a more particular conſideration of the ſame, in order to approve or diſallow them; and, to begin with the firſt, namely, That the two kingdoms ſhall, May 1, 1707, be united into one. But the oppoſite party moved alſo, That the farther conſideration of the articles ſhould be delayed for ſome conſiderable time, that the ſentiments of the parliament of England about the ſame might be known; and that the members of parliament might conſult thoſe, whom they repreſented. However, after ſome debate, theſe two motions were let fall, and it was agreed, that the firſt article ſhould be read; but that it ſhould be allowed the next ſitting to debate, whether the firſt article ſhould be concluded, by approving thereof, or not; or, if the parliament might not, before the concluding thereof, begin with, or conclude any other of the articles; and, accordingly, the firſt article was read. The next day, there was a debate, "Whether they ſhould proceed immediately to the conſideration of the firſt article of the union, or the ſecurity of the church?" When the vote was preſſed for giving the preference to the firſt article of the union, ſeveral members urged the unreaſonableneſs of agreeing to an union, till they had gone through the treaty, and found, that the terms thereof were for the intereſt of Scotland; for if they ſhould, in the firſt place, agree to the ſubverting the monarchy, and into a dependency on England; what conditions ſoever might be now ſpeciouſly offered, as a ſecurity to them, they could not expect that they ſhould be adhered to, or religiouſly maintained in a parliament, where ſixteen peers and forty-five commoners could not hold the balance, againſt above an hundred peers, and five hundred and thirteen commoners.

ſinking the parliament, which was the purport of the firſt article of the treaty of union; who could tell but the royal aſſent might be given thereto, and the parliament adjourned; and ſo the nation be united upon no terms, or, at leaſt, upon ſuch, as England ſhould afterwards pleaſe to grant? This argument carrying a great deal of weight, and the houſe appearing generally inclined to take the terms of the union previouſly into conſideration, the lord regiſter found an expedient to remove the difficulty, by propoſing a reſolve, "That the houſe, in the firſt place, proceed to take the firſt article of the treaty into conſideration, with this proviſo, that, if all the other articles of union were not adjuſted by the parliament, then the agreeing to and approving the firſt article ſhould be of no effect. And that, immediately after the firſt article, the parliament ſhould proceed to an act for the ſecurity of the doctrine, diſcipline, worſhip, and government of the church, as now by law eſtabliſhed." This being approved by the majority, the lord Belhaven made a long ſpeech, wherein he very pathetically lamented the miſerable and deſpicable condition, into which Scotland was going to fall by the union. In the next ſitting, after ſome debate, the marquis of Annandale preſented a reſolve againſt an 'incorporating union;' and many of the country party urged, that ſuch an union was altogether inconſiſtent with the honour of the Scots nation, and deſtructive of its intereſt and concerns, both civil and military. Some went yet farther, affirming, that this ſcheme would infallibly be an handle to any aſpiring prince to attempt the overthrow of the liberties of all Britain; for, if the parliament of Scotland could alter, or rather ſubvert its conſtitution, it might be made a precedent for the parliament of Great Britain to do the ſame: And that the repreſentatives of Scotland, being reduced to a poor miſerable condition, would entirely depend upon thoſe, who had the purſe; and, having ſhewn ſo little concern for the ſupport of their own conſtitution, it was not to be expected they would much regard that of any other. The duke of Hamilton ſaid, "What ſhall we, in half an hour, yield what our forefathers maintained with their lives and fortunes for many ages? Are here none of the deſcendants of thoſe worthy patriots, who defended the liberty of their country againſt all invaders; who aſſiſted the great king Robert Bruce, to reſtore the conſtitution, and revenge the falſhood of England, and uſurpation of Baliol? Where are the Douglaſſes and Campbels? Where are the peers; where are the barons, once the bulwark of the nation? Shall we yield up the ſovereignty and independency of the nation, when we are commanded by thoſe we repreſent, to preſerve the ſame, and aſſured of their aſſiſtance to ſupport us?" He urged a great deal more to the ſame purpoſe; but the court party called for a vote, which was thus ſtated, 'Approve of the firſt article of union, or not.' Before the queſtion was put upon it, the duke of Athol gave in a proteſt againſt 'an incorporating union, as contrary to the honour, intereſt, fundamental laws and conſtitution of the kingdom of Scotland, the birth-right of the peers, the rights and privileges of the barons and boroughs, and to the claim of right, property, and liberty of the ſubjects:' Which proteſt being read, his grace took inſtruments thereon, and the ſame was adhered to by the

Then the vote was put, 'Approve of the firſt article of the union in the term of the motion (beforementioned) yea, or not;' and it was carried 'approve' by a majority of thirty-four voices. Then it was moved, that the liſt of all the members of parliament, as they voted pro and con, be printed, which was agreed to. After which an overture for an act 'for ſecurity of the true proteſtant religion and government of the church, as by law eſtabliſhed, within the kingdom of Scotland,' was read, and afterwards paſſed by a majority of ſeventy-four votes. However the lord Belhaven gave in a proteſtation, importing, "That this act was no valid ſecurity to the church, in caſe of an incorporating union; and that the church could have no real and ſolid ſecurity by any manner of union, by which the claim of right was unhinged, the Scots parliament incorporated, and the diſtinct ſovereignty and independency entirely aboliſhed." To this proteſtation adhered the dukes of Hamilton and Athol, the marquis of Annandale, the earls of Errol, Mareſchal, Wigtoun, and others.

Two days after, the ſecond article of the union (namely, That the ſucceſſion to the monarchy of the united kingdom of Great Britain ſhall be to the princeſs Sophia and her iſſue) was read, and a motion was made, "That the parliament ſhould proceed to ſettle the ſucceſſion upon regulations and limitations in the terms of the reſolve mentioned in the minutes of the 4th of November, and not in the terms of the ſecond article of the union." This was warmly oppoſed by the court party, who urged, that the parliament of Great Britain would be more competent judges of what was neceſſary for the good of the united kingdoms, than that houſe. To which it was anſwered, "That any limitations made by the parliament were alterable by a ſubſequent parliament: But if, as was by ſome alledged, the articles of union were to be punctually obſerved in all future ages, and nothing to be altered in them, without demoliſhing the whole ſtructure; then it followed, that it was the general intereſt of all Britain to have ſuch limitations, as were neceſſary to be put upon the ſucceſſion to the crown, inſerted in the articles of union, particularly in what related to Scotland, whoſe repreſentatives could but act precariouſly in the parliament of Great Britain." In the height of this debate it was moved, "To addreſs her majeſty to lay before her the condition of the nation, and the averſion in many perſons to an incorporating union with England, and to acquaint her with the willingneſs of the houſe to ſettle the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line upon limitations; and, in order thereto, that a ſhort receſs might be granted." But this was oppoſed, and a vote demanded upon the ſecond article, which at laſt was ſtated. But, before voting, the earl Mareſchal gave in a proteſt for himſelf and all thoſe, who ſhould adhere to his proteſtation, importing, that no perſon could be deſigned a ſucceſſor to the crown of that realm, after the deceaſe of her majeſty, and failing iſſue of her body, who was ſucceſſor to the crown of England, unleſs that in the preſent ſeſſion of parliament, or any other ſeſſion of this or any enſuing parliament, during her majeſty's reign, there were ſuch conditions of government ſettled and enacted, as might ſecure the honour and ſovereignty of that crown and kingdom, the frequency and power of parliament, the religion, liberty, and trade of the nation from any Engliſh or any foreign influence. To this proteſtation, forty-ſix members having adhered, it was agreed, that a liſt of the members ſhould be printed, as they voted, 'approve, or not?' And that they who adhered to the proteſt, ſhould likewiſe be marked. Then the vote was put, 'approve, or not?' and it was carried, 'approve,' by fifty-nine votes.

On the 18th of November, the third article (namely, that both kingdoms ſhall be repreſented by one and the ſame parliament) falling under conſideration, the country-party endeavoured to ſhew the diſhonour and prejudice, that would ariſe to the Scots nation from this ſingle article, urging, "that thereby they did, in effect, ſink their own conſtitution, when the Engliſh would not allow the leaſt alteration in theirs: That the members of Scotland in the Britiſh parliament would bear ſo ſmall a proportion to the Engliſh, that it could not be expected, that the former ſhould ever be able to carry any thing, that ſhould be for the intereſt of Scotland, againſt ſo great a majority, who, though divided among themſelves about different parties, would yet unite againſt the Scots, to whom they all bore a natural antipathy. That in all nations there are fundamentals, which admit of no alteration by any power whatſoever. That the rights and privileges of parliament being one of theſe fundamentals among the Scots, no parliament, nor any other power, could ever legally prohibit the meeting of parliaments, or deprive any of the three eſtates of its right of ſitting or voting in parliament, or give up the rights and privileges of parliament; but that, by this treaty, the parliament of Scotland was entirely abrogated, its rights and privileges given up, and thoſe of the parliament of England ſubſtituted in their place. That, if the parliament of Scotland could alter their fundamentals, the Britiſh parliament might do the ſame; and if ſo, what ſecurity had the Scots for any thing ſtipulated in the treaty of union, with reſpect either to the repreſentation of Scotland in that parliament, or any other privileges and immunities granted to Scotland? That though the legiſlative power in parliament were regulated and determined by a majority of voices; yet the giving up the conſtitution, and the rights and privileges of the nation, was not ſubject to ſuffrage, being founded on dominion and property; and therefore could not be legally done, without the conſent of every perſon, who had a right to elect, and be repreſented in parliament. That, by this treaty, not only the conſtitution of the parliament in general was wholly altered, or rather given up, but the barons and boroughs were aggrieved in their particular rights and privileges. For ſuppoſing the twenty-ſecond article, which limits the number of Scots peers, barons, and boroughs, ſhould be rejected; yet, nevertheleſs, the barons and boroughs were ſtill deprived of their judicial authority, to which they had an undoubted right, and of which the parliament could not deprive their conſtituents, without their own conſent. That though the barons, for their own convenience, conſented to be repreſented by a certain number in parliament, yet they had as good a right to ſit, and vote, and adviſe their ſovereign, as the peers themſelves, whenever they pleaſed to reaſſume their power, of which the third and twenty-ſecond articles deprived them. And, laſtly, it was repreſented, that the Scots members being obliged to reſide ſo long in London

Scotland would be no more confidered as formerly by foreign princes and ſtates: Their peers would be precarious and elective: They magnified their crown, with the other regalia ſo much, that, ſince the nation ſeemed reſolved never to ſuffer them to be carried away, it was provided, in a new clauſe added to the articles, that theſe ſhould ſtill remain within the

to attend the Britiſh parliament, that alone were ſufficient to drain Scotland of all their money in ſpecie." And it was moved, "That the agreeing to the third article, in relation to the parliament of Great Britain, ſhould not be binding, nor have any effect, unleſs terms and conditions of an union of the two kingdoms, and particularly the conſtitution of the ſaid parliament, were finally adjuſted and concluded, and an act paſſed thereupon in the parliament; and that the ſaid terms and conditions be alſo agreed to and ratified by an act of the parliament of England; the conſtitution of the parliament of Great Britain being left intire, until the parliament came upon the twenty-ſecond article." It was moved alſo, to proceed to the conſideration of the fourth and other articles of union before the third; but it was carried to proceed to the conſideration of the third article. After a long debate, a vote was ſtated, 'Approve of the third article, in the terms of the motion relating thereto, or not?' And it was carried 'approve,' by a majority of thirty-one votes. But, before voting, the marquis of Annandale gave in a proteſt, and deſired, that the narrative of the 4th of that month of November might be prefixed thereto, being both together as follows: viz. "Whereas it evidently appears, ſince the printing, publiſhing, and conſidering the articles of treaty now before this houſe, that this nation ſeems generally averſe to the 'incorporated union,' in the terms now before us, as ſubverſive of the ſovereignty, fundamental conſtitution, and claim of right of this kingdom, and as threatning ruin to this church, as by law eſtabliſhed: And ſince it is plain, that if an union was agreed to in theſe terms by the parliament, and accepted of by the parliament of England, it would in no ſort anſwer the peaceable and friendly ends propoſed by an union, but would, on the contrary, create ſuch diſmal diſtractions and animoſities amongſt ourſelves, and ſuch jealouſies and miſtakes betwixt us and our neighbours, as would involve theſe nations into fatal breaches and confuſions. Therefore I do proteſt for myſelf, and in the name of thoſe, who ſhall adhere to this my proteſtation, that an incorporating union of the crown and kingdom of Scotland with the crown and kingdom of England, and that both nations be repreſented by one and the ſame parliament, as contained in the articles of the treaty of union, are contrary to the honour, intereſt, fundamental laws and conſtitution of this kingdom, is a giving up the ſovereignty, the birth-right of the peers, the rights and privileges of the barons and boroughs, and is contrary to the claim of right, property, and liberty of the ſubjects, and the third act of her majeſty's parliament, 1703, by which it is declared high-treaſon in any of the ſubjects of this kingdom, to quarrel, or endeavour by writing, malicious and adviſed ſpeaking, or open act or deed, to alter or innovate the claim of right, or any article thereof. As alſo that the ſubjects of this kingdom, by ſurrendering the ſovereignty of parliaments, are deprived of all ſecurity, both with reſpect to ſuch rights, as are by the intended treaty ſtipulated and agreed, and in reſpect of ſuch other rights, both eccleſiaſtical and civil, as are, by the ſame treaty, pretended to be reſerved to them. And therefore I do proteſt, that this ſhall not prejudice the being of future Scots parliaments and conventions, within the kingdom of Scotland, at no time coming." To this proteſt fifty-two members adhered. The next eighteen articles, from the fourth to the twenty-firſt, paſſed without any thing very remarkable; but, before the houſe came to the twenty-ſecond article, which ſettles the number of the repreſentatives of Scotland in the Britiſh parliament, duke Hamilton, having aſſembled the leading men of the party, who had long oppoſed the union, exhorted them, "Not to look back upon what might have been done amiſs by any amongſt them, but to go forwards, and now at laſt to unite their efforts to ſave the nation, which ſtood on the very brink of ruin." After all, who were preſent, had declared their concurrence, let the conſequences be what they would, he propoſed, "That the marquis of Annandale ſhould renew his motion for ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown upon the houſe of Hanover; and, as it was not to be doubted, but the ſame would be rejected, that then a proteſtation ſhould be entered and adhered to by all, who were againſt the union, who, immediately after, ſhould in a body ſeparate from the other members, and leave the houſe, never to return again. And that, in the next place, a national addreſs ſhould be forthwith ſigned by as many hands as poſſible, and diſpatched to the queen; urging, that, of all meaſures, this was the moſt likely to prevail with the Engliſh to let the union drop." And then he offered the draught of the intended proteſtation, which had been put into his hands by the marquis of Annandale, but was thought to have been drawn up by ſir James Stuart, the queen's advocate. The perſons preſent, moſt of whom were profeſſed Jacobites, having deſired a day or two to take the propoſal into conſideration before they came to a final reſolution, the duke of Hamilton was, in the mean time, at no ſmall pains to convince them of the reaſonableneſs of this counſel. The greateſt difficulty, with ſome, was the mentioning their concurrence to ſettle the ſucceſſion on the houſe of Hanover, which they ſaid was a kind of obligation upon them to have recourſe to that family, to protect them in oppoſing the union; whereas their deſign was to reſtore the pretender to the throne, which they thought the preſent ferment among the people would much advance. To this the duke of Hamilton returned, "That this could draw no obligation upon them to adhere to the intereſt of the houſe of Hanover, ſince they did not proteſt againſt the motion's being rejected; and, even ſuppoſing it were otherwiſe, it was not the firſt time they had made greater ſtretches, with a deſign, that good might come of it, and he hoped this would be the laſt. For, added he, this bold proteſtation, backed by the ſeparation, will not only confound the Engliſh, but likewiſe encourage our countrymen, and engage them to ſupport us. And, for my part, I am of opinion, that, if the Engliſh do not deſiſt from proſecuting the union, we muſt have recourſe to arms, and call over the king; nor do I doubt but the nation will concur with us, to ſave themſelves from utter ruin." By theſe arguments and conſiderations all were brought over, and at the next meeting declared their approbation, promiſing to adhere to the proteſtation, which, it was taken for granted, the duke of Hamilton would preſent; only the duke of Athol could by no reaſons be prevailed upon to adhere to the proteſtation, on account of the clauſe relating to the houſe of Hanover; but he engaged to join with the reſt in leaving the houſe, and concerting further meaſures. All things being thus adjuſted, and the next day appointed for the execution, great numbers of gentlemen and eminent citizens flocked that morning about the parliament-houſe, to wait the iſſue, and, in caſe of need, to aſſiſt the ſeparating members. But all their hopes were ſoon defeated; for the duke of Hamilton, pretending to be ſeized with a violent tooth-ach, refuſed to go to the houſe. Some of his friends having boldly expoſtulated with him about his fluctuating and ambiguous conduct, which bore ſo near a reſemblance to that of his grandfather, in the reign of king Charles I, he was at laſt prevailed with to go to the parliament-houſe; but, notwithſtanding all the preſſing inſtances his friends made to engage him to preſent the intended proteſtation, he ſtill refuſed to do it, and only promiſed to be the firſt adherer. So much time was therefore ſpent in this private conteſt among the cavaliers, that the opportunity was loſt, and, in a few days, great numbers of thoſe who had ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the union, left the houſe in deſpair; ſo that, when the twenty-ſecond article came to be read and debated, it met with little or no oppoſition. Only, before approving the firſt paragraph, Mr. George Lockhart of Carnwath entered a proteſt, with relation to the privileges of the barons; as the duke of Athol did another, relating to the ſeveral branches of that article; the earl of Buchan a third, with relation to the rights of the peers; ſir Walter Stuart of Pardouan a fourth, in behalf of the peers, barons, and boroughs; the earl of Errol a fifth, with relation to his hereditary office of high conſtable; and the earl of Mariſchal a ſixth, in relation to his hereditary office of earl marſhal of Scotland. The earl of Marchmont inveighed and proteſted in very ſevere terms againſt theſe proteſtations, as preſumptuous, illegal, unwarrantable, and ſeditious; after which, the firſt paragraph of the twenty-ſecond article was approved by a majority of forty voices; and then the ſecond paragraph, relating to the calling the repreſentatives of Scotland to the parliament of Great Britain, was alſo approved with ſome amendments.

On the 8th of January it was moved in parliament, that the proteſts given in the former ſitting by the duke of Athol, earl of Buchan, George Lochart of Carnwath, and Walter Stuart, ſhould be neither inſerted in the minutes, nor printed; and the earl of Marchmont gave in a proteſtation againſt theſe four proteſts, and the lord-chancellor, the marquis of Montroſs, preſident of the council, the duke of Argyle, the marquiſſes of Tweedale and Lothian, and moſt of the well-affected to the union, adhered thereto. The next day, the lord Balmerino gave in a proteſtation againſt that of the earl of Marchmont, to which the duke of Hamilton and his party adhered; and after ſome debate it was agreed, that none of theſe proteſts be inſerted at length in the minutes, or printed. but that they be all recorded in the books of parliament. Then, the third paragraph of the twenty-ſecond article being approved, the remaining part of the article was read, and after ſome reaſoning, and reading of the oaths, to which it relates, an oath was given in 'for an additional clauſe, for explaining the word limitation, mentioned in the oath appointed to be taken by Stat. 13. Will. III. Cap. 6;' as alſo an overture 'for exempting perſons in any office or employment in Scotland, from taking the oath of abjuration mentioned in the article.' A third overture was alſo given in for a clauſe, importing, "That, ſo long as the act appointing the ſacramental teſt ſhall continue in force in England, all perſons in public truſt, within the limits of Scotland, ſhall ſwear, and ſign a formula thereto ſubjoined, in manner, and under the penalty therein mentioned." After reading theſe three overtures, and reaſoning thereon, a vote was ſtarted, 'approve of the twenty-ſecond article of union as explained, or not?' But before voting it was agreed, that, notwithſtanding the vote, and that the article ſhould thereby be approved, it ſhould nevertheleſs be entire and free afterwards to proceed on the overtures next ſitting, and to the parliament to give their ſentiments thereon: And, it being thereupon moved to adjourn the vote for approving the article till next ſitting, a previous vote was ſtated, 'proceed or delay?' And it was carried, Proceed. Then the vote being put, 'Approve the twenty-ſecond article, as explained, or not,' it was carried 'approve.'

On the 10th of January, the overture 'for exempting perſons in any office or employment in Scotland from taking the oath of abjuration, mentioned in the twenty-ſecond article of union,' being read, and dropped, the overture 'for an additional clauſe to the twenty-ſecond article, for explaining the word limitation, mentioned in the oath appointed to be taken by 13 W. III. Cap. 6,' was again read, viz. "Like as it is declared, that, by the word limitation in the oath mentioned in the above article, is only underſtood, entail of the ſucceſſion, and not the conditions of government upon the ſucceſſor; and that all perſons of Scotland, who may be liable to take the oath, ſwear it in that ſenſe only." But, after ſome debate, the vote being put 'for adding the ſaid clauſe,' it was carried in the negative. Then the third overture, for a clauſe to be added to the twenty-ſecond article, mentioned in the minutes of the laſt ſitting, was again read in theſe terms: "And further it is agreed, that, ſo long as that part of the ſecond act, Anno 25, Cap. 20, appointing a 'ſacramental teſt,' ſhall ſtand and continue in force in England, all perſons in publick truſt, civil or military, within the limits of Scotland, ſhall ſwear and ſign the Formula underwritten, within ſix months after the commencement of the union; and all, who ſhall be admitted to any public truſt thereafter, ſhall, before the exerciſing their office of truſt, ſwear and ſubſcribe the ſame; to be adminiſtred by the lords of the privy-council, or any one of them, under the like penalties and diſabilities, as are provided by the foreſaid act, made in the parliament of England." The Formula was thus: "I, A. B. do ſincerely declare, in the preſence of God, that I own the preſbyterian government of the church, as by law eſtabliſhed in Scotland, to be a lawful government of the church; and that I ſhall never, directly nor indirectly, endeavour the ſubverſion thereof, nor any alteration in the worſhip, diſcipline, or government of the church, as by law eſtabliſhed: So help me God." But, after ſome debate, this clauſe was rejected by a majority of thirty-five voices. Then the twenty-third article of union was read, and, on the 13th of January, an overture was given in for adding a clauſe thereto, in theſe words: "With this expreſs prohibition, that none of the peers of Scotland ſhall have perſonal protection within Scotland, for any debt owing before the commencement of the union." As alſo another overture, for adding a clauſe, importing, That all the peers of that part of Great Britain, called Scotland, qualified according to law, ſhould, after the union, have the right to ſit covered in the houſe of peers of Great Britain, notwithſtanding that the right to give vote therein belong only to the ſixteen peers, who were ſummoned in the manner appointed by the preceding article." After reaſoning upon theſe two overtures, and upon two ſeparate motions, the firſt in relation 'to allowing all the peers of Scotland to ſit upon the trial of the peers of Britain;' and the other in relation 'to their precedency according to their patents;' the vote was ſtated in theſe terms, 'Approve the twenty-third article of union, or alter, reſerving intire the conſideration of the above two overtures, and whether the ſame ſhall be added to the article;' and it was carried, 'approve.' Then the firſt overture for the clauſe in relation to perſonal protection, and the ſecond clauſe 'in relation to all the peers of Scotland ſitting covered in the houſe of peers of Great Britain,' were debated, and both ſeverally rejected.

The next day, the twenty-fourth article was read; whereupon a memorial was given for Lyon king at arms, in relation to his precedency; which being read and debated, it was at laſt agreed, that his rank ſhould be left to her majeſty. There was another clauſe offered to be added to the twenty-fourth article, "That the crown, ſcepter, and ſword of ſtate, records of parliament, and all other records, rolls, and regiſters whatſoever, both public and private, general kingdom. They inſiſted moſt vehemently on the danger, that the conſtitution of their church muſt be in, when all ſhould be under the power of a Britiſh parliament: This was preſſed with fury by ſome, who were known to be the moſt violent enemies to preſbytery, of any in that nation: But it was done on deſign, to inflame that body of men by thoſe apprehenſions, and ſo to engage them to perſiſt in their oppoſition. To allay that heat, after the general vote was carried for the union, before they entered on the conſideration of the particular articles, an act was prepared for ſecuring the preſbyterian government: By which it was declared to be the only government of that church, unalterable in all ſucceeding times, and the maintaining of it was declared to be a fundamental and eſſential article and condition of the union; and this act was to be made a part of the act for the union, which, in the conſequence of that, was to be ratified by another act of parliament in England. Thus thoſe, who were the greateſt enemies to preſbytery, of any in the nation, raiſed the clamour of the danger that form of government would be in, if the union went on, to ſuch a heighth, that by their means this act was carried, as far as any human law could go, for their ſecurity: For, by this, they had, not only all the ſecurity that their own parliament could give them, but they were to have the faith and authority of the parliament of England, it being, in the ſtipulation, made an eſſential condition of the union: The carrying this matter ſo far was done, in hopes that the parliament of England would never be brought to paſs it. This act was paſſed, and it gave an entire ſatisfaction to thoſe who were diſpoſed to receive any; but nothing could ſatisfy men, who made uſe of this, only to inflame others.

The party, who oppoſed the union, finding the majority againſt them, ſtudied to raiſe a ſtorm without doors, to terrify them. A ſet of addreſſes againſt the union were ſent round all the countries, in which thoſe, who oppoſed it, had any intereſt. There came up many of theſe in the name of counties and boroughs, and at laſt from pariſhes. This made ſome noiſe abroad, but was very little conſidered there, when it was known, by whoſe arts and practices they were procured. When this appeared to have little effect, pains were taken to animate the rabble to violent attempts, both at Edinburgh and at Glaſgow. About two or three thouſand commoners came in arms to Dumfries, and publickly burnt the articles of union, and affixed on the market-croſs a declaration of their reaſons for ſo doing. Sir Patrick Johnſton, lord provoſt of Edinburgh, had been one of the commiſſioners, and had concurred heartily in the deſign. A great multitude gathered about the houſe, and were forcing the doors, on deſign, as was believed, to murder him; but guards came and diſperſed them. Upon this attempt, the privy-council publiſhed a proclamation, the next day, againſt tumults, and gave orders for quartering the guards within the town. But, to ſhew that this was not intended to over-awe the parliament, the whole matter was laid before them, and the proceedings of the privy-council were approved. Although no perſon of diſtinction appeared among the rioters, yet it was no difficult matter to gueſs from what quarter that diſturbance came, ſince, at the ſame time, that they inſulted the high-commiſſioner, and other well-wiſhers to the union, they attended the duke of Hamilton with loud acclamations, as he paſſed the ſtreets to and from the parliament. However, no other conſiderable attempt was made after this; but the body of the people ſhewed ſo much ſullenneſs, that probably, had any perſon of authority once kindled the fire, they ſeemed to be of ſuch combuſtible matter, that the union might have caſt that nation into great convulſions[y]. Theſe things made great impreſſions upon the duke of Queenſberry, and on ſome about him. He deſpaired of ſucceeding, and he apprehended, that his perſon might be in danger. A friend of his wrote to the lord-treaſurer Godolphin, repreſenting the ill temper general and particular, and warrants thereof, continue to be kept, as they are, in that part of the united kingdom, now called Scotland; and that they ſhall ſo remain in all times coming, notwithſtanding the union." Which, being read, was agreed to be added, and was accordingly ſubjoined, and the article, thus amended, read over and approved; as was alſo the twenty-fifth article, without any oppoſition.

On the 15th of January, the draught of an act, 'ratifying and approving the treaty of union of the two kingdoms of Scotland and England' was given in, and offered to be read: Whereupon it was moved, That the parliament ſhould firſt proceed to the conſtitution of the manner of electing the repreſentatives for Scotland to the parliament of Great-Britain; and either now determine that matter, or appoint a day for that end. After debate the vote was ſtated, "Proceed to the ratification of the treaty of union, and act for ſecurity of the proteſtant religion and preſbyterian church-government, or to the conſtitution of the manner of electing the repreſentatives of Scotland." But, before voting, it was agreed, that, in caſe it ſhould be carried to proceed to the ratification, the parliament, would, immediately after paſſing the act of ratification, proceed to the conſtitution of the manner of electing the repreſentatives for Scotland. Then the vote being put, it was carried to proceed to the ratification: After which, the draught of the act, 'ratifying, approving, and at length narrating the articles of union, as inlarged, explained, and amended, and the act of ſecurity of the proteſtant religion, and preſbyterian church-government,' was read; and, after ſome diſcourſe, a firſt reading was marked thereon. The next day, the act was read a ſecond time; and then the act 'for ſecurity of the proteſtant religion, and preſbyterian church-government, inſerted in, and ratified by that act, was touched with the royal ſcepter. Immediately after this, there was laid before the houſe a 'repreſentation and petition' of the church of Scotland, importing, "That being informed, that the parliament were paſſing an act of ratification of the articles of the treaty of union, declaring, That the parliament of England might provide for the ſecurity of the church of England, as they ſhould think expedient, to take place with the kingdom of England, and not derogating from the ſecurity provided for the church of Scotland: Which clauſe ſeemed to them not only to be like a blank, put into the hands of the parliament of England, to exact what they ſhould think fit, for ſecuring the hierarchy and ceremonies of their church; but alſo a conſent, that it be an article and fundamental of the union: They therefore beſought the high commiſſioner and the eſtates of parliament, that there be no ſuch ſtipulation or conſent for the eſtabliſhment of that hierarchy and ceremonies, as they would not involve themſelves, and the Scots nation, in guilt, and as they conſulted the peace and quiet of that nation both in church and ſtate." An Act for 'the ſecurity of the preſbyterian church government in Scotland,' having already been paſſed, this repreſentation was, by all ſober men, looked upon as frivolous and impertinent; and therefore, after the duke of Argyle had given in a proteſtation for his privilege of the firſt vote in parliament, which was oppoſed by a counter-proteſt from the duke of Hamilton, the 'act for ratifying and approving the treaty of union, &c.' was approved by a majority of one hundred and ten voices, and touched with the royal ſcepter.

[y] The common people are ſaid to have been ſo enraged, that they threatened to come up in a body to Edinburgh, and diſſolve the parliament. But none ſhewed more zeal on this occaſion than the weſtern ſhires, where a vaſt number of people, and chiefly the Cameronians, were willing to venture their all to oppoſe the union; for which purpoſe they had ſeveral meetings, divided themſelves into regiments, choſe their officers; provided themſelves with horſes, arms, and ammunition; mentioned the reſtoration of the king, as the only means to ſave their country; were ſo far reconciled to the northern parts, and epiſcopal party (whom they formerly hated on account of their different principles in religion) that they were inclined to concert meaſures with them, and had appointed correſpondents in all places throughout the kingdom to ſtrengthen and encourage their party, and to feel the pulſe of thoſe members of parliament, who were againſt the union. There was one Cunningham of Eekatt, who had been very forward in promoting the late revolution; but upon the peace of Ryſwick, the regiment, whereof he was major, being broke, he went to Darien, and, after the ruin of that enterprize, returning to Scotland, he lived privately and meanly at his country-houſe. He had made frequent applications for an employment, but though new levies were made, upon the war breaking out again, he could never obtain to be provided for in the army, which he aſcribed to his having been employed by the Darien company, and at which he was not a little diſguſted. As he waited for an opportunity to ſhew his reſentment, he was ſoon known to the weſtern agents, and, being of the preſbyterian principles, entirely truſted by them. Having concerted meaſures with Mr. Briſbane of Biſhoptown, Mr. Cochrane of Kilmoronock, and Mr. Lockhart of Carnwath, three ſtaunch cavaliers, who aſſured him, that the duke of Hamilton approved his deſign of bringing up the Cameronians to diſſolve the parliament, and that the duke of Athol readily undertook to cauſe his highlanders to ſecure the paſs of Stirling, to open a communication with the northern parts, major Cunningham took a progreſs through the weſtern ſhires, and, by his dextrous management, brought things to ſuch a conſiſtency, that ſeven or eight thouſand men, well armed, were ready to rendezvous at the town of Hamilton, in order to march forwards to Edinburgh under his command. But, a day or two before they were to meet, the duke of Hamilton, without acquainting any of thoſe who had concerted this deſign, ſent privately expreſſes through the whole country, ſtrictly requiring them to put it off till another time; ſo that not above five hundred, more forward than the reſt, came to the place appointed, which entirely broke major Cunningham's meaſures. What induced the duke of Hamilton to act as he did on this occaſion, the Scotch memorialiſt, who was privy to the deſign, leaves undetermined, acquainting us, "That ſome ſwore he had made his terms with the court; others ſaying, that he was afraid to venture, by reaſon of his eſtate in England; and that the only thing, that was alledged in his behalf, was, that he thought the nation was not in a condition to carry on ſuch an enterprize at that time, becauſe the Engliſh had ſent their troops to the borders, and more forces might ſoon be waſted over from Holland, and ſo the Scotch nation be undone." But Fletcher of Salton uſed to declare to his friends, that this conduct of the duke fully convinced him of his treachery to his party. This project of diſſolving the parliament, carried on by Cunningham, having miſcarried, the party bethought themſelves of another expedient to prevent the union, which was (according to a precedent in the minority of James the Fifth) to invite as many of the barons, freeholders, and heretors, as could poſſibly be got, to Edinburgh, that they might in a body attend the Lord High-Commiſſioner, and (by a prolocutor intreat his grace, either to lay aſide the intended union, or, at leaſt, to grant a receſs, until they had informed the queen of the preſent temper and diſpoſition of the nation, and obtained an order for calling a new parliament, to provide againſt the calamities that were like to enſue: And, whether, his grace granted, or refuſed this demand, they reſolved that a national addreſs, to that purpoſe, ſhould be ſigned, and forthwith ſent up to the queen. This counſel came firſt from the duke of Athol, and Mr. Fletcher of Salton; and, being reliſhed and recommended by the duke of Hamilton, was generally approved by the cavaliers, who acquainted their friends in the country with the deſign, and deſired them to come privately to Edinburgh, againſt a certain prefixed day. In the mean time, Mr. Henry Maul, brother to the earl of Panmure, was pitched upon for the prolocutor; and the form of an addreſs to the queen concerted and agreed to, by all who were in the ſecret; wherein they made it 'their moſt humble ſupplication to her majeſty, that ſhe would be graciouſly pleaſed to diſcountenance this treaty, and call both a new parliament and a general aſſembly of the church of that kingdom.' Againſt the day appointed, above five hundred gentlemen were actually come to Edinburgh, and many more were upon the road: But, the very next day, the duke of Hamilton acquainted thoſe in concert with him, That, unleſs they added a clauſe to the addreſs, intimating their readineſs to ſettle the ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover, he would by no means be concerned in it; urging, that, without ſuch a clauſe, the Engliſh tories, who (it was expected) would oppoſe the union in the Engliſh parliament, could have no foundation to go upon. This objection was no ſmall ſurprize to the cavaliers, who generally looked upon it as intended to break the deſign; ſince the duke of Hamilton could the nation was generally in, and moved for an adjourment, that ſo, with the help of ſome time and good management, thoſe difficulties, that ſeemed then inſuperable, might be conquered. The lord-treaſurer's anſwer was, that a delay was, upon the matter, laying the whole deſign aſide. Orders were given both in England and Ireland to have troops ready upon call; and, if it were neceſſary, more forces ſhould be ordered from Flanders. The French were in no condition to ſend any aſſiſtance to thoſe, who might break out; ſo that the circumſtances of the time were favourable. The lord Godolphin deſired therefore, that they would go on, and not be alarmed at the fooliſh behaviour of ſome, who, whatever might be given out in their name, he believed, had more wit than to ruin themſelves [y]. Every ſtep that was made, and every vote that was carried, was with the ſame ſtrength, and met with the ſame oppoſition; both parties giving ſtrict attendance during the whole ſeſſion, which laſted three months. Many proteſtations were printed, with every man's vote. In concluſion, the whole articles of the treaty were agreed to, with ſome ſmall variations.

The earl of Stair, who had all along exerted himſelf with great zeal in favour of the union, and who, though much indiſpoſed, came on the 7th of January to the Parliament-houſe, and maintained the debate upon the twenty-ſecond article, died ſuddenly the next night, his ſpirits being quite exhauſted by the length and vehemence of the debates. He was ſon of ſir James Dalrymple, formerly preſident of the ſeſſion, and afterwards created viſcount and earl of Stair. He was ſucceeded in honour and eſtate by his ſon the lord John Dalrymple.

As ſoon as the act for ratifying the treaty of union was paſſed, the next buſineſs, which the parliament went upon, was the preparing an act for ſettling the manner of electing the ſixteen peers and forty-five commoners, to repreſent Scotland in the parliament of Great Britain; and on the 22d of January the queſtion was put, whether the ſixteen peers ſhould be ſent by rotation or election? And it was carried by election. And then upon the queſtion, whether the election ſhould be by ballotting, or by open election? It was carried for the latter. It was alſo debated, what proportion the ſhires and boroughs ſhould have of the forty-five members, that were to ſit in the houſe of commons of Great-Britain; and it was agreed, that thirty ſhould be the number for the ſhires, and fifteen the number for the boroughs. It was reſolved, that the borough of Edinburgh, by itſelf, ſhould have one repreſentative; and then a ſcheme, dividing the boroughs into fifteen diſtricts, one of which was to have one repreſentative, was given in, read and approved.

On the 31ſt of January, the parliament proceeded to conſider the motion, for allowing the commiſſioners for the treaty of union their expences; and a reſolve was brought in, for allowing each noblemen twelve thouſand pounds Scots, and each other commiſſioner ſix thouſand pounds; their ſecretary four thouſand eight hundred pounds; and to each of the three accountants two thouſand four hundred pounds Scots, out of the equivalent, pari paſſu, with public debts, after the African Company: which, after ſome debate, was approved. Then it was moved and agreed, That the commiſſioners for the treaty in 1702, ſhould likewiſe be allowed their expences; viz. each nobleman five hundred pounds; each baron three hundred pounds; and each borough two hundred pounds ſterling: which ſums were declared to be a public debt, and referred to the committee to ſtate the ſame as ſuch. After this it was moved, "That no repreſentative to the parliament of Great-Britain, either for ſhire or borough, ſhould have any allowance for their charges in attending the ſame." But, this being adjourned to the next ſitting, on the 3d of February, it was then reſolved, "That nothing in relation to the expences of the repreſentatives of ſhires and boroughs, ſhould be inſerted in the act for ſettling the manner of electing the ſixteen Peers, and forty-five commoners." Then it was moved, "That at all meetings of the Peers for electing their repreſentatives, ſuch peers as were abſent, be allowed to vote by proxy; the parties being peers, and they and their conſtituents being qualified by taking the oaths required by law. And they the abſent peers might either vote by their proxies, or by ſending up a liſt ſubſcribed by them." And, after reaſoning thereon, it was carried for allowing proxies. Afterwards it was agreed, that the meeting of the peers, for the election, ſhould be at any place the queen ſhould appoint within the kingdom of Scotland; as alſo, that, in caſe of the deceaſe or promotion of any of the forty-five commoners, to be choſen by this ſeſſion of parliament to the parliament of Great-Britain, the diſtrict, for which he was a member, upon a writ directed to them for that effect, ſhould chuſe another in his place. And it was agreed likewiſe, that, in caſe of the deceaſe of any of the ſixteen peers, the peers ſhould meet and elect another in the room of the deceaſed, upon a writ directed to them for that purpoſe. Then it was moved, That ſuch peers of Scotland, who were alſo peers of England, who, after the union, ſhould be created peers of Great Britain, ſhould have no vote in the election of the ſixteen peers from Scotland to the parliament of Great Britain: and, after ſome debate, it was agreed, that nothing, in relation to this motion, ſhould be inſerted in the act. It was alſo agreed, that, when the commiſſioners for boroughs, who ſhould meet for electing their repreſentatives, ſhould happen to be equal, the preſident of the meeting ſhould have the caſting vote; and that the commiſſioners for the eldeſt borough ſhould preſide at the firſt meeting, and the commiſſioners for the other boroughs by turns, as the boroughs were then called in the rolls of parliament. After this, the act for ſettling the manner of election was approved and confirmed by the touch of the royal ſcepter. The ſame day, a proclamation concerning the coin was brought in from the committee, read, voted, and approved. A few days after, the houſe proceeded to elect the repreſentatives for Scotland in the firſt parliament of Great Britain; and, the three eſtates having retired to their uſual places, they returned, and reported their reſpective elections. As it was reſolved, that the parliament of England ſhould ſit out its period, which by the law for triennial parliaments, ran yet a year farther, in order to have another ſeſſion continued of the ſame men who had made the union (ſince they would more readily conſolidate and ſtrengthen their own work) ſo, upon this ground, it ſeemed moſt proper, that the members to repreſent Scotland ſhould be named by the parliament there. Thoſe, who had oppoſed the union, carried their averſion to the ſquadrone ſo far, that they concurred with the miniſtry in a nomination, in which very few of them were included, not above three peers, and fifteen commoners; ſo that great exceptions lay againſt many who were nominated to repreſent that kingdom: All this was very acceptable to the oppoſers of the union. [z] could not be ignorant, that the far greater part of the gentlemen, who were come up to Edinburgh, would never conſent to ſuch a clauſe. Two or three days being ſpent in endeavouring to make up this difference, the country gentlemen grew weary of ſpending their time and money to no purpoſe, ſo that many of them returned home; and the government, having been informed of the deſign, reſolved to put an effectual ſtop to it.

[y] Beſides the precaution uſed to preſerve the public tranquillity, and protect the well affected from the inſults of the male-contents, other methods were employed to remove the obſtacles, which the union met with in the houſe. The lord Godolphin prevailed with the queen to lend her Scots treaſury the ſum of twenty thouſand pounds, which the earl of Glaſgow is ſaid to diſtribute to the beſt advantage, and for which he, ſome years after, accounted with the commiſſioners of public accounts. Lockhart gives a liſt of the perſons, to whom the earl declared upon oath, he diſtributed the money.

For the LORDS,

The duke of Queenſbury, Loudoun,
The earl of Seafield, chancellor, Crawford,
Sutherland,

The remainder of the ſeſſion was ſpent, among other affairs, in examining the accounts of the African and Indian company, and providing for the due application of the equivalent. In diſpoſing of this ſum, great partialities appeared, which were much complained of, but there was not ſtrength to oppoſe them. The miniſtry, and thoſe who depended on them, moved for very extravagant allowances to thoſe who had been employed in this laſt, and in the former treaty; and they made large allotments, of ſome public debts, that were complained of as unreaſonable and unjuſt; by which a great part of the ſum was diverted, from anſwering the end for which it was given. This was much oppoſed by the ſquadrone; but as the miniſters promoted it, and thoſe who were to get by it, made all the intereſt they could to obtain it (ſome few of them only excepted, who, as became generous patriots, ſhewed more regard to the public, than to their private ends) ſo thoſe, who had oppoſed the union, were not ill-pleaſed to ſee this ſum ſo miſapplied: hoping, by that means, that the averſion, which they endeavoured to infuſe into the nation againſt the union, would be much increaſed; therefore they let every thing go as the miniſter propoſed, to the great grief of thoſe, who wiſhed well to the public [a].

The buſineſs of the ſeſſion being ended, the high-commiſſioner went to the parliament-houſe in great ſolemnity, being attended by the whole troop of life-guards, and all the nobility and gentry in their coaches, and, having touched with the royal ſcepter ſeveral acts, made the following ſpeech to the parliament:

My lords and gentlemen,

"THE public buſineſs of this ſeſſion being now over, it is full time to put an end to it. I am perſuaded, that we and our poſterity will reap the benefit of the union of the two kingdoms; and I doubt not, but, as this parliament has had the honour to conclude it, you will, in your ſeveral ſtations, recommend to the people of this nation a grateful ſenſe of her majeſty's goodneſs and great care for the welfare of her ſubjects, in bringing this important affair to perfection; and that you will promote an univerſal deſire in this kingdom, to become one in heart and affections, as we are inſeparately joined in intereſt with our neighbour nation.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I have a very deep ſenſe of the aſſiſtance and reſpect I have met with from you in this ſeſſion of parliament; and I ſhall omit no occaſion of ſhewing, to the utmoſt of my power, the grateful remembrance I have of it."

The parliament being adjourned to the 22d of April, the duke returned to the queen's palace in the ſame ſolemnity as he went to the houſe, and gave a ſplendid entertainment to the nobility and gentry. The day before, the draught of a letter from the parliament to the queen was brought in, voted, and approved; and the, duke having thus happily concluded this ſeſſion, and ſurmounted all the difficulties which he met with, he ſet out, a few days after, for London, where he arrived the 16th of April, being met ſeveral miles out of town by many noblemen and gentlemen in their coaches, to the number of above forty, and by near four hundred perſons on horſe-back. The next morning he waited upon the queen at Kenſington, where he was graciouſly received.

It was the general opinion, and perhaps the firſt reſolution of the court, that the parliament of England ſhould not ſit, till that of Scotland had finiſhed the affair of the union; but, that drawing into a great length, and the queen's occaſions not admitting of delays, the parliament of England, which, on the 21ſt of November, had been farther prorogued to the 3d of December, met that day at Weſtminſter; and the queen, being come to the houſe of peers with the uſual ſolemnity, made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I Hope we are all met together at this time with hearts truly thankful to Almighty God, for the glorious ſucceſſes, with which he has bleſſed our arms and thoſe of our allies through the whole courſe of this year; and with ſerious and ſteady reſolutions to proſecute the advantages we have gained, till we reap the deſired fruit of them in an honourable and durable peace.

"The goodneſs of God has brought this happy proſpect ſo much nearer to us, that, if we be not wanting to ourſelves, we may, upon good grounds, hope to ſee ſuch a balance of power eſtabliſhed in Europe, that it ſhall no longer be at the pleaſure of one prince to diſturb the repoſe, and endanger the liberties of this part of the world.

"A juſt conſideration of the preſent poſture of affairs, of the circumſtances of our enemies, and the good diſpoſition of our allies, muſt needs excite an uncommon zeal, and animate us to exert our utmoſt endeavours, at this critical conjuncture.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"As I am fully perſuaded you are all of this mind, ſo I muſt earneſtly deſire you to grant me ſupplies ſufficient for carrying on the war next year in ſo effectual a manner, that we may be able to improve every where the advantages of this ſucceſsful campaign. And I aſſure you, I ſhall make it my buſineſs to ſee all you give applied to thoſe ends with the greateſt care and management.

My lords and gentlemen,

"In purſuance of the powers veſted in me by act of parliament, both in England and Scotland, I appointed Commiſſioners to treat of an union between the two kingdoms. And though this be a work of ſuch a nature, as could not but be attended with great difficulties, yet ſuch has been the application of the commiſſioners, that they have concluded a treaty, which is at this time before the parliament of Scotland; and, I hope, the mutual advantages of an entire union of the two kingdoms will be found ſo apparent, that it will not be long before I ſhall have an opportunity of acquainting you with the ſucceſs, which it has met with there.

"Your meeting at this time being later than uſual, I cannot conclude, without earneſtly recommending to you to give as much diſpatch to the public affairs, as the nature of them will admit, it being of the greateſt conſequence, that both our friends and our enemies ſhould be fully convinced of your firmneſs, and the vigour of your proceedings."

This ſpeech was received with uncommon applauſe both within and without doors; and, two days after, each houſe, in a body, attended the queen with their congratulatory addreſſes. The lords, in particular, took norice of "the univerſal joy and ſatisfaction, upon the public declaration, which her majeſty, in concert with the ſtates-general, made to the miniſters of the other confederate princes, that no negotiations of peace ſhould be entered into, but in conjunction with all the members of the grand alliance: which generous method would prevent the indirect and dangerous practice of the common enemy; put a ſtop to clandeſtine and corrupt tranſactions; and muſt not only remove all preſent jealouſies from the allies, but create in them a laſting confidence and reliance on her majeſty's honour and juſtice." This was intended to keep the queen ſteady to the meaſures which had been ſuggeſted to her by the duke of Marlborough and the lord-treaſurer Godolphin, upon a well-grounded ſurmiſe, that Mr. ſecretary Harley, who had by this time, inſinuated himſelf very deep in the queen's confidence, endeavouring to infuſe pacific counſels; which were more agreeable to the queen's temper, and more ſuitable to his own ambitious deſigns. The commons, on their part, paſſed alſo a compliment on the miniſtry, by telling the queen, "That the experience they had of the prudent adminiſtration, and the great care and management in the application of the public aids, encouraged them to aſſure her, that they would chearfully give ſuch ſpeedy and effectual ſupplies, as, by the continuance of God's bleſſing upon her arms, might eſtabliſh the balance of power in Europe by a ſafe, honourable and laſting peace." To both theſe addreſſes, the queen returned very gracious anſwers.

Purſuant to their promiſe, the commons proceeded on the ſupply with all imaginable diſpatch. In leſs than a week they voted the neceſſary ſums for the fleet and army, granted an aid of four ſhillings in the pound upon all lands, and continued the duties upon malt. Upon preſenting theſe money-bills, the ſpeaker of the commons made a ſpeech to her majeſty, importing, "That as the glorious victory obtained by the duke of Marlborough at Ramillies was ſo ſurpriſing, that the battle was fought before it could be thought the armies were in the field; ſo it was no leſs ſurpriſing, that the commons had granted ſupplies to her majeſty, before her enemies could well know, that her parliament was ſitting." And the queen, on her part, made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein having repeated to them "her great ſatisfaction in their ſeveral addreſſes, in the zeal they had expreſſed in them for her ſervice, and the common cauſe of Europe, which could not fail of being a great encouragement to all their allies, and in the notice they had taken of the eminent ſervices of the duke of Marlborough; ſhe thanked the commons, in a very particular manner, for the more than uſual diſpatch of the bills of ſupply." In the cloſe of this ſpeech, the queen ſaid, "She ſuppoſed they would think it convenient to make ſome ſhort receſs during the holidays;" whereupon the lords adjourned to the 30th, and the commons to the 31ſt of December.

The queen cloſed the year with two triumphal proceſſions. At the requeſt of the city of London, ſhe ordered, that the ſtandards and colours taken at the battle of Ramillies, and which were lately brought from the Netherlands, ſhould be put in Guildhall, as trophies of that victory. A detachment of the horſeguards and horſe-grenadiers, and a battalion of the foot-guards, were drawn up on the parade in St. James's Park; and having received the colours and ſtandards, which had been laid up at Whitehall, they proceeded in the following manner: firſt, the troop of horſe-grenadiers; then the detachment of the three troops of the horſe-guards, twenty-ſix of the gentlemen in the center, carrying each a ſtandard taken from the enemy. The battalion of foot-guards cloſed the march, ſixty-three of the pikemen carrying each one of enemy's colours inſtead of their pikes. In this manner they marched through the park and St. James's Meuſe, where the queen was pleaſed to ſee them paſs by from the lady Fitzharding's lodgings; the guns in the park being fired at the ſame time; and ſo they proceeded down Pall-Mall, the Strand, &c. to Guildhall. The duke of Marlborough having been invited by the lord-mayor and court of aldermen to dine with them in the city, he went thither the ſame day about noon, accompanied by the lord treaſurer, and the dukes of Somerſet and Ormond, in one of the queen's coaches, and was followed by a train of other coaches in which were ſeveral of the nobility, the foreign miniſters, and other perſons of quality, with the generals, and other chief officers of the army. They were received at temple-bar by the city marſhal, and were conducted to Vintner's-Hall, where a ſplendid entertainment was provided for them; and they were attended, both going and coming, with great acclamations from the people [b].

The queen having, by proclamation, appointed a general thankſgiving to be obſerved on the laſt of December, for the great ſucceſſes of her arms, and thoſe of her allies, the laſt campaign, ſhe went to the cathedral of St. Paul's, attended by both houſes of parliament, the great officers of ſtate, the judges, and other public officers, with the ſame ſolemnity and ceremonies, as were uſed before after the victory gained at Ramillies, ſo that ſhe gave her ſubjects the joyful ſpectacles of two triumphs in one year. The biſhop of Saliſbury preached the ſermon upon this occaſion. The ſame day both houſes adjourned themſelves to the 7th of January, and at their meeting again the commons thanked the biſhop for his ſermon.

Hitherto every thing had gone very ſmoothly in both houſes of parliament; but on the 10th of January, the earl of Nottingham acquainted the houſe of peers, that he had ſomething of great conſequence to lay before them; and therefore deſired, that they would name a day to receive it in a full houſe. The lords having appointed the Tueſday following, and ordered their members in and about London to attend; the earl of Nottingham, in a ſet ſpeech repreſented to them, "That the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland was a matter of the higheſt importance, and a work of ſo much difficulty, that all the attempts that had been made towards it in the laſt century, had proved ineffectual. That, the parliament of Scotland having thought fit to ſecure the preſbyterian church-government in that kingdom, it became the wiſdom of the parliament of England to provide betimes againſt the dangers, with which the church by law eſtabliſhed, was threatened, in caſe the union was accompliſhed. And therefore he moved, that an addreſs be preſented to the queen, humbly to deſire her majeſty, that the proceedings, both of the commiſſioners for the treaty of union, and of the parliament of Scotland, relating to that matter, be laid before them." He was ſeconded by the earl of Rocheſter, who declared, "That he was for an union, and had been ſo for twenty years paſt; but that he had a few doubts in the matter, and therefore was for entering upon the debate of that important affair as ſoon as poſſible." The duke of Buckingham ſpoke to the ſame purpoſe, adding, "That the union of both kingdoms had been upon the anvil ſince the acceſſion of king James I. to the Engliſh throne; and as it could not be expected, that ſo weighty a matter, which took up ſo much time and labour before, ſhould now be compleated in a few days, therefore he was for taking it forthwith into conſideration."

The treaſurer Godolphin anſwered, "That this affair was not yet ripe for them to debate; and that they need not doubt, but that her majeſty would communicate to the parliament of England all the proceedings relating to the union, as ſoon as that of Scotland ſhould have gone through with it." The lords Wharton, Sommers, and Hallifax ſpoke on the ſame ſide, and urged, "That it was an honour to this nation, that the treaty of union ſhould firſt come ratified from the parliament of Scotland; and that then, and not before, was the proper time for the lords to take the ſame into conſideration." The other party finding, that they were too weak to carry a queſtion, the earl of Nottingham's motion was dropped.

[b] The creation and promotions at this time were as follows: Towards the middle of December the queen was pleaſed to create Henry, earl of Kent, lord-chamberlain of her houſhold, viſcount Goderick in the county of Hereford, earl of Harrold in the county of Bedford, and marquis of Kent. A few days after her majeſty was alſo pleaſed to create Robert, earl of Lindſey, lord great-chamberlain of England, marquis of Lindſey in the county of Lincoln: Evelyn, earl of Kingſton, marquis of Dorcheſter in the county of Dorſet; Thomas, lord Wharton, viſcount Winchendon in the county of Bucks, and earl of Wharton in the county of Weſtmoreland; John, lord Poulet, of Hinton St. George in the county of Somerſet, earl Poulet; Sidney, lord Godolphin, lord-high-treaſurer of England, viſcount Rialton, and earl Godolphin in the county of Cornwall; Hugh, lord Cholmondely, viſcount Malpas, and earl of Cholmondely in the county of Cheſter: Henry, lord Walden, ſon and heir apparent of Henry, earl of Suffolk, baron of Cheſterfield in the county of Eſſex, and earl of Bindon in the county of Dorſet; the lord-keeper, a peer of this kingdom by the name and title of William, lord Cowper, baron of Wingham in the county of Kent; and ſir Thomas Pelham, bart. likewiſe a peer by the name and title of lord Pelham, baron of Laughton in the county of Suſſex.

Though the grant of ſupplies went on quicker than was uſual, there was one particular to which great objections were made. When ſeveral accounts and eſtimates were laid before the commons, in relation to monies, either advanced to the Duke of Savoy and King Charles of Spain, or expended in the expedition under the earl Rivers, it was found that theſe extraordinary ſupplies amounted to about eight hundred thouſand pounds more than had been provided for by parliament. Some complained of this, and ſaid, if a miniſtry could thus run the nation into a great charge, and expect the parliament muſt pay the reckoning, this might have very ill conſequences. But it was anſwered, a miniſtry deſerved public thanks, who had followed our advantages with ſuch vigour: if any thing was raiſed without neceſſity, or ill applied, under pretence of ſerving the public, it was very reaſonable to enquire into it, and to let it fall heavy on thoſe who were in fault: but, if no other exception lay to it, than becauſe the matter could not be foreſeen, nor communicated to the parliament before thoſe accidents happened that occaſioned the expence, it was a very unjuſt diſcouragement, if miniſters were to be quarrelled with for their care and zeal: ſo it was carried by a majority of two hundred and fifty voices againſt one hundred and five, that the ſeveral ſums, for the extraordinary ſervices of the year 1706, had been expended for the preſervation of the duke of Savoy, for the intereſt of king Charles of Spain againſt the common enemy, and for the ſafety and honor of the nation. All the other ſupplies (and among them the equivalent for Scotland) were given and lodged on good funds, ſo that no ſeſſion of parliament had ever raiſed ſo much, and ſecured it ſo well, as this had done.

By this time the act of the parliament of Scotland, for ratifying the treaty of union, was ſent up to London. Upon which the queen (Jan. 28.) came to the houſe of peers, and made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"HAving acquainted you, at the opening of this ſeſſion, that the treaty for an union between England and Scotland, which had been concluded here by the commiſſioners appointed for that purpoſe, in purſuance of the powers given by the parliaments of both kingdoms, was then under conſideration of the parliament of Scotland, I can now, with great ſatisfaction, inform you, that the ſaid treaty has been ratified by act of parliament in Scotland, with ſome additions and alterations.

I have directed the treaty, agreed to by the commiſſioners of both kingdoms, and alſo the act of ratification from Scotland, to be laid before you; and I hope it will meet with your concurrence and approbation.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons.

"It being agreed by this treaty, that Scotland is to have an equivalent for what that kingdom is obliged to contribute towards paying the debts of England, I muſt recommend to you, that, in caſe you agree to the treaty, you would take care to provide for the payment of the equivalent to Scotland accordingly.

My lords and gentlemen,

"You have now an opportunity before you of putting the laſt hand to a happy union of the two kingdoms; which, I hope, will be a laſting bleſſing to the whole iſland, a great addition to its wealth and power, and a firm ſecurity to the proteſtant religion.

"The advantages, which will accrue to us all from an union, are ſo apparent, that I will add no more, but that I ſhall look upon it as a particular happineſs, if this great work which has been ſo often attempted without ſucceſs, can be brought to perfection in my reign."

The commons being returned to their houſe, the lord Coningſby, by the queen's command, preſented to the houſe the articles of union agreed upon by the commiſſioners, the act of parliament in Scotland for the ratification of them, and a copy of the minute-book of the proceedings of the commiſſioners, which were ordered to be printed. Then a motion being made by the tory party, and the queſtion being put, "That an addreſs be preſented to her majeſty, that ſhe would be pleaſed to give orders, that the minutes of the proceedings of the former commiſſioners, appointed in the firſt year of her reign to treat of an union, be laid before the houſe," it paſſed in the negative. It was afterwards reſolved, "That an addreſs be preſented to her majeſty, returning her the humble thanks of the houſe for her moſt gracious ſpeech that day to both houſes of parliament, and for communicating to this houſe the articles of union, and the act of parliament in Scotland for ratification thereof." Which addreſs being preſented by Mr. chancellor of the exchequer, the queen anſwered, "That ſhe was well pleaſed, that what ſhe had done was ſo much to the ſatisfaction of that houſe."

The treaty of union, and the proceedings relating to the ſame, having been likewiſe communicated to the houſe of peers, their lordſhips, upon the archbiſhop of Canterbury's motion, ordered a bill to be brought in for the ſecurity of the church of England; which being read a ſecond time on the 3d of February (the queen and prince being preſent) a queſtion was put, "Whether it ſhould be an inſtruction, by leave of the houſe to inſert in the bill the act made 25 Car. II. intitled, an act for the preventing dangers, which may happen from popiſh recuſants." Which was reſolved in the negative, by a majority of ſixty three voices againſt thirty three. After which their lordſhips went through the bill, by which all acts, paſſed in favour of the church, were declared to be in full force for ever; and this was made a fundamental and eſſential part of the union. Some exceptions were taken to the words of the bill, as not ſo ſtrong as the act paſſed in Scotland ſeemed to be, ſince the government of the church was not declared to be unalterable; but they were judged more proper, ſince, where a ſupreme legiſlature is once acknowledged, nothing can be unalterable. This bill had a quick paſſage through both houſes, and received the royal aſſent [c].

On the fourth of February, the commons, in a committee of the whole houſe conſidered of the articles of union, and act of ratification of the parliament of Scotland; and, Mr. Compton being choſen chairman, Mr. Charles Cæſar opened the debate, and raiſed ſome objections againſt the union. He was ſeconded by ſir John Packington, who made a ſpeech, importing, "That the buſineſs of the union, that was now before them, being of the higheſt importance, required the moſt deliberate conſideration. That, with relation thereto, people without doors had been, for a long time, tongue-tied by a ſpecial order of council; which not reaching them within theſe walls, he would very freely impart his thoughts about it. That, for his own part he was abſolutely againſt this incorporating union, which, he ſaid, was like marrying a woman againſt her conſent; an union, that was carried on by bribery and corruption within doors, by force and violence without." Many members taking offence at this bold expreſſion, which highly reflected both on her majeſty's, miniſters, and the Scots commiſſioners and parliament, ſir John Packington ſaid, "He was told, that in Scotland they ſaid that the union was carried on by bribery and force:" Adding, "That the promoters thereof, in thus giving up their independent conſtitution, had actually betrayed the truſt repoſed in them; and therefore he would leave it to the judgment of the houſe to conſider, whether, or no, men of ſuch principles were fit to be admitted to ſit amongſt them? That, among the many inconveniences and irreconcileable contradictions this union was liable to, he would only take notice of this material one, viz. that her majeſty, by the coronation-oath, was obliged to maintain the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed; and bound likewiſe by the ſame oath, to defend the preſbyterian kirk of Scotland in one and the ſame kingdom. Now, ſaid he, after this union is in force, who ſhall adminiſter this oath to her majeſty? It is not the buſineſs of the Scots who are incapable of it, and no well wiſhers to the church of England. It is then the part of the biſhops to do it. And can it be ſuppoſed thoſe reverend perſons will, or can, act a thing ſo contrary to their own order and inſtitution, as thus to promote the preſbyterian church-government in the the united kingdom?" He urged likewiſe, that the church of England being eſtabliſhed jure divino, and the Scots pretending, that their kirk was alſo jure divino, he could not tell how two nations, that claſhed in ſo eſſential a point, could unite: And therefore he thought it proper to conſult the convocation about this critical point." Colonel Henry Mordaunt, in oppoſition to ſir John Packington, ſaid, "That he knew of no other jure divino but God almighty's permiſſion: In which ſenſe it might be ſaid, that the church of England, and the kirk of Scotland, were both jure divino; becauſe God almighty had permitted, that the firſt ſhould prevail in England, the other in Scotland: And that the member, who ſpoke laſt, might, if he thought fit, conſult the convocation for his own particular inſtruction; but that it would be derogatory to the rights of the commons of England, to adviſe, on this occaſion, with an inferior aſſembly, who have no ſhare in the legiſlature." Little was ſaid in anſwer to this ſpeech, only ſome members moved, "That the firſt article of the treaty, which implies a peremptory agreement to an incorporating union, be poſtponed; and that the houſe ſhould proceed to the conſideration of the terms of that intended union, contained in the other articles." This motion being rejected by a great majority, ſeveral members of the high-church party went out of the houſe; whereupon the firſt, ſecond, third, and fourth articles of the treaty was read and approved without oppoſition; and on the 8th of February the commons in a committee of the whole houſe, went through and approved the remaining articles. The only objection raiſed by the tory party on this laſt occaſion was, that the commons went poſt-haſte in a buſineſs of the higheſt importance: to which it was anſwered, "That deliberation always ſuppoſeth doubts and difficulties; but, no material objections being offered againſt any of the articles, there was no room for delays[d]." However, as the debates about the union laſted but a few days (for they begun the 4th of February, and the whole treaty was approved the 11th) it was thought the commons did not interpoſe delay and conſideration enough, ſuitable to the importance of ſo great a tranſaction.

The debates were longer and more ſolemn in the houſe of lords. On the 15th of February (the queen being preſent) the lords having reſolved themſelves into a commitee of the whole houſe, and the biſhop of Sarum being called upon by the earl of Sunderland to take the chair, the debate on the firſt article was opened by the earl of Rocheſter, who acquainted the houſe, that he had many things to object to ſeveral articles, and ſaid, "It was all one to him, whether their lordſhips would pleaſe to receive them now, or when thoſe articles came more properly under their conſideration." The earl of Angleſy moved, "That the firſt article might be poſtponed, it being impoſſible for him to give his vote to it, before he knew, and was thoroughly ſatisfied, wherein this union was to conſiſt." Several others were of that opinion, among whom the biſhop of Bath and Wells ſpoke much to the ſame effect. The earl of Nottingham excepted againſt the name of Great-Britain, alledging, that it was ſuch an innovation in the monarchy, as totally ſubverted all the laws of England; and therefore moved, that the judges opinions might be aſked about it; and he was ſeconded by ſeveral other members. Hereupon the judges, being ſeverally aſked their opinions in that reſpect, unanimouſly declared, "They could not conceive, that it any ways altered or impared the conſtitution of this realm, whoſe laws, in their opinion muſt remain entirely the ſame, as well after, as before the union, except ſuch as were altogether inconſiſtent with, and directly contrary thereto." The lord Haverſham, who, of late years, had made himſelf famous for his ſet of ſpeeches on ſeveral occaſions, could not be ſilent on this, and therefore ſpoke as follows:

My lords,

"What my noble lord (Rocheſter) has mentioned to your lordſhips, occaſions my ſtanding up. I find myſelf under the ſame difficulties. I have ſeveral things to ſay to this matter of the union to your lordſhips, and it is very indifferent to me, when I offer them. I have a right of ſpeaking and entering my proteſt too, to any thing I diſlike; and I ſhall certainly find ſome time to do ſo, before this matter can paſs into a law. I am in your lordſhips judgment, whether you will allow me to ſpeak, what I have to ſay, now.

"My lords, with what diſpoſition I come hither, I hope may be evidenced by the motion, I made your lordſhips laſt year, for the repealing certain clauſes, that were grievous to Scotland. I would do any thing that were for the benefit and good of both nations.

"Theſe articles come to your lordſhips with the greateſt countenance of authority, that, I think, it is poſſible any thing can come. Your commiſſioners have agreed to them; the Scots parliament has, with ſome few amendments, ratified them, and the queen herſelf from the throne approves of them. And yet, you muſt give me leave to ſay, that authority, though it be the ſtrongeſt motive to incline the will, is the weakeſt argument in all the world to convince the underſtanding. It is the argument of the church of Rome makes uſe of for their ſuperſtitious worſhip, where there are ten Ave Maria's to one Pater Noſter; juſt as unreaſonable as if ten times the application and addreſs was made to a ſhe-favourite, as to the perſon of the ſovereign, which is a kind of ſtate-idolatry.

"I would not my lords, be miſunderſtood, as if I were againſt an union. A fœderal union, an union of intereſt, an union in ſucceſſion, is what I always ſhall be for. Nay, were it, whether a people inhabiting the ſame iſland, ſpeaking the ſame language, and having the ſame religion, ſhould be all under one and the ſame form of policy and government, I cannot ſee how any man could be againſt it. But this is a mater of a quite different nature: It is, whether two nations independent in their ſovereignties, that have their diſtinct laws and intereſts, and what I cannot forget, their different forms of worſhip, church-government, and order, ſhall be united into one kingdom. An union made up, in my opinion, of ſo many miſmatched pieces, of ſuch jarring, incongruous ingredients, that, ſhould it ever take effect, I fear that it would carry the neceſſary conſequence of a ſtanding power and force, to keep us from falling aſunder, and breaking in pieces every moment. For, as my lord Bacon well obſerves (whom I take to be a very great man, though ſometimes the courtier got the better of the philoſopher) 'an unity, ſays he, that is pieced up by a direct admiſſion of contraries in the fundamental points of it, is like the toes of Nebuchadnezzar's image, which were made of iron and clay;' they may cleave together, but can never incorporate.

"Another reaſon, why I am againſt an incorporating union, is, for the ſake of the old Engliſh conſtitution, juſtly allowed to be the moſt equal and beſt-poized government in all the world, the peculiar excellency of which lies in that well-propotioned diſtribution of powers, whereby the greatneſs of the monarch, and the ſafety of the people, are at once provided for; and it is a maxim in all policy, that the ſureſt way to preſerve any government is by a ſtrict adherence to its principles. So that, whilſt this balance of power is kept equal, the conſtitution is ſafe; but who can anſwer what alteration ſo great a weight, as ſixty one Scots members, and thoſe too returned by a Scots privy-council, when thrown into the balance, may make?

"Beſides, my lords, I muſt own I am apprehenſive of the precedent, and know not how far it may be carried hereafter, or what alteration future parliaments may think fit to make. It is evident by the two and twentieth article, that above an hundred Scots peers, and as many commoners, are excluded from ſitting and voting in the Britiſh parliament, who perhaps as little thought of being ſo a year or two ago, as any of your lordſhips do now; for they had as much right by inheritance of ſitting there, as any one lord in this houſe has of ſitting here; and that right too as well and as ſtrongly fenced and ſecured to them by the fundamental laws of their kingdom, by claim of right, and act of parliament, which made it treaſon to make any alteration in the conſtitution of that kingdom; and yet have not they loſt their privilege? And what one ſecurity has any peer of England, by the laws of this land, to his right and privilege of peerage, that thoſe lords had not? My lords the biſhops have been once voted out of this houſe by the temporal lords already; and who knows what queſtion may come hereafter? I will venture my life in defence of the church of England; and yet at the the ſame time own myſelf an occaſional conformiſt. But if my lords the biſhops will weaken their own cauſe, ſo far as to give up the two great points of epiſcopal ordination and confirmation; if they will approve and ratify the act for ſecuring the preſbyterian church-government in Scotland, as the true proteſtant religion and purity of worſhip; they give up that, which has been contended for between them and the preſbyterians this thirty years, and, which I will undertake to prove to my lords the biſhops, has been defended by the greateſt and learnedeſt men in the church of England. I hope, when it is proper, my lords will pleaſe to give ſome light to one, who deſires inſtruction, that I may not ignorantly do any thing to their prejudice in this matter.

"There is anotherreaſon why I am againſt this union, becauſe I cannot think it an entire union. The exempting articles, I mean the twentieth article, whereby heritable offices and ſuperiorities are reſerved; and alſo the one and twentieth; both which Oliver, by an act of ſtate was ſo wiſe as to aboliſh; eſpecially their act for ſecuring their preſbyterian church-government and general aſſemblies, ſeem to me like thoſe little clouds, in a warm calm ſummer's day, that are generally the ſeeds and attractives of aproaching tempeſt and thunder. I the rather take notice of theſe, becauſe, though the articles of union are ratified by the Scots parliament, yet the bulk and body of that nation ſeem to be againſt them. Have not the murmurs of the people there been ſo loud, as to fill the whole nation? And ſo bold too, as to reach even to the doors of the parliament? Has not the parliament itſelf thought fit to ſuſpend their beloved clauſe in their act of ſecurity, for arming their people during the ſeſſion? Nay, has not the government, by advice of parliament, ſet out a proclamation, which I have here in my own hand, pardoning all ſlaughter, blood-ſhed, maiming, &c. that is committed upon any, who are found in any tumults there, and diſcharging all proſecution for the future? I do not mention this to find fault with any thing, that is done in Scotland, but only to ſhew to your lordſhips, that when ſuch an unuſual proclamation as this is ſet out by advice of parliament, and cannot ſtay the forms of a law; when we know, that, upon extraordinary occaſions, a bill may be read three times in one day; ſure, my lords, it ſhews a great ferment, that requires ſo very ſpeedy an application. After all, has not what we deſire, I mean their being upon the ſame foot of ſucceſſion with us, being offered without this union? In ſhort, my lords, I think an incorporating union one of the moſt dangerous experiments to both nations; in which, if we happen to be miſtaken, however we may think of curing things hereafter, the error is irretrievable.

"My lords, this is the laſt time, that I believe I ſhall ever trouble your lordſhips in an Engliſh parliament: give me leave therefore to ſay but one word.

"In king Charles the firſt's time the cavaliers were the perſons, that ventured their lives, and loſt their eſtates to ſave him. And, in king Charles the ſecond's time, they were forgot and left ſtarving. At the reſtoration the preſbyterians were as zealous for that as any men whatever, and none more perſecuted all his reign. Towards the later end of that reign, the biſhops threw out the bill of excluſion, and king James put them into the tower. At the revolution, the Londonderry men, &c. were the perſons, that made the firſt and nobleſt ſtop to king James in Ireland; and I myſelf have fed ſome of them at my own table, when they were ſtarving with the greateſt commendations and promiſes in their pockets, which I have ſeen under king William's own hand. In the laſt reign every body knows, who they were that made their moſt conſtant court at St. James's; and we ſee in what favour they are at preſent.

"Now there is a great deal of zeal in this union. I wiſh, from my zeal, that the advantages may attend it of tranquillity and ſecurity, power, peace, and plenty, as is intended by it. But yet it is poſſible men may be miſtaken. I will not ſay they will ever repent of it; but I will take leave to ſay what has been formerly ſaid in this place, That what has been may be."

It may here be obſerved, that to all the objections, that were offered againſt the union, this general anſwer was made, that ſo great a thing, as the uniting the whole iſland into one government, could not be compaſſed but with ſome inconveniences: But, if the advantage of ſafety and union was greater than thoſe inconveniences, then a leſſer evil muſt be ſubmitted to.

The debate being over, the queſtion was put, Whether the conſideration of the firſt article of the treaty of union ſhould be poſtponed till after the other articles had been examined? But it was carried in the negative by a majority of ſeventy-two voices againſt twenty-two; and ſo the firſt ſix articles were read and approved, and the conſideration of the reſt adjourned to the 19th of February, when the lord North and Grey, obſerved, with relation to the ninth article, "The ſmall and unequal proportion, which Scotland was to pay to the land-tax; urging that Wales, as poor a country every whit as that, and of a much leſs extent, paid to the full as much again, and yet ſent not much more than half the number of repreſentatives in parliament, which were granted to Scotland; and for that reaſon, his lordſhip ſaid he could not agree to this article." He was anſwered by lord Halifax, "That the number of repreſentatives was no rule to go by, ſince there was the county of Cornwall in England, that paid not near ſo much towards the land-tax as that of Glouceſter, and yet ſent almoſt five times as many members to parliament as the other did. That it was very true, the quota of Scotland was very ſmall and unequal, in compariſon to what was paid in England; but that the Engliſh commiſſioners could not induce the Scots ones to agree to any more, upon account of ſeveral impoſſibilities on their ſide. That we could not expect to reap the like advantages of every article of the treaty; and that, if they had the better of us in ſome few, we were infinitely recompenſed by the many advantages, which did accrue to us from the whole." Here again the houſe divided on this article, there being ſeventy for it, and twenty-three againſt it: and ſo, having run over the four following articles, the conſideration of the reſt was further adjourned to the 21ſt of February, when (the queen being preſent) the debate chiefly ran upon the fifteenth article. The earl of Nottingham obſerved, that it conſiſted of two parts, a certain grant of money, and the application thereof, in reference to which he ſaid, "That it was highly unreaſonable, that the Scots, who were by the treaty let into all the branches of our trade, and paid ſo little towards the ſupport of the government, and of a moſt expenſive and bloody war, ſhould moreover have an equivalent of three-hundred and ninety-eight thouſand and eighty-five thouſand pounds given them for coming into this treaty. His lordſhip inſiſted much upon that argument, and took notice, as to the diſpoſal of this equivalent, that part of it, which was to be given to the Darien company, was ſo ordered, as that it might be ſwallowed up by a few perſons, without any particular regard to the indemnifying every private ſufferer in that unhappy enterprize." The lord Halifax anſwered, "That this equivalent could not be looked upon as a gift, but as an actual purchaſe of the Scots revenue and cuſtoms, which, by this union, were to be applied to the payment of the debts on England; and that they were no more gainers by it, than the Engliſh were by the ſale of annuities at fifteen or ſixteen years purchaſe. That as to the diſpoſal of the money, it being their own, it was but reaſonable they ſhould have the liberty of applying the ſame, as they thought moſt convenient, the Engliſh commiſſioners being no ways concerned therein, whoſe care nevertheleſs, and great prudence had been ſuch, that they made proviſion it ſhould not be diſpoſed of but by certain commiſſioners, who ſhould be accountable for the ſame to the parliament of Great Britain." Then their lordſhips proceeded as far as the nineteenth article, and ſo adjourned to the 24th of February, (the queen being likewiſe preſent) the lord Thanet, on the twentieth article, acquainted their lordſhips, "That, himſelf having an heritable office here in England, by being perpetual ſheriff of the county of Weſtmorland, he ſhould be glad, with their lordſhips leave, to have the opinion of the judges about the preſervation of that his right, there being no proviſion made in this article for heritable offices in England." The lord chamberlain ſeconded him in that motion, ſaying, "He had the honour likewiſe of having ſuch an heritable office, about the preſervation whereof he had the very ſame doubts and ſcruples with the noble peer, who ſpoke laſt." Whereupon it was agreed, that the judges ſhould deliver their opinion about it, which they did, and their anſwers were much the ſame with what they had declared to the houſe to be their opinion with reſpect to the firſt article.

The earl of Rocheſter, after reading the twenty-ſecond article, declared, "That he looked upon it as incongruous, contradictory to, and inconſiſtent with itſelf. That there were ſixteen peers to be returned to the houſe of lords, in the parliament of Great-Britain, who were peers and no peers. That, being all peers by right of inheritance, they were, nevertheleſs, made here elective, which he took to be diveſting them of their peerage; becauſe, not being ſure of being always elected to every parliament of Great-Britain, they conſequently muſt loſe, when left out, the benefit of ſitting fitting in parliament, which was ever deemed an inſeparable right of the peerage. The reſt of the nobility of Scotland, to the number of above a hundred, were thereby manifeſtly injured; and that, for his part, he wondered very much, how the Scots came to accept of ſuch unreaſonable conditions; or how their lordſhips could entertain the thoughts of permitting ſuch peers by election to ſit among them." The lords Nottingham, North and Grey, and Guernſey very much inforced this topic, adding, "That, as one might very well ſuppoſe, that thoſe Scots peers would be ſuch, as were addicted to the kirk, it might prove of dangerous conſequence to the church of England." The earl of Warton replied, "That, though they were all never ſo much of the kirk party, yet there was no reaſon to fear, but they would alſo be very well diſpoſed for the church of England, and ſtand up in its defence on all occaſions, ſince there were even ſome ſitting among their lordſhips, who would venture their lives for the church of England, and yet openly declared themſelves to be at the ſame time occaſional conformiſts." The lord Haverſham, rightly judging, that he was hinted at by the earl, ſtood up to inform the houſe, what he underſtood by an occaſional conformiſt, in which explanation he appeared ſomewhat embarraſſed; for after having made a long encomium on the epiſcopal order, which he took to be the beſt and moſt conformable to primitive chriſtianity, he gave no leſs commendations to all the proteſtant churches abroad, and to the kirk of Scotland itſelf in particular, which, he ſaid was a true proteſtant church." The biſhop of Bath and Wells declared, "That, for his part, he was altogether againſt this union, though he could wiſh from his heart it had been compleated an hundred years ago, becauſe all the ferment and diſcords, which now were likely to inſue upon it, would, by this time have had their courſe. That he could no better compare it, than to the mixing together ſtrong liquors of a contrary nature in one and the ſame veſſel, which would go nigh being burſt aſunder by their furious fermentation: that their bench was always reckoned the dead weight of the houſe; but that the ſixteen Scots peers, being admitted to ſit therein, would more effectually be ſo, eſpecially in any future debates relating to the church, towards which they could no ways be ſuppoſed to be well-affected; and therefore he was humbly of opinion, that ſome proviſion might be made for debarring them of their votes in any church-matter, that ſhould hereafter come in agitation." To all this, and much more that was alledged on account of the danger of the church, when ſo many votes of perſons tied to preſbytery were admitted to a ſhare in the legiſlature, it was anſwered by the lords Sommers, Hallifax, and others, that the chief dangers, the church was in, were from France and from popery. ſo that whatſoever ſecured us from theſe, delivered us from our juſteſt fears. Scotland lay on the weakeſt ſide of England, where it could not be defended, but by an army: the coaleries on the Tine lay expoſed for ſeveral miles, and could not be preſerved, but at a great charge, and with a great force: If a war ſhould fall out between the two nations, and if Scotland ſhould be conquered, yet, even in that caſe, it muſt be united to England, or kept under by an army: The danger of keeping up a ſtanding force, in the hands of any prince, and to be modelled by him (who might engage the Scotch to join with that army and turn upon England) was viſible: and any union after that would look like a force, and ſo could not be laſting; whereas all now was voluntary. As for church-matters, there had been ſuch violence uſed by all ſides in their turns, that none of them could reproach the others much, without having it returned upon them too juſtly. A ſofter management would lay thoſe heats, and bring men to a better temper: the cantons of Switzerland, though very zealous in their different religions, yet were united in one general body: The dyet of Germany was compoſed of men of three different religions: So that ſeveral conſtitutions of the churches might be put under one legiſlature; and, if there was a danger of either ſide, it was much more likely that five hundred and thirteen would be too hard for forty-five, than that forty-five would maſter five hundred and thirteen; eſpecially when the crown was on their ſide: And there were twenty-ſix biſhops in the houſe of lords, to outweigh the ſixteen votes from Scotland. The debate being over, the twenty-ſecond article was approved by a majority of ſeventy-one votes againſt twenty-two; and the remaining articles were likewiſe approved. Upon the then reading the laſt, the earl of Abingdon moved, that the judges opinion might be aſked, what laws would be repealed by this union, and what would remain in force; but that motion was rejected. Then the earl of Nottingham ſtood up, and begged their lordſhips pardon "for having troubled them almoſt to every article, excuſing himſelf, by urging, that they were ſuch material objections occuring to him, as in conſcience he thought himſelf obliged to lay before the houſe. That as ſir John Maynard made this compliment to the late king at the revolution, 'That, having buried, upon account of his great age, all his contemporaries in Weſtminſter-hall, he was afraid, if his majeſty had not come in that very juncture of time, he might have likewiſe outlived the very laws themſelves;' ſo, if this union did paſs, as he had no reaſon to doubt but it would moſt certainly paſs, he might, with as much reaſon, and as juſtly affirm, he had outlived all the laws, and the very conſtitution of England:" Concluding with a prayer to God, "to avert the dire effects, which might probably inſue from ſuch an incorporating union." Three days after, the biſhop of Sarum reported to the houſe of lords the reſolutions of their grand committee, approving the treaty of union, which were agreed to by a great majority; but ſeveral peers entered their proteſts, ſome againſt all, others, againſt ſome of the articles [e].

(e) They were as follow:

We diſſent to every one of the twenty-five reſolutions.

Granville, Haverſham, Staweell.

I diſſent to the four laſt reſolutions, having not been preſent at the paſſing the others.

Geo. Bath and Wells.

I diſſent to every one of the twenty-five reſolutions, except the ſecond.

Beaufort.

I diſſent to the firſt, fourth, fifth, ſixth, ninth, fifteenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, twenty-firſt, twenty-ſecond, and twenty-fifth reſolutions.

Diſſentient' To the ninth reſolution.

Becauſe we humbly conceive the ſum of forty-eight thouſand pounds, to be charged on the kingdom of Scotland, as the quota of Scotland, for a land-tax, is not proportionable to the four ſhillings aid granted by the parliament of England; but if, by reaſon of the preſent circumſtances of the kingdom, it might have been thought it was not to bear a greater proportion at this time, yet we cannot but think it unequal to this kingdom, that it ſhould be agreed, that whenever the four ſhillings aid ſhall be enacted by the parliament of Great-Britain, to be raiſed on land in England, that the forty-eight thouſand pounds, now raiſed on Scotland, ſhall never be increaſed in time to come, when the trade of that kingdom ſhould be extremely improved, and conſequently the value of their land proportionably raiſed, which, in all probability, it muſt do, when this union ſhall have taken effect.

North and Grey, Rocheſter, Howard, Leigh, Guilford.

Diſſentient' To the fifteenth reſolution.

Becauſe we humbly conceive nothing could have been more equal on this head of the treaty, than that neither of the kingdoms ſhould have been burdened with the debts of the other, contracted before the union; and if that propoſal, which we find once made in the minutes of the treaty, had taken place, there would have been an occaſion to have employed the revenues of the kingdom of Scotland towards the payment of the debts of England; thoſe revenues might have been ſtrictly appropriated to the debts of the kingdom, and to any other uſes within themſelves, as ſhould have been judged requiſite; and there would have been no need of an equivalent of very near four hundred thouſand pounds to be raiſed on England, within this year, for the purchaſe of thoſe revenues in Scotland, which, however it may prove to be but a reaſonable bargain, upon a ſtrict calculation, there does not ſeem to have been a neceſſity juſt now to have raiſed ſo great a ſum, when this kingdom is already burdened with ſo vaſt ones for neceſſary charges of the war.

Rocheſter, North and Grey, Guilford, Leigh.

Diſſentient' To the twenty-ſecond reſolution.

Becauſe we humbly conceive, in the firſt place, that the number of ſixteen peers of Scotland is too great a proportion to be added to the peers of England, who very rarely conſiſt of more than an hundred attending lords in any one ſeſſion of parliament; and, for that reaſon, we humbly apprehend, ſuch a number as ſixteen may have a great ſway in the reſolutions of this houſe, of which the conſequence cannot now be forſeen.

In the ſecond place, we conceive the lords of Scotland, who by virtue of this treaty, are to ſit in this houſe, being not qualified as the peers of England are, muſt ſuffer a diminution of their dignity to ſit here on ſo different foundations, their right of ſitting here depending entirely on an election, and that from time to time during the continuance of one parliament only; and, at the ſame time, we are humbly of opinion, that the peers of England, who ſit here by creation from the crown, and have a right of ſo doing in themſelves for their heirs by that creation for ever, may find it an alteration in their conſtitution, to have lords added to their number, to ſit and vote in all matters brought before a parliament, who have not the ſame (right) of their ſeats in parliament, as the peers of England have.

Buckingham, North and Grey, Leigh, Rocheſter, Guildford.

We diſſent to the reſolution of paſſing the laſt article, becauſe, there being no enumeration of what laws are to be repealed, it is conceived too great a latitude of conſtruction thereupon is left to the judges.

Abingdon, Leigh, North and Grey, Guilford.

The

The ſeveral articles of the union being thus agreed to by both houſes, a bill was ordered to be brought in to enact it, which was prepared by ſir Simon Harcourt, the ſolicitor-general, with ſo particular a contrivance, as to cut off all debates. The preamble was a recital of the articles, as they paſſed in Scotland, together with the acts made in both parliaments for the ſecurity of their ſeveral churches; and in concluſion there came one enacting clauſe, ratifying all. This put thoſe upon great difficulties, who had reſolved to object to ſeveral articles, and to inſiſt on demanding ſome alterations in them: they could not object to the recital, it being merely matter of fact; and they had not ſtrength enough to oppoſe the general enacting clauſe; nor was it eaſy to come at particulars, and to offer proviſo's relating to them. The matter was carried on with ſuch zeal, that it paſſed the houſe of commons, before thoſe who intended to oppoſe it had recovered themſelves out of the ſurpriſe, under which the form, it was drawn in had put them. The bill was carried there by a majority of two hundred and ſeventy-four voices againſt a hundred and ſixty, who were for rejecting it [f]. The bill was on the firſt of March, carried by Mr. Spencer Compton to the houſe of lords, who gave it a quick diſpatch but, upon the third reading, the lord North and Grey offered a rider to be added to it, importing, "That nothing, in this ratification contained, ſhould be conſtrued to extend to an approbation or acknowledgement of the truth of the preſbyterian way of worſhip, or allowing the religion of the church of Scotland to be what it was ſtiled, the true proteſtant religion." After a debate, the queſtion was put, "Whether the rider ſhould be read a ſecond time, and it was carried in the negative by fifty-five voices againſt twenty-nine; upon which ſeveral lords entered their diſſent [g]. Then the queſtion being put, Whether this bill ſhould paſs? It was reſolved in the affirmative by a great majority; but ſeveral peers entered their proteſts againſt it [h].

When the queen came to the houſe of lords to paſs the union-bill, ſhe made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"IT is with the greateſt ſatisfaction, that I have given my aſſent to a bill for uniting England and Scotland into one kingdom.

"I conſider this union as a matter of the greateſt importance to the wealth, ſtrength, and ſafety of the whole iſland; and, at the ſame time, as a work of ſo much difficulty and nicety in its own nature, that till now all attempts which have been made towards it, in the courſe of above a hundred years, have proved ineffectual; and therefore I make no doubt, but it will be remembered and ſpoke of hereafter, to the honour of thoſe who have been inſtrumental in bringing it to ſuch a happy concluſion.

"I deſire and expect from all my ſubjects of both nations, that from henceforth they act with all poſſible reſpect and kindneſs to one another, that ſo it may appear to all the world, they have hearts diſpoſed to become one people.

"This will be a great pleaſure to me, and will make us all quickly ſenſible of the good effects of this union.

"And I cannot but look upon it as a peculiar happineſs, that in my reign ſo full proviſion is made for the peace and quiet of my people, and for the ſecurity of our religion, by to firm an eſtabliſhmont of the proteſtant ſucceſſion throughout Great-Britain.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I take this occaſion to remind you of making effectual proviſion for the payment of the equivalent to Scotland, within the time appointed by the act; and I am perſuaded, you will ſhew as much readineſs in this particular, as you have done in all the parts of this great work.

My lords and gentlemen,

"The ſeaſon of the year being now pretty far advanced, I hope you will continue the ſame zeal, which appeared throughout this ſeſſion, in diſpatching what yet remains unfiniſhed of the public buſineſs before you."

Thus this great deſign, ſo long wiſhed and laboured for in vain, was begun and happily ended within the compaſs of nine months. The union was to commence the firſt of May, and, till that time, the two kingdoms were ſtill diſtinct, and their two parliaments continued to ſit.

The act of union was no ſooner paſſed, but an ill uſe was intended to be made of it. The cuſtoms of Scotland were then in a farm, and the farmers were the creatures of the miniſtry, ſome of whom, as we believed, were ſharers with them: It was viſible, that ſince there was to be a free trade opened between Scotland and England, after the firſt of May, and ſince the duties in Scotland, laid on trade, were much lower than in England, that there would be a great importation into Scotland, on the proſpect of the advantage that might be made by ſending it into England. Upon ſuch an emergency, it was reaſonable to break the farm, as had been ordinarily done upon leſs reaſon, and to take the cuſtoms into a new management, that ſo the gain to be made in the interval, might go to the public, and not be left in private hands; but the leaſe was continued in favour of the farmers. They were men of no intereſt of their own, ſo it was not doubted, but that there was a ſecret practice in the caſe. Upon the view of the gain to be made by ſuch an importation, it was underſtood, that orders were ſent to Holland, and other places, to buy up wine, brandy, and other merchandize. And another notorious fraud was deſigned by ſome in England; who, becauſe of the great drawback that was allowed for tobacco and other plantation-commodities, when exported, were ſending great quantities to Scotland, on deſign to bring them back after the firſt of May, that ſo they might ſell them free of that duty. A bill was therefore offered to the commons, for preventing theſe fraudulent practices. When this bill was read the third time, Mr. Secretary Harley propoſed the adding another clauſe, namely, that all goods, that were carried into Scotland, after the firſt of February (unleſs it were by the natural-born ſubjects of that kingdom inhabiting it) in caſe they were imported into England after the firſt of May, ſhould be liable to the Engliſh duties; and of this, the proof was to lie on the importer: This angered all the Scots, who raiſed a great clamour upon it, and ſaid, the union was broke by it; and that ſuch a proceeding would have very ill effects in Scotland. But the houſe of commons were ſo alarmed with the news of a vaſt importation, which was aggravated far beyond the truth, and by which they concluded, [f] On the 22d of February, upon Mr. Bromley's motion, the commons ordered, "That it be an inſtruction to the committee of the whole houſe, to whom the bill for an union between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland was committed, that they might receive a clauſe that the two univerſities of this kingdom might continue for ever, as they are now by law eſtabliſhed." But a motion being made, and the queſtion put, "That it be another inſtruction to the committee, that they might receive a clauſe to make the like proviſion, that the ſubjects of this kingdom ſhould be for ever free of any oath, teſt, or ſubſcription within this kingdom, contrary to, or inconſiſtent with, the true proteſtant religion, government, worſhip, and diſcipline of the church of England, as now by law eſtabliſhed, as was already provided for the ſubjects of Scotland, with reſpect to their preſbyterian government;" it paſſed in the negative. The ſame day ſir Roger Moſtyn moved, that a clauſe ſhould be inſerted in the ſaid bill, in favour of the convocation of the clergy, as part of the conſtitution; which aſſertion and motion were both exploded. But, the parliament of Scotland having inſerted in the articles of union ſeveral clauſes for drawbacks and allowances upon divers commodities of the growth of that kingdom, which might put the Engliſh traders upon an unequal foot with the Scots, the commons of England took that matter into their conſideration; and, in a committee of the whole houſe came to ſeveral reſolutions for allowing drawbacks on Engliſh ſalt, white herrings, beef, pork, oatmeal, and grain, called Bear alias Big, exported from England and Wales: Which reſolutions were, on the 27th of February, reported to the houſe, agreed to, and a bill ordered to be brought in, which received the royal aſſent.

Becauſe the conſtitution of this Kingdom has been ſo very excellent, and therefore juſtly applauded by all our neighbours, for ſo many ages, that we cannot conceive it prudent now to change it, and to venture at all thoſe alterations made by this bill, ſome of them eſpecially being of ſuch a nature, that, as the inconvenience and danger of them (in our humble opinion) is already but too obvious, we think it more proper and decent to avoid entering further into the particular apprehenſion we have from the paſſing of this law.

ed, that the trade of England would greatly ſuffer, at leaſt for a year or two, that they paſſed the bill, and ſent it to the lords, where it was rejected; for it appeared plainly to them, that this was an infraction of ſome of the articles of the treaty. It was ſuggeſted, that a receſs for ſome days was neceſſary, that ſo the Commons might have an opportunity to prepare a bill, prohibiting all goods from being brought to England, that had been ſent out, only in order that the merchants might have the drawback allowed. Accordingly, the queen came to the houſe of peers on the 8th of April, and prorogued the parliament to the 14th of that month.

The parliament being met again on that day, the queen came to the houſe of lords, and made a ſhort ſpeech to both houſes, importing, "That ſhe was willing to give them an opportunity of coming together again, to conſider, if any thing could properly be done to prevent the inconveniences, that might happen to trade, by too great an interval between the riſing of the parliament and the firſt of May; and that ſhe need not add, that whatever was to be done of that kind, would require to be diſpatched in a little time." The commons, who were more inflamed than before, being returned to their houſe, received and read a petition of the merchants concerned in the importation of wines and brandy from Spain, Portugal, and Italy, and of other goods from Holland, &c. complaining, "That great quantities of French wines, brandies, ſilks, prunes, roſin, &c. of the growth and product of France; whalebone, linen, drugs, coffee, ſpices, &c. from Holland and from France; were directly brought, and more intended to be imported into the kingdom of Scotland, in order to be brought thence and imported into England, after the firſt of May, to avoid the Engliſh duties, to the great detriment and loſs of ſome, and the utter ruin of others, who had imported, and were importing into England the like commodities from Spain, Portugal, Italy and Holland, paying the high duties upon them; which commodities had been chiefly purchaſed abroad with the woollen manufactures, corn, and other products of England; and praying that the houſe would prevent the importation of theſe goods, which would be a great damage, not only to the petitioners, but to her Majeſty's cuſtoms; or otherwiſe ſo to provide for the petitioners relief, as the houſe ſhould think fit." The next day the commons, in a committee of the whole houſe, reſolved, firſt, "That the importation of goods and merchandizes of the growth and produce of France, and other foreign parts, into Scotland, in order to be brought from thence into England, after the firſt of May, and with intention to avoid the payment of the Engliſh duties, would be to the damage and ruin of fair traders, to the prejudice of the manufactures of England, a great loſs to her Majeſty's revenue of the cuſtoms, and a very great detriment to the public. Secondly, That the exporting of goods and merchandizes from England into Scotland that are intitled to a drawback, with intention to bring the ſame back again into England after the firſt of May, was a moſt notorious fraud, to the damage and ruin of fair traders, to the great loſs of her majeſty's revenues of the cuſtoms, and a very great detriment to the public." Theſe reſolutions being immediately reported and agreed to, a bill was ordered to be brought in upon the ſame; which, being was paſſed, ſent to the lords for their concurrence. But it being apprehended, that this would give offence to the Scots; and the moſt eminent lawyers, who were conſulted about it, not agreeing in their opinions, the court thought fit to let it fall; the rather, becauſe the firſt of May was near at hand, and that the practices of the fraudulent traders had, in great meaſure, been prevented by the terror of the intended law, and the clauſe offered by Mr. Harley. And, therefore, the queen came to the houſe of peers on the 24th of April, and made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I Return you my hearty thanks for the great zeal and affection, which you have ſhewn for my ſervice and the public good, in the ſeveral affairs, which have been before you, eſpecially in that of the union of Scotland, which, I doubt not, will prove a laſting bleſſing to this iſland.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I am to thank you in particular for the great diſpatch you have made, in providing the largeſt and moſt effectua ſupplies, that have ever been given to the crown for the current ſervice, in any one ſeſſion of parliament. I am very much concerned, the public occaſions require the raiſing of ſuch great ſums from my people. I will take care they ſhall be applied to the uſes for which they were given; and I hope, by God's bleſſing, we may obtain advantages from them, anſwerable to ſo great an expence.

My lords and gentlemen,

"It is proper for me, before we part, to communicate to you, that I think it expedient, that the lords of parliament of England, and commons of the preſent parliament of England, ſhould be the members of the reſpective houſes of the firſt parliament of Great-Britain, for, and on the part of England: and therefore I intend, within the time limited, to publiſh a proclamation for that purpoſe, purſuant to the power given me by the acts of parliaments of both kingdoms, ratifying the treaty of union. And, after we have ſo fully compleated this great work, I aſſure myſelf, that, when you return to your ſeveral countries, you will omit no opportunity of making my ſubjects ſenſible of the ſecurity, and the other great and laſting benefits, they may reaſonably expect from this happy union.

"This will conduce very much to make it prove ſo, and be a good preparation to the ſucceſs of our next meeting; when, I hope, we ſhall all join our ſincere and hearty endeavours to promote the welfare and proſperity of Great Britain."

After this ſpeech, the lord-keeper prorogued the parliament to the 30th of April 1707.

Thus this remarkable ſeſſion came to a happy concluſion, after having finiſhed the great tranſaction of the union, on which it may not be improper to make the following obſervations. It is certain, the deſign on Darien the great charge it put Scotland to, and the total miſcarriage of that project, made the trading part of that kingdom ſee the impoſſibility of undertaking any great deſign in trade; and this made them the more ready to concur in carrying on the union. The wiſer men of that nation had obſerved long, that Scotland lay at the mercy of the miniſtry, and that every new ſet of miniſters made uſe of their power to enrich themſelves and their creatures at the coſt of the public; that the judges being made by them were in ſuch a dependance, that, ſince there are no juries allowed in Scotland in civil matters, the whole property of the kingdom was in their hands, and by their means in the hands of the miniſters. They had alſo obſerved, how ineffectual it had been to complain of them at court. It put thoſe, who ventured on it, to a vaſt charge, to no other purpoſe, but to expoſe them the more to the fury of the miniſtry. The poor noblemen and the poor boroughs made a great majority in their parliament, and were eaſily to be purchaſed by the court. They ſaw therefore no hopes of a remedy for ſuch a miſchief, but by an incorporating union with England. Theſe thoughts were much quickened, by the proſpect of recovering what they had loſt in that ill-concerted undertaking of Darien; and this was ſo univerſal and ſo operative, that the deſign on Darien, which the Jacobites had ſet on foot and proſecuted with ſo much fury, and with bad intentions, did now engage many to promote the union, who, without that conſideration, would have been at leaſt neutral, if not backward in it. The court was engaged to promote the union, on account of the act of ſecurity paſſed in the year 1704, which was imputed chiefly to the lord-treaſurer. Threatenings of impeaching him for adviſing it had often been let fall; and, upon that, his enemies had ſet their chief hopes of overthrowing him; for, though no proof could be brought of his counſel in it, yet it was not doubted, but that his advice had determined the queen to paſs it. An impeachment was a word of an odious ſound, which would engage a party againſt him, and diſorder a ſeſſion of parliament; and the leaſt ill effect it might have, would be to oblige him to withdraw from buſineſs, which was chiefly aimed at. The queen was very ſenſible, that his managing the great truſt he was in, in the manner he did, made all the reſt of her government both ſafe and eaſy to her; and therefore ſhe ſpared no pains to bring this about, and it was believed ſhe was at no ſmall coſt to compaſs it; for thoſe of Scotland had learned from England to ſet a price upon their votes, and expected to be well paid for them. The lord-treaſurer likewiſe exerted himſelf in this matter with an activity and zeal, that ſeemed not to be in his nature; and indeed, all the application, with which the court purſued this affair, was neceſſary to maſter the oppoſition and difficulties, which ſprang up in the progreſs of it. That, which completed all, was the low ſtate to which the affairs of France were reduced. That kingdom could ſpare neither men nor money to ſupport their party, which otherwiſe they would undoubtedly have done. They had, in imitation of the Exchequer notes here in England, given out mint-bills to a great value; ſome ſaid two hundred millions of livres. Theſe were ordered to be taken by the ſubjects in all payments, as money to the full value, but were not to be received in payments of the king's taxes. This put them under a great diſcredit, and the fund created for repaying them, not being thought a good one, they had ſunk ſeventy per cent. This occaſioned an inexpreſſible diſorder in all payments, and in the whole commerce of France. All the methods, that were propoſed for raiſing their credit, had proved ineffectual; for they remained, after all, at the diſcount of fifty-eight per cent. A court, in this diſtreſs, was not in a condition to ſpare much to ſupport ſuch an inconſiderable intereſt, as they eſteemed their party in Scotland; who therefore had not the aſſiſtance, which they promiſed themſelves from thence. The conjuncture of theſe various incidents, which brought this great work to a happy concluſion, was ſo remarkable, that the laying them all in one view will, it is hoped, not be thought an impertinent digreſſion.

The parliament being at an end, the queen, by virtue of a clauſe in the act of union, and purſuant to her promiſe in her ſpeech, revived it by a proclamation of the 29th of April, and, by another of June 5, declared her pleaſure for holding the firſt parliament of Great-Britain on the 23d of October. Upon this, many of the Scotch lords came to London, and were very well received. Montroſs and Roxburgh were made dukes in Scotland; ſome of them were made privy-councillors in England; and a commiſſion, for a new council, was ſent to Scotland: There appeared ſoon two different parties among the Scotch; ſome of them moved, that there ſhould neither be a diſtinct government, nor a privy-council continued there, but that all ſhould be brought under one adminiſtration, as the ſeveral counties in England were; they ſaid, the ſooner all were conſolidated, in all reſpects, into one body, the poſſibility of ſeparating and diſuniting them would be the ſooner extinguiſhed; this was preſſed with the moſt earneſtneſs by thoſe, who were weary of the preſent miniſtry, and longed to ſee their power at an end: But the miniſtry, who had a mind to keep up their authority, ſaid, there was a neceſſity of preſerving a ſhew of greatneſs, and a form of government in thoſe parts, both for ſubduing the Jacobites, and that the nation might not be diſguſted, by too ſudden an alteration of outward appearances. The court reſolved to maintain the miniſtry there, till the next ſeſſion of parliament, in which new meaſures might be taken. Thus affairs were happily ſettled at home, and the firſt of May, when the union took place, being appointed to be obſerved as a day of public and general thankſgiving for the happy concluſion of the treaty of union, it was celebrated with a decent ſolemnity. Congratulatory addreſſes on account of the union were preſented to the queen from all parts of the kingdom. But it was obſerved, that the univerſity of Oxford were ſilent on this occaſion, as well as the Scots, which made the addreſſers of Brackley in Northamptonſhire ſuggeſt, "That after the little notice, that had hitherto been taken of the union by thoſe, who enjoyed the greateſt ſhare of it, at leaſt an equivalent of the advantage, they had ſome thoughts of not diſturbing her majeſty at this time, in her great concernments for the liberties of all Europe, had they not been afraid, leſt the malice of the world ſhould have unjuſtly tacked them to ſome of her majeſty's miſtaken ſubjects, who, by their ſilence, in not addreſſing, had ſufficiently declared their diſlike of what her majeſty had owned her greateſt pleaſure and ſatisfaction." [1]

[1] That the proceedings in the affair of the union might not be interrupted, the following particulars, which happened during this ſeſſion, were purpoſely omitted.

The houſe of commons addreſſed the queen about reſettling the iſlands of Nevis and St. Chriſtophers, which had ſuffered much by the French. The French came from Martinico with five men of war and twenty ſloops to St. Chriſtophers, and made a deſcent in March 1706; being repulſed in their attack of the caſtle, they fell in among the plantations, ſome of which they burnt, and plundered the inhabitants; but the governor of Barbadoes, upon notice of it, ſent down a ſloop to the governor of St. Chriſtophers, to acquaint him there was a ſtrong ſquadron of Engliſh men of war coming to his aſſiſtance; which news being conveyed to the French had the intended effect, for they no ſooner heard of it, than they quitted the iſland, taking away with them about three hundred negroes. From thence they went to Nevis, where they landed their troops, and the inhabitants being overpowered by numbers retired to the mountains; the enemy, marching thither too, attacks them; they beat a parley, and a capitulation was concluded the next day, March 24, by which they were to be priſoners of war, but to remain in the iſland, and procuring a like number of French priſoners, to be releaſed by way of exchange, either in America or Europe; and, in the mean time, they were to be civilly uſed, and their houſes and ſugar-works preſerved; but the French broke the capitulation in ſeveral reſpects, treating them moſt barbarouſly, and burning their houſes and ſugar-works, and by threats and ill uſage forced many of them to form a ſecond agreement the 6th of April, promiſing the enemy in ſix months time to ſend to Martinico a certain number of negroes, or money in lieu thereof, after which they left the iſland. The commander and other officers of this ſquadron gave ſo little content to the French court by their conduct in this expedition, that they were put under arreſt upon their arrival in France.

The marquis of Caermarthen having offered to go with a ſmall ſquadron of men of war to Madagaſcar, to ſuppreſs the pirates there, who were become very troubleſome and dangerous to the navigation in thoſe parts, the commons appointed a committee to conſider that matter; and it was reſolved to preſent an humble addreſs to her majeſty to take into her royal conſideration how the ſaid pirates might be ſuppreſſed; and another, that ſhe would be pleaſed to uſe her endeavours to recover and preſerve the ancient poſſeſſions, trade, and fiſhery in Newfoundland.

The French refugees, by private direction of the biſhop of Sarum, and ſome other perſons in power, addreſſed the queen, repreſenting, "That the proteſtant churches of France, though ever ſtruggling under oppreſſion, held formerly a conſiderable rank; and that her majeſty's predeceſſors had always ſuch a tender regard for them, as to protect and ſupport them to the utmoſt of their power: That the famous edict of Nantes, in favour of the proteſtants of France, was, in great meaſure, owing to the great intereſt queen Elizabeth had with king Henry the fourth of France: That king James the firſt, her majeſty's great-grandfather, did often interpoſe, by his ambaſſadors, in behalf of the French reformed churches. And, that king Charles the firſt, her majeſty's grandfather, intervened as mediator in the treaty, which Lewis XIII. made with the Rochellers (who held the principal rank among the proteſtants of France) and afterwards, upon the French king's infraction of that treaty, began a war with France upon that account." Moreover, they ſet forth, "That they found and accounted themſelves ſo happy in living under her majeſty's gentle government, and among a nation, where they had been ſo kindly entertained, when driven from their native country by the violence of perſecution, that, if they had nothing but their own private intereſt in view, they would ſit quiet and eaſy, and be contented to ſhare the felicity of her majeſty's natural-born ſubjects; but that the juſt concern they ought to have for their brethren, relations, and friends, who ſtill groaned in France under the preſſure of perſecution, obliged them to lay hold on this occaſion, moſt humbly to beſeech her ſacred majeſty, that, when her thoughts ſhould be employed in ſettling the great concerns of Europe in a treaty of peace, her majeſty would graciouſly vouchſafe to take into her royal care the intereſt of the poor diſtreſſed churches of France, which having been ruined by the ſuperſtitious vanity of the enemy, ſo it would add to the ſolid glory of her majeſty's reign, to be inſtrumental in reſtoring the ſame." This addreſs having been preſented to the queen, on the 7th of April, by ſome of the moſt eminent perſons among the French refugees, ſhe was pleaſed to tell them, "That ſhe always had a great compaſſion for the unhappy circumſtances of the perſecuted proteſtants of France: That ſhe would communicate her thoughts upon this matter to her allies; and ſhe hoped ſuch meaſures might be taken, as might effectually anſwer the intent of their petition."

On the 15th of May, Andrew de Matneoff, ambaſſador extraordinary from the czar of Muſcovy, had a private audience of the queen, in which his excellency delivered to her majeſty a long letter from the czar, dated April 27, containing a detail of the ſervices he had done king Auguſtus from his firſt election to the crown of Poland; and "complaints of the ill treatment of the Ruſſian troops ſent to his aſſiſtance; of the impriſoning of count Patkul, his miniſter and general; of king Auguſtus's non-performance of the treaty made with the czar; and of his concluding a diſhonourable peace with the king of Sweden, without his czariſh majeſty's privity; purſuant to which he had delivered up count Patkul, on pretence of his being a Swediſh deſerter, contrary to the laws of nations, and even cuſtom of the barbarians?" Deſiring, in the concluſion, "That her Britannic majeſty would uſe her good offices, to procure the liberty of the ſaid Patkul, or, at leaſt, that he might be uſed as his czariſh majeſty's miniſter, and not as a ſubject of the king of Sweden; as alſo to obtain the enlargement of the other Ruſſian general officers, and other ſubjects of Muſcovy, detained at Stockholm. As for the remaining of the Ruſſian auxiliaries, now upon the Rhine, the czar put them under her Britannic majeſty's protection, and deſired, that they might enter into her majeſty's ſervice, or that of her allies; or, at leaſt, he intreated her majeſty's good offices, that they might have leave to return home with safety." In compliance with the czar's deſire, the queen uſed her good offices in favour of count Patkul, but her interceſſion proved ineffectual, and that unfortunate gentleman was afterwards barbarouſly put to death.

The republic of Venice, having at laſt appointed the chevaliers Erizzo and Piſani their ambaſſadors extraordinary, to compliment the queen on her acceſſion to the throne, their excellencies made their public entry into London, on the 19th of May, in a very magnificent manner; and having, for three days, been ſplendidly entertained at Somerſet houſe, had their public audience of the queen, on the 22d, at St. James's-houſe. Three days after they had a private audience of her majeſty, and then returned homewards. Signior Cornaro, the Venetian ambaſſador in ordinary, continuing here to take care of the concerns of that republic.

The government thinking fit to check the licentiouſneſs of the preſs, William Pittis, being convicted of writing a ſcandalous and ſeditious libel, intituled, 'The caſe of the church of England's memorial fairly ſtated: Or, A modeſt enquiry into the grounds of thoſe prejudices, that have been entertained againſt it,' was fined by the court of queen's-bench one hundred marks, and to ſtand in the pillory at Charing-croſs with a paper on his head, denoting his offence; and alſo near the Royal-exchange in Cornhill in like manner. Which ſentence was executed accordingly. George Sawbridge, convicted of publiſhing that libel, was fined two hundred pounds, and committed to the queen's-bench priſon till he paid the ſame; and alſo to be brought by the marſhal of that priſon to all the courts at Weſtminſter (the courts ſitting) with a paper on his head, denoting his offence.

On the 30th of April the caſe of Dr. James Drake, indicted for writing a pamphlet, called Mercurius politicus, was argued at the queen's-bench bar; but it appearing, that, in the libel ſet forth in the information, the word Not was inſerted, and in the libel given in evidence the word Not; upon arguing of that error, the court inclined for the party accuſed; whereupon the trial was adjourned, and he was afterwards acquitted. The ſame day Dr. Joſeph Browne was tried at Guild-hall before the lord chief juſtice Holt for binding to the preſs a paper of verſes, called 'The country parſon's advice to the lord keeper; where, in a groſs, ironical way, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the dukes of Southampton, Richmond, Somerſet, Bolton, and Devonſhire, the earls of Montague, Pembroke, Eſſex, and Oxford, the lords Sommers, Mohun

About this time there were made ſome changes in ſeveral public offices. The earl of Stamford, the lord Herbert of Cherburg, Robert Monkton, and John Pultney, eſquires, were made commiſſioners of trade and plantations, in the room of the lord viſcount Weymouth, who had before reſigned that poſt, and of William Blaithwaite, John Pollexfen, and Matthew Prior, eſquires, who were laid aſide, as too ſtrongly attached to the tory party. At the ſame time, by the intereſt of Mr. ſecretary Harley, ſir Simon Harcourt was conſtituted attorney-general, in the room of ſir Edward Northey; ſir James Montague ſucceeded ſir Simon Harcourt in the place of ſolicitor-general; and the honourable Spencer Compton, who had exerted his zeal and abilities in the treaty of union, was made treaſurer and receiver-general to prince George of Denmark, and pay-maſter to her majeſty's penſioners, in the room of Mr. Nicholas. In the beginning of May, the queen declared the lord Cowper lord high-chancellor of Great-Britain. In like manner, the lord Godolphin was appointed lord high-treaſurer of Great-Britain. Prince George of Denmark took the oath in the court of chancery, as lord high-admiral of Great Britain, and by a new commiſſion appointed ſir David Mitchell, George Churchill, Mr. Robert Walpole, and ſir Stafford Fairborne, to be council in the affairs of the admiralty. In January, the earl of Manchester received his inſtructions to go ambaſſador extraordinary to the republic of Venice, and, in his journey thither, he went to the courts of Vienna and Turin. But the moſt conſiderable change had been in December, by the promotion of the earl of Sunderland to the poſt of ſecretary of ſtate, in the room of ſir Charles Hedges: though it was not till after much ſolicitation, that the queen could be prevailed with to make this alteration [k].

Mohun, Haverſham, Wharton, and Hallifax, and the biſhop of Sarum, were ſcurrilouſly reflected upon. The charge being plainly proved by the printer, and by Mr. Lewis, ſecretary to Mr. Harley, the jury brought the doctor in guilty; and ſome time after he received ſentence to ſtand in the pillory, which was executed upon him.

On the 6th of May, being the laſt day of the term, judge Powel, in the court of queen's-bench, pronounced ſentence againſt Mr. William Stephens, rector of Sutton in Surry, for writing a ſeditious pamphlet, called, 'A letter to the author of the memorial of the church of England;' which contained moſt ſcandalous reflections on the duke of Marlborough's conduct laſt campaign, and againſt Mr. ſecretary Harley. The judge told the priſoner, "That his offence was the greater, in that it was the duty of his calling to teach others the poſitive precept of the goſpel about the reverence we owe to ſovereigns, and thoſe who are in authority under them; but, that his crime was ſtill the more heinous in abuſing the duke of Marlborough, a peer, who had done ſuch glorious actions for his country, and ſo well deſerved of the common cauſe:" Adding with reſpect to the ſecretary, "That the traducing the queen's miniſters was a downright abuſe upon her majeſty herſelf." Stevens would have ſpoken ſomething by way of ſubmiſſion, but the judge pronounced the judgment of the court againſt him; which was "That he ſhould be fined an hundred marks, and ſtand twice in the pillory with a paper fixed to his hat, denoting his offence; the firſt time at Charing-croſs, and the next day before the Royal-exchange; and that he ſhould find ſurities for his good behaviour for a twelvemonth." However, it being repreſented and conſidered, that the inflicting ſuch an ignominious puniſhment on a perſon in holy orders might give offence to the whole clergy; the execution of this ſentence was firſt ſuſpended, and at laſt the pillory remitted, though with this mortifying circumſtance, that Stephens was brought to a public houſe at Charing-croſs, from whence he ſaw the ſcaffold, and multitudes of people gathering together to be ſpectators of his diſgrace.

On the 6th of November, Dr. Joſeph Browne being convicted of writing and publiſhing another ſcandalous and ſeditious libel, intitled 'A letter to the right honourable Mr. ſecretary Harley, occaſioned by his late commitment to Newgate: Together with his interpretation of that paper, called, The Country Parſon's advice to my lord-keeper, laid to his charge;' reflecting upon the great officers of ſtate, and ſeveral of the nobility of this kingdom, was, on the 14th of November fined for the ſame by the court of queen's-bench forty marks, and ordered to ſtand in the pillory two days after at Charing-croſs and alſo near the Royal-exchange in Cornhill, and to give ſecurity for his good behaviour for one year.

Edward Ward being convicted of writing, printing and publiſhing ſeveral ſcandalous and ſeditious libels, particularly, 'Hudibras Redivivus, or, A Burleſque Poem on the Times, highly reflecting upon the queen and her government, was likewiſe, on the 14th of November fined forty marks, and ordered to ſtand twice in the pillory, with a paper on his head denoting his offence, and to give ſecurity for his good behaviour for one year. Some were of opinion, that theſe, and other proſecutions of the like nature, were chiefly promoted by Mr. ſecretary Harley, not only that he might thereby appear to be entirely devoted to the general and treaſurer, but with a deeper deſign of rendering them obnoxious by thoſe unpopular ſeverities.

[k] The duchess of Marlborough, in 'The account of her conduct, p. 172,' obſerves, That the whigs, after the ſervices they had done, and the aſſurances the queen had given them, thought it reaſonable to expect, that one of the ſecretaries at leaſt ſhould be ſuch a man as they could place a confidence in. They believed they might truſt the earl of Sunderland; and though they did not think him the propereſt man for the poſt, yet, being the duke of Marlborough's ſon-in-law, they choſe to recommend him to her majeſty, becauſe, as they expreſſed themſelves to the ducheſs, they imagined it was driving the nail that would go. The duke indeed was not in his inclination for this promotion of the earl; but, how hard preſſed both he and the lord-treaſurer Godolphin were by the whigs to have it brought to effect, appears from the following letter of his to the ducheſs, dated at Grametz in October 1706. "When I writ my laſt I was very full of the ſpleen, and, I think, with too much reaſon: My whole time, to the beſt of my underſtanding, has been employed for the public good, as I do aſſure you I do in the preſence of God, neglecting no opportunity of letting 83 (the queen) ſee what I take to be her true intereſt. It is terrible to go through ſo much uneaſineſs. I do not ſay this to flatter any party, for I will never do it, let the conſequence be what it will. For, as parties, they are both in the wrong. But it is certain 73 (ſuppoſed to be Rocheſter) and his adherents are not to be truſted. So that 83 (the queen) has no choice but that of employing thoſe who will carry on the war, and ſupport 91 (lord Godolphin). And, if any other method is taken, I know we ſhall go into confuſion. Now, this being the caſe, I leave you to judge, whether I am dealt kindly with? I do not ſay this for any other end but to have your juſtice and kindneſs, for in that will conſiſt my future happineſs. I am ſure I would venture a thouſand lives, if I had them, to procure eaſe and happineſs to the queen. And yet no number of men could perſuade me to act as a miniſter in what was not my opinion. So that I ſhall never fail in ſpeaking my mind very freely, and as my opinion is, that the tackers, and all the adherents of 73, are not for carrying on the war, which is for the true intereſt of the queen and kingdom; you may depend I ſhall never join with any but ſuch as I think will ſerve her and the true intereſt of our country with all their hearts. And, if the war continues but one year longer with ſucceſs, I hope it will not be in any body's power to make the queen's buſineſs uneaſy. And then I ſhould beglad to live as quiet as poſſible, and not envy the governing men, who would then, I believe, think better of 90 (duke of Marlborough) and 91 (lord Godolphin) than they now do. And I will own frankly to you, that the jealouſy ſome of your friends have, that 90 (Duke of Marlborough) and 91 (lord Godolphin) do not act ſincerely, makes me ſo weary, that, were it not for my gratitude for 85 (the queen) and concern for 91 (lord Godolphin, I would now retire, and never ſerve more. For I have had the good luck to deſerve better from all Engliſhmen, than to be ſuſpected for not being in the true intereſt of my country, which I am in, and ever will be, without being of a faction, And this principle ſhall govern me for the little remainder of my life. I muſt not think of being popular; but I ſhall have the ſatisfaction of my going to the grave with the opinion of having acted, as became an honeſt man. And, if I have your eſteem and love, I ſhould think myſelf entirely happy. Having writ thus far, I have received your two letters of 20th and 21ſt, which confirm me in my opinion before. And, ſince the reſolution is taken to vex and ruin 91 (lord Godolphin) becauſe 83 (the queen) has not complied with what was deſired for 117 (lord Sunderland,) I ſhall from henceforth deſpiſe all mankind, and think there is no ſuch thing as virtue. For I know with what zeal 91 (lord Godolphin) has preſſed 83 (the queen) in that matter. I do pity him, and ſhall always love him as long as I live, and never be a friend to any that can be his enemy.

"I have writ my mind very freely to 83 (the queen) on this occaſion; ſo that, whatever misfortunes may happen, I ſhall have a quiet mind, having done what I thought my duty. And as for the reſolution of making me uneaſy, I believe they will not have much pleaſure in that, for, as I have not ſet my heart on having juſtice done me, I ſhall not be diſappointed, nor will I be ill uſed by any man."

The ducheſs of Marlborough likewiſe wrote the following letter to the queen on this occaſion:

"By the letter I had from your majeſty this morning, and the great weight you put upon the difference betwixt the word notion and nation in my letter, I am only made ſenſible (as by many other things) that you were in a great diſpoſition to complain of me, ſince to this moment I cannot for my life ſee any eſſential difference betwixt theſe two words as to the ſenſe of my letter, the true meaning of which was only to let your majeſty, know with that faithfulneſs and concern, which I have had ever for your ſervice, that it was not poſſible for you to carry on your government much longer with ſo much partiality to one ſort of men, though they loſe no opportunity of diſſerving you, and of ſhewing the greateſt inveteracy againſt my lord Marlborough and my lord-treaſurer, and ſo much diſcouragement to others, who, even after great diſobligations, have taken ſeveral opportunities to ſhew their firmneſs to your majeſty's intereſt, and their zeal to ſupport you, and your miniſters too, only becauſe they had been faithful and uſeful ſervants to you and the public.

"This was all the ſenſe and meaning of my letter; and, if you can find fault with this, I am ſo unhappy as that you muſt always find fault with me; for I am uncapable of thinking otherwiſe as long as I live, or of acting now but upon the ſame principle, that I ſerved you before you came to the crown for ſo many years, when your unlimited favour and kindneſs to me could never tempt me to make uſe of it in one ſingle inſtance, that was not for your intereſt and ſervice. I am afraid I have been too long in explaining my thoughts upon the ſubject of my own letter, which it ſeems has been ſo great an offence; and how juſtly I leave you to judge; and I muſt beg your patience, ſince I am not very like to trouble you again, to let me ſay ſomething upon the ſubject of your letter to my lord-treaſurer, which he has ſhewn me to-day, with more concern than I know how to expreſs. This was indeed the ſubject of my own letter, and the occaſion of it; for I do not only ſee the uneaſineſs and the grief he has to leave your ſervice, when you ſeem ſo deſirous he ſhould continue in it; but I ſee, as well as he, the impoſſibility of his being able to ſupport it, or himſelf, or my lord Marlborough, for it all hangs upon one thread; and, when they are forced to leave your ſervice, you will then indeed find yourſelf in the hands of a violent party, who, I am ſure will have very little mercy or even humanity for you. Whereas you ought to prevent all theſe misfortunes by given my lord-treaſurer and my lord Marlborough (whom you may ſo ſafely truſt) leave to propoſe thoſe things to you, which they know and can judge to be abſolutely neceſſary for your ſervice, which will put it in their power to influence thoſe, who have given you proofs, both of their being able to ſerve you, and of their deſiring to make you great and happy. But, rather than your majeſty will employ a party-man, as you are pleaſed to call lord Sunderland, you will put all things in confuſion; and, at the ſame time, that you ſay this, you employ ſir Charles Hedges, who is in one againſt you, only that he has voted in remarkable things, that he might keep his place; and he did the ſame thing in the late king's time, till at laſt, that every body ſaw he was juſt dying, and he could loſe nothing by differing with that court. But formerly he voted with theſe men, the enemies to this government, called whigs; and if he had not been a party-man, how could he have been ſecretary of ſtate, when all your councils were influenced by my lord Rocheſter, lord Nottingham, ſir Edward Seymour, and about ſix or ſeven more juſt ſuch men, that call themſelves the heroes for the church? But what church can any men be of, that would diſturb ſo juſt a government as yours? Or how can any body be in the true intereſt of England, that oppoſes you and your miniſters, by whoſe advice, in four years time, you are very near pulling down the power of France, and making that religion, they only talk of, not only more ſecure than in any of the late reigns, but putting it upon a better foundation than it has been ſince the reformation?

"You

The convocation, as uſually, ſat this winter with the parliament. Though they had, in their former ſeſſion, differed much about the form of an addreſs to the queen, yet now they agreed pretty unanimouſly, and both houſes preſented a congratulatory addreſs upon the wonderful ſucceſs of her arms, and acknowledged the church to be in a ſafe and flouriſhing condition under her majeſty's adminiſtration. But, notwithſtanding this addreſs, when the debates concerning the union were before the parliament, ſome in the lower-houſe ſpoke very tragically on that ſubject, and a committee was named to conſider of the preſent danger of the church. This was carried, by the private management of ſome aſpiring men amongſt them, who hoped by a piece of ſkill, to ſhew what they could do, that it might recommend them to farther preferment; they were much cried out on, as betrayers of their party, for carrying that addreſs; ſo, to recover their credit, and becauſe their hopes from the court were not ſo promiſing, they reſolved now to act another part. It was given out, that they intended to make an application to the houſe of commons, againſt the union; to prevent that, the queen wrote to the archbiſhop, ordering him to prorogue them for three weeks: By this means that deſign was defeated, for, before the end of the three weeks, the union had paſſed both houſes. But, when one factious deſign failed, they found out another; they ordered a repreſentation to be made to the biſhops, which ſet forth, that, ever ſince the ſubmiſſion of the clergy in Henry the eighth's time, which was for a courſe of a hundred and ſeventy-three years, no ſuch prorogation had ever been ordered, during the ſitting of parliament; and they beſought the biſhops, that from the conſcientious regard, which they doubted not they had, for the welfare of this church, they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours, that they might ſtill enjoy thoſe uſages, of which they were poſſeſſed, and which they had never miſemployed: With this they brought up a ſchedule, containing, as they ſaid, all the dates of the prorogations, both of parliament and convocation, thereby to make good their aſſertion: and to cover this ſeeming complaint of the queen's proceedings, they paſſed a vote, that they did not intend to enter into any debate, concerning the validity of the late prorogation, to which they had humbly ſubmitted. It was found to be a ſtrange and a bold aſſertion, that this prorogation was without a precedent: Their charge, in the preſerving their uſages, on the conſciences of the biſhops, inſinuated that this was a breach made on them: The biſhops ſaw this was plainly an attempt on the queen's ſupremacy; ſo they ordered it to be laid before her majeſty: And they ordered alſo a ſearch to be made into the records. For though it was an undoubted maxim, that nothing but a poſitive law could limit the prerogative, which a non-uſage could not do; yet they ordered the ſchedule, offered by the lower-houſe, to be compared with the records: They found that ſeven or eight prorogations had been ordered, during the ſitting of parliament, and there were about thirty or forty more, by which it appeared, that the convocation ſat ſometimes before, and ſometimes after a ſeſſion of parliament, and ſat ſometimes, even when the parliament was diſſolved. Upon all this, the queen wrote another more ſevere letter to the archbiſhop (who had now prorogued the convocation to the 10th of April) in which ſhe ſignified her reſentment of the lower-houſe: Intimating, "that ſhe thought them as guilty of an invaſion of her royal ſupremacy repoſed in her, by the law and the conſtitution of the church of England;" and declaring, that, if any thing of the like nature was attempted for the future, it would make it neceſſary for her to uſe ſuch means for the puniſhing offences of this nature, as are warranted by law.

The lower-houſe continued ſitting after the prorogation. But, on April 10, when the archbiſhop ſent for the lower-houſe, to communicate her majeſty's letter, and ſome members appeared without the prolocutor, he aſked for him, and was told he was gone into the country. This appeared to be a contempt or neglect of ſuch a nature, that it was not to be ſuffered; whereupon he proceeded to paſs a ſentence of contumacy againſt him for his abſence, reſerving the puniſhment of his crime to the 30th of the ſame month, to which day the convocation was prorogued, by a ſchedule, backed with a royal writ. The archbiſhop deferred the puniſhment, on purpoſe, that the prolocutor might have an opportunity by his ſubmiſſion, on that day that was fixed on, to have prevented it. But, in this interval, a proteſtation againſt the archbiſhop was prepared, by the diſſatisfied members of the lower-houſe, which was offered to the houſe on April 30, with an intimation, that it was the opinion of an eminent counſellor who had been adviſed with, that no proceſs, begun before a prorogation upon the royal writ, could be continued after ſuch prorogation; and a concern ſeemed to be diſcovered, that the royal ſupremacy ſhould be this way broken in upon: And ſo they who by the archbiſhop and the queen herſelf, were charged with invading the royal ſupremacy, were willing it ſhould be believed, that none had a greater concern for the ſupremacy than they, and therefore by a proteſtation, which was carried up April 30, by the prolocutor, the majority of the lower-houſe declared the ſentence of contumacy, and the proceſs continued after the prorogation, to be an invaſion of the royal ſupremacy, unlawful and altogether null: and yet, though the prolocutor carried up this at the command of the houſe, and was preſſed by his party to ſtand it out, yet, upon ſounder advice given him by ſome, who underſtood the law better, he made a full ſubmiſſion, with which the archbiſhop was ſatisfied, and the ſentence was taken off. However, a party continued with great impudence to aſſert, that their ſchedule was true, and that the queen was miſinformed, though the lord-chancellor and the lord chief-juſtice Holt had, upon peruſal of the records, affirmed to the queen, that their aſſertion was falſe, and that there were many precedents for ſuch prorogations.

[1707.] The great and unparrelled ſucceſſes of the allies, in the glorious and ever-memorable year 1706, and the many eminent misfortunes to the French king in one campaign, raiſed great expectations from the next, and made it concluded, that the time was come, in which the perfidy, tyranny, and cruelty of that king's long and bloody reign were going to be repaid him with the ſame meaſures wherewith he had formerly treated others. But the events of the enſuing campaign produced a contrary effect, and proved very unfortunate to the allies. The offers of peace, made by France, had been indeed rejected by Great-Britain and Holland, but the inclination (as hath been obſerved) expreſſed by ſome perſons to come to a treaty with the French, upon the terms offered, was thought to have raiſed, in the imperial court, a ſtrong jealouſy, that the maritime powers were tampering with France, and making terms for themſelves, to which the intereſt of Auſtria was to be ſacrificed. And this jealouſy was ſuppoſed to have put that court upon meaſures, that had a fatal influence on the campaign of this year, and to have occaſioned the two moſt unfortunate events that happened during the whole war. For the concluſion of a treaty with the French, for evacuating the Milaneſe, without the privity of England and Holland, gave the French an opportunity of ſending immediately into Spain a great body of good veteran troops, to the aſſiſtance of King Philip, whoſe army had by that means the ſuperiority over the allies, and gained the battle of Almanza. And the expedition to Naples was the chief cauſe of the ill ſucceſs of the deſign again Toulon.

As to the affair of the Milaneſe, the French were loſing place after place in Lombardy. Cremona, Mantua, and the citadel of Milan were the only places, that were left in their

"You are pleaſed to ſay, you think it a great hardſhip to perſuade a man to part with a place he is in poſſeſſion of, for one that is not vacant. In ſome caſes that were certainly right, but not in this; for ſir Charles Hedges can have the place he deſires immediately; and it is much better for him, unleſs he could be ſecretary for life. He will have two places, that are conſiderable, one of which he can compaſs no other way; and this is ſo far from being a hardſhip, that he and all the world muſt think it a great kindneſs done him; and he muſt be a very weak man, if he loſt the opportunity of having ſuch a certainty, when he cannot flatter himſelf, that (whatever happens) he can be ſupported long in a place of that conſequence, for which he is ſo unfit. He has no capacity, no quality, no intereſt, nor ever could have been in that poſt, but that every body knows, my lord Rocheſter cares for nothing ſo much as a man, that he thinks will depend upon him. I beg your majeſty's pardon for not waiting upon you; and I perſuade myſelf, that, long as my letter is, it will be leſs troubleſome to your majeſty."

It was a wonder to many, as the ducheſs obſerves, that this affair of the earl of Sunderland's promotion met with ſuch difficulties, conſidering his relation to the duke, whoſe merit, with his queen and country, was every year augmenting. But it quickly appeared, that the difficulties, raiſed by her majeſty againſt parting with ſir Charles Hedges, were wholly owing to the artifice and management of Mr. Harley the other ſecretary of ſtate, whoſe intereſt and ſecret tranſactions with the queen were then doubtleſs in their beginning. Harley had been put into that poſt by the lords Marlborough and Godolphin, when my lord Nottingham, in diſguſt, reſigned it. They thought him a very proper perſon to manage the houſe of commons, upon which ſo much always depends. And his artifices had won upon them ſo far, that they could not be perſuaded, but they might ſafely truſt him, till experience too late convinced them of the contrary. But it is no wonder, that, with ſuch views, as he then had, he ſhould be unwilling to ſee a ſecretary of ſtate diſplaced, over whom he thought he had ſome influence, and through whoſe hands the greateſt part of the buſineſs of his own office (ſcandalouſly neglected by himſelf) uſed to paſs; and much more unwilling to have him ſucceeded by a perſon, over whom he had no power whatſoever. As for ſir Charles Hedges, when he found, how backward the queen was to diſmiſs him, he was ſo prudent, as to make a greater advantage to himſelf, by quitting his poſt, that he could have done by holding it.

hands. It was not poſſible to maintain theſe long without a greater force, nor was it eaſy to convey that to them. On the other hand, the reducing thoſe fortreſſes was like to be a work of time, which would fatigue thoſe troops, and would bring a great charge with it. A capitulation was therefore propoſed for delivering up thoſe places, and for allowing the French troops a free march into Dauphine. As ſoon as this was ſent to Vienna, it was agreed to, without communicating it to the allies, which gave juſt cauſe of offence. It was ſaid in excuſe, that every general had a power to agree to a capitulation; and conſequently the emperor, in this caſe, was not bound to ſtay for the conſent of the allies. This was true, if the capitulation had been for one ſingle place; but this was of the nature of a treaty, being of a greater extent. By this the French ſaved ten or twelve thouſand men, who muſt have all been, in a little time, made priſoners of war. They were veteran troops, and were ſent into Spain; the ill effects of which were quickly felt.

The deſign was formed for the following campaign after this manner: The duke of Savoy undertook to march an army into France, and to act there, as ſhould be concerted by the allies[l]. Some propoſed the marching through Dauphine to the Rhone, and ſo up to Lyons; but an attempt upon Toulon being thought the moſt important thing which could be deſigned, that was determined. Marſhal de Teſſe was ſent to ſecure the paſſes, and to cover France on that ſide. Prince Lewis of Baden dying this winter little eſteemed and little lamented, the marquis of Bareith had the command of the army on the Upper Rhine, from whom leſs was expected; and he was ſo ill ſupported, that he could do nothing. The court of Vienna was ſo ſet on the reduction of Hungary, that they thought of nothing elſe. The Hungarians were very numerous, but they wanted both officers and diſcipline. Ragotzki had poſſeſſed himſelf of almoſt all Tranſylvania; and the Hungarians were ſo alienated from the emperor, that they were conſulting about chuſing a new king.

The campaign was opened very fatally in Spain. It has been related, that in a council of war held at Valencia in February 1706-7, (at which were preſent the earls of Peterborough, Galway, and Rivers, and General Stanhope) it was reſolved to act offenſively, ſeek out the enemy, and endeavour to bring them to a battle, on the ſtrength of the reinforcement arrived from England under earl Rivers. This reſolution was not generally approved, for the earl of Peterborough, though diſmiſſed from the command of the army (which, upon the departure of earl Rivers, was devolved to lord Galway) gave his opinion in writing againſt an offenſive war in Spain, urging, "That the confederate troops in Italy, under the command of the duke of Savoy, and prince Eugene, could only give the mortal blow, by entering France. That the difficulties of ſubſiſting armies in Caſtile were ſufficiently apparent in the laſt campaign. That the dangers were evident, of putting the whole upon the riſque of paſſing to Madrid, before an army ſuperior in cavalry: And that, above all things, the defence of Catalonia, Arragon, and Valencia, was neceſſary." However, the contrary reſolution being taken, the earl of Galway, the more to ſtrengthen the confederate army, ſent orders to the lord Tyrawley's regiment, and the two battalions of marines, who were quartered in Catalonia, to march and join him. But the vice-roy of that principality would not ſuffer them to march from their quarters, or part with any troops out of the province, without the king's orders, which was often ſolicited, but could not be obtained. King Charles towards the end of February, declared, to the generals of the allies, his intention of going into Catalonia; and a few days after, proceeded in his journey thither, taking with him the regiment of dragoons of Winterfeldt, conſiſting of five ſquadrons, with count Talais's regiment of Dutch foot. But, at his departure, he promiſed the confederate generals, that whenever it ſhould be thought proper to march to Madrid, he would be ready to join them, with the troops from Catalonia [m].

[l] In the Memoirs of Chriſtian Cole, eſq; p. 432, is the following project concerted with the duke of Savoy.

Her majeſty the queen, having obſerved with pleaſure, that his royal highneſs was entirely bent to conform himſelf to the deſign ſhe has long had, to execute the enterprize againſt Toulon, as ſoon as the affairs of Italy would permit it, has ordered her miniſters to hold conferences with thoſe of his royal highneſs about this expedition, in which was regulated and reſolved upon what follows:

1. Her majeſty will furniſh forty ſhips of the line at the time and place fit for the enterprize of Provence, with a ſufficient number of tranſport-ſhips, to carry proviſions and ammunition from Oneglia and the coaſts of Genoa to that of France, when the army ſhall be there.

2. His royal highneſs will be pleaſed to let it be known, as ſoon as poſſible, about what time, and at what place, the fleet ſhall come, that ſo we may here take infallible meaſures, that it may be ready and furniſhed with every thing; and his royal highneſs is deſired not to let the fleet come to the place of meeting, but juſt at the time he ſhall judge it to be indiſpenſably neceſſary to let it act; and then the fleet ſhall be abſolutely under his orders, and the admirals ſhall have poſitive orders to obey him, and ſhall remain with the army in Provence.

3. Whilſt we wait for the time, that is proper for theſe operations, there will be ſhips enough in the ſeas of Italy, to keep the enemies in their ports, and hinder the tranſports on the coaſts of Italy; and, according to the advices we ſhall receive of armaments at Toulon, theſe ſhips ſhall be reinforced from time to time.

4. His royal highneſs is deſired to take care to have certain advices of the armaments, that ſhall be made at Toulon, and to let admiral Shovel, who commands the fleet, know them; and afterwards to have the goodneſs to let us know here, what he may have wrote to admiral Shovel, who will conform himſelf to his orders and advice.

5. The admiral is to furniſh as many cannon for the batteries, as his royal highneſs ſhall judge to be neceſſary for the expeditions in Provence; but his royal highneſs is to furniſh the carriages, that are neceſſary, the fleet carrying none that are fit for the land.

6. His royal highneſs is alſo to furniſh the mortars with their carriages, as alſo the bombs, lead, and the bullets of that ſize which he ſhall judge neceſſary, there being cannon of all ſorts on board the fleet; all which he may cauſe to be brought out of the Milaneſe to the coaſts of Genoa and Piedmont, and to Oneglia, as he ſhall think proper to be afterwards brought by the tranſport ſhips, where he ſhall order it.

7. The ſhips ſhall furniſh ſome quantity of powder.

N. B. This article is to be farther explained.

8. His royal highneſs will have the goodneſs to take care of eſtabliſhing magazines for proviſions, and oats, and other things neceſſary for the army, in the places, which he ſhall judge moſt proper for the enterprize; as alſo to find voitures and mules to paſs the mountains, and to ſerve in the army during the campaign, as well in Provence, as in Dauphine.

9. The queen and the ſtates-general will, upon this project, continue the twenty-eight thouſand men in their pay; and they will take care to have them fully recruited, and that early: and the court of Vienna will leave the whole body of troops, which was employed during the laſt campaign in Piedmont, in Lombardy, to ſerve in the expedition of France, and will recruit it as they have promiſed, which will make thirteen thouſand recruits of foot, and four thouſand new horſe, which body of troops is to be in a condition to act in the month of April.

10. His royal highneſs will, on his ſide, uſe all his endeavours to reſtore and augment his troops to the number mentioned in the treaty.

11. As to the troops, his royal highneſs is to chuſe thoſe he ſhall think proper to enter into France, or to remain in Piedmont and Lombardy, and no general ſhall be allowed to make any difficulty to obey his orders; and her majeſty and the ſtates-general will obtain from the princes, to whom the troops in their pay belong, expreſs orders to their reſpective generals, ſo that his royal highneſs may have the abſolute command of them.

12. It is deſired, that his royal highneſs may enter into France, with the greateſt number of forces, which the conjunctures of the times, and the ſituation of the enemies may require, and all within the month of May, if it be poſſible, having always this principal aim upon Toulon, which is to be the firſt object of the campaign.

13. Forty thouſand pounds ſterling will be furniſhed for the extraordinary expences: And, if that ſum be not ſufficient, we will give the ſurplus, which ſhall be judged neceſſary by his royal highneſs, in whom we place an entire confidence.

N. B. After the return of the courier this article was changed, and the queen ſent fifty thouſand pounds ſterling immediately to the duke of Savoy, with a promiſe, that if the deſign upon Toulon ſhould ſucceed, ſhe would pay bills, which the duke of Savoy might draw, for fifty thouſand pounds ſterling more.

14. There will be no troops for a debarkment on board the fleet, while the affairs of Spain will not permit it.

15. The expedition of Naples, that was propoſed, is excluded, as being judged at preſent impracticable and hurtful to the campaign in France.

If his royal highneſs has any thing to object or to add to theſe articles, he is deſired to do it by an expreſs, that ſo a final reſolution may be taken about his remonſtrances, and be ſent him by the ſame expreſs at his return.

[m] Biſhop Burnet ſays (Vol. II. 475.) "That king Charles pretended there was an army coming into Catalonia from Rouſſillon, and that it was neceſſary for him to march into that country. The dividing a force, when the whole together was not equal to the enemy's, has often proved fatal. He ought to have made his army as ſtrong as poſſibly he could, and to have marched with it to Madrid, for the reſt of Spain would have fallen into his hands upon the ſucceſs of that expedition. But he perſiſted in his firſt reſolution, and marched away with a part of the army, leaving about ſixteen thouſand men under the earl of Galway's command. They had eaten up all their ſtores in Valencia, and could ſubſiſt no longer there; ſo they were forced to break into Caſtile. The duke of Berwick came againſt them with an army not much ſuperior to theirs; but the court of France had ſent the duke of Orleans into Spain with ſome of the beſt troops, that they had brought from Italy; and theſe joined the duke of Berwick a day before the two armies engaged." Dr. Freind obſerves, p. 181, &c. that ſoon after the earl of Peterborough had given his opinion in writing in the council of war at Valencia, on the 4th of February 1707, N. S. againſt an offenſive war in Spain, he left that kingdom, and went a ſecond time to Italy and Turin, from which city he wrote a letter on the 21ſt of April 1707, to the Portugueſe ambaſſador, in which he preſſed more earneſtly, and explained more at large, the advice, which he had given in the council of war. But, before his ſcheme could reach Spain, the confederate generals had entered upon other meaſures. Mr. Boyer tells us, p. 291, "That king Charles, with his German and Spaniſh generals and miniſters, and count Noyelles, concurred with the earl of Peterborough; but were over-ruled by brigadier Stanhope, the queen's miniſter, who declared in her name, That her poſitive orders were, that they ſhould ſeek the enemy, march to Madrid, and not divide the forces upon any occaſion whatſoever." The earl of Galway in his narrative gives this account: "I joined with thoſe, that were of opinion, that it was by no ways convenient to divide the troops, as may appear by a copy of that opinion ſigned by my lord Tyrawly, and by me, bearing date the 15th day of January 1706-7. But I muſt beg leave to obſerve, that this was not the deciſive council for the operations of the campaign, for many ſubſequent councils were held in the king's preſence more important than this; and, though in them there might have been ſome variety of opinions as to the manner, yet almoſt all the generals and miniſters, that aſſiſted at thoſe councils, agreed perfectly in the ſubſtance, which was, that we ſhould join our troops, and march to Madrid. Some indeed were for paſſing through the plains of la Mancha Whilſt earl Rivers was gone to the council of war at Valencia, all the troops, both Engliſh and Dutch, began to march under lieutenant-general Erle to join lord Galway, and with them the regiments of lord Montjoy, colonel George's and colonel Alnott's. Brigadier Farrington's regiment was reduced, and the men put into Southwell's and Breton's. The marquis de Montandre's regiment, in its march from Alicant to join the reſt, was ſurprized, and almoſt all killed or taken priſoners. The two regiments of ſir Charles Hotham and colonel Syburg were left to garriſon that town and caſtle, though very weak, and Syburg was appointed governor, ſir Charles chuſing to follow the army. It was the 30th of March before we all could join the great camp, having met croſs the country with many difficult paſſes, and an incredible ſcarcity of proviſions both for men and horſes; and above all, very cold and wet weather, eſpecially for thoſe that were reduced to lie in the field.

The whole army under the lord Galway[n] and the marquis das Minas (conſiſting of about four thouſand five hundred horſe, and eleven thouſand foot) being joined, moved the next Mancha, and croſſing the Tagus; but this opinion was over-ruled, becauſe of the hazard in paſſing the river, if the enemy oppoſed us, and of the ſcarcity of proviſions in the Mancha, which had been exhauſted by the enemy's winter-quarters: For which reaſons it was, after many debates, agreed, that we ſhould take the way of Valencia and Arragon, paſſing the Tagus at its head, to avoid all oppoſition. But, leſt the kingdom of Valencia might by this means be any ways expoſed, it was likewiſe reſolved, before we ſhould begin our march, to deſtroy all the enemy's magazines of proviſions and forage in the country bordering upon the frontier of Valencia, to prevent them from making any incurſions; and I do take upon me to aver, that nothing was ever tranſacted, during the time I had the honour to command the queen's troops, contrary to the poſitive reſolution of any general council, or council of war, unleſs that reſolution was afterwards repealed by ſome ſubſequent council.

" So ſenſible was every one of our being already too weak, that it was reſolved to deſire my lord Rivers (who was lately arrived at Liſbon) would join us with the troops, that came under his command from England, which his lordſhip did not long after.

" For the better execution of what had been reſolved for our march through Valencia and Arragon, proper commiſſaries and officers were diſpatched to provide bread and forage ſufficient for the troops in all places where it was deſigned the armies ſhould paſs. I went with the marquis das Minas to the frontiers towards the latter end of March, and we took the field the beginning of April. We ruined part of the country bordering upon the frontiers of Valencia before the enemy could join their troops, particularly Yecla, where they had their largeſt magazines: and, judging it neceſſary to take in the caſtle of Villena, to prevent the army from being maſters of one of the moſt conſiderable inlets into the kingdom of Valencia, ſat down before that place. But it proved ſtronger than was expected; and, after we had ſpent ſome days there, we had notice the enemy had aſſembled their troops at Almanza. Upon this advice a council of war was held, where it was unanimouſly reſolved to fight the enemy; which we were the rather induced to, becauſe it was judged impoſſible to ſubſiſt upon the defenſive in the kingdom of Valencia; for the country had already been ſo much exhauſted by our winter-quarters, that there was not two days proviſion to be found for the army; and we could not have been able to have ſubſiſted there ſo long as we did, but for the ſupply we found in the enemy's magazines in Yecla. Nor did we think it proper to purſue the once intended march through that kingdom and Arragon, leſt proviſions ſhould be wanting, leaving the enemy ſo near, and in a condition to follow us; for, though commiſſaries had been employed, there was reaſon to apprehend the towns, we were to paſs through, would ſhut the gates againſt us, whilſt we were cloſely followed by the enemy, and perſecuted by the peaſants of the country, who, grown deſperate by ſeeing themſelves abandoned, would naturally be up in arms in the mountains. Beſides, we had certain advice, that there was already a body of French troops, conſiſting of eight thouſand men in Spain, and upon their march to reinforce the enemy. Thus, as the army muſt inevitably have periſhed without fighting, it was thought reſonable to run the hazard of a battle, wherein we had an equal chance to come off victors; which was accordingly done two days after, on the 25th of April 1707, N. S. but with ill ſucceſs."

The earl of Peterborough, in anſwer to the fourth queſtion of the committee of the houſe of lords, ſaid, that ſeveral councils of war were held in the month of January 1706-7 at Valencia about the time that intelligence was brought, that the forces, under the earl Rivers, were entered into the Mediterranean, in order to adjuſt the meaſures for the enſuing campaign. That the matters therein debated were principally, whether the army ſhould march towards Madrid, and ſeek the enemy. That, in the debates upon this ſubject, the earl of Galway, Mr. Stanhope, and the lord Tyrawley ſupported thoſe meaſures with the Portugueſe general; and that the king, the count de Noyelles, the Spaniſh generals and miniſters, with himſelf, argued ſtrongly againſt thoſe meaſures, as highly dangerous and impracticable: and this in repeated councils of war, till at laſt the earl of Peterborough, ſolicited by the king of Spain to renew the debate, deſired the king, that he would order all called to the council to bring their opinions in writing, that every body's opinion and reaſons for that opinion might appear, and be known to the world: which, according to the king's commands, were put in writing, and delivered at the council."

The earl of Galway, in his reply, or obſervations upon the earl of Peterborough's anſwers to the five queſtions, ſays thus: " In reply to this aſſertion, I would beg leave to appeal to your lordſhip's memory, whether, upon the firſt mention of theſe reſolutions in this moſt honourable houſe, the earl did not as poſitively affirm, That the concluſive council for the operation of the enſuing campaign was held on the 15th of January? And whether he did not offer to depoſe on oath, That in that very council no perſon whatever was of opinion for making an offenſive war, and againſt dividing the troops, but the lord Tyrawley, Mr. Stanhope, and I? Soon after indeed, upon further recollection, he was pleaſed to add the marquis das Minas to our number; and I obſerve he has ſince given himſelf a much larger latitude, both as to the time of holding that council, and as to the perſons, who voted for an offenſive war? His lordſhip is now ſo far from confining himſelf to a day, that he has taken in a whole month; and, by accuſing us more modeſtly for having oppoſed only the king, count Noyelles, himſelf, and the Spaniſh generals and miniſters, leaves half the council on our ſide; for, ſuppoſing all the Spaniſh generals and miniſters to have aſſiſted at that council, there could only have been twelve perſons there, viz. prince Lichtenſtein, count Oropeza, count Corſana, count Cardona, count Noyelles, my lord Peterborough, the marquis das Minas, count d'Aſſumar, my lord Tyrawley, Mr. Stanhope, Monſieur Freiſheim, and I. The laſt ſix his lordſhip has plainly left on our ſide; but my lord Tyrawley poſitively affirms count Oropeza was of the ſame opinion, and believes count Corſana was ſo too. Thus, taking the matter as the earl of Peterborough is pleaſed to ſtate it, we had an equality, and, as my lord Tyrawley remembers, the greater number of our party. Perhaps, when my lord Peterborough contended ſo poſitively to prove that council, of the 15th of January, concluſive, he was led into that error by the miſtake in my lord Sunderland's letter, in anſwer to one of Mr. Stanhope's of January 15. But he has ſince been pleaſed to allow, that the council of the 15th was not concluſive, and that many more ſubſequent councils were held, which determined the operations of the enſuing campaign, wherein he voted himſelf for marching to Madrid by the way of Arragon, which, I ſhould have imagined, had left no further room to mention our opinions of the 15th. But, becauſe he is ſtill reſolved to make good his charge againſt lord Tyrawley, Mr. Stanhope, and me, he affirms to your lordſhips, That the occaſion of that change in the ſubſequent councils was, becauſe the opinion of the majority had been over-ruled by a miniſter of her majeſty, aſſuring, that the queen had given him orders to declare in her name, that her poſitive orders were, that they ſhould ſeek the enemy, march to Madrid, and not divide the troops upon any account whatſoever.

" I muſt confeſs I do not conceive, that it imports me much to reply to this part of the earl's anſwer; nor ſhall I attempt to make an imperfect defence for an abſent man; for, if Mr. Stanhope was here, I doubt not he would be able ſufficiently to juſtify his own conduct in this affair. Yet I cannot help ſaying, that even malice itſelf has never yet ſuggeſted, that my lord Tyrawley, Mr. Stanhope, and I, did not act on that occaſion with great integrity, according to the beſt of our underſtandings; nor ſhall I ever be aſhamed to own an opinion, which was then not only the common ſenſe of the army, but agreeable to the deſires and intereſt of the whole kingdom of England.

" In the earl of Peterborough's farther anſwer to this queſtion, he is pleaſed to ſay, that, notwithſtanding this, the earl of Galway brought the army into the plains of Valencia, a directly contrary route to that of Arragon, and into all thoſe dangers, which he was to avoid by marching by the head of the Tagus. In reply to this anſwer I ſhall only obſerve, that I had not the command of that army (which conſiſted of three ſeparate bodies, Engliſh, Portugueſe, and Dutch) but the marquis das Minas, from whom I always received orders; and the battle of Almanza was fought by the unanimous approbation of a council of war: Nor could the reſolutions of that council have ever been executed, had there been the leaſt difference in opinon, becauſe each commander of a ſeparate corps might have refuſed to march.

" For the occaſion of our moving towards Almanza, I muſt beg leave to refer to my narrative, where I have mentioned more at large, that, in order to execute the reſolutions of thoſe councils of war, where it was agreed we ſhould march to Madrid by the way of Arragon, but firſt to deſtroy the enemy's magazines on the frontiers of Valencia, I went with the marquis das Minas in the beginning of April to Yecla, where the enemy's chief magazines lay, and from thence to Villena, where we had advice of their troops being aſſembled at Almanza; upon which that council was held, wherein the battle was unanimouſly reſolved on.

" The earl of Peterborough is pleaſed to add a reaſon for his opinion, that the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene had declared their ſentiments for a defenſive war at that time in Spain, and had communicated their thoughts to Charles III. upon that ſubject, to the certain knowledge of the earl of Peterborough, as he can make appear by authentic papers from the king of Spain. I ſhall not take upon me to deny a matter of fact, which his lordſhip ſo poſitively affirms; but I have been credibly informed, that the duke of Marlborough and my lord Godolphin did, both of them, aſſure this moſt honourable houſe, that the true project againſt Toulon was not concerted by the earl of Peterborough, prince Eugene, and the duke of Savoy, but firſt ſet on foot by the duke of Marlborough with count Maffei in Flanders, and finiſhed in England with the counts Maffei and Briancon; but did not require, that any troops ſhould be ſent from Spain, nor was ever communicated to the earl of Peterborough: Which indeed his lordſhip ſeems to be aware of, when he ſays not long after, that the project againſt Toulon, as ſettled by him, had been ſo altered, that the duke of Savoy publicly declared his diſlike of engaging it it. And yet it is moſt certain, that his royal highneſs did engage in an attempt againſt Toulon, purſuant to the project concerted in England. And, though that attempt did not prove entirely ſucceſsful, it had a very good effect; for thereby a great body of the enemy's troops were diverted from acting elſewhere, and a conſiderable damage was done to the fleet and magazines of France."

The author of the Impartial Inquiry into the Management of the War in Spain, having quoted the above-cited paſſage from the earl of Galway's narrative, obſerves, p. 238, " that hence we are informed of the true reaſons why all the generals of the allies unanimouſly reſolved to fight the battle of Almanza, for which my lord Galway and the late miniſtry have been ſo ſeverely cenſured, though his lordſhip was not commander in chief there, nor did the miniſtry ſend him orders to fight, as has been very ridiculouſly ſuggeſted; for neither could they have been capable of giving, or his lordſhip of obeying any ſuch directions at that diſtance, unleſs he had thought them apparently neceſſary, and for the benefit of the common cauſe. Though the ſucceſs of this action proved different from what might have been wiſhed, it is certain the ill fate of that day cannot, with the leaſt colour of juſtice, be imputed to the earl of Galway, ſince it is notoriouſly known, both his lordſhip and the troops immediately under his command, as well as the Dutch that were preſent, did their duty to admiration; but wanting near five thouſand of the king of Spain's forces, with part of the Dutch, that had been detached, contrary to my lord Galway's opinion, to Arragon, and being oppreſſed by unequal numbers, part of our army were forced to give way, and the reſt to ſurrender priſoners of war upon honourable terms. Yet as many regiments as we loſt at Almanza, and as much noiſe as this misfortune has made in the world, it is certain it only reduced us to a neceſſity of acting upon the defenſive."

day to a camp at Caudeta, and the day after marched upon two columns, and the baggage upon a third, expecting to engage the enemy in the plain of Yecla: but they were diſappointed, for the duke of Berwick had, upon the approach of the confederate army, left that town with great precipitation, though he had made there large magazines of wheat and barley, beſides a great quantity of wines, and all other ſorts of proviſions, as cattle, fiſh, &c. all which fell very ſeaſonably into our hands.

The Generals concluding, from the duke's precipitate retreat from this place, that his army was weak, and that the French ſuccours (conſiſting of eight thouſand men, and which were daily expected) had not joined him, reſolved to go and ſurprize him in his camp at Montalegre, a few miles from Yecla, where they had certain intelligence, that part of his army was encamped. Purſuant to this reſolution, April 3, at nine in the evening, our army marched without noiſe, leaving only two battalions to ſecure the camp at Yecla. During two days the whole army had leave to take what proviſions they wanted both for horſe and men, out of the plentiful magazines in this place, and the reſt were ordered to be burnt. On the 7th, the army marched to Villena, a little caſtle on a high rock, defended by five hundred men, under a reſolute governor. It lies in the road between Valencia and Caſtile, and would have greatly annoyed our convoys. As ſoon as the army was come before the caſtle, the governor was ſummoned to ſurrender; but he returned a proud anſwer, on which ſome field-pieces were ordered to fire againſt it, but, as they did very little execution, the engineers were commanded to work with the miners. The governor being told, from under the wall, what was doing, gave as bold an anſwer as he had done to the ſummons. There was then no thoughts of coming ſoon to a battle, for the lord Galway gave leave, on the 9th, to the queen's royal regiment of dragoons, to go as far as Denia for their cloathing, and to refreſh their horſes; and ordered brigadier Carpenter, and all the new-landed dragoons, Engliſh and Dutch to go into quarters of refreſhment above ten miles off, to try to recover their horſes, which were almoſt dead by the particular fatigue of the ſea, their long marches from Alicant, and the ſcarcity and difference of forage, having, inſtead of hay and oats, only ſtraw and barley (the feed of the country) which was not thought good for the large Engliſh and Dutch horſes. But the brigadier received orders to return the very day he marched from the camp, upon an intelligence received by the lord Galway, that the enemy had aſſembled all their forces, received the ſuccours expected from France, and were marching, as they gave out, to attack us. This intelligence was brought to lord Galway (who was ſo able an examiner of all French deſerters, that he could not eaſily be impoſed on) by two young French gentlemen of a good proteſtant family, who had been educated in the principles of the reformed religion by the care of their parents, a practice very common in France after the perſecution. They told him, they had entered as volunteers into the French ſervice, in a regiment that was coming to Spain, in hopes of meeting an opportunity to come to the Engliſh. Lord Galway, after a long converſation, was ſo well ſatisfied with the truth of what they ſaid, that he gave full credit to their intelligence, and took his meaſures accordingly °. He ordered that night a new camp to be marked out in a plain, not far from Villena, deſigning to meet the enemy there, if they came to attack us. But as they did not, it was reſolved to go in ſearch of them. The whole army marched in three columns, the 13th of April, from Villena, to la Torre de Bougarres near Caudeta, with an eager expectation to meet the enemy, but none appeared. News being brought, that the enemy were near the town of Almanza, a great council of war was held, in which it was unanimouſly agreed to go the next day, and give them battle. Accordingly, about three in the morning, we began to march in four columns, till we had paſſed the hilly country, which was computed at ſix long miles, and then, coming into better ground, the army formed, and marched the other three miles in order of battle. About twelve, we ſaw from ſome riſing grounds, the town of Almanza, and ſoon after the enemy drawn up, and ready to receive us. They began to fire very briſkly with two or three batteries, and we returned their fire with one. Lord Galway, having ſeen the diſpoſition of the right and of the centre, came to the left, which he commanded, as general Erle did the centre, and the marquis de Minas the right. He ordered the enemy's advanced guard to be attacked by a party of a hundred dragoons, who put them to flight. Being purſued beyond their ſecond line, they left the army, and took to the high-road with ſuch haſte upon a full gallop, that they were ſoon got ſome miles from the field of battle; and meeting with the duke of Orleans, who was coming to take the command upon him, told him, their army was beat, and all was loſt. This put the duke upon going back till night, when he received other news. Lord Galway viewed the right of the enemy, whoſe line was extended far beyond ours, having many more ſquadrons than we had in our left, and ſent for count Attalaia, who commanded in the ſecond line, to bring up all the horſe (which were eleven ſquadrons of Portugueſe) and draw them up ſo on our left, as far as the center, that they might prevent the enemy's flanking us. Then he commanded Carpenter's and Eſſex's ſquadrons to go and attack the battery over-againſt our left, which did very much gall our horſe. This was inſtantly executed very gallantly, but with ill ſucceſs. Here the battle began about two. The battery was placed upon a ſteep riſing ground, which covered every thing behind it; ſo that when the two ſquadrons came up with it, the guns were in a moment drawn away by the mules that continued faſtened to them, and eight or ten ſquadrons of their beſt horſe fell upon our two with incredible fury, and cut them all to pieces. Then they and the reſt of their horſe attacked our Engliſh and Dutch ſquadrons, who maintained a very obſtinate and bloody fight near two hours, but were at laſt overpowered by their far ſuperior number, and ſo cut off, that not above four or five officers, and ten or twelve private men, were left in each ſquadron. The ſquadron of Guiſcard's dragoons ſtood their ground the longeſt of any, and no wonder, for they had thirty-four officers in their front rank, moſt of them veterans, who had ſerved in all king William's wars. They had charged three times, but, when they ſaw their friends were gone, the ſtandard was ordered to be ſecured; after which they attacked three ſquadrons that faced them, having the lords Galway and Tyrawley, and brigadier Carpenter, at their head, of whom the commander begged, as they came ſeparately to him, that they would be pleaſed to take the command of the ſquadron, which they all declined. So the brave old colonel la Fubreque (whoſe name ought to be mentioned with honor for his courage andconduct) havingtheſe three great volunteers with him, fell upon the three ſquadrons with ſo much intrepidity, that he routed them, and retired in good order from the field of battle with the three generals. Lord Galway received, in this laſt bold attack, a cut over his eye (having before loſt his right hand, with which he might have parried the blow) and with ſuch a long ſword, as wounded his aid de camp in the forehead at the ſame time.

The center, that is, the Engliſh and Dutch, were engaged all this while, and drove the enemy with great ſucceſs before them. They had puſhed the firſt line upon the ſecond, ſo that, though our left was routed, we ſtill had ſome hopes, in caſe the Portugueſe horſe in the right behaved well, to get the day. But our hopes were ſoon defeated; for, as ſoon as the enemy marched up to them, and ſome battalions gave them a fire, they all galloped away, and the foot ran into ſome neighbouring woods upon our right, in which flight many of them fell, tho' none were killed in charging. The duke of Berwick, having nothing to fear from our right and left, ordered all his horſe to come and ſuſtain his foot, who had been very ſeverely beaten by ours, during three or four hours. The generals to prevent their being ſurrounded, ordered all the battalions to form themſelves into a hollow ſquare, which ſo well anſwered the deſign, that the enemy could gain no advantage of them, and by that means they retired from the field of battle with little or no loſs, though ſtill purſued till night parted them. And, if they could have continued their retreat a few miles farther, the enemy would have had no great reaſon to boaſt of a victory, nor would the battle of Almanza have been ſo much talked of, to ſay no worſe, as it has been in this nation. But the loſs of twenty-three battalions Engliſh and Dutch was too great to be eaſily repaired at ſo great a diſtance. How theſe brave men, after having fought ſo gallantly for ſo many hours, and made ſo glorious a retreat, could at laſt come to the reſolution of ſurrendering to an enemy that was ſome miles from them, and reckoned them quite out of his reach, is not ſo eaſy to be accounted for, unleſs their excuſe be admitted, which was, that the ſoldiers, after marching nine hours without any refreſhment, and fighting about ſix, could march no farther: They had ſpent all their ammunition, and had not ſo much as bread and water to refreſh themſelves with: They were all ſtrangers to the country, and did not know of any place to retire to: Beſides all this, they thought themſelves in danger of being purſued and attacked the next morning by the enemy's whole army, againſt which they could not pretend to defend themſelves, being abandoned by all the horſe. Upon theſe conſiderations, after a long conſultation, in which very warm debates, they came to the reſolution of ſurrendering themſelves, as the French infantry had done at Blenheim, and of ſending to the duke of Berwick to deſire honourable terms, which were gladly and readily granted; namely, that they ſhould be priſoners of war, till they could be exchanged: That they ſhould be all diſarmed but the officers, who ſhould keep their ſwords: And that they ſhould have liberty to ſend for their baggage, before they marched any farther.

The duke of Berwick is ſaid to have been aſtoniſhed, and could hardly believe the officer who brought him this welcome meſſage, which did compleat his victory. For till then it might have been called a drawn battle, the number of the ſlain being reckoned very equal, our baggage ſafe, and only a Portugueſe train of twenty field-pieces loſt. But twenty-three battalions, carried priſoners into France, were marks of a triumph to all places through which they paſſed. To their long and obſtinate reſiſtance, the ſafety of our baggage was certainly owing; for, had the enemy detached a thouſand men to ſecure the very difficult paſs of Pont de la Guiera, through which all the Portugueſe horſe made their eſcape, and the baggage after them, they muſt have all fallen into their hands. Two officers of dragoons, that were taken priſoners by the fall of their horſes, aſſured the author of this account, that, when they were carried towards the town of Almanza, they found it in our hands, and above a thouſand priſoners in it, the enemy's foot being puſhed far beyond it by ours. Almanza was in the center of the field of battle, and the enemy's ſecond line was on both ſides of the town[p].

The next day the Portugueſe horſe, and part of the Engliſh, got into Xativa, with the foot that guarded the baggage; and the day after to Alcira, a very ſtrong town on a river defended by almoſt inacceſſible mountains. Here our broken army aſſembled, and lord Galway joined it from Ohtinaute, with the dragoons that had ſecured his perſon and retreat [q].

From Alcira the worſt of the wounded, and the baggage of the officers killed in the battle, went ſent to the grove of Valencia, to be embarked for Barcelona. Here a trumpet arrived, with the ſhocking news of our infantry having ſurrendered, and ſeveral letters from the officers, with the articles and the before-mentioned apology for their conduct, which was not much reliſhed; for a great difference was made between the French battalions at Blenheim, and ours in the neighbourhood of Almanza. The French were ſurrounded by a victorious army in a village, and could not pretend to fight their way through it: But ours were in the open field, without any enemy near them. However, their baggage and money were ſent to them. Many of our foot liſted among the enemy, deſigning to come back to us as ſoon as they

[p] Biſhop Burnet, p. 475, ſays, That the confederates had about ten thouſand killed or taken priſoners. Among the wounded and ſlain, theſe were the moſt remakable: The lord Galway was wounded in the face: Brigadier Killigrew, being wounded in the firſt aſſault, ſtill kept the field, and was killed in a ſecond charge: Lieutenant-colonel Roper (of major-general Harvey's horſe) lieutenant-colonel Lawrence (of brigadier Carpenter's regiment) lieutenant-colonel Dormer (of the lord Eſſex's) lieutenant-colonel Deloches (of colonel Pierce's) and lieutenant-colonel Green (of the lord Peterborough's) were killed at the head of their reſpectives ſquadrons, having behaved themſelves with extraordinary reſolution and undauntedneſs: And colonel Pierce, and Mr. O Hara, ſon of the lord Tyrawley, were wounded. Of the foot, lieutenant Auſtin of the guards, lieutenant-colonel Mac Neale, (of Southwell's) lieutenant-colonel Woollet, and lieutenant-colonel Withers (of Blood's) lieutenant-colonel Ramſey (of Macartney's) lieutenant-colonel Erſkin (of lord Mark Kerr's) were among the ſlain; and lord Mark Kerr was wounded in the arm, and colonel Clayton in the body.

Father Daniel's account of the action is to this effect: The action began at three in the afternoon, and the victory ſtood long doubtful. The regiment of Mayne diſtinguiſhed itſelf upon this occaſion. Marſhal Berwick ſhewed a great preſence of mind, and a vaſt capacity in the art of war, by providing remedies wherever they were wanting, and guarding againſt all inconveniences. The enemy was purſued about two leagues. Thirteen battalions were made priſonere in the purſuit, beſides five others, which were taken in the field of battle. Six marſhals de camp, ten brigadiers, twenty colonels, and eight hundred other officers were taken with all their artillery, and ſixſcore colours and ſtandards. Near five thouſand men were killed on the ſpot, beſides the wounded, which were very numerous, and, among the reſt, the lord Galway and the marquis das Minas, general of the Portugueſe. The conquerors loſt two thouſand men, and among others, the marquis de Sillery and monſieur de Polaſtron, brigadiers; and, among the wounded were the duke of Salerno, general of the Spaniſh guards, who received eleven wounds with a broad ſword, the marquiſes de St. Clair and de Silly, marſhals de camp: The duke of Orleans, who was lately arrived from France, and was to have commanded the armies of the two crowns, though he made all poſſible haſte, after he had heard, that the two armies were not far diſtant from each other, could not come up till the action was over. The marquis de Feuquieres in his Memoirs obſerves, that this was an action of the ſpecies, ſince the two armies charged through the whole extent of their front; and that the confederates were maſters of the two entire kingdoms of Valencia and Arragon, and of all Catalonia, and were preparing to enter New-Caſtile. "A few days before the battle (continues the Marquis) they had received a powerful reinforcement from England and Holland, and were determined to improve the time of the firſt campaign. With this intent they paſſed the Xucar, and advanced near Almanza. The duke of Berwick marched up to them without the leaſt heſitation, and the armies engaged. The Portugueſe infantry being entirely broke in the firſt charge, and our cavalry having thrown that of the enemy into diſorder, we remained abſolute maſters of the field of battle. The duke of Berwick likewiſe purſued with his cavalry thirteen of the enemy's battalions, who were retreating in good order through the mountains, with an intention to repaſs the Xucar, and retire to Valencia; but as the body of infantry was extremely fatigued and deſtitute of bread, they were obliged to halt before they could arrive at the Xucar. This diſcontinuance of their march gave our infantry time to approach them; and they were all made priſoners of war. The recovery of the kingdoms of Valencia and Arragon was owing to the ſucceſs of this battle." Dr. Hare, in a letter to a tory-member, p. 13, fourth edition, tell us, "that it was owing to the reinforcement ſent the duke of Anjou after the evacuation of Milan, that we owed the loſs of the battle of Almanza, which proved ſo fatal to our affairs on that ſide. If theſe troops had not joined, we had been ſuperior to the enemy; and that battle had either not been fought, or it had been won, and Spain with it, conſidering the ill condition the duke of Anjou's affairs were then in; and the true reaſon we ventured that battle was to prevent the junction, which we did not know, or, at leaſt, did not believe, was made at the time we fought; a miſtake, we may think, very eaſily made in Spain, when it is known, we owe the victory of Ramillies to the French making the very ſame miſtake in Flanders, where they thought the Engliſh had not at that time joined the confederate army, and reckoned for certain, that the Danes at leaſt neither had nor could. And this perſuaſion made them venture a battle, which the French had ſo much reaſon to remember, without waiting for a conſiderable body of troops, that were coming to them from the Rhine, the head of which were actually at Namur, when Monſieur Villeroy began his march towards the confederates. But to return, it is plain the French had not gained the battle of Almanza without that reinforcement from Italy, and even with it, though the battle was fought in April, and our army was in a manner ruined by that blow, all they did that year was only to take Lerida."

[q] And here (ſays our author) I had the pleaſure of being eaſed of a very troubleſome burden, which had much endangered my life by the imprudence of the officers, who had given me their purſues at the head of the three ſquadrons; and very large they were, by the management of earl Rivers, who, unwilling to carry the treaſure back to England, had obliged the paymaſters of the regiments to take four months ſubſiſtence in advance, which, it was ſaid, was no ſmall perquiſite to his lordſhip, upon the account of the high price gold was at in Spain. When I returned their purſes to the officers, it was computed I had no leſs than fifteen hundred pounds about me, beſide ſome gold watches: So that I ſhould have been a good booty for ſome deſperate deſerter, which the owners of the money were more afraid of than myſelf. found an opportunity, which indeed hundreds of them did in a very ſhort time, the Valencians, Arragoneſe, and Catalans, who were all very zealous in king Charles's intereſt, aſſiſting them in their eſcape and march to us.

The day after the battle, the duke of Orleans came to Almanza, and took upon him the command of the enemy's army, which, as will be related, was of ſome ſervice to us. What foot we had left, remained at Aſcira and Xativa, and we marched all our horſe through the city of Valencia, and ſome other towns as far as Tortoſa. The enemy followed us, but very civilly, for they generally, encamped their army in the evening on the very ground we left in the morning, till we came to the Ebro, and marched over the bridge of Tortoſa, a camp about two miles from the city, up the river. The army did not continue here long, for, on the 11th of May, the enemy appeared on the hills, and an advanced party came down into the plain, a mile from the town, where they ſtaid all that day in ſight of our horſe-guard. The next day their whole army came down, and, having puſhed in our horſe-guard, encamped in a long line over againſt the town. Upon this we burnt the ſuburbs on that ſide the water, and manned a half-moon at the bridge-foot on the ſame ſide, whilſt our cannon from the caſtle made a continual fire on their camp. The night of the 13th, they brought down ſome gabions and lodged themſelves near our half-moon; but we made a ſally and deſtroyed that work, which they ſoon replaced, and firing continued on both ſides many days. There being no proſpect of any ſuccours to enable us to keep that advantageous poſt, the lord Galway, after putting a good garriſon into Tortoſa and Gironne, and leaving the reſt of the foot in Tarragona, marched up the river with the horſe, and the duke of Orleans, at the ſame time, ordered moſt of his cavalry to obſerve and follow us on the other ſide of the Ebro. We continued three months in marches and counter-marches, obſerving one another's motions, our great care being to prevent the enemy paſſing the Cinea, which would have been of very bad conſequence to us; for the country about Tarragona muſt have fallen into their hands, unleſs we were in a condition to make a vigorous ſtand, which we were not. But the duke of Orleans proved a very pacific general for ſome time, having private views, and a very extraordinary ſcheme for a peace [r]. Mr. Stanhope, the queen's envoy extraordinary, came to our camp near the Cinea to viſit the general. During his ſtay the duke of Orleans ſent a letter to the lord Galway, to deſire he would ſend two truſty perſons, by whom he had ſome propoſals of the higheſt nature to make to him. Mr. Stanhope was not long in ſuſpenſe, but gladly accepted the offer lord Galway made him of being one of the two, and the general's aid de camp was appointed for the other [s]. Theſe two gentlemen went to the place aſſigned for a conference, which laſted ſome hours, and was managed in ſuch a manner, and with ſo much ſecrecy, that no one ſuſpected any thing in either army. Lord Galway was not a little ſurprized at the overtures that were made, and diſpatched his aid de camp to the duke of Orleans, with the ſame anſwer in ſubſtance, general Stanhope had given him. This advantage we reaped from the conference, that we lived ſome weeks like good neighbours, the enemy on the one ſide, and we on the other, of the river Cinea, and at a very ſmall diſtance from one another; but not without great fatigue on both ſides, for they made many motions to paſs the river, which alarmed our camp, and kept us always, chiefly in the night, upon our guard, ready to mount, and our baggage to be loaded.

Brigadier Carpenter took this opportunity to have his own ſquadron, Eſſex's and Guiſcard's, ſent to Manreſſa [t] to refreſh their horſes, now almoſt dead, and unfit for ſervice. From hence we ſoon marched to las Borgues, where we remained ſome time. About the beginning of Auguſt, the enemy detached a good number of horſe and foot for France, and the duke of Berwick quickly followed them. On the 30th of that month, they marched from Belpuis towards Lerida (having plundered ſeveral villages without ſparing the churches) and, paſſing the Segre, they inveſted the town the next day on both ſides. General Wills commanded the garriſon, with the prince of Heſſe Darmſtat. The duke of Berwick returned to the army, but without any forces; and it was the 21ſt of September before they opened the trenches, and the 27th before they erected their batteries. Whilſt the ſiege was carried on, all the forces, that could be drawn from all parts of Catalonia, the lord Galway aſſembled at las Borgues, and encamped within a few miles of Lerida, with a reſolution to attempt the relief of that place. But, before this reſolution could be executed, news came that the garriſon had capitulated, who marched out of Lerida, on the 2d of November, with all the marks of honour cuſtomary after a brave defence [u]. In a few days, the horſe went into winter-quarters, under the command of major-general Carpenter (who had lately received a commiſſion from king Charles, appointing him to that rank) and the foot under major-general Wills marched to the city of Tarragona. The Portugueſe and Dutch marched likewiſe into their quarters, all in Catalonia, between Lerida and Barcelona. And thus ended this long and unfortunate campaign, which had been ſo unſucceſsful, that the principality of Catalonia was all that remained in king Charles's obedience. The lord Galway, general Erle, and the Marquis das Minas, with three other Portugueſe generals embarked at Barcelona for Liſbon, and Carpenter remained commander of the Engliſh.

The allies in Spain were in hopes the Portugueſe would have favoured them with a diverſion, but were diſappointed. For, on the contrary, the Spaniards, under the duke of Oſſuna, took Serpa and Moura, and at the ſame time, the marquis de Bay poſſeſſed himſelf of the bridge of Olivenza, threatening, with the aſſiſtance of the duke of Oſſuna, to lay ſiege to that place. The Portugueſe, being reinforced with four Engliſh regiments [w], began to move on their frontiers. Upon which the Marquis thought fit to lay aſide his enterprize, and deſtroying part of the bridge of Olivenza, retired to Badajox. The Portugueſe excuſed themſelves for the little reſiſtance, they made, by their feebleneſs, ſince their beſt troops were in Catalonia.

Mr. Stanhope, who, beſides his poſt of brigadier, had alſo the character of envoy extraordinary and plenipotentiary, took the opportunity of king Charles's broken affairs, to conclude with him a treaty of commerce, which would have been of great advantage to the Engliſh nation, had that prince remained quiet poſſeſſor of the Spaniſh throne. In order to effect this, Mr. Stanhope ingratiated himſelf with the counteſs of Oropeza, a lady of great wit, whoſe huſband was one of the chief grandees of Spain, but, who having abandoned all his great employments and vaſt eſtate, to follow king Charles's fortune, was reduced to extreme indigence; and therefore was the more liable to be managed by a lady, for whom Mr. Stanhope had obtained a conſiderable preſent from the queen. This nobleman who had the greateſt weight in king Charles's Spaniſh council, being gained, and appointed one of his Catholic majeſty's plenipotentiaries, together with the prince of Litchſtenſtien and count de Cardona, admiral of Arragon, a treaty was concluded and ſigned

[r] Which ſcheme (ſays our author) I do not think prudent to divulge. His ſcheme, it is ſaid, was to be made king of Spain himſelf, for which he offered very advantageous terms to England. But this is only conjecture.

[t] Manreſſa is a fine and rich town, in the mountains of Catalonia, famous for giving birth to Ignatius Loyala, founder of the order of Jeſuits. The whole town is entirely devoted to that ſaint, who had borne arms many years. The houſe where he was born is turned into a nunnery, where the inhabitants affirm that on every Whitſunday, when the magiſtrates and all the religious orders in that town make a proceſſion to that cloyſter, the holy ghoſt appears, as a white dove, and perches a good while upon the croſs on the top of the chapel. This miracle, which is managed by the prieſts, is firmly believed by theſe poor mountaineers, who are pleaſed, beyond meaſure, to have ſo remarkable a token of the divine favour to boaſt of above their countrymen. Manuſcript account, &c.

[u] Burnet's account of this affair is as follows: The duke of Orleans, being reinforced with troops after the deſign upon Toulon had miſcarried, ſat down before Lerida, in the end of September, with an army of thirty thouſand men: The place was commanded by a prince of Heſſe, who held out above forty days: After ſome time, he was forced to abandon the town, and to retire into the caſtle: the army ſuffered much in this long ſiege. When the beſieged ſaw how long they could hold out, they gave the earl of Galway notice, upon which he intended to have raiſed the ſiege; and, if the king of Spain would have conſented to his drawing out of the other garriſons, ſuch a force as might have been ſpared, he undertook to raiſe it; which was believed might have been eaſily done; and, if he had ſucceeded, it would have given a new turn to all the affairs of Spain. But count Noyelles, who was well practiſed in the arts of flattery, and knew how much king Charles was alienated from the earl of Galway, for the honeſt freedom he had uſed with him, in laying before him ſome errors in his conduct, ſet himſelf to oppoſe this, apprehending that ſucceſs in it would have raiſed the earl of Galway's reputation again, which had ſuffered a great diminution by the action of Almanza: He ſaid, this would expoſe the little army they had left them to too great a hazard, for, if the deſign miſcarried, it might occaſion a revolt of the whole principality. Thus the humours of princes are often more regarded than their intereſt; the deſign of relieving Lerida was laid aſide. The French army was diminiſhed a fourth part, and the long ſiege had ſo fatigued them, that it was viſible the raiſing it would have been no difficult performance, but, the thoughts of that being over, Lerida capitulated in the beginning of November.

[w] Theſe four regiments, namely, Pearce, Newton, Sankes, and Stanwix, were embarked at Cork for Portugal, about the latter end of April, and arrived at Liſbon the 4th of June, conſiſting of two thouſand nine hundred men. Theſe were all the forces then in the queen's pay in that kingdom.

by them and Mr. Stanhope at Barcelona, on the 10th of July [x].

After the ſigning of this treaty, king Charles was made ſenſible, that the conceſſions granted therein to the Engliſh nation were too large, and ſuch as would not eaſily paſs with his own ſubjects, in caſe he ſhould ever be poſſeſſed of the Spaniſh throne; and therefore it was not without reluctance, and merely in compliance with the neceſſity of his affairs, that he confirmed and ratified the articles of it on the 9th of January 1707-8, ſix months after they had been concluded and ſigned. The perſon, who was intruſted to carry this important treaty to London, having embarked for Barcelona on board a ſmall veſſel for Genoa, that veſſel was unluckily taken by a French frigate. The maſter, as is uſual in ſuch caſes, threw his mail over-board; but it being taken up by ſome divers, was tranſmitted to the marquis de Torci at Verſailles, who took care to ſend privately a copy of the treaty to the ſtates-general, in order to excite their jealouſy of the Engliſh, who were endeavouring by it to engroſs the trade of the Weſt-Indies [y].

The affairs of the Upper Rhine, this campaign, were attended with no greater ſucceſs to the confederates than thoſe of Spain. For the German forces were ſo inconſiderable in their numbers, and ſo ill provided, as not to be able to ſtand a ſudden irruption of the enemy. Marſhal de Villars, who had with great diligence and ſecrecy aſſembled his army early in Alſatia, reſolved to paſs the Rhine, and committed the execution of his deſign to the Marquis de Vivans and the count de Broglio. To this end, he cauſed a bridge of boats to be laid over an arm of the Rhine, and, having landed a great number of grenadiers on the iſland over-againſt Newbourgh the count de Broglio advanced to the Germans, and attacked them with great ſucceſs. After that marſhal de Villars, May 22d, advanced to the lines of Buhl with forty ſquadrons and battalions; and in his march entirely defeated the Germans advanced guard of horſe. On the 23d, at break of day, a fog made it difficult to diſcover whether the Germans, whoſe tents were ſtanding, and who fired ſome cannon-ſhot, continued behind their intrenchments: But, as ſoon as it was cleared up, it appeared, that they had abandoned them, for fear of being attacked in the rear, having notice, that the whole body, commanded by the marquis de Vivans and the count de Broglio had paſſed the Rhine; ſo, at five in the morning, marſhal de Villars entered, without loſs, thoſe lines, which had been eſteemed the rampart of Germany, and in which he found a great many pieces of cannon, and vaſt quantities of ammunition and proviſions. The ſame day he advanced to Raſtadt, took poſſeſſion of the caſtle belonging to the princeſs of Baden, and prepared to follow the Germans with all poſſible expedition. The marſhal having proceeded ſucceſsfully thus far, continued four days at Radſtadt, waiting for his waggons and artillery, and to give neceſſary directions; and, on the 28th, marched with his main army, and incamped at Etlingen, where he found a conſiderable quantity of proviſions. The ſame day, the marquis de Vivans, whom the marſhal had ſent out with fifteen hundred horſe on the road of Pfortzheim, having information, that a body of German horſe were coming towards him, advanced to meet them, who, at his approach, poſted themſelves behind a rivulet; but he charged them ſo vigorouſly, that they were broke and entirely defeated, a hundred and fifty of them being killed, eighty made priſoners, particularly a major of count Merci's regiment, who commanded them, and count de Berlo, together with all their officers, and above a hundred and fifty horſes were taken. Marſhal de Villars advanced to Pfortzheim, and there halted to wait for a convoy of bread and meal from fort Louis; and, on the 31ſt, marched before with the horſe of the right wing, and all the dragoons to follow the Germans, and obſerve their motions; and, on the firſt of June, advanced within two leagues of Stutgard, where he made and had his own demands. The contributions of the Duchy of Wirtemberg were regulated, at two millions and two hundred thouſand livres, payable in three months; thoſe of the little imperial city of Etlingen on the Neckar, at one million and one hundred thouſand, and ſix hundred thouſand livers were demanded of the city of Baden. In Stutgard they found a magazine of four thouſand ſacks of meal, beſides ten thouſand furniſhed by the regency; and marſhal de Villars, not being able to come up with the flying enemy, marched towards Schorndorf, which he cauſed to be inveſted by the marquis de Fremont. The next day, the marſhal came before the place with his whole army; but though the town was pretty ſtrong, both by its fortifications and advantageous ſituation; yet, the inhabitants refuſing to

[x] The ſubſtance of which was, "1. That there ſhould be an univerſal and ſincere peace between the queen of Great-Britain and the king of Spain, their heirs, ſucceſſors, and the ſubjects of both nations. 2. That all the treaties of peace, friendſhip, confederacy, free commerce and navigation between both crowns, ſhould be held to be as firmly renewed and eſtabliſhed, by virtue of this preſent treaty, as if they were inſerted therein verbatim, provided they were not contradictory to one another, nor any way leſſen the force of theſe preſent articles: And that the royal cedulas or patents, which contain divers privileges granted by Philip the fourth, confirmed by the treaty of May 13-23, 1667, and all other grants formerly made by any king of Spain, ſhould have the ſame force and effect with this preſent treaty. 3. That all the ſubjects on both ſides, who had been made priſoners by either, whether in America, or any where elſe, ſhould be reſtored, and ſet at liberty, as ſpeedily as poſſible, without charge or ranſom. 4. That all merchandize and goods, which the ſubjects of Great-Britain might bring and import into the dominions of Spain, for which any cuſtoms under the name of conſumption, or other tolls uſed to be demanded, ſhould not be obliged to pay the ſaid tolls till ſix months after the unlading, or ſale and delivery of the ſaid goods. 5. That the ſubjects of Great-Britain might bring and import into the dominions of Spain all ſorts of goods, wares, manufactures and fruits, and produce of the dominions of Morocco; nor ſhould any greater toll be demanded for the ſame than uſual. 6. That books of rate, called Fueros, containing an exact account of the cuſtoms agreed on by the commiſſioners from the queen of Great-Britain and the king of Spain, ſhould be adjudged and eſtabliſhed within twelve months after the ſigning of this treaty, and be publiſhed through all the Spaniſh dominions. Nor ſhould the Britiſh ſubjects be obliged to pay any greater duties than what is therein ſet down; and for all other goods not mentioned in theſe tables, the rate of ſeven per cent. ſhould be demanded upon the credit of the inſtrument, declaring the charge and prizes of the merchandize and goods, which ſhould be exhibited by the merchant or factor, confirmed by witneſſes on oath. 7. That all goods taken as prize by ſhips of war, ſet out either by the queen or private ſubjects of Great-Britain, ſhould, without any difference, be eſteemed as merchandize and goods of the Britiſh iſlands. 8. That the queen of Great-Britain and the king of Spain ſhould confirm and ratify theſe articles within ten weeks." To this treaty was annexed a ſecret and moſt important article, importing, "That the queen of GreatBritain and the king of Spain being deſirous to knit the ties of the friendſhip and alliance now concluded in ſuch a manner, as that the mutual advantages of it might redound ſo viſibly to the benefit of the ſubjects of both crowns, that their common intereſts might cement an eternal and indiſſoluble union between them; and conſidering, that the moſt effectual and proper means to this end would be to form a company of commerce to the Indies, whereby theſe vaſt and rich provinces of the dominions of his catholic majeſty would enable the monarchies of Great-Britain and Spain to make ſuch diſpoſitions of force, as ſhould, by curbing their enemies, ſecure to their ſubjects an univerſal and laſting tranquility: It was therefore agreed, that ſuch a company of commerce ſhould be formed, conſiſting of the ſubjects of Great-Britain and Spain, in the Indies. But, becauſe it was not poſſible, at preſent, to enter into the particulars of ſuch a ſettlement, becauſe the duke of Anjou was, at this time, poſſeſſed of thoſe provinces of Spain, which are the principal ſeats of trade, it was reſerved to ſettle the form of the ſaid company of commerce to the Indies, till his catholic majeſty ſhould be poſſeſſed of the court of Madrid. But, in caſe unforeſeen accidents ſhould hinder the ſettlement of ſuch a company, his catholic majeſty obliged himſelf, and promiſed for himſelf, and all the kinds, his ſucceſſors, that he would grant to the ſubjects of Great-Britain the ſame privileges, and the ſame liberty of a free trade to the Indies, which his majeſty's own Spaniſh ſubjects ſhould enjoy; a previous ſecurity being given for the payment of the royal duties. That his catholic majeſty likewiſe obliged himſelf, that from the day, that the general peace ſhould be ſettled, and conſequently, that he ſhould be in poſſeſſion of the Spaniſh Indies, to the day that the ſaid company of commerce, ſhould be ſettled, he would give licence and permiſſion, that the ſubjects of Great-Britain might ſend every year to all the ports and other places of the Indies, under the dominion of the crown of Spain, ten ſhips, of five hundred tons each or more, or fewer ſhips, provided their whole burden did not exceed in all five thouſand tons; in which they ſhould be at liberty to tranſport, ſell and traffick for all the merchandizes and commodities, which the Spaniſh ſubjects were permitted to tranſport and traffic for; provided, that they pay all the royal duties, and that the ſaid ten ſhips ſhould be regiſtered in the port of Cadiz, or in ſuch other port of Spain, as his catholic majeſty ſhould appoint, ſetting out from ſuch port to ſail to the Indies, and giving an obligation, that from the Indies they ſhould return to the ſame port in Spain, without touching before at any other port of Spain, Great-Britain, or France, except in caſe of being forced to do ſo by ſtorm. That his catholic majeſty would likewiſe permit, that the ſaid ten ſhips of trade be accompanied by ſuch a number of Britiſh ſhips of war, as ſhould be neceſſary for their greater protection and ſecurity, provided, that, on board the ſaid ſhips of war, there might not be loaded any kind of merchandize: His catholic majeſty declaring likewiſe, that he would not cauſe to be paid, or demand any indulto's, or any other kind of donative, on account of the ſaid ſhips contenting himſelf barely with the punctual ſatisfaction of the royal duties. And the queen of Great-Britain offered and promiſed on her part, that the ſaid ſhips of war ſhould, both in going to, and in returning from the Indies, take under their convoy ſuch ſhips belonging to his catholic majeſty, returning the ſame to the perſons, to whom they ſhould be conſigned. That it being evident to all men, that the forces, with which the crown of France had diſturbed Europe, had been furniſhed and ſupplied by the great treaſures it had drawn from the Spaniſh dominions in the Indies, by the fraudulent introduction of their commodities, and their trade in thoſe countries; it was therefore agreed, that from this time forward, for ever, ever, all Frenchmen, being ſubjects of France, ſhould be entirely excluded, as well out of the ſaid company of commerce, as out of all other kind of trade, within the dominions of the king of Spain, obliging themſelves never to conſent, by any treaty, public or private, to any matter, which ſhould be repugnant to this excluſion of the ſubjects of France."

[y] Dr. Swift means this treaty in his Conduct of the Allies and of the late Miniſtry, p. 38, fifth edition, in the following paſſage: "Our trade with Spain was referred the ſame way: But this they will pretend to be of no conſequence, becauſe that kingdom was to be under the houſe of Auſtria; and we had already made a treaty with king Charles. I have indeed heard of a treaty made by Mr. Stanhope with that prince for ſettling our commerce with Spain. But, whatever it were, there was another between us and Holland, which went hand in hand with it, I mean that of Barrier, wherein a clauſe was inſerted, by which all advantages propoſed for Britain are to be in common with Holland." The doctor's aſſertion in this paſſage is a very groundleſs one; for the treaty of commerce with Spain and the Barrier treaty could not go hand in hand, ſince the former was ſigned on the 10th of July 1713, and the other on the 20th of October 1709.

aſſiſt in the defence of it, the garriſon, to the number of about five hundred men, ſurrendered the place, upon condition of their being conducted to the imperial army. The French found in the place two mortars, fifty-four pieces of cannon, and a conſiderable quantity of ammunition and proviſions. After this ſucceſs, the marſhal being informed, that three thouſand Germans, commanded by general Janus, had intrenched themſelves near Lorch, very advantageouſly, he attacked, and totally defeated them. Janus made a brave reſiſtance; but, being over-powered, his troops were broke, and purſued almoſt as far as Gemund, with the loſs of about ſix hundred men killed, and as many taken priſoners, and among the latter general Janus himſelf, and twenty-ſeven officers. The marſhal afterwards did ſome execution on the rear of the imperial army, who thought it proper to retire towards Hailbron,

The marſhal de Villars had certainly greater deſigns in view, no leſs than reſtoring the elector of Bavaria to his dominions. But, having been obliged to ſend conſiderable detachments towards Provence in France, he durſt not venture further, nor undertake any conſiderable ſiege. While the empire was thus expoſed, all mens eyes turned toward the elector of Hanover, as the only perſon that could recover their affairs out of thoſe extremities, into which they were brought. The emperor preſſed him to accept of the ſupreme command. This was ſeconded by all the allies, but moſt earneſtly by the queen and the ſtates. The elector uſed all the precaution that the embarking in ſuch an affair required, and he had ſuch aſſurances of aſſiſtance from the princes and circles, as he thought might be depended upon; ſo he undertook the command. His firſt care was to reſtore military diſcipline, which had been very little conſidered or ſubmitted to for ſome years paſt; and he eſtabliſhed it with ſuch impartial ſeverity, that the face of affairs was ſoon changed. But the army was too weak, and the ſeaſon too far ſpent to enter on great deſigns. One conſiderable action happened, which very much raiſed the reputation of his conduct. Being informed, that the French had ſeven regiments of horſe and dragoons incamped near Offenburg, under the command of the marquis de Vivans, he detached fourteen hundred men, and one hundred grenadiers under count Merci, to ſurprize the enemy. That general executed his orders with great conduct; and attacked the marquis, Sept. 24, by break of day, and entirely defeated them, killing ſeveral officers, and eight hundred private men. As the French knew nothing of the march of the Germans, they had appointed that day for a forage, which facilitated their defeat. The general made his eſcape with no ſmall difficulty, and his men finding themſelves cloſely purſued, quitted their horſes, and made their retreat through the hedges; ſo that the Germans brought away four ſtandards, a hundred and fifty priſoners, and near thirteen hundred horſes, having had only two lieutenants and thirty private men killed. Soon after, marſhal de Villars took the opportunity to repaſs the Rhine, by the way of fort Louis and fort Kehl; and the elector of Hanover ſeparated his army, and diſpoſed them ſo conveniently in their winter-quarters, that they might aſſemble in forty-eight hours upon any emergent occaſion.

The duke of Marlborough, who had made ſo glorious a campaign the laſt ſummer, merited this year the public attention, chiefly by his important negociations. Upon his arrival at the Hague, he had a conference with the deputies of the ſtates-general, wherein, among other particulars, he told them, "that the troubles of Saxony occaſioning a great diſtraction in the empire, which brought infinite prejudice to the common cauſe; the queen, his miſtreſs, had thought fit to ſend him thither, to pay a compliment to the king of Sweden, and endeavour to engage him to remove the juſt jealouſies, which his long ſtay in the heart of Germany gave to ſome of the high allies, for which purpoſe he had the neceſſary powers from her majeſty, and deſired the ſame from the ſtates." The penſionary having acquainted the ſtates of Holland and Weſt-Frieſeland with the neceſſity of the duke of Marlborough's journey, the matter was thought of ſo great importance to the common cauſe, that they readily concurred in thoſe meaſures, and the duke immediately ſet out for Leipſick by the way of Hanover. Monſieur Auverquerque, veltmarſhal of the ſtates forces, having had ſeveral conferences with the duke of Marlborough, ſet out the ſame day for Bruſſels, in order to aſſemble the confederate troops, and obſerve the French, who began to be in motion about Namur.

The court of England, it ſeems, had been adviſed by the elector of Hanover to ſend the duke of Marlborough to the king of Sweden. It was thought this would pleaſe him much, if it had no other effect. That king ſtill remained with his army in Saxony, to the great oppreſſion of that country, and to the terror of the court of Vienna, who were apprehenſive of his quarrelling with them. His deſigns were kept ſo ſecret, that they could not be penetrated, which made the allies very uneaſy. The king of Sweden was very remarkable on many accounts. He affected a neglect of his perſon, both in cloaths, lodging and diet; all was ſimple, even to meanneſs; nay, he did not ſo much as allow a decent cleanlineſs: He appeared to have a real ſenſe of religion, and a zeal for it, but it was not much enlightened: He ſeemed to have no notion of public liberty; but thought princes ought to keep their promiſes religiouſly, and to obſerve their treaties punctually: He rendered himſelf very acceptable to his army, by coming ſo near their way of living, and by his readineſs to expoſe his own perſon, and to reward ſervices done him: He had little tenderneſs in his nature, and was a fierce enemy, too rough and too ſavage: He looked on foreign miniſters as ſpies by their character, and treated them accordingly; for he kept himſelf on great reſerves with them, nor would he ſuffer them to come near him, except when they had a particular meſſage to deliver. He uſed his own miniſters rather as inſtruments to execute his orders, than as counſellors.

Whilſt the king of Sweden was in Saxony, the czar overran Poland, ſo that king Staniſlaus was forced to fly into Saxony to the king of Sweden, for protection. Both he and his queen ſtaid there all the winter of 1706, and a great part of this ſummer. The czar preſſed the Polanders to proceed to the election of another king, but could not prevail with them. It was therefore generally believed, that they were reſolved to come to a treaty with king Staniſlaus, and to ſettle the quiet of the kingdom, exhauſted by a long and deſtructive war. The czar tried, if it were poſſible to come to a peace with the king of Sweden, and made great offers to that purpoſe; but that king was implacable, and ſeemed reſolved to pull him down as he had done king Auguſtus.

To diſcover this king's intentions was the chief aim of the duke of Marlborough's journey to Alt-Ranſtad, about two German leagues from Leipſick, where the king of Sweden had his head-quarters. The duke was accompanied by Mr. Robinſon, the queen's envoy extraordinary, and Monſieur Cronenburg, the Dutch miniſter. Being informed on the way, that the king could not give him an audience till the next day, the duke thought fit to go directly to count Piper's quarter's [z]. The count made ample proteſtations, how acceptable his coming would be to the king, his maſter, and appointed eleven of the clock the next morning for his repairing to the head-quarters, when his majeſty came from church. The duke went thence to the quarters prepared for him about an Engliſh mile and a half from the king's; and the next morning, at the time appointed, went to wait upon his majeſty. The intendant of the court and other officers received him, and in the anti-chamber count Piper, who conducted him into the cabinet, where the king was, with ſeveral ſenators, generals, and other officers about him. The duke made a ſhort compliment in Engliſh[a], which was interpreted by Mr. Robinſon, as the king's anſwer was by count Piper[b]. Afterwards the duke ſpoke in French, which the king underſtood, but did not ſpeak; and the converſation was general for about an hour, when his majeſty took the duke with him to dinner, placing him on his right hand, and count Piper on his left. After dinner the duke returned with the king to the audience-room, which, after a little while, was voided by the reſt of the company; and then the duke ſpoke at large, his majeſty giving great attention to what was ſaid, with all appearances of much content. Count Piper, who, together with Mr. Harmelin, ſtaid with the king, could not refrain from ſhedding ſome tears at the very pathetic expreſſions, which the duke uſed to aſſure the king of her majeſty's friendſhip, and, on the king's part, made ſuitable returns[c]. Thoſe diſcourſes, and others about military matters, took up an hour and a half, when his majeſty went again to church. Afterwards the duke made a viſit to the counteſs Piper, and had then a conference with the count, and from thence went to ſee the veldt-marſhal Reinſchild's lady. On the 28th he went to Leipſick, to wait on king Auguſtus, with whom he had a private conference of about half an hour, and then returned to count Piper's quarters, where he dined. He had that afternoon a conference with count Piper and baron Gortz about the affairs of Holſtein, in which things were concerted to mutual conſent. In the evening he ſupped with veldt-marſhal Reinſchild. On the 29th he was viſited by count Piper, veldt-marſhal Ogilvy, and many others; and, after having dined with baron Gortz, had his audience of leave of the king of Sweden. Before it was ended, notice was given, that king Staniſlaus was in the anti-chamber; whereupon the duke ſaying, that he had no objection againſt his coming in, the king of Sweden went and brought him. Some civilities paſſed between that king and the duke, who ſoon after took his leave, and went to Leipſick, and thence, without making any ſtay, proceeded on his journey to Berlin. On the 30th of April, he arrived at Charlottenburg, the king of Pruſſia having ſent Monſieur Grumkaw to deſire him to paſs that way. He ſupped that night with the king, and was lodged in the apartment belonging to the margrave. The next day, being Sunday, he accompanied the king to divine ſervice, and monſieur Lenfant, the author of the Hiſtories of the Councils of Baſil and Conſtance, by his majeſty's particular order, preached in French on that occaſion. On the 2d of May the duke left Charlottenburg, in order to proceed towards Hanover, where he arrived on the 3d; and, the day following, had a private conference with the elector. In the afternoon he ſet out for the Hague, where he arrived on the 8th, having received the higheſt marks of honour and eſteem in the ſeveral courts, through which he had paſſed ſince his departure from thence.

[z] This is the account of Mr. Robinſon, afterwards biſhop of London, in his letter from Leipſick, of May 1707, to the earl of Mancheſter. But Monſ. Voltaire, in his life of Charles XII. king of Sweden, affirms, "That, as ſoon as the duke of Marlborough arrived at Leipſick, where king Charles then was, he made his application privately, not to count Piper, the firſt miniſter, but to baron Gortz, who began to have a ſhare in the king's confidence with count Piper. He told Gortz, that the deſign of the allies was, in a ſhort time, to propoſe to the king of Sweden his being once more mediator between them and France. His motives for this were his hopes of diſcovering the king's intentions by Gortz's anſwer, and becauſe he would much rather have had Charles for an arbitrator, than an enemy." Mr. Lediard, in his Life of the duke of Marlborough, Vol. I. p. 457, ſecond edition, obſerves, That this piece of private hiſtory of Monſieur Voltaire's is mentioned by no other hiſtorian, and ſeems very improbable. "I was, ſays he, that night in the city of Leipſick, and the next morning in the camp; but no ſuch thing ever came to my knowledge. Is it probable, that ſo remarkable an incident ſhould eſcape the knowledge of every one, but Monſieur Voltaire's informant? Were not the eyes of every one on the duke at his arrival? Could this interview be ſo privately managed, as not to come to count Piper's knowledge? Would not this have raiſed a jealouſy in him, that muſt have put a ſtop to, or very much entangled, the whole negotiation? And can it be believed, that ſo great a ſtateſman, as the duke was, would have thrown ſuch a ſtumbling-block in his own way, as this would have been, at the very beginning of his treaty? Baron Gortz began indeed at this time to riſe in the king's eſteem and confidence; but he was not yet arrived to that height in his favour to be a rival to Piper, or to dare to enter into a ſecret negotiation without his knowledge." Monſieur de la Motraye, in his Remarks on Voltaire, carries the matter yet farther againſt that writer, and ſays, "That Gortz was out of the queſtion, he being then grand-marſhal of the biſhop of Lubeck, adminiſtrator of the duchy of Holſtein, and was certainly then very little known to the king of Sweden." But it is evident from Mr. Robinſon's letter to the earl of Mancheſter above-cited, that the duke had a conference, on the 28th in the afternoon, with baron Gortz, as well as with count Piper; though he limits that conference with the baron to the affairs of Holſtein, in which, he ſays, 'things were concerted to mutual content.' Monſieur de la Motraye mentions a remarkable incident upon the authority of a gentleman, who was in the coach with the duke, when he went to the audience he had demanded of count Piper: "The duke, ſays he, coming to the gate of count Piper's quarters preciſely at the time appointed, ſent in his meſſage, but was anſwered the count was buſy. The duke waited a good half hour before he came down; but he no ſooner ſaw him at the gate ready to receive him, than he came out of his coach, and, putting on his hat, paſſed by the count without ſaluting him, and went aſide, as if to make water; and then, after having made him wait longer than was neceſſary for that purpoſe, he went up to him, and addreſſed him with that eloquence and politeneſs, which every one knows was natural to him."

The next day, the duke was in conference with the deputies of the ſtates-general, to whom he communicated the aſſurances he had received from the king of Sweden. This entirely diſſipated the jealouſies, which ſome of the allies had conceived of his Swediſh majeſty's deſigns, which were induſtriouſly fomented by the emiſſaries of France, who, on the other hand, uſed all their endeavours to engage that king in an open rupture with the emperor; for which he did not want plauſible pretences. For, about this time, an unlucky quarrel happened between baron Strahlenheim, envoy of Sweden, and count Zobor, an Hungarian lord, ſon-in-law of prince Adam of Litchtenſtein. The occaſion was this: Being both at dinner at the count de la Tour's, and diſcourſing of the affairs of Europe, count Zobor ſaid, Three knaves occaſioned a great deal of miſchief in the world. He named indeed only prince Ragotſki for one, and king Staniſlaus for another, but he made uſe of ſuch expreſſions, as evidently ſhewed, that he meant the king of Sweden for the third: Upon which the Swediſh envoy thought himſelf in honour obliged to give him a box on the ear. The company prevented any farther miſchief at that time, and count Zobor was at firſt confined by order of the emperor, and ſhortly after ſent priſoner to the caſtle of Gratz in Stiria; the commiſſaries appointed to make enquiry into that affair, having reported, that he had been guilty of diſreſpect towards the king of Pruſſia. Baron Strahlenheim having informed the king, his maſter, of what had paſſed, his Swediſh majeſty ordered him to declare, that he approved his conduct; and that he had orders to abſent himſelf from court, till he had received a juſt ſatisfaction, as well on that account, as for the affront offered to ſome officers of his troops, who, being liſting men at Breſlau, were inſulted by the people. The imperial miniſters ſhewed a willingneſs, at this critical juncture, to give the king of Sweden all reaſonable ſatisfaction: But, with regard to count Zobor, they thought, that, baron Strahlenheim having given a blow to a perſon of his quality, and his imperial majeſty having ſince confined him cloſe priſoner, the Swediſh court ought not to inſiſt upon farther ſatisfaction.

This was not, however, the moſt material point, that made the court of Vienna uneaſy; for the Swedes had ſtarted other pretenſions of a more delicate nature; and, in a declaration, which count Piper had communicated to count Zinzendorf, his Swediſh majeſty inſiſting on the delivering up of the Muſcovite troops, which, when they eſcaped the year before out of Saxony, were entertained in the imperial army on the Upper Rhine. Theſe troops being informed, what was in agitation in regard to them, diſbanded themſelves, and marched off, in parties of about twenty, through Bohemia and Moravia into Poland. This ſo exaſperated the king of Sweden, that he renewed and ſtrenuouſly inſiſted upon his demand of the ſurrender of thoſe troops; adding, that he expected a more ample ſatisfaction, as well for the affront offered to baron Strahlenheim, as for the recruits which were raiſed for him in Sileſia, and had been taken from his officers at Breſlau. The very day that theſe demands, [a] This is Mr. Robinſon's own account, who was preſent, and interpreted it; and therefore Mr. Boyer is miſtaken in aſſerting, that the duke made his compliment in French. Lamberti, Vol. IV, p. 434, ſays, that it was in Engliſh, and to this purpoſe:

SIR,

"I preſent to your majeſty a letter, not from the chancery, but from the heart of the queen, my miſtreſs, and written with her own hand. Had not her ſex prevented her from taking ſo long a journey, ſhe would have croſſed the ſea, to ſee a prince admired by the whole univerſe. I eſteem myſelf happy in having the honour of aſſuring your majeſty of my regard; and I ſhould think it a great happineſs, if my affairs would allow me to learn under ſo great a general as your majeſty what I want to know in the art of war."

[b] It was, according to Lamberti, to this effect:

"The queen of Great-Britain's letter and your perſon are both very acceptable to me; and I ſhall always have the utmoſt regard for the interpoſition of her majeſty of Great-Britain, and the intereſts of the grand alliance. It is likewiſe much againſt my will, that I have been obliged to give the leaſt umbrage to any of the parties engaged in it: But your excellency cannot but be convinced, that I had juſt cauſe to come into this country with my troops. On the other hand, you may aſſure the queen, my ſiſter, that my deſign is to depart from hence as ſoon as I have obtained the ſatisfaction I have demanded, but no ſooner. However I ſhall do nothing, that can tend to the prejudice of the common cauſe in general, or to the proteſtant religion in particular, of which I ſhall always glory to be a zealous protector."

Monſieur de Liniers, in his Life of Lewis XIV, tells us, that the king of Sweden added, "That he was not accountable to any one for his actions; and that he would diſcover his deſigns, when he ſhould think proper." This indeed agrees pretty well with the king's general character, but his whole deportment to the duke ſeems to be a contradiction to it.

[c] Monſieur Voltaire ſays, "That the duke, who was never haſty in making propoſals, and had learned by a long experience the art of penetrating into the minds of men, as well as of diving into the ſecret connection between their inmoſt thoughts and their actions, geſtures, and diſcourſe, fixed his eyes attentively upon the king. When he ſpoke to him of the war in general, he imagined, that he ſaw in his majeſty a natural averſion towards France, and that he took a ſecret pleaſure in ſpeaking of the conqueſts of the allies. He mentioned the czar to him, and took notice, that his eyes kindled whenever he was named, notwithſtanding the moderation of the conference. He moreover remarked, that the king had a map of Muſcovy lying before him on the table. This was ſufficient to determine him in his judgment, that the king of Sweden's real deſign and ſole ambition were to dethrone the czar, as he had no other views by remaining in Saxony, than, by that means, to impoſe ſome hard terms on the emperor of Germany. He knew his imperial majeſty would comply, and that thus matters would be eaſily brought to a concluſion. The duke left Charles XII. to his natural inclination; and, being ſatisfied with having diſcovered his intentions, he made him no propoſal." Monſieur de la Motraye, in his remarks upon this paſſage of Monſieur Voltaire, ſays, "I never heard theſe circumſtances mentioned; nor do I know it was ever ſurmiſed, that the duke, by a bare view of the map of Muſcovy lying before the king of Sweden, penetrated into the real deſign of that monarch, which you yourſelf afterwards own the Swedes themſelves were ignorant of, even when they were actually on their march." In anſwer to which Monſieur Voltaire refers to Monſieur Fabricius as his author, and an eye-witneſs. Monſieur de la Motraye adds: "I had the honour to be frequently in the preſence of Charles XII. during his ſojourning at Bender; but I never knew him ſhew any averſion towards France. On the contrary, he always employed Frenchmen in his army preferably to all other foreigners, and could not conceal his concern for them, when he heard of their loſſes. I never knew a Swediſh officer, but what wiſhed well to France; and I never heard any complaints, but only that France had forſaken them in their misfortunes, and had never paid one penny of the ſubſidies ſtipulated between them after the battle of Pultowa." To this Monſieur Voltaire anſwers; "Cabinet meſſengers are admitted to the preſence of their ſovereigns, and are the bearers of their ſecret councils, and yet are never the better informed of them."

which were made to count Zinzendorf, were communicated by him to the imperial court, baron Strahlenheim received orders from the king his maſter, to repair to him, without taking leave of that court. He was prevailed upon to ſtay four days, that he might carry with him the emperor's anſwer to his maſter's demands; but that anſwer not being then ready, he left Vienna, and ſet out for Saxony. Two days after, the anſwer was however ſent, and imported, in ſubſtance, "That the emperor could not deliver up the Muſcovites, they not being in his power: That count Zabor ſhould be proſecuted as a criminal in the courſe of law; and, as for what had happened in Sileſia, with reſpect to the levies for his Swediſh majeſty, ſufficient ſatisfaction ſhould be made, after due examination into the mattter of fact." To give further ſatisfaction to his Swediſh majeſty, the imperial court ſoon after declared, that ſome troops had been detached in purſuit of the Muſcovites, in order to their being delivered up to the king of Sweden, but had not been able to overtake them; and, farther, ſolemnly averred, that the Muſcovites made their eſcape from the Rhine, without their connivance or participation. This declaration was, however, contradicted by Baron Strahlenheim, who in his way from Vienna to Saxony, meeting ſome of thoſe troops, and pretending to be count Wackerbaert, a general in the ſervice of king Auguſtus, they frankly owned, that their eſcape was concerted with the imperial court. This, being entirely believed by the king of Sweden, irritated him the more, and made him inſiſt peremptorily upon full ſatisfaction, with regard to all the three points, before he left Saxony. The emperor dreading the conſequences of a rupture with the Swedes, who might eaſily have over-run his hereditary countries; and having nominated count Wratiſlau to go to the king of Sweden, to adjuſt all differences, that nobleman wrote to count Piper, to know whether he ſhould meet with a favourable reception. But count Piper let him know, "That, if he came with power to give his maſter real ſatisfaction, he would be welcome; but that, if he came to enter into a diſcuſſion of his Swediſh majeſty's pretenſions, he might ſave himſelf the trouble of that journey." Upon this, the imperial court ſent orders to count Zinzendorf to urge count Piper to declare, what ſatisfaction his maſter inſiſted upon, ſince he refuſed to allow his miniſter to diſcuſs it, and to aſſure him, that the emperor was ready to refer the controverted points to the arbitration of the queen of Great-Britain [d]. Her majeſty wrote likewiſe to the king of Sweden, to exhort him to forbear all hoſtilities; but his anſwer was, "That ſeeing the emperor did not give him the ſatisfaction he expected, he ſhould be obliged at laſt to take it, ſince his delaying to do himſelf juſtice had encouraged people to offer him new affronts:" Which laſt expreſſion related to the eſcape of the Muſcovites. The Imperial court not only complied with the king of Sweden's demands, as to the delivering up both count Zobor, and the imperial officers, who hindered the raiſing of the Swediſh levies in Sileſia, as preliminaries to the admiſſion of count Wratiſlau as envoy from the emperor; but declared likewiſe, that the city of Breſlau ſhould pay four thouſand crowns to the widow of a Swediſh corporal, who was killed in that city, in a ſcuffle, occaſioned by the ſeizure of thoſe levies. But this forced compliance did not ſatisfy the king of Sweden, who, upon count Wratiſlau's arrival at Alt-Ranſtadt, refuſed to admit him to his audience. This miniſter was therefore obliged to content himſelf with conferring with count Piper and Monſieur Hermelin, concerning the eſcape of the Muſcovites, which the imperial court now thought was the only important point, that remained unadjuſted. But they were deceived.

It ſeems the proteſtants in Sileſia had their churches, and the free exerciſe of their religion, ſtipulated to them by the treaty of Munſter, and the crown of Sweden was the guarantee for the obſervation of this article. Now, theſe churches being taken from them, the king of Sweden, upon their application, very readily embraced the opportunity which had been long neglected or forgotten by his father, to reſtore them to their juſt rights and privileges. To this end, having ſent four regiments of Swediſh horſe into that country, he multiplied his demands into the following articles: "I. That the emperor ſhould give it under his hand, that he knew nothing of the march of the one thouſand two hundred Muſcovites, who eſcaped through the hereditary countries. II. That he ſhould forthwith decide the affair of the election of Lubeck in favour of the duke adminiſtrator of Holſtein, and confirm the agreement between that houſe and the chapter for the two next generations. III. That the country of Hadeln, on the river Elve, be ſequeſtered into the hands of his Swediſh majeſty, till the right of all the pretenders to it be decided. IV. That the proteſtant religion in Sileſia be reſtored according to the treaty of Weſtphalia. V. That his imperial majeſty ſhould renounce all pretences to the quota which the king of Sweden had not furniſhed towards the preſent war, and ſhould draw no conſequences from the crown of Sweden's not having done homage for the dominions they have in the empire, ſince the year 1664. VI. That the whole Swediſh army, in their return through Sileſia into Poland, ſhould be maintained at the emperor's charge." There were about the ſame time certain other articles handed about privately in Holland, which, it was inſinuated, the king of Sweden deſigned to propoſe to the diet, the chief of which were: "1. That the elector of Bavaria ſhould be reſtored, or, at leaſt, his electorate given to the king of Sweden, and he be declared elector in his room, as being his neareſt relation. 2. That, for the future, the election of emperor ſhould be alternately out of the three religions, ſince the electoral college was compoſed of them. 3. That the proteſtant churches ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed in Sileſia, Moravia, Bohemia, Hungaria, &c. on the ſame foot they were on at the time of his great predeceſſor, Guſtavus Adolphus. 4. That the king of Sweden ſhould have the ſovereignty of the city of Bremen." Theſe articles were probably forged in France; but, with regard to the other ſix articles, they occaſioned ſeveral conferences between count Wratiſlau and count Piper; and the former, being convinced of the neceſſity of preventing a rupture, which would have proved fatal to the common cauſe, paſſed over ſeveral formalities, and granted ſome points, which, at any other time, would have been rejected by the court of Vienna. The confirmation of the treaty between the chapter of Lubeck and the ducal houſe of Gothorp in the year, 1647, and the reſtoration of the exerciſe of the proteſtant religion in Sileſia, were the two articles of hardeſt digeſtion with the imperial court, and therefore met with the greateſt difficulty. The Swedes inſiſted, that they ſhould be allowed to keep ſome troops in Sileſia, till the churches of the proteſtants ſhould be rebuilt, which the imperial court would not agree to; and, on the other hand, they refuſed to approve and ratify the treaty about the biſhoprick of Lubeck, till that affair was fully examined. But the guaranty of the queen of Great-Britain and the ſtates-general removed all obſtacles, and on the 1ſt of September, N. S. all matters were agreed upon.

The next day the king of Sweden decamped very early from his quarters at Alt-Ranſtadt, and count Wratiſlau, having waited upon him, the treaty was ſigned at Wolkwitz that very day; and the imperial miniſter ſet out on the 3d, for Vienna to have the agreement ratified.

King Auguſtus being indiſpoſed, the king of Sweden went to Dreſden, and made him a viſit, with whom he had a long conference. His Swediſh majeſty, being returned to his army, continued his march for Sileſia, where the imperial ratifications of the convention, ſigned by count Wratiſlau, were delivered to him. That prince was ſo well pleaſed with the diſpatch uſed at the imperial court in this affair, that he reſolved to quit Sileſia immediately, and march into Poland, ſo that all his forces were on the other ſide of the Oder before the 25th of September. However, his Swediſh majeſty left the baron de Strahlenheim in Sileſia to ſee the execution of the treaty; and, before his departure from Leibnitz, he had the ſatisfaction to ſee ſeveral churches reſtored to the proteſtants, which was no ſmall mortification to the jeſuits and popiſh prieſts, who made great oppoſition to the performance of what had been ſtipulated; but the imperial court would not provoke a prince who they thought was ſeeking a [d] This is confirmed by the following paſſage, in a letter of the earl of Manchester to the earl of Sunderland from Vienna, May 14, 1707, printed in Mr. Cole's Memoirs of Affairs of State, p. 447.

"The miniſters (ſays lord Mancheſter) have ſpoke to me of the proceedings of the king of Sweden towards this court. This envoy has again renewed with ſtrong expreſſions his demands of having the Muſcovites delivered to him by the emperor, and ſatisfaction for what has paſſed between the count Zobor and his miniſter, which he carries ſo high, as to make it a capital crime, as alſo reparation in the matter of Breſlau; and, in caſe he has not immediate ſatisfaction, he has orders to go away. Theſe things make them very uneaſy here, they lying ſo expoſed. All this he has done within theſe few days; and ſince the duke of Marlborough has been in Saxony, which they hoped had made all things eaſy. I believe, they have not yet determined what meaſures to take; but I believe they have wrote this whole matter to England, and I cannot tell whether it will not ſtop the detachment for Naples, though by this time it ſhould be marched. I do believe, that they wrote this whole matter to England, to be laid before the queen; and I hear they have alſo ſent an expreſs to Holland. I wiſh it may not be the occaſion of recalling ſome troops out of Italy for their own preſervation." Here the earl of Mancheſter ſeems doubtful, whether the duke of Marlborough had been ſo effectually ſucceſsful, as had been hoped; but the earl of Sunderland, in a letter to his lordſhip from Whitehall, May 6, 1707, ſays, "lord Marlborough has, I hope, left matters with the king of Sweden in as good a way as one could expect, which will be a great eaſe on that ſide."

colour to break with them. It is obſervable, that the biſhop of Breſlau, fearing the reſentment of the pope, took a pretence to abſent himſelf from that city, to avoid ſigning the orders given for reſtoring the proteſtants to their former rights. But the king of Sweden, being diſpleaſed with that prelate on this account, ſignified, that he expected, that he ſhould ſign and approve thoſe orders; which formality he thought neceſſary, becauſe the biſhop of Breſlau is the chief perſon in the regency of Sileſia next to the emperor; and therefore his refuſing to ſubſcribe the orders, might afterwards have been drawn into ill conſequence againſt the proteſtants. As for count Zobor, whom the king of Sweden had ſent priſoner to Stetin, he was upon his humble ſubmiſſion ſet at liberty with great marks of generoſity. Upon theſe proceedings the king of Sweden was highly magnified, and great endeavours were again uſed to engage him in the alliance; but he was ſo ſet againſt the czar, whom he deſigned to dethrone, that nothing could divert him from it.

To return to the duke of Marlborough. He arrived at Bruſſels the 13th of May, N. S. and having immediately held a council of war with Monſieur Auverquerque and the field deputies of the ſtates, orders were ſent to the confederate troops to march to their rendezvouz at Anderlach near Bruſſels; from whence they moved to Billengen and Lembeck. Upon intelligence, that the elector of Bavaria and the duke of Vendoſme, who commanded the French army, were come out of their lines, the allies marched to Soignies, with a deſign to engage them in the plain of Flerus: But being further informed, that the enemy were much ſuperior in number, and had drained all their garriſons, with a deſign to plunder the rich open cities of Brabant, in caſe the allies ſhould undertake any ſiege; the confederate generals marched back from Soignies towards Bruſſels, and poſted themſelves at Meldert. At the ſame time, the French advanced to Gemblours; and ſo both armies continued above two months in their reſpective camps. At length, upon certain advice, that the French had detached thirteen battalions and twelve ſquadrons from their army towards Provence, the duke of Marlborough, in concert with Monſieur Auverquerque and the deputies of the ſtates, reſolved to march from Meldert towards Genap, in order to attack the enemy with leſs diſadvantage, in their fortified camp at Gemblours. Accordingly, the diſpoſition was made for the army to paſs the Zeule at the abbey of Florival; which being done, they marched towards Genap, where they incamped with their right at Promelles, and their left at Davieres. Here they had intelligence, that the enemy no ſooner received advice, that the army of the allies was in motion, than they were extremely alarmed, and immediately ordered their troops to their arms. They likewiſe cut down ſeveral trees in the roads and paſſages, which led to their camp, and, having got certain information which way the allies were moving, they began their march with all imaginable precipitation towards Flerus and Heſpenay, intending to be that evening at Goſſeliers, and take poſſeſſion of the ſtrong camp at Pieton. The confederate generals received advice, that the French army had made but a ſhort halt at Goſſeliers, and were advanced to Seneff, the elector of Bavaria having taken his head quarters in the caſtle of Vanderbeck, and the duke of Vendoſme in the farm-houſe of Rel, between Vanderbeck and Seneff, with the river Pieton before them.

The duke of Marlborough and Monſieur Auverquerque having conferred together, it was reſolved to march directly to Nivelle, and attack the enemy; but, coming too late to attack them that day, and having reaſon to believe, that they would attempt to retire in the night, in order to gain the camp at Cambron, all poſſible diligence was uſed to prevent their effecting it. To this end, count Tilly, with forty ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, which were commanded, under him, by the earl of Albermarle, and the major-generals count d' Erbach and Roſs, and a detachment of between five and ſix thouſand grenadiers, commanded by lieutenant-general Scholten and major-general Zoutland, was ordered to poſt himſelf between the two armies; and, in caſe the enemy decamped, to fall upon their rear, and keep them in play, till the whole army ſhould come up. Theſe troops, notſtanding they marched with all poſſible diſpatch, could not reach their poſts before midnight. The French, in the mean time, foreſeeing what was the duke of Marlborough's deſign, and perceiving, that it would not be poſſible for them to avoid an engagement, if they continued in their camp till the morning, reſolved to decamp in the night, and count Tilly, advancing before break of day with his detachment, ſaw their army in full march, making their retreat in very good order from hedge to hedge, and obſerved the country to be ſo difficult, that it would be next to impoſſible to come at them. He gave immediate notice of this to the duke of Marlborough, and informed him, that he was marching to endeavour to attack their rear, according to his orders. Upon this the duke detached twenty battalions, and thirty ſquadrons, under the command of general count Lottum, to ſupport count Tilly; the horſe being commanded by lieutenant-general Dopf, the ſieur Schulenburgh, and the earl of Athlone, major-generals; and the foot by lieutenant-general Fagel, and major-general Welderen. Count Tilly marched with all poſſible ſpeed, and had ſeveral ſkirmiſhes with the enemy's rear; but, having purſued them three or four hours, as far as the plains of Marimont, and obſerving, that it was to no purpoſe to fatigue the troops, he returned to the camp. The country was cut by many deep roads, which very much favoured the enemy's retreat; for there they poſted ſome of their infantry, which hindered the confederate horſe from making openings to follow them. The duke of Marlborough, who was advanced with a detachment, being returned to the camp, reſolved to remain there that day, to give the troops ſome repoſe, after the fatiguing march they had made; and, becauſe he was under an uncertainty, whether the enemy marched towards their lines, or to Cambron, Monſieur Auverquerque ſent one of his aids de camp, with one hundred and fifty huſſars, to poſt himſelf on the hills of the Great-Roulx, from whence they diſcovered the enemy's march at about half a league's diſtance. That officer reported, that the vanguard was advanced to St. Dennis, having the river Haiſne behind them; which was confirmed by the ſpies, who added, that the elector of Bavaria had his quarters at St. Dennis, and the duke of Vendoſme at Caſtiaux.

From this march the generals concluded, that the enemy did not deſign to retire within their lines, but rather to poſſeſs the advantageous camp at Cambron: Upon which the confederate army decamped from Nivelle; but, having the whole day a very violent rain, which made the roads almoſt unpaſſable, it was very late, when the right came to Soignies, and the left could not come up till the next morning, though a thouſand pioneers had been three days at work to repair the road from Arquennes to Soignies. The confederate army ſuffered very much in this march, but the enemy laboured under much greater difficulties; for, having lain on their arms at St. Dennis all night, they purſued their march early the next morning with great precipitation, and in the ſame confuſion as before, to Chievres, where they arrived at the ſame time the confederates came to Soignies. This haſty retreat, beſides the fatigue, occaſioned a very great deſertion among the French; for, their ſoldiers having been without bread for more than two days, and without reſt for three, not having time to put up their tents between Seneff and Chievres, about a thouſand of them went over to the confederate camp, and as many more at leaſt to Bruſſels and other places. The enemy was, beſides, in want of all ſorts of neceſſaries, during their whole march from Gemblours, their baggage being ſent away from thence, with their artillery to Charleroy, upon the firſt motion of their army to avoid an engagement.

The great rains, which continued for ſome days, having rendered the ways wholly unpaſſable, obliged the duke of Marlborough to give over the purſuit of the enemy, and detained the confederate army in the camp at Soignies. The enemy, in the mean time, fortified the avenues to theirs, as well as the unſeaſonableneſs of the weather would allow them; and though their army was ſoon after re-inforced with ſix battalions and two regiments of horſe from the flying camp of count de la Motte; yet they retired farther beyond the Marque, and incamped with their right at Pont a Treſin, and there left under the cannon of Liſle. Monſieur Rouſſet, in his account of this march, obſerves, that the confederate army left their camp at Soignies, on the 31ſt of Auguſt, and marched directly towards the enemy, who were at Cambron: That the prince of Orange, as general of the republic, put himſelf at the head of the Dutch infantry; but that the French had no ſooner advice of this march, than they quitted the camp at Cambron with great precipitation, notwithſtanding the advantageous ſituation, paſſed at length the Scheld, and retired behind their lines between Liſle and Pont a Treſin: That, if the allies had begun their march an hour or two ſooner, they might have fallen upon the rear-guard of the French army, whom they ſaw following the body of it: And that the van of the allies got into their camp, where they found beer, wine, and ſeveral other things, which the French had not time to carry away with them. The allies advancing again towards them, the duke of Marlborough had intelligence, that the French had made a diſpoſition to forage at Templeuve and the villages thereabouts: He therefore marched out by break of day with twenty thouſand foot, five thouſand horſe, and twelve pieces of cannon, with a deſign to attack the guard, that covered them, and, by that means, endeavour to bring them to a general action; but the enemy being informed of the duke's intention, did not think fit to venture out of their camp. The duke therefore ordered his troops to forage thoſe places, that the enemy might have no farther benefit from them; which was done without the leaſt oppoſition, though under the cannon of Tournay, within a league of the enemy's camp, and three from that of the confederates; ſo fearful were the French of expoſing themſelves to any hazard, though with never ſo viſible an advantage. The duke of Marlborough finding it impoſſible to bring the duke of Vendoſme to an engagement, the French camp being covered with the Scheld and their intrenchments, he left the camp at Helchim on the 4th of October, N. S. and went to the Hague, where he arrived, on the 6th, at nine in the morning, and made a viſit to the grand penſionary and Monſieur de Slingerland, ſecretary of the council of ſtate. The ſame day he had a conference with the deputies of the ſtates-general, wherein he communicated the orders he had received from the queen of Great Britain, to repair to Francfort, and confer with the electors of Mentz and Hanover about the operations of the next campaign. The next morning he had another conference with theſe deputies, and, in the evening, ſet out for the army, to give the neceſſary orders for the marching into winter quarters. Immediately after his arrival there, the troops which were deſigned for the garriſons of Menin, Courtray, and Oudenarde, went into thoſe places; and, when the reſt of the army came to Aſche, they continued till they heard the French army was ſeparated, upon which all the confederate troops went into winter quarters, being much the ſame as they had been the laſt year.

The duke of Marlborough ſet out for Germany, and was met by the elector palatine at Bruck, about a league from his caſtle of Banſberg; and, the next day, he arrived at Francfort, where the electors of Hanover and Mentz being already come, they had ſeveral conferences together, but nothing was concluded, till the arrival of Count Wratiſlau, the emperor's plenipotentiary; nor even then neither, becauſe the count declared, that he was not fully inſtructed. Upon this the conferences broke off; and the two electors left Francfort, and the duke of Marlborough returned to the Hague, attended by Count Wratiſlau, and arrived there on the 3d of November. During his ſtay, he communicated to the ſtates-general what had paſſed at Francfort; and their deputies having had ſeveral conferences with the imperial miniſters, the ſtates reſolved to uſe all poſſible means to engage the empire, to make greater efforts for the future than they had hitherto done. In order to this, they wrote a preſſing letter to the diet of Ratiſbon, wherein, after having repreſented the great deficiencies and delays of the Germanic body from time to time in the performance of what they were by treaty bound to, and the ill conſequences, which had hitherto attended them, they concluded with ſaying, "That their high mightineſſes would continue to contribute their utmoſt towards bringing about the great work, which they had, jointly with them, undertaken; but that they expected the like from his imperial majeſty and the empire, ſeeing they were obliged to it by their alliances and the common intereſt; and, in caſe of non-performance, their high mightineſſes proteſted againſt all the ill conſequences thereof."

The duke of Marlborough, having ſettled ſeveral other affairs with the ſtates, embarked for England, and came to St. James's on the 7th of Nov. O.S.

The queen of Great-Britain, the ſtates-general, and the duke of Savoy had formed (as hath been ſaid) a project of invading Provence in France, in order to take or deſtroy Toulon and Marſeilles; which deſign, if it could have been effected, would have ruined the maritime power of France, and been of infinite advantage to Great-Britain and Holland, by ſecuring and enlarging their trade, and to the whole confederacy, by depriving the enemy of means to carry on their profitable commerce to the Weſt-Indies, which alone enabled them to proſecute the war. But the court of Vienna laid the deſign of reducing the kingdom of Naples, which, as it tended to divide the confederate army in Italy, claſhed with the other enterprize, and therefore was ſtrongly oppoſed by Great Britain and Holland, the earl of Mancheſter, who paſſed through Vienna in his way to Venice, having remonſtrated againſt it [e]. Theſe repreſentations having proved ineffectual, and the court of Vienna inſiſting, that the forces of the allies were ſufficient to carry on both theſe enterprizes at once; count Thaun, with a ſtrong body of imperialiſts, marched from Lombardy through the eccleſi-

The earl of Sunderland to the earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, March 7, 1706-7. O.S.

Having received by the laſt poſt an account of an agreement between prince Eugene and the prince of Vaudemont, for the withdrawing all the French troops out of Italy, and apprehending leſt the court of Vienna, upon this, may be more intent than ever, upon the deſign of ſending troops into the kingdom of Naples, and Monſieur Vryberge having, in a memorial to her majeſty, repreſented the ſame thing; her majeſty has commanded me to acquaint your lordſhip, that it is her pleaſure, that you haſten your journey to Vienna as much as poſſible; and that you do repreſent to that court, in her majeſty's name, how deſtructive any ſuch deſign would be to the carrying on the war in Dauphine and Provence, which is ſettled and concerted with the duke of Savoy, and which is the only way, by which France can be affected, or a diverſion made in favour of king Charles.

The earl of Mancheſter to the duke of Marlborough.

Hague, March 25, 1707.

I have waited on the penſionary, and I told him, that I had orders to make what haſte I could to Vienna; and that her majeſty did entirely concur with the ſtates-general, in relation to the project concerted with the duke of Savoy. He ſeemed to think, that the agreement that is made in Italy, for the French troops to retire to Safa, may be of ill conſequence: and this he ſuppoſes is the reaſon, why her majeſty nor the ſtates-general were not made acquainted with it from the imperial court, leſs they ſhould have diſſuaded them from it.

Marquis de Prie to count Leightenſtein.

April 8, 1707.

We are at laſt come to the favourable moment to be able to undertake the conqueſt of Naples, with all the appearances of a ſpeedy and happy ſucceſs. The kingdom is entirely unprovided with troops; the people ſhew openly enough a good diſpoſition for the very auguſt houſe, and they are at liberty to follow it. The retreat of the enemies out of Lombardy will give ſtill more courage to the well-intentioned. We have even all the reaſon to believe, that France has already reſolved to renounce that kingdom, which ſhe would, beſides, have difficulty enough to ſupport. The cabinet of France will reflect without doubt, that the ſending a ſmall body of men would be ſacrificing them with the country; and ſhe cannot ſend thither a great one without unarming the frontiers on the ſide of Piedmont, which is entirely open, after the demolition ſhe has made of Nice and Montmeillan, rather to ſatisfy her animoſity againſt his royal highneſs of Savoy, than to follow her intentions. Our army will be ſtronger and in a better condition to act, than that of the laſt campaign, which has ſurmounted ſo many obſtacles. All the troops of the allies remain in Italy. The imperial army will be reinforced conſiderably by the recruits and the remounting. That of his royal highneſs will be re-eſtabliſhed to the number of ſeventeen thouſand men. We are here almoſt ready to undertake the expedition of Naples, and the entry into France, both at the ſame time. The enemies will not be able in this uncertainty to ſend troops into the kingdom of Naples, which they would hereafter not be able to withdraw, or reinforce, as ſoon as the fleet ſhall appear in the Mediterranean. On our ſide we can carry on that war with all ſort of convenience and advantage. Our troops, and eſpecially our horſe, will go by land, whilſt France will be obliged to immenſe difficulties and expences to embark their cavalry. She may remember the conſequences of the engagements at Meſſina: The too great diſtance cauſed her ſo great a diverſion, that the court of France was at laſt perſuaded to abandon, ſcandalouſly enough, that enterprize, at a time when ſhe made war every where elſe with advantage enough. But, if ſhe would even make all ſorts of efforts, we ſhall be always able to make detachments from this army great enough to maintain a ſuperiority. So that ſhe will either ruin herſelf in ſupporting a diſtant war, full of expence and difficulty, or we ſhall have fair play; and we can finiſh the expedition in one march, and even make uſe elſewhere of the troops, that will not be neceſſary to guard the country; whence we can eaſily embark the foot, and tranſport them in a little to Final, or perhaps into Provence. We could even, in caſe of neceſſity, ſend them into Spain. I have made good uſe of theſe reaſons to perſuade the miniſters of England and Holland of the facility of this enterprize. I have ſhewn, that it does not hinder us at all in any of the operations, and the view we have of entering into France, which they have much at heart; and, far from that, the conqueſt of theſe two kingdoms will facilitate the means to puſh that war more vigorouſly, and to finiſh it perhaps more quickly, whilſt it may chance to determine the Spaniards to return to their duty, to preſerve the eſtates in Italy to their monarchy. I have alſo endeavoured to confirm his royal highneſs in the firſt reſolutions which were taken, and of which we formed the projects at the end of the laſt campaign, which were then ſent to England; whilſt we were very much attacked by the remonſtrances and difficulties, which the two powers made, and by the zeal he has to puſh his point vigorouſly on the ſide of France, according to the deſire and inſtances of England and Holland, and the hopes we have to cauſe ſome commotions. His royal highneſs has declared, that he would ſubmit to what the emperor ſhould order about it, and that he will be ready to execute it.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. Secretary Harley.

Vienna, April 25, 1707.

I arrived here on the 21ſt, and had been here ſooner, had I not met with contrary winds on the Danube, though I find it would have been much the ſame thing, for this week every one is in devotion. I have, nevertheleſs, ſeen Monſieur de Zinzendorf and Monſieur Wratiſlau, and did not fail to take the firſt opportunity to ſhew that the ill conſequence to the intended deſign of proſecuting the war into France, ſhould they firſt undertake that of Naples; and I did acquaint them with the orders I had received from her aſtical ſtate, and ſtruck no ſmall terror into the court of Rome, as they paſſed near it. It was apprehended, that ſome reſiſtance would have been made in Naples by thoſe, who governed there under king Philip; but the inbred hatred, which the Neapolitans bore to the French, together with the ſeverities of their government, had put that whole kingdom into ſuch a diſpoſition to revolt, that the ſmall party, which adhered to king Philip, found it not adviſeable to offer any reſiſtance, and had only time enough to convey their treaſure, and all their richeſt goods to Gaeta, and to retire her majeſty. As for count Zinzendorf, he was not ſo poſitive as the latter; but they both agreed in this, that it would not in the leaſt prejudice that undertaking; for ſince the French were entirely out of Italy, there were troops ſufficient for both. That prince Eugene was to ſtay, though his preſence would have been of very great conſequence: That they had given their reaſons to Monſieur Dopf, which they hoped would ſatisfy her majeſty; as alſo the ſtates-general. I had a great deal of diſcourſe on that ſubject with the latter, who, I fear, has no great opinion of the project concerted with the duke of Savoy. When I preſſed that matter, he did ſay, that, by the grand alliance, that of Naples was firſt to be undertaken; and that the emperor was not able to ſuſtain this war without ſome aſſiſtance of that nature: That every thing was ready here, and they had reaſon to believe, they ſhould ſucceed with a ſmall number of troops. I do not doubt but her majeſty is already informed of the reaſons they alledge; and I cannot but think, though they do not poſitively own it, that the orders are already gone to Italy.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Sunderland.

Vienna, April 27, 1707.

Yeſterday I had my audience of the emperor, when, after I had made him the uſual compliments on the part of her majeſty, and told him how great a ſatisfaction it was to her, as alſo to her allies, that his majeſty had granted the inveſtiture of the duchy of Milan to the king of Spain, and that her majeſty had commanded me to receive his orders before I went to Italy; then I acquainted him, that the expedition into France was of the laſt conſequence, not only in relation to the common cauſe, but alſo to the ſecuring the crown of Spain to the king: That her majeſty did hope, that he had given all the neceſſary directions, in order to ſupport it as far as it is poſſible: That it was a matter that ſo nearly concerned her majeſty, in regard it related to the king of Spain, that ſhe did hope there would be no objections made to it. I alſo took notice of the orders I had received in relation to the duke of Savoy. The emperor anſwered me, in relation to her majeſty, with all the acknowledgments imaginable; but did not touch on any thing of the inveſtiture of the duchy of Milan. As to the duke of Savoy, he ſaid, that he had done, and would do what remained, not only in regard to him, whom he ſpoke extremely well of, but alſo in regard to the queen. I have again preſſed all the miniſters to lay aſide for the preſent the ſending a detachment to Naples, &c.——Yeſterday arrived an expreſs from count Galas. The letters are of the 9th inſtant, O. S. I perceive they do not pleaſe here, for they are much ſet on the expedition to Naples. I aſked Monſieur Zinzendorf, whether the reaſons they had given Monſieur Dopf had changed their minds in England, in the affair of Naples; but he ſeemed to own it had not.

Memorial of the Dutch envoy.

The ſtates-general of the United-Provinces have ordered the underwritten miniſter at the imperial court, under the date of the 11th of April, 1707, to repreſent here, that they muſt judge, by the ſmall preparations that are made by the ſaid court in Italy, for the concerted expedition againſt France from that ſide, that the imperial court takes the ſaid expedition very little to heart; but that it ſeems rather, that they think here only on that of Naples; which their high mightineſſes can, however, not approve of, nor can they find the reaſons alledged on the part of the ſaid court ſufficient to juſtify it, becauſe, the great aim of the war and the alliance being to bring France to reaſon, the invaſion of France is the moſt certain and the moſt likely method to do it; and the more the forces, that are to be employed in this, ſhall be conſiderable, ſo much greater will be the effect hoped from it, whilſt the expedition for Naples deviates from it, and cannot but leſſen the ſucceſs of it, by leſſening the forces, without cauſing the enemy any diverſion; and whilſt we ſhall by this put ourſelves in danger of loſing Spain, which would be a loſs by no means to be made up by all the advantages, that can be obtained by the expedition of Naples. It is therefore, that their high mightineſſes hope, that his imperial majeſty would ſtill be pleaſed to deſiſt from the ſaid enterprize to Naples; and they have ordered their underwritten miniſter to make the moſt preſſing inſtances, that all the forces, that are in Italy, may be employed in the expedition againſt France; and that all the neceſſary preparations for this may be forthwith made, with more ſeriouſneſs and application, than could hitherto be perceived.

Vienna, April 25, 1707. J. J. HAMEL BRUYNINX.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Harley.

Vienna, April 30, 1707.

Here are no letters yet from England; ſo that I continue, as often as I ſee the miniſters, to perſuade them to lay aſide the expedition of Naples, which I believe they will do, unleſs it be approved of by her majeſty. What makes them more zealous in that matter is the apprehenſion, that in Holland they might be brought, at a general peace, to conſent to the diſmembering it from the Spaniſh monarchy; and, if once they are in poſſeſſion of it, England will never conſent to it. They flatter themſelves, that upon their appearing, the people will declare. As to the intended expedition into France, it is certain, that this court has ſent the recruits they promiſed, as alſo the mounting for their horſe. They alſo aſſure me, that they are doing what is neceſſary in relation to their magazines; but I am confident, that in this they will fall ſhort; and I can eaſily perceive, that their meaning is, only till their troops can enter into France; and then they muſt ſubſiſt themſelves, or we muſt do it: which I find is the true reaſon, which makes them ſay, that of Provence is moſt practicable, becauſe, as I ſuppoſe, they think they can be ſubſiſted by our fleet. They aſſure me, that what is agreed on will be performed.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Sunderland.

Vienna, May 4, 1707.

They are ſtill zealous for the expedition of Naples. Theſe troops, as they promiſe, ſhall not exceed ſeven thouſand men; and that, in caſe they do not ſucceed, they will not ſend a man more; but thoſe are to canton, and to keep their ground, till a more favourable opportunity. General Thaun is to command them, and under him general Kriegbaum, who ſet out yeſterday with orders to prince Eugene to have the troops ready; and it may be to march, for there is no time to be loſt. But I am ſtill of opinion, they will wait till they ſee what the king of Sweden will do, and what aſſurances the duke of Marlborough has. Here are letters come from thence, which mention, that his grace was in conference with count Piper for ſeveral hours; that my lord duke arrived there on the 26th, and was to go away on the 29th, but they could not tell any particulars. No expreſs is come here from the emperor's miniſters, which makes them fear here, that things are not right. The letters all agree, that they very much doubt it, which, I believe, will be the only inducement to prevent ſending a detachment to Naples. For the preſent, I take all occaſions to diſſuade them from it; but their anſwer is always what I have already mentioned; as alſo that there will be more troops left, after this detachment ſhall be made, than can be employed. The emperor will have thirty-five thouſand men in Italy, and in our pay, as they ſay, twenty-thouſand. There ſhould be twenty-eight thouſand. But the Heſſians, Sax-Gotha, and Palatines will not be complete. The duke of Savoy has thirteen thouſand. So that the army will conſiſt of about ſixty-eight thouſand men. Now the concluſion is, that, if ſeven thouſand out of this army go, there will ſtill remain troops ſufficient for garriſons, and a very great army for the expedition, and more than can be ſubſiſted. Theſe are the arguments they make uſe of, both to the envoy of Holland and to myſelf. We ſtill perſiſt to perſuade them to lay aſide this expedition for the preſent. What they will do, time muſt ſhew; for nothing is certain here, as your lordſhip cannot but know very well.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Sunderland.

Vienna, May 7, 1707.

Here are no letters from England by the Dutch poſt; but the orders, the envoy of Holland has received, continue the ſame in relation to the expedition of Naples, which, they continue to ſay, cannot fail to ſucceed, all things being prepared there for a general revolution, and that, if they ſhould not go, they would expoſe all their friends. Here are ſome perſons of quality of Naples, to whom they give penſions. Theſe are to go with the troops, but I do not find as yet, that they have any orders. The arguments here are ſtill, that the duke of Savoy does not propoſe for this expedition more than thirty-five thouſand men: That there will be left a great body of men, after what is intended is executed: That they are very much ſurprized at our being ſo much againſt this expedition; but they give me to underſtand, that they know from whence all this comes: That there may be a particular view in a certain prince, that the duke of Anjou ſhould have Naples at a general peace. They are very well ſatisfied by what I have ſaid, that this can never be the intention of England, or that they can ever agree to it: I muſt confeſs, that, by all the informations I can get, I cannot ſee, but there will be ſeventy thouſand men in Italy; and if the detachment to Naples ſhould amount to ten thouſand men, and the garriſons in Lombardy to ten thouſand more, there will ſtill remain a very great army: What there is to be apprehended is, that there are not thoſe magazines prepared, as, in caſe this court is to do it, are neceſſary.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Sunderland.

Vienna, May 11, 1707.

I believe you will have received, before this comes to your lordſhip, the certainty of the detachment's going to Naples. It conſiſts of five regiments of foot, and five of horſe, which, though not complete, will amount to ten thouſand men, as you will ſee by the incloſed. They are at preſent in the Modeneſe; and, about the 16th inſtant, they begin their march to Naples. I have done all I could to perſuade them to defer it. Their arguments are ſtill the ſame; only they ſay farther, that prince Eugene has wrote to England to ſatisfy the queen, that it will not prejudice the great deſign againſt France. They have all often repeated, and do ſtill promiſe, that there ſhall not be a man more ſent, let the ſucceſs be what it will, till they ſee the event of the other expedition, which, as I can perceive, they have no great opinion of, though they agree, that it ought to be attempted.

The earl of Sunderland to the Earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, May 6, 1707.

I have the honour of your lordſhip's letters of the 27th and 30th of April, N. S. and am very glad to find you have ſome hopes, that that court will lay aſide their thoughts of the expedition to Naples. It was always very unſeaſonable, but particularly ſo now, ſince our great misfortune in Spain. Upon theſe accounts her majeſty would have your lordſhip inſiſt, in the ſtrongeſt manner poſſible, againſt this expedition to Naples, as that, which will very much obſtruct, if not totally defeat the main deſign of entering France by Dauphine or Provence, which ſeems to be the only means of bringing France to reaſon, and retrieving our misfortune in Spain.

Mr. ſecretary Harley to the earl of Mancheſter.

I received this morning the honour of your excellency's letter of April 30. I am heartily glad your excellency has had ſo much ſucceſs, as to ſhake that court from their ſpeculative expedition againſt Naples. But I am very ſorry, that the misfortune of our army in Spain is an irreſiſtible argument to lay aſide wholly that project. The account we have of this diſaſter are only got from France; yet they bring too many marks of truth not to be credited ſo far, as that we have received a very great loſs there. The queen has done all that is poſſible on the ſudden event, and in this great uncertainty. Orders are gone this night to encourage the king of Portugal to keep firm to the alliance; and likewiſe to Holland, to conſult with them the beſt way to recover the blow. But all will be to no purpoſe, unleſs the emperor will exert himſelf upon this occaſion, not only to lay aſide the expedition to Naples, to puſh vigorouſly into France, but alſo to act offenſively upon the Rhine. Theſe are points which the queen hath ſo much at heart, that her majeſty hath wrote to the emperor with her own hand, which I incloſe herewith to your excellency, that you may pleaſe to deliver it with all poſſible ſpeed; and that you may be better apprized of it, I incloſe thither. They reckoned, that they ſhould either be relieved from France, by ſea, or obtain a capitulation; or, if that failed, they had ſome ſhips and gallies, in which they might hope to eſcape. The Imperials took poſſeſſion of Naples, where they were received with great rejoycing. But their ill conduct quickly moderated that joy, and very much diſpoſed the Neapolitans to a ſecond revolt; but upon applications made to the courts of Vienna and Barcelona, the exceſſes of the Imperialiſts, who carried the ravenous diſpoſition with them wherever they went, were ſomewhat corrected, ſo that they became more tolerable [f]. As ſoon as a government could be ſettled at Naples, they undertook the ſiege of Gaeta, which went on at firſt very ſlowly; ſo that thoſe within it ſeemed to apprehend nothing ſo much as the want of proviſions, upon which they ſent the few ſhips they had to Sicily, to bring them ſupplies. When theſe were ſent away, the Imperialiſts, knowing what a rich booty was lodged in the place, preſſed it very hard, and in concluſion took it by ſtorm, and ſo were maſters of all the wealth that was in it. The garriſon retired to the caſtle, but they were ſoon after forced to ſurrender, and were all made priſoners of war. It was propoſed to follow this ſucceſs, with an attempt upon Sicily; but it was not eaſy to ſupply Naples with bread; nor was the Engliſh fleet at liberty to aſſiſt them; for they were ordered to lie on the coaſt of Spain, and to wait there for orders; which, when they arrived, required them to carry the marquis das Minas, and the earl of Galway, with the forces of Portugal, to Liſbon: The thoughts of attempting Sicily were therefore laid aſide for this time; though the Sicilians were known to be in a very good diſpoſition to entertain it. A ſmall force was ſent from Naples to ſeize on thoſe places, which lay on the coaſt of Tuſcany, and belonged to the crown of Spain; ſome of which were ſoon taken; but Porto Longone and Port Hercole made a better reſiſtance.

In the month of June, the deſign upon Toulon began to appear. The queen and the ſtates-general ſent a ſtrong fleet thither commanded by ſir Cloudeſly Shovel. Prince Eugene had the command of the Imperial army, which was to ſecond the duke of Savoy in this undertaking, upon the ſucceſs of which the final concluſion of the war depended. The army was not ſo ſtrong, as it was intended it ſhould have been, on account of the detachment, which was ſent to Naples, and the ſtopping in Germany of eight or ten thouſand recruits, that had been promiſed to be ſent to reinforce prince Eugene; for the emperor was under ſuch apprehenſions of a rupture with Sweden, that he pretended it was abſolutely neceſſary, for his own ſafety to keep a good force at home. Prince Eugene had likewiſe orders not to expoſe his troops too much; by which means they were the leſs ſerviceable [g]. Notwithſtanding theſe diſappointments, the duke of Savoy, after he had for ſome weeks covered his deſign by a feint upon cloſe alſo a copy for your peruſal. Your excellency will enforce it with ſuch arguments, as you will find, according to your great ſagacity, may beſt incline his Imperial majeſty to comply with ſo reaſonable a deſire; and you will be pleaſed to preſs the emperor to ſend his brother the king of Spain ſome troops. Without that, it will be hard for her majeſty to prevail with the ſtates-general to join with her in ſending more troops.

The queen to the emperor.

Sir, my brother,

The advantage, which the enemy has now obtained in Spain, might have ſuch diſmal conſequences, that I could not forbear to tell you, that it is of the utmoſt importance, that all your troops, that are in Italy, ſhould be employed to make an invaſion in France; and that, at the ſame time, the army in the empire ſhould act with vigour on the Rhine. Spain is ſo far from the countries, in which my troops, and thoſe of the ſtates-general, are, that there is no remedy ſo quick nor ſo powerful, as that of making this invaſion. Your majeſty is too well informed, to amuſe yourſelf with a little expedition for ſome member or dependency of that kingdom, when the noble and principal parts of the monarchy in queſtion, the honour and welfare of my brother the catholic king, and in his perſon the dignity of the auguſt houſe of Auſtria, are concerned. I promiſe myſelf therefore from your prudence, that you will think only on the re-eſtabliſhment of the affairs of that prince, by obliging his enemies to recall their troops for the defence of their own dominions.

Kenſington, May 6, 1707. I am
Your majeſty's moſt affectionate ſiſter,
ANNE R.

The duke of Marlborough to the earl of Mancheſter.

Bruſſels, May 17, 1707.

I did not receive the honour of your excellency's letter of the 27th of laſt month, till my return from Saxony to the Hague, where I made ſo ſhort a ſtay, that I hope you will excuſe my not anſwering it ſooner. I have ſeen by other letters from Vienna of later date, how obſtinately they purſue the expedition againſt Naples, notwithſtanding all the repreſentations, that have been made to diſſuade them from it. A jealous humour prevails ſo much at that court, that they will not ſeriouſly weigh and conſider their own intereſt, ſo that the beſt arguments are thrown away. I expect ſoon to hear, whether our misfortune in Spain has made ſuch impreſſion, as it ought, with them.

The earl of Mancheſter received on the 18th of May 1707, a note from Mr. Hamel Brutyninx, envoy from the ſtates-general at Vienna, to let his excellency know, that he had received from the prince of Salms an extract of a letter, wherein it was ſaid, among other things, that the detachment for Naples was great enough to maintain a ſuperiority, which the envoy ſaid would by no means pleaſe his maſters at the Hague. "It was then pretty plan, ſays Mr. Cole, that the Germans had no great deſire for Spain, but wanted only Italy; and that they had not the expedition of Toulon at heart, fearing the aggrandizing the duke of Savoy, whilſt they ſpread reports, as if that prince was not to be truſted, and prepared to lay the blame on him, if, according to their with, the expedition ſhould not ſucceed."

The earl of Mancheſter to the lord-treaſurer Godolphin.

Vienna, May 18, 1707.

I was unwilling to leave this place without acquainting your lordſhip with the ſituation of affairs here, where there are ſo many miniſters, each oppoſing the other, that every thing, how reaſonable ſoever the matter is, meets with delays, and ſometimes fatal ones. This has made the emperor fling himſelf more than ever entirely into the hands of the prince of Salms, who is ſo troubled with the gout, that the emperor comes to him. The whole buſineſs of the reſt is to bring their own deſigns about through his means. I do not find one of them, but what was extremely bent on the expedition to Naples, and ſpeaking very doubtfully of that of France, and of the difficulties it would meet with; not but they all agree, it ought to be attempted; and the emperor aſſured me he had given the neceſſary orders to prince Eugene. I find, that the ſubſiſting of this army is ſtill one of the arguments againſt that expedition, which makes me fear, that they do not intend, or cannot contribute much towards it.

The earl of Sunderland to the earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, May 9, 1707, O. S.

I have the honour of your lordſhip's from Vienna of the 4th of May, N. S. and I am very ſorry to find that court continues ſo obſtinate in their wrong meaſures; but I will ſtill hope, that the news of the fatal blow we have had in Spain, will bring them to their ſenſes, ſo as not to divert their arms from the only part, where we may hope to retrieve that misfortune; at leaſt they muſt never hope to have the queen's conſent to it: and this your lordſhip will let them know in the ſtrongeſt manner if you are yet there.

The Dutch envoy to the earl of Mancheſter.

Vienna, May 28, 1707.

I hope, this will find your excellency happily arrived at Turin. The count of Rechteren arrived here the 25th inſtant; and though we have, according to our orders newly received from their high mightineſſes, again oppoſed the expedition of Naples, and even proteſted againſt the bad conſequences, which it may have, eſpecially after the melancholy news of a defeat in Spain; we have not been able to obtain, that this expedition be countermanded; theſe miniſters make uſe of the ſame reaſons, which they alledged, when your excellency was here; which makes me wiſh the more to hear from your excellency, how you have found things in Italy; and if the conjectures of this court are true in their utmoſt extent; and, above all, whether there be ſo many troops, as they perſuade themſelves here; whether they apply themſelves with vigour to the expedition againſt France; whether they be ready; and agreed in regard to their magazines; when the paſſage of the mountains will be practicable; and whether the expedition to Naples will cauſe no prejudice to the other. They had even given out, on the part of this court, in England and Holland, that your excellency was entirely come into the ſame ſentiments with them in this affair, which their high mightineſſes can ſcarce believe, whilſt they have ſeen the contrary in my advices; and I do again this day juſtice to your excellency upon that in writing to my maſters.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Sunderland.

Turin, June 8, 1707.

The envoy of Spain preſſes for five thouſand men to be ſent to Spain; but ſince the detachment for Naples does proceed according to the poſitive order from the court of Vienna to prince Eugene, I cannot ſee, that any can be ſpared from this ſide; neither do I think, that they will be inclined to ſend their troops, unleſs it be from Naples, if they ſucceed, as they imagine they ſhall. I received here your lordſhip's of May 6, O. S. as alſo one of the ſame date from Mr. ſecretary Harley. I am ſatisfied, that, had I been at Vienna, nothing could have prevailed with them to alter their deſign of Naples. The duke of Savoy is not in the leaſt pleaſed with the Imperial court, of which I ſhall ſoon acquaint you more fully.

[f] The earl of Mancheſter, in a letter to the earl of Sunderland, dated at Venice, Auguſt 19, 1707, writes thus: "I fear the Germans begin to make the moſt of the kingdom of Naples. They laid a duty on fruit and herbs, which ſo incenſed the people at Naples, that there has been a tumult, which might have had worſe conſequences, but was prevented by revoking it." And Mr. Cardonnel, in a letter to Mr. Cole from the camp at Helchin, dated October 2, 1707, and printed in the Memoirs of the latter, has theſe words: It looks as if the Germans were reſolved to ruin the kingdom of Naples, as they have done the electorate of Bavaria; but in all likelihood they may repent it, when it is too late. It is a miſerable council governs that court of Vienna. In the mean time we are ſufferers; for, inſtead of aſſiſting the king of Spain, as the revenues of Milan and Naples ought certainly to do, they do not ſtick to ſay, it is none of their concern; and that we muſt carry on the war in Spain for our own intereſt. God preſerve us hereafter from ſuch allies."

[g] Mr. Cole informs us in his Memoirs, page 457, that the earl of Mancheſter told him, That he had been with the duke of Savoy, when prince Eugene made many difficulties about the expedition againſt Toulon, and the duke of Savoy anſwered them all. When prince Eugene was gone, his royal highneſs aſked my lord Mancheſter, what he thought now of prince Eugene. His excellency anſwered, that he was ſorry to hear him make ſo many difficulties. Then the duke ſaid, 'I will tell you, my lord, what I think of him and all the Germans. I believe they have no great mind to take Toulon, and their whole mind is ſet on Italy.' But his excellency attributed this to the warmth of that prince, and believed prince Eugene would do his beſt.

Dauphiné, by which he drew moſt of the French troops to that ſide; as ſoon as he heard, that the confederate fleet was come upon the coaſt, he made a quick march through ways, that were thought impracticable, to the river Var, where the French had caſt up ſuch works, that it was reckoned theſe muſt have ſtopped his paſſing the river; and they would have done it effectually, if ſome ſhips had not been ſent in from the fleet into the mouth of the river, to attack theſe works where there was no defence, becauſe no attack from that ſide was apprehended. By this means the works were abandoned, and ſo the paſſage over the river was free.

Upon this the duke of Savoy entered Provence, and made all the haſte he could towards Toulon. The artillery and ammunition were on board the fleet, and were to be landed near the place, ſo the march of the army was as little encumbered as was poſſible; yet it was impoſſible to advance with much haſte in an enemy's country, where the proviſions were either deſtroyed or carried into fortified places, which, though they might have eaſily been taken, yet no time was to be loſt in executing the great deſign; ſo this retarded the march for ſome days: Yet, in concluſion, they came before the place, and were quickly maſters of ſome of the eminencies, that commanded it. At the firſt coming, they might have poſſeſſed themſelves of another called St. Anne's Hill, if prince Eugene had executed the duke of Savoy's orders: He did it not, which raiſed a high diſcontent; but he excuſed himſelf, by ſhewing the orders he had received, not to expoſe the emperor's troops[h]. Some days were loſt by the roughneſs of the ſea, which hindered the ſhips from landing the artillery and ammunition. In the mean while, the troops of France were ordered to march from all parts of Toulon: The garriſon within was very ſtrong; the forces that were on their march to Spain, to proſecute the victory of Almanza were countermanded; and ſo great a part of Villar's army was called away, that he could not make any further progreſs in Germany. So that a great force was, from all hands, marching to raiſe this ſiege; and it was declared in the court of France, that the duke of Burgundy would go and lead on the army. The duke of Savoy loſt no time, but continued cannonading the place, whilſt the fleet came up to bombard it: They attacked the two forts, that commanded the entrance into the mole with ſuch fury, that they made themſelves maſters of them; but one of them was afterwards blown up. Thoſe within the town were not idle: They ſunk ſome ſhips, in the entrance into the mole, and fired furouſly at the fleet, but did them little harm: They beat the duke of Savoy out of one of his moſt important poſts, which was long defended by a gallant prince of Saxe-Gotha; who, not being ſupported in time, was cut to pieces. This poſt was afterwards regained, and the fleet continued for ſome days to bombard the place, with ſo good ſucceſs, that a great number of houſes were deſtroyed, ſeveral magazines blown up, and eight men of war either burnt or rendered unſerviceable[i]. But, in the end, the duke of Savoy, whoſe ſtrength had never been above thirty thouſand men, ſeeing ſo great a force marching towards him, who might intercept his paſſage, and ſo deſtroy his whole army, and there being no hope of carrying the place, found it neceſſary to march home in time. Accordingly, having ordered all the artillery and the ſick and wounded to be embarked, he decamped in the night, retiring in very good order the ſame way he came, without being the leaſt inſulted by the enemy[k]. After his return into Piedmont, he concluded the campaign on that ſide, with the recovery of his important place of Suza, which the French had left unprovided, and which ſurrendered to him at diſcretion; by which means he ſhut up that inlet into his own dominions, and opened himſelf a free paſſage into Dauphine.

Thus ended the expedition into Provence, on which the [h] On the 3d of Auguſt, Mr. J. Chetwind wrote the following letter from the camp there to the earl of Mancheſter, printed in Cole's Memoirs, p. 465: The ſituation of affairs here is ſomewhat changed ſince my laſt, but not ſo much as I could wiſh, or indeed as I did expect. This is the 9th day, that our army has been before Toulon; and all that we have done has been to oblige the enemies to quit us ſome ſmall poſts, where we deſign to make our batteries; but their camp before the town is in the ſame place where it was when we came, though moſt people will have it, that they might eaſily have been forced away. I do not know, my lord, what is the meaning of it, but things do not go as they ought to do. Of our great men, I only find his royal highneſs hearty. I fear, if we do not make better haſte, that we ſhall paſs our time but ill, ſince we are informed, that the enemies are gathering together from all parts to drive us from hence.

[i] Namely, Le Triumphant of eighty-two guns; Le Sceptre, ninety; Le Vainqueur, eighty-ſix; Le Neptune, ſeventy-ſix; L'Invincible, ſeventy; Le Serieux, ſixty; Le Laurier, ſixty; and Le Sage, fifty-four.

[k] The progreſs of the ſiege will appear from the following journal of Mr. Chetwynd, dated at the camp at la Valetta, Auguſt 20, 1707, and printed in Mr. Cole's Memoirs, p. 470:

The 14th. My laſt to you was this day, ſince when I hear, that ſome deſerters from Toulon bring word, that the enemies have given out powder and ball to every ſoldier; upon which orders are now given to reinforce the guard upon the left of our line with three battalions, the right having already a reſerve of four battalions ordered for ſome days before. The 15th the enemies, as the deſerters had reported, marched all night to gain the hill above our camp upon our right, and that with ſo much diligence and ſecrecy, that they ſeized on our advanced guards, and began their true attack on our right by break of day, after having made their ſignal for the attack by firing three guns, making at the ſame time a falſe attack on our left. Our troops on the right received the enemies very well at firſt; but being over-powered by their ſuperiority, and the ſituation of the ground being ſuch, that the reſerve could not immediately come up, they were obliged to give way, and retire into the other poſts on the right, which they did in very good order, till the prince of Saxe-Gotha, who was general of the day, was killed; and this, though they were expoſed to the fire of the place, and of three ſhips, which did not ceaſe firing through the whole action. The enemies endeavoured to puſh their good fortune farther; but, after a diſpute of about two hours, at a little caſine in the middle of our communication, they were obliged to ſtop in the poſt of St. Catherine, for fear the troops, which his royal highneſs and prince Eugene, who arrived a little after the action was begun, had ordered to march to the top of the hills, ſhould cut off the retreat to the camp; which they had great reaſon to apprehend, ſince they could not but perceive our whole army in motion, which our generals had ordered ſo, in view of a general action, upon the news we had received the day before, that the enemies had above ſixty battalions in their camp. But things went no further, and towards the evening the enemies abandoned all they had taken, after having ſet fire to our batteries, and ruined all the works we had made on the right. A detachment of horſe we had in the valley of Ardennes on the right of our camp, with a ſmall body of foot, was attacked by the enemies at the ſame time, but came off without any loſs, colonel Pheffercorn, who commanded them, having been killed the day before, as he went to reconnoitre the enemy. We do not know the loſs of the enemy in the attacks of our works on the right, but to judge by our own loſs, and the reſiſtance our troops made at firſt, methinks it cannot be leſs than two thouſand or fifteen hundred men. We had between five and ſix hundred men killed, wounded, or taken priſoners. Beſides the prince of Saxe-Gotha, we had a lieutenant-colonel of the Heſſians, a major of the Palatines, with ſeveral captains and under officers killed; general Efelt, a Palatine brigadier, with ſeveral under officers wounded; a Piedmonteſe, and a Saxe-Gotha colonel taken priſoners, with one or two captains; beſides which, we loſt two ſmall field-pieces, which our gunner had forgot to carry off from the poſt of St. Catherine. At night we began to bombard the town with ſix mortars, which immediately ſet fire in two places. This evening the fort St. Margarite, the outermoſt near to the ſea, ſurrendered at diſcretion. The garriſon was compoſed of a lieutenant-colonel, and three other officers, with one hundred and thirty ſoldiers. We found in the place ſome proviſions, and fourteen pieces of iron cannon, four of which were forty-eight pounders. By the reddition of this caſtle our ſhips can come near the ſhore, and the artillery, &c. which was landed at Hieres, may be reimbarked here with much more eaſe, which was ordered to be done to-morrow, the ſiege of Toulon not being practicable, becauſe of the reinforcements the enemies have received ſince we are here, and by reaſon of the works they have had time to make. The 16th our batteries on the left continued to play againſt the town and ſhips, as alſo againſt fort Louis, where the breach is near made. Our bombardiers flung ſeveral bombs laſt night, and all this day, into the town with very good ſucceſs; but no ſhip has yet been touched, as we know of. We continue to embark our artillery, &c. The admiral commanded ſhips to attack fort Louis, but the wind was ſo ſtrong, that our ſhips could do little ſervice. However they lay ſo near, that one of our ſhips had thirty men killed or wounded. This day the wind blew ſo hard, that the royal Anne loſt one of her maſts, was drove from her anchor, and ran foul upon a Dutch man of war, who was ſomewhat damaged. The 17th drummers and trumpeters were ſent to and from Toulon, to enquire after ſeveral officers and ſoldiers; and the enemies did deſire to exchange their priſoners made at St. Margarite, to which his royal highneſs and prince Eugene do conſent. The 18th the greateſt part of the artillery, which is not on batteries, and almoſt all the powder, balls, &c. are re-imbarked. Our bombs deſtroy the town of Toulon very much; but none have yet been flung into the baſin among the ſhips. The breach of fort Louis is practicable, and orders will be given to attack it to-night. All our ſick and wounded are ordered to Hieres, where they are to be embarked to be carried to Nice, Oneglia, and Final. The 19th, laſt night we took the fort St. Louis, the enemies having abandoned it as our grenadiers mounted the breach. By the fall of this place, I believe our bomb-veſſels may come to bombard the town and ſhips, which is the only hurt we can now pretend to do here.

Mr. Chetwynd likewiſe, in a letter to the earl of Mancheſter, dated Aug. 20, writes thus: All things have been ſo managed with us, that I had not ſpirit nor courage enough to write to you, knowing how much you had the good ſucceſs of our deſigns at heart. Our ſcene is not yet finiſhed, for we are to ſteal away as we can, and as ſoon as we can. Now every thing is in the greateſt confuſion, and I fear will continue ſo till we are got on the other ſide of the Var.

Sir Cloudeſly Shovel wrote the following letter to the earl of Mancheſter, dated on board the Aſſociation before Toulon, Auguſt 9-20, 1707.

My lord,

After all the hopes we had entertained of ſucceſs in our enterprize on Toulon, the enemy, on 5-16th inſtant, made a vigorous ſalley with a great number of troops, and attacked our works, and took great part of them, and kept them all that day, and deſtroyed what they had poſſeſſion of, and drew off four or five of our cannon into the town. The killed and wounded on our ſide is ſaid to be about one thouſand, and among the ſlain is the prince of Saxe-Gotha; and ſince that time it has not been thought proper to carry on the ſiege; the enemies, as our army ſay, growing every day more numerous, and our troops continually deſerting. And the 6-17 his royal highneſs the duke of Savoy ſent to me to embark the ſick and wounded, and to take off the cannon, mortars, ammunition, proviſions, &c. in order to raiſe the ſiege, which is now only cannonading, and bombardment, and we are getting every thing a-board, his royal highneſs having informed me, he deſigns to decamp with the army to-morrow morning. Before the enemies had made this ſalley, and deſtroyed our works, they were ſo frightened, that they ſunk twenty of their ſhips; ten of them or more we reckoned to be three-deck ſhips; and we believe ſome of them can never be recovered. The duke has deſired me to accompany him back with the fleet, which I deſign to do as far as the Var.

P.S. Auguſt 11-22, about ten in the morning. Our eyes of all Europe were fixed, and which failed in the execution, chiefly by the emperor's means[1]. England and the ſtates general performed all that was expected of them; nor was the duke of Savoy wanting on his part, though many ſuſpected him as backward, or at leaſt cold in the undertaking. But though this great deſign failed in the main point, it proved of great ſervice to the allies, and was attended with many good conſequences, which, perhaps, ought to balance the expence: For, beſides the great damage, which the French ſuſtained in their ſhipping; the blowing up of ſeveral magazines; the burning of above one hundred and ſixty houſes in Toulon; and the devaſtations committed in Provence by both armies, to the value of thirty millions of French livres; this enterprize, which had ſtruck a greater terror throughout all France, than had been known there during the whole reign of Lewis XIV, brought this further advantage to the common cauſe, that it gave great diverſion to the enemy's forces, whereby their army in Germany was weakened; the duke of Orleans's progreſs after the battle of Almanza retarded in Spain; the ſuccouring of Naples prevented; and the conqueſts of the allies in Italy ſecured.

Admiral Shovel, who was not a little chagrin'd at the miſcarriage of an expedition, upon which he had ſet his heart; having aſſigned ſir Thomas Dilkes a ſquadron of thirteen ſail for the Mediterranean ſervice, ſailed from Gibraltar with the reſt of the fleet, containing fifteen men of war of the line, five of a leſs rank, and one yatch [m]. On the 22d of October, he had ninety fathom water in the ſoundings, and brought the fleet to, and lay by from twelve till about ſix in the afternoon, the weather being hazy; but then, the wind coming up freſh at ſouth ſouth-weſt, he made the ſignal for ſailing. The fleet ſteered eaſt by north, ſuppoſing they had the channel open, when ſome of the ſhips were upon the rocks to the weſtward of Scilly, before they

Our ſea-bombs laſt night fired very briſkly, and beyond any expectation about midnight ſet the town on fire, which burnt very furiouſly all night, and is not yet extinguiſhed; and, in the opinion of every body here, it is ſomewhat more than dwelling-houſes, that are on fire, we ſuppoſe ſtore-houſes. We cannot ſee the town or baſin by reaſon of a hill between us. Our army being decamped, they have brought guns and mortars againſt our bomb-veſſels, and have obliged them to come off, being pretty much ſhattered by the enemy's ſhot.

Mr. Chetwynd concludes his account of the ſiege in a letter to the earl of Manchester, dated from the camp at Sealin, September 16, 1707, with theſe words:

The difficulties we met with at Toulon were very great, but they were rendered much more ſo by the indolence and ill will of ſome of our generals. If we had puſhed upon our arrival, there was a very great probability of ſucceſs; but, as things went, it was almoſt impracticable to do any good three or four days after our arrival; and I do not know the reaſons why we did not then ſet to bombarding the town and ſhips, inſtead of amuſing ourſelves about what we were ſure could do us no good.

[1]. Dr. Swift, in his conduct of the allies and of the late miniſtry. p. 27, fifth edition, aſſerts, That one inſtance of the emperor's indifference or rather diſlike of the common cauſe, was the buſineſs of Toulon; his deſign, ſays he, was indeed diſcovered here at home by a perſon who every body knows to be the creature of a certain great man, at leaſt as much noted for his ſkill in gaming as in politics, upon the baſe mercenary end of getting money by wagers, which was then ſo common a practice, that I remember a gentleman in employment, who, having the curioſity to inquire how wagers went upon the Exchange, found ſome people deep in the ſecret, to have been concerned in that kind of traffic, as appeared by premiums named for towns, which nobody but thoſe behind the curtain could ſuſpect. However, although this project had gotten wind by ſo ſcandalous a proceeding, yet Toulon might probably have been taken, if the emperor had not thought fit to detach twelve or fifteen thouſand men to ſeize Naples, as an enterprize, that was more his private and immediate intereſt. But, it is manifeſt, that his Imperial majeſty had no mind to ſee Toulon in poſſeſſion of the allies; for even with theſe diſcouragements the attempt might have yet ſucceeded, if prince Eugene had not thought fit to oppoſe it, which cannot be imputed to his own judgment, but to ſome politic reaſons of his court. The duke of Savoy was for attacking the enemy as ſoon as our army arrived; but when the marſhal de Theſſe's troops were all come up, to pretend to beſiege the place, in the condition we were at that time, was a farce and a jeſt. Had Toulon then fallen into our hands, then the maritime power of France would in a great meaſure have been deſtroyed.

But Dr. Hare, in his piece, intitled, The Allies and the late Miniſtry defended againſt France and the preſent friends of France, Part III. p. 13, gives a particular anſwer to this paſſage of Dr. Swift, and obſerves, That every propoſition advanced by him is falſe in whole or in part. Firſt, he tells us the deſign was diſcovered here by a creature of a certain great man laying wagers about the taking of it. This is a very odd preamble to a proof, that Toulon was loſt by the emperor's fault, to tell us, that probably it was not; the deſign was diſcovered here. But theſe inconſiſtencies are nothing with this writer, if he can but bring in one or two certain great men whoſe reputation ſtands cruelly in his way, and will do ſo, let him employ never ſo many pens to blacken them. Now, in anſwer to this, I affirm, that this deſign was not diſcovered by the creature of this great man, but by the clerk of another great man, who was then ſecretary of ſtate. But to go on; our author argues, that the emperor had no mind Toulon ſhould be taken, becauſe he detached twelve thouſand men to ſeize Naples, as he ingeniouſly expreſſes it. That the emperor did, at that time, make an expedition to Naples, is true; but was it, becauſe he had no mind Toulon ſhould be taken? No it was becauſe thoſe, who would make a ſcandalous peace now, were attempting the ſame thing then; and he was afraid, the intereſt of his family in Italy would have been ſacrificed to other views. This was the true reaſon of that expedition, and this writer knows it was, which makes his virulence and malice the more unpardonable. As things were managed, it is plain, there was a want of troops. But, when the emperor was preſſed to put off that expedition, did not want an anſwer. He told them, that without thoſe twelve thouſand men, they had as many as they had before deſired; and indeed as many, as would be able to find ſubſiſtance, and that more would be but a burden to them: That, while they were employed in the reduction of Toulon, the other troops ſhould, by great marches, haſten to Naples, and then return to join them for any further ſervices. But, it is manifeſt, ſays our author, that the emperor had no mind we ſhould take Toulon, becauſe the attempt might have ſucceeded, if prince Eugene had not thought fit to oppoſe it. This is falſe again. The duke of Savoy had the chief command in that expedition, and not prince Eugene. What was the true reaſon they delayed ſo long the beginning of that march, I cannot pretend to ſay; but, when they had paſſed the Var, I deſire this author would tell us, who it was that propoſed the holding a council of war on board the fleet, and did hold one, to conſider, whether they ſhould proceed directly to Toulon, or beſiege Antibes? A man muſt be a very ill judge in affairs, that could not from that ſtep ſee, what was likely to come of the expedition. Again, to clear up this affair, I would fain know, who governed the motions of the army, till they came before the place; for it is incredible, how ſo ſmall an army could be ſo many days making ſo ſhort a march. And, if they had advanced with half the ſpeed that they retired, it is certain that they might have inveſted the place, before the works the enemy were making would have been finiſhed, and before any conſiderable number of the enemy's troops were arrived. But the ſlowneſs of our motions made our arrival too late in both theſe reſpects. And the enemies troops were in poſſeſſion of the high ground about the place, before we came in ſight of it. And therefore if the duke of Savoy did not ſeem willing to attack the enemy, that is not very hard to account for; nor might it be any fault in prince Eugene, that he did not think it reaſonable. But, beſides, there was particular reaſon at that time to think, the prince might have ſtrict orders from Vienna, to be very cautious how he expoſed that body of troops; and that was the neighbourhood of the king of Sweden, who was pleaſed to pick many quarrels with the emperor; and nobody could tell where his demands would ſtop, or what would ſatisfy him. This gave very great umbrage to the Imperial court; and had they loſt that body of troops before Toulon, they had reaſon to fear they ſhould ſoon feel the want of them. This was certainly a good reaſon for not venturing a battle to diſadvantage, where the leaſt misfortune would have been the ruin of them all. But, had that expedition either begun ten days ſooner, or the march from the Var had been made in leſs time, the deſign would have ſucceeded without the hazard of a battle. There is more might be ſaid upon this ſubject; but I am not in ſo much haſte to diſcover ſome truths as our author, is to tell the moſt pernicious lies. Upon this inſtance then I muſt obſerve, 1. That the expedition to Naples was not the effect of any diſregard to the allies, but of ſelf-preſervation. 2. That prince Eugene's declining a battle was not the cauſe of our ill ſucceſs againſt Toulon. 3. That it is no way chargeable on the late miniſtry, who formed the deſign with the greateſt ſecrecy, and made the moſt effectual preparations for it, and did all they could to put off the expedition to Naples, and remove every difficulty, that might hinder the ſucceſs of it. And, laſtly, that it was not diſcovered firſt by any creature of the late miniſtry, nor had France any ſuſpicion till the expedition was actually begun as any one may ſee, that will look back into the hiſtory of that affair.

Dr. Hare, in the poſtſcript to the fourth part of the Allies and the late Miniſtry defended, p. 78, 79, obſerve, That in the paſſage above cited, where he mentions, That the deſign on Toulon was diſcovered by the clerk of a great man, who was then ſecretary of ſtate, he did not mean Gregg, who was afterwards hanged, but another perſon then alive; nor did he mean a direct diſcovery made to France, but ſuch a one, as was occaſioned by laying wagers; a folly which the perſon hinted at has paid dearly for.

A late writer pretends to have diſcovered the ſecret ſprings of raiſing the ſiege of Toulon, and the peaceable retreat of the duke of Savoy's army. 'France (ſays he) perceiving the loſs of Toulon would be a mortal blow, ordered Buzenval (her miniſter to the king of Sweden then in Saxony) to try to engage that victorious prince to declare againſt the emperor. Count Monaſterols, the Bavarian miniſter, had the ſame orders. Theſe two miniſters gained count Piper, who had a great aſcendant over his maſter. The king of Sweden, who had given repeated aſſurances not to undertake any thing the allies, was very much embarraſſed. He fought a quarrel with the emperor, and to that end made exorbitant demands, accompanied with threatnings to invade Sileſia and Bohemia. The emperor laid the ſtorm by agreeing to all his demands. Whilſt the treaty was negotiating, the ſiege of Toulon was undertaken. The king of Sweden, who wiſhed to hinder the loſs of that place, cauſed it to be inſinuated with great ſecreſy to the duke of Savoy, not to perſiſt in the ſiege of Toulon, becauſe, if it was taken, he ſhould be obliged to invade the emperor's hereditary dominions. The duke of Savoy, who had a great penetration and foreſight, reflected that the king of Sweden was ſtedfaſt in his reſolutions, and that his ſucceſſes had given him that ſtedfaſtneſt; that, after all, the matter was only the taking of a town, which perhaps it would be difficult to keep, and would be demoliſhed. Theſe weighty conſiderations induced the duke, by an unparalleled generoſity, to prefer the intereſts of the common cauſe to the advantage of taking Toulon. Hence the ſecret reaſon of raiſing the ſiege.' This circumſtance is ſaid to be warranted by the duke himſelf, who was pleaſed to declare it to ſome perſons of diſtinction. were aware, about eight of the clock at night, and made a ſignal of diſtreſs. The aſſociation, in which ſir Cloudeſly was, ſtruck upon the rocks called the Biſhop and his Clerks, and was loſt, with all the men in it; as were alſo the Eagle and the Romney. The Firebrand was likewiſe daſhed on the rocks, and foundered; but the captain and four and twenty of his men ſaved themſelves in the boat. Captain Sanſom, who commanded the Phœnix, being driven on the rocks within the iſland, ſaved all his men, but was forced to run his ſhip a-ſhore. The Royal Anne was ſaved by a great preſence of mind, both in ſir George Byng, and his officers and men, who in a minute's time, ſet her topſails, one of the rocks not being a ſhip's length to the leeward of her, and the other, on which ſir Cloudeſly Shovel was loſt as near as in a breach of the ſea. Nor had the Lord Derſley, commander of the St. George, a leſs ſtrange eſcape; for his ſhip was daſhed on the ſame ridge of rocks with the Aſſociation, and the ſame wave, which he ſaw beat out all ſir Cloudeſly Shovel's lights, ſet his own ſhip a-float. Sir Cloudeſly Shovel's body being, the next day after this misfortune, taken up by ſome country fellows, was ſtripped and buried in the ſand; but, on enquiry being made by the boats of the Saliſbury and Antelope, it was diſcovered where he was hid; from whence being taken out, and brought on board the Saliſbury into Plymouth on the 28th of October, it was afterwards carried to London, and decently interred in Weſtminſter Abbey, where a monument was erected in honour of the admiral, who was one of the greateſt ſea-commanders of that, or any other age; of undaunted courage and reſolution, and, at the ſame time, eminent for his generoſity, frankneſs, and integrity. He was the artificer of his own fortune; and by his perſonal merit alone, from the loweſt beginnings, raiſed himſelf to almoſt the higheſt ſtation in the navy. He was born in the county of Suffolk of mean parentage, and having an early inclination to ſea, became a cabin-boy to ſir Chriſtopher Mingo, and, improving daily by quick progreſſes in the knowledge of naval affairs, was ſoon advanced to the rank of lieutenant; and gave early proofs of his valour on the 14th of January 1673-4, when being lieutenant to ſir John Narborough, admiral of the Engliſh fleet in the Mediterranean, he burnt in the harbour, and under the caſtle of Tripoli, four men of war belonging to the pirates of that place, which forced them to accept ſuch conditions of peace, as ſir John Narborough was pleaſed to preſcribe them. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the firſt ſea engagement, that happened after the revolution, in Bantray-bay, on May 1ſt, 1689, for which he received the honour of knighthood, being the commander of the Edgar. He was ſoon after advanced to a flag-officer; and, upon the breaking out of the war in 1702, he was ſent, with a ſquadron of about twenty men of war to join the grand fleet, and bring home the galleons, and other rich booty, taken by the duke of Ormond and ſir George Rooke at Vigo. The next year he was appointed to command in chief the confederate fleet deſigned for the Streights, conſiſting of thirty-five Engliſh and fourteen Dutch men of war; and, being come into Leghorn road, maintained the honour of the Engliſh union-flag, and forced the governor of that city to give him a royal ſalute, which he had at firſt refuſed. In that expedition, ſir Cloudeſly endeavoured to ſupply the Cevennois with money, arms and ammunition; but, for want of intelligence, the Cevennois not coming to the ſea-ſhore, the admiral expreſſed a great concern, that he could not relieve them, having been always zealous for liberty and the proteſtant religion. In June 1704, he joined the grand fleet, commanded by ſir George Rooke, in the Mediterranean, had his ſhare in the honour of taking Gibraltar, and by his bravery and admirable conduct in the ſea-fight, that happened ſoon after, obliged the enemy's van to bear away out of the reach of his cannon; and, though but the ſecond in command, yet he got the principal honour of the day, and contributed moſt to the preſervation of the confederate-fleet. For this ſignal piece of ſervice, he was, ſome months after, appointed rear-admiral of England, and admiral and commander in chief of her majeſty's fleet, in conjunction with the earl of Peterborough. In 1706, he commanded the whole confederate fleet, which had on board ten thouſand men, under the command of earl Rivers, deſigned for a deſcent upon France; but, being detained by contrary winds in Torbay, till the 1ſt of October, the admiral, according to his new orders, ſailed for Liſbon, and from thence to Alicant, where having ſet on ſhore the land forces, he returned to Liſbon, to prepare for a greater expedition in the year 1707; and accordingly, in the latter end of June that year, he caſt anchor in the road of Nice, where he nobly entertained the duke of Savoy, Prince Eugene, and the Engliſh and Dutch miniſters on board his ſhip, and with them concerted meaſures for the attack of Toulon; and had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing eight of the enemy's capital ſhips burnt and deſtroyed.

France ſet out no fleet this year, and yet the Britiſh nation never had greater loſſes on that element. The prince of Denmark's council was very unhappy in the whole conduct of the cruiſers and convoys. The merchants made heavy complaints, and, not without reaſon. Convoys were ſometimes denied them; and, when they were granted, they were often delayed beyond the time limited for the merchants to get their ſhips in readineſs; and the ſailing orders were ſometimes ſent them ſo unhappily (but, as many ſaid, ſo treacherouſly) that a French ſquadron was then lying in their way, to intercept them. This was liable to very ſevere reflections; for many of the convoys, as well as the merchants ſhips were taken.

However, about this time an account was brought of the ſucceſs of captain Underdown, commander of the Falkland, in his expedition againſt the French fiſheries in the north of America, in which the French ſuſtained the following damage: Two ſhips taken, one of thirty guns, and an hundred men; one ſhip taken and burnt, of twenty guns, and eighty men; two ſhips burnt by the enemy, one of thirty-two, and another of twenty-ſix guns; two hundred and twenty-eight fiſhing boats burnt; four hundred and ſeventy boats and ſloops, that were not employed in the fiſhery this ſeaſon; twenty-three ſtages, and twenty-three train fats burnt; ſeventy-ſeven thouſand two hundred and eighty quintals of fiſh; and one thouſand five hundred and ſixty-eight hogſheads of train oil deſtroyed. But all this was too inconſiderable, to alleviate the loſs of the men and ſhips that periſhed with ſir Cloudeſly Shovel.

This year there was carried on a negociation, in which the allies were greatly concerned, and in which the queen of Great-Britain, in particular, made not the leaſt figure. The ducheſs of Nemours, princeſs of Neufchatel and Valangin, dying at Paris on the 16th of June, N. S. no leſs than thirteen competitors laid claim to that ſovereignty.

Among theſe competitors, were the king of Pruſſia, and ſeveral of the French nation, of whom the prince of Conti was the chief[a]. Upon news of the ducheſs's death (in whom the houſe of Longueville ended) the prince of Conti, and ſome others of the French competitors, repaired to Neufchatel; and others ſent their miniſters and agents thither, to proſecute their reſpective claims.

A letter from the marquis de Torcy, ſecretary of ſtate in France, wherein he threatened the French king's reſentment towards the inhabitants of Neufchatel, if they admitted a ſtranger in competition with his ſubjects, having been induſtriouſly ſpread among the people, and other artifices uſed, to induce them to make choice of a Frenchman; count Metternich, the Pruſſian ambaſſador, acquainted the magiſtracy, that the king, his maſter, would be ſupported by the whole confederacy in the juſtice of his pretenſions. Accordingly, Mr. Abraham Stanyan, the queen of Great Britain's envoy extraordinary to the proteſtant cantons, in a memorial to the magiſtrates of Bern, recommended his Pruſſian majeſty's right, and repaired to Neufchatel. The day after his arrival, he delivered by his ſecretary two letters from the queen; in the firſt of which, directed to the governor and counſellers of [a] The competitors were: 1. The king of Pruſſia, as heir to the houſe of Orange, and conſequently of that of Chalons. 2. The marquis of Mailly, in the name of his lady, who ſtiled herſelf princeſs of Orange, and pretended to be heireſs of the houſe of Chalons. 3. The prince of Baden Durlach, by virtue of an agreement made in the year 1490, between the families of Hochberg-Neufchatel and Hochberg-Baden. 4. The prince of Conti, as univerſal heir to the late duke of Longueville. 5. The chevalier de Soiſſons's relict, who ſtiled herſelf princeſs of Neufchatel, by virtue of a deed or gift, made by the late ducheſs of Nemours, of that principality to the ſaid chevalier, although ſhe could not be ignorant of the decree of the three eſtates, dated March the 8th, 1694, whereby they declared the ſaid deed and gift void and illegal, and acknowledged the ſaid ducheſs of Nemours, merely as the only ſiſter, and the next heir to the late duke of Longueville. 6. The prince of Carignan, as nephew, on the mother's ſide, to the late ducheſs of Nemours; but, this ſovereignty being devolved to her by the right of her father, the count of Matignon, and the ducheſs of Leſdiguieres, who ſet up the ſeventh and eighth candidates, objected, that being heirs by right of conſanguinity, viz. the firſt, nephew to the ducheſs of Nemours, in the third degree, and the ducheſs in the fourth, the ſaid count pretended, that the principality ought to be adjudged to him, as the next heir, though of a later deſcent; and, on the other hand, the ducheſs de Leſdiguieres contended, that the lineal ſucceſſion being to take place, the principality ought to be conferred on her by right of primogeniture, as being deſcended from the eldeſt. 9. The count of Montbelliard. 10. The baron of Montjoy, as a deſcendant of the houſe of Chalons. 11. The prince of Furſtemburgh, by title, which he could not produce. 12. The marquis d' Allegre, in the right of his lady, as deſcended from the houſe of Chalons. 13. The Swiſs canton of Ury claimed the city and county of Neufchatel, becauſe when that ſtate, which formerly belonged to the thirteen cantons of Switzerland, was yielded by twelve of them, the canton of Ury refuſed to ſubſcribe the deed of reſignation.

ſtate of the ſovereignty of Neufchatel and Valangin, ſhe ſaid, "That, having been informed of the death of the ducheſs of Nemours, her majeſty thought there was an indiſpenſable obligation incumbent upon her to write to them in favour of his Pruſſian majeſty, that, by virtue of his right to the city and country of Neufchatel, both by hereditary title, and by the ceſſion of the late king of Great-Britain, William the third, her brother, they would acknowledge and admit him for their lawful ſovereign. That ſhe hoped they would do it the more readily, not only becauſe that prince was united with them by the ſacred bond of the reformed religion, which both he and they equally profeſſed; but alſo becauſe he had hitherto ſhewn the ſame care and affection for their intereſts, which he ever expreſſed for the good and advantage of his good ſubjects. Wherefore her majeſty did not doubt, that, being mindful of their country's welfare, and endowed with ſo much prudence as they were, they would carefully avoid chuſing for their prince a perſon, who being a ſubject, and entirely devoted to the government of France, ought, for that reaſon, to be as ſuſpected to them as he would be to her majeſty, and to all her other allies: which perſuaded her at the ſame time, that, without any delay, they would grant his Pruſſian majeſty's juſt demand; and, as the ſame would give her majeſty a ſingular ſatisfaction, ſo, on her part, ſhe would ever be diſpoſed to ſhew them the effects of her friendſhip." The queen's letter to the miniſtraux and counſellors of Neufchatel was much to the ſame purpoſe; and the ſecretary preſented at the ſame time to the council of ſtate a memorial in behalf of the king of Pruſſia. Not long after Mr. Runckell, envoy from the ſtates-general, arrival at Neufchatel, with inſtructions to join with Mr. Stanyan in all proper meaſures to aſſiſt count Metternich; and a letter from the king of Sweden to the canton of Bern, in favour of the king of Pruſſia, added no ſmall weight to the interpoſition of Great-Britain and Holland.

The allies looked on this as a matter of great conſequence; ſince it might end in a rupture between the proteſtant cantons and France, for the popiſh cantons were now wholly theirs. After much pleading and a long debate, the ſtates of the principality gave judgment in favour of the king of Pruſſia, to whom the inveſtiture of Neufchatel was ſolemnly granted on the 3d of November, N. S. The French competitors proteſted againſt this, and left the place in high diſcontent: The French ambaſſador threatned that little ſtate with an invaſion, and all commerce with them was forbid. The canton of Bern eſpouſed their concern with a ſpirit and a zeal, which was not expected from them, and declaring, they were in a comburgherſhip with them, came to an unanimous reſolution, to defend the principality of Neufchatel with all their forces; purſuant to which reſolution, they ſent, a few days after, four thouſand five hundred of their men to the frontiers of Neufchatel. The French continued to threaten, and marſhal de Villars had orders to march a great part of his army towards them. But, when the court of France ſaw, that the cantons of Bern and Zurich were not terrified by thoſe marches, they let the whole matter fall, very little to their honour; and ſo the intercourſe between the French dominions and that ſtate was again opened, and the peace of the cantons was ſecured. The king of Pruſſia engaged his honour, that he would govern that ſtate with a particular zeal for advancing both religion and learning in it; and upon theſe aſſurances he perſuaded the biſhops of England, and the biſhop of Sarum in particular, to uſe their beſt endeavours to promote his pretenſions; upon which they wrote, in the moſt effectual manner they could, to Monſieur Oſtervald, who was the moſt eminent eccleſiaſtic of that ſtate, and one of the beſt and moſt judicious divines of the age. He was bringing that church to a near agreement with the forms of worſhip in the church of England. The king of Pruſſia was well diſpoſed in all matters of religion, and had made a great ſtep, in order to reconcile the Lutherans and the Calviniſts in his dominions, by requiring them not to preach to the people on thoſe points, in which they differed, and by obliging them to communicate together, notwithſtanding the diverſity of their opinions; which was indeed the only wiſe and honeſt way of making up their breach.

The proteſtant cantons of Swiſſerland obſerving the zeal, which the king of Sweden ſhewed in favour of their religion, in ſupporting the pretenſions of the king of Pruſſia, to the principality of Neufchatel, by his letter to the king of France, as well as to the cantons, ſent to him a French gentleman of quality, the marquis de Kochegude, to let him know, what regard they had to his recommendations, and to deſire him to interpoſe his good offices with the French king, for ſetting at liberty about three hundred perſons, who were condemned to the gallies, and treated moſt cruelly in them, upon no other pretence, but becauſe they would not change their religion, and had endeavoured to make their eſcape out of France. The king of Sweden received this meſſage with a particular civility, and immediately complied with it; ordering his miniſter at the court of France, to make it his deſire to that king, that theſe confeſſors might be delivered to him. But the miniſters of France ſaid, that was a point of the king's government at home, in which he could not ſuffer foreign princes to meddle. The king of Sweden ſeemed ſenſible of this neglect; and it was hoped, that, when his affairs would admit of it, he would expreſs a due reſentment of it.

Whilſt the houſe of Auſtria was ſtruggling this year with great difficulties, two pieces of pomp and magnificence conſumed a great part part of their treaſure. An embaſſy was ſent from Liſbon to demand the emperor's ſiſter for that king, which was done with an unuſal and extravagant expence. A wife was to be ſought for king Charles among the proteſtant courts, for there was not a ſuitable match in the popiſh. He had ſeen the princeſs of Anſpach, and was much pleaſed with her; ſo that great applications were made to perſuade her to change her religion; but ſhe could not be prevailed on to buy a crown at ſo dear a rate; and, ſoon after, ſhe was married to the electoral prince of Brunſwick, and her firmneſs to the proteſtant religion rewarded with the crown of Great-Britain. The princeſs of Wolfenbuttle was not ſo firm; ſhe was brought therefore to Vienna, and ſome time after married by proxy to king Charles, and ſent to Italy in her way to Spain. The ſolemnity, with which theſe matters were managed, amidſt all the diſtreſs of the Auſtrian affairs, conſumed a vaſt deal of treaſure; for ſuch was the pride of thoſe courts on ſuch occaſions, that, rather than fail in a point of ſplendor, they would let their moſt important affairs go to wreck. That princeſs was landed at Barcelona; and the queen of Portugal, the ſame year, came to Holland, to be carried to Liſbon by a ſquadron of the Engliſh fleet.

The city of Hamburgh was this year thrown into great confuſion by a conteſt, which aroſe between ſome private perſons, one of whom was a Lutheran miniſter, and gave occaſion to a diviſion there. One ſide was protected by the ſenate, which diſguſted the other, that it was like to end in a revolt againſt the magiſtrates, and a civil war within the city; and it being known that the king of Denmark had, for many years, an eye on that place, the neighbouring princes apprehended, that he might take advantage from thoſe commotions, or that the weaker ſide might chuſe rather to fall under his power, than under the revenge of the adverſe party. The kings of Sweden and Pruſſia, with the houſe of Brunſwick, reſolved to ſend troops thither, to quiet this diſtraction, and to chaſtiſe the more refractory; while the emperor's miniſters, together with the queen's, endeavoured to accommodate matters, without ſuffering them to run to extremities.

Before the opening the campaign this year in Flanders, a very extraordinary attempt was made by a partizan in the Imperial army for carrying off the dauphin, or ſome other prince of the blood of France, which very narrowly miſſed of ſucceſs. This man's name was Queintem; he had ſerved the prince of Conti, as a valet de chambre, when he went to Hungary; he afterwards became one of the elector of Bavaria's band of muſic, and then his huntſman. Some of the princes of Germany uſed to have a great number of thoſe huntſmen, whom in time they incorporated into their troops. This man going over to the Imperialiſts ſerved as a partizan, and was honoured with a brevet as a colonel for ſome good ſervices he had performed. This animated him to do ſtill greater things; and, the alterations produced by the battle of Ramillies making it no difficult matter to get from Flanders into France, he formed a project of carrying off ſome prince of the blood from the road between Verſailles and Paris; and, it was generally believed, that his view was particularly upon the dauphin. In order to effect this, he made choice of ſixteen officers and fourteen dragoons, all enterprizing men, and of great reſolution. He procured three paſſports, each for ten men; and having given them to perſons, whom he could truſt, he divided his troop into three ſmall corps, each of which entered France by a different route, joining in the neighbourhood of Paris. The two commanders of his ſmall ſquadrons were directed by him, that ten ſhould poſt themſelves in the wood of Chantilli, ten at St. Oüen, and the other ten at Seve, on the road from Paris to Verſailles, theſe laſt, to prevent diſcovery, were lodged in different public houſes. One of them, who was a lieutenant, went frequently to Paris, where he ſold two Engliſh horſes. He walked from time to time in the ſtreet of Seve, and on the bridge, that croſſes the Seine there. He one day met the duke of Orleans, but it happened to be too light for him to undertake any thing. Two days after the dauphin and the princeſſes paſſed him, going to hunt in the wood Boulogne; but they were too well attended for the partizan to hope any thing from an attack. At laſt, on the 24th of March, he, who was centinel, perceiving Monſieur de Berrington, firſt equerry to the king, in a coach and ſix, with the king's liveries, with a few attendants, it being but half an hour paſt ſeven in the evening, took him for ſome prince of the blood, and immediately made a ſignal for the nine others, who paſſed the bridge. As for the centinel, thoſe, who guarded the bridge, ſeeing him croſs it three or four times in a hurry, at laſt threw down the barrier, ſtopped him, and gave notice to the grand provoſt. In the mean time his nine companions, among whom was the partizan Queintem, ſtopped the coach, and put out the flambeaux; and then the partizan taking Monſieur le Premier (ſo in France they ſtyle the king's firſt equerry) by the ſleeve, told him, that they arreſted him by the king's order. Monſieur le Premier anſwered, that he juſt came from his majeſty; that he would be glad to know who he (the partizan) was, and whether he had not ſome officer with him, to whom he might ſpeak. The partizan, without making him any anſwer, obliged him to get out of the coach, and mount a ſpare horſe, which one of the ſervants rid. Monſieur le Premier's valet de chambre would have followed him, had not one of the ſoldiers threatened to ſhoot him, upon which his maſter bid him go back; but he deſired, that he might have his cloak; upon which one of the men took it from his ſervant, and threw it upon his ſhoulders. He, who was ſtopped at Seve, was their guide; and his loſs proved a great misfortune to them, becauſe it retarded them very much in their journey. They turned by the walls of the wood of Boulogne, from whence they went to St. Oüen, where they had left a poſt-chaiſe, with the ten men abovementioned; but, as they did not know the roads perfectly, they loſt a good deal of time in getting to that place. Monſieur le Premier's valet de chambre ſoon carried the news of his maſter's misfortune to Verſailles, ſo that the king heard of it by nine o'clock, and ſent an order to Monſieur Chamillard to diſpatch couriers immediately to the intendants to ſtop all the paſſages. He ſent likewiſe an exempt with twenty life-guards to follow the partizan. Monſieur d'Epines and all the other equerries mounted and rode, ſome towards Normandy, ſome towards Flanders, and others towards Germany. They learned, that, Monſieur le Premier finding himſelf much out of order, the partizan made a halt for three hours to give him time to reſt, and had even cut and lowered the back of the chaiſe, which hindered its going, that his priſoner might be the leſs incommoded. The guards and equerries rode ſo faſt, and ſpread intelligence ſo quick, that the partizan, as he got out of the foreſt of Chantilli, heard the alarum bell ring in all the villages; upon which he began to doubt of the ſucceſs of his expedition: However, he went on boldly and undiſcovered as far as Ham, where he was diſcovered by a quarter-maſter, who rode up to him, and clapped a piſtol to his throat. The partizan, finding himſelf ſurrounded on all ſides, was obliged to ſurrender. Monſieur le Premier immediately cried out, 'That he had been extremely well uſed, and deſired, that the man might not be hurt.' He kept him that night to ſupper with him, carried him on his parole back to Verſailles, and lodged him there in his own apartments. Madam de Beringhen, who happened to be gone before her huſband in another coach, made the partizan a very conſiderable preſent for the civilities which he had ſhewn Monſieur le Premier. It is certain, that nothing but his condeſcenſion in ſtopping thoſe three hours hindered him from getting clear off, ſince, at the place where he was ſtopped, he was within three hours march of a place of ſafety; and on this account it was, that he and his companions were diſcharged.

This was the ſtate of our affairs abroad, both by ſea and land. During theſe tranſactions, a parliament was held at Dublin by the earl of Pembroke, who was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland. At the opening of the ſeſſion, on the 7th of July, he made a ſpeech, wherein, among other things, he ſaid, "That the queen, conſidering the number of papiſts in Ireland, would be glad of any expedient for the ſtrengthening the intereſt of her proteſtant ſubjects. That, the public ſervice requiring that ſeveral regiments ſhould be ſent abroad, the queen intended to ſupply the like number of forces, for the ſecurity of that kingdom; and he did not doubt, but they would provide ſupplies for them, as well as for defraying the expence of the government."

Both houſes addreſſing the queen, the lords, it is ſaid, omitted congratulating her upon the late union of England and Scotland, which ſhe ſo much valued herſelf upon; whilſt the commons not only mentioned the glory ſhe had acquired by it, but hinted at a much more comprehenſive union. To this the queen anſwered, "They might be ſure, nothing ſhould be wanting to make the Union of all her ſubjects as extenſive as poſſible." Some thought this related to a comprehenſion in matters of religion; but others more reaſonably ſuppoſed, that by their comprehenſive union, the commons meant the uniting of Ireland as well as Scotland with England, and forming the three kingdoms into one.

Purſuant to the queen's deſire, expreſſed in his excellency's ſpeech, for ſtrengthening the proteſtant intereſt, a bill was brought in by the commons, for explaining an act to prevent the farther growth of popery, and it was reſolved, I. That any proteſtant guardian, that permits a papiſt to educate and diſpoſe of his ward, does thereby betray the truſt repoſed in him, evade the law, and propagate popery. II. That any papiſt, who ſhall take upon him to manage and diſpoſe of the ſubſtance and perſon of any infant committed to a proteſtant guardian, is guilty of a notorious breach of the law. III. That altering a proteſtant guardian duly appointed, without ſufficient reaſon, is a diſcouragement to the execution of the act againſt the further growth of popery. However, when the committee had gone through the bill, and agreed to every paragraph except one (by which the ſons of papiſts that ſhould turn proteſtants might be injured) the houſe diſagreed to that, and rejected the bill. But it was unanimouſly reſolved, that all popiſh prieſts were obliged to take the oath of abjuration by the laws in force, and that it was the indiſpenſible duty of all judges and magiſtrates to put thoſe laws in execution.

The houſe of commons having appointed a committee to inſpect the public accounts, upon their report being read, it was reſolved, I. That this kingdom had been put to exceſſive charge, by means of great arrears of rent, returned by the late truſtees, to be due out of the forfeited eſtates of this kingdom; and that moſt of the ſaid arrearages returned appear to be unjuſt charges on the ſubject, and falſe returns, by receipts under the hand of the truſtees, or their receivers, or entries in their own books. II. That an humble repreſentation be laid before her majeſty, of the great charge and preſſure the kingdom lies under, by the ſaid returns, and ſeveral other the oppreſſive proceedings of the late truſtees.

The houſe alſo reſolved, That it would greatly conduce to the relief of the poor, and the good of that kingdom, that the inhabitants ſhould uſe no other than their own manufactures in their apparel, and the furniture of their houſes; and all the members mutually agreed and engaged their honours to each other, that they would conform to the ſaid reſolution.

The commons having granted the neceſſary ſupplies, and the ſeveral bills they were upon being ready for the royal aſſent, the lord lieutenant gave it to.

An act for regiſtering lands, deeds, &c.

An act to explain an act to prevent papiſts being ſolicitors.

An act for explaining and limiting the privileges of parliament.

An act for the more effectual preventing the taking away, and marrying children againſt the wills of their parents.

And ſeveral other acts public and private.

This being done, the parliament was prorogued from the 29th of October to the 6th of May, and the earl of Pembroke returned to England.

During the campaign, things went in England in their ordinary channel. But the conduct with relation to Scotland, was more unaccountable. For whereas it might have been reaſonably expected, that the management of the newly-united part of this iſland ſhould have been particularly taken care of, ſo as to give no juſt diſtaſte to the Scots, nor offer an handle to thoſe, who were ſtill endeavouring to inflame that nation, and to increaſe their averſion to the union; things were, on the contrary, ſo ordered, as if the deſign had been to contrive methods to exaſperate the ſpirits of the people there. Though the management of the Scots revenue was to fall into the lord-treaſurer's hands on the firſt of May, no care was taken to have all the commiſſions ready at the day, with new officers to ſerve in them; ſo that the whole trade of Scotland was ſtopped for almoſt two months for want of orders, to put it into the new courſe, in which it was to be carried on. Three months paſſed before the equivalent was ſent to Scotland; and, when wines and other merchandize were imported into England from thence, ſeizures were every where made; and this was managed with a particular affectation of roughneſs. All theſe things heightened the prejudices, with which that nation had been poſſeſſed againſt the union. It was alſo known, that many meſſages paſſed between Scotland and France; and that there were many meetings and much conſultation among the diſcontented party there. A great body appeared openly for the pre-tender, and celebrated his birth-day very publicly, both at Edinburgh, and in other places of the kingdom; and it was openly talked, that there was now an opportunity that was not to be loſt, of invading the kingdom, though with a ſmall force; and that a general concurrence from the body of that nation might be depended upon. Theſe things were done in ſo public a manner, that no check being given to them, nor enquiry made after them, by thoſe who were in the government, it gave occaſion to many melancholy ſpeculations. The management from England looked like a thing concerted to heighten that diſtemper; and the whole conduct of the fleet afforded great cauſe of jealouſy.

But to open this more clearly, it will be neceſſary to give an account of a new ſcene at court. It was obſerved, that Mr. Harley, who had been for ſome years ſecretary of ſtate, had gained great credit with the queen, and began to ſet up for himſelf, and to act no more under the direction of the lord-treaſurer. There was one of the bed-chamber women, Mrs. Abigail Hill [o], who, being nearly related to the ducheſs of Marlborough, had been taken care of by her, toge-

[o] The ducheſs of Marlborough, in the account of her Conduct, p. 177, &c. gives the following account of Mrs. Hill and her practices. She was the daughter of Mr. Hill, a merchant in London, by a ſiſter of the ducheſs's father. Mr. Hill lived very well for many years, till turning projector, he brought ruin upon himſelf and family. The ducheſs of Marlborough never knew, that there were ſuch people in the world, till after the princeſs Ann was married, and when ſhe lived at the Cockpit; at which time an acquaintance of the ducheſs came to her, and ſaid, That ſhe believed ſhe did not know, that ſhe had relations, who were in want; and gave her an account of them. The ducheſs anſwered, That indeed ſhe had never heard before of any ſuch relations; and immediately gave out of her purſe ten guineas for their preſent relief, ſaying, ſhe would do what ſhe could for them; and afterwards ſent Mrs. Hill more money, and ſaw her.

Mrs. Hill told the ducheſs, that her huſband was in the ſame relation to Mr. Harley, as ſhe was to the ducheſs, but that he had never done any thing for her. Mr. Hill and his wife died not long after this, and left two ſons and two daughters. The elder daughter (afterwards Mrs. Maſham) was a grown woman. The ducheſs took her to St. Albans, where ſhe lived with her grace and her children, and was treated by her grace with as great kindneſs, as if ſhe had been her ſiſter. After ſome time a bed-chamber woman of the princeſs of Denmark's died; and, as in that reign (after the princeſſes were grown up) rockers, though not gentlewomen, had been advanced to be bed-chamber women, the ducheſs procured the vacant place for Mrs. Hill, whoſe younger ſiſter ſhe likewiſe took care of, and got to be made laundreſs to the duke of Gloceſter, and afterwards obtained a penſion for her of two hundred pounds a year. The elder brother was, at the ducheſs's requeſt, put into a place at the cuſtom-houſe; the younger, whom the bottlemen, ſays the ducheſs, afterwards called honeſt Jack Hill, was a tall boy, whom I clothed (for he was all in rags) put to ſchool at St. Albans to one Mr. James, who had been an uſher under Dr. Buſby of Weſtminſter; and, whenever I went to St. Albans, I ſent for him, and was as kind to him, as if he had been my own child. After he had learned what he could there, a vacancy happening of page of honour to the prince of Denmark, his highneſs was pleaſed, at my requeſt, to take him. I afterwards got my lord Marlborough to make him groom of the bed-chamber to the duke of Gloceſter; and though my lord always ſaid, that Jack Hill was 'good for nothing,' yet, to oblige me, he made him his aid de camp, and afterwards gave him a regiment. But it was his ſiſter's intereſt, that raiſed him to be a general, and to command in that ever-memorable expedition to Quebec. I had no ſhare in doing him theſe honours. To finiſh what I have to ſay upon this ſubject; when Mr. Harley thought it uſeful to attack the duke of Marlborough in parliament, this Quebec general, this honeſt Jack Hill, this 'once ragged boy, whom I cloathed,' happening to be ſick in bed, was nevertheleſs perſuaded by his ſiſter to get up, wrap himſelf in warmer clothes than thoſe I had given him, and go to the houſe to vote againſt the duke. I may add here, that even the huſband of Mrs. Maſham had ſeveral obligations to me. It was at my inſtance, that he was firſt made a page, then a querry, and afterwards groom of the bed-chamber to the prince; for all which he himſelf thanked me, as for favours procured by my means.

As for Mrs. Maſham herſelf, I had ſo much kindneſs for her, and had done ſo much to oblige her, without having ever done any thing to offend her, that it was too long before I could bring myſelf to think her other than a true friend, or forbear rejoicing at an inſtance of favour ſhewn her by the queen. I obſerved indeed at length, that ſhe was grown more ſhy of coming to me, and more reſerved than uſual, when ſhe was with me; but I imputed this to her peculiar moroſeneſs of temper, and for ſome time made no other reflection upon it. The firſt thing, which led me into enquiries about her conduct, was the being told, in the ſummer of 1707, that my couſin Hill was privately married to Mr. Maſham. I went to her, and aſked her, if it were true. She owned it was, and begged my pardon for having concealed it from me. As much reaſon as I had to take ill this reſerve in her behaviour, I was willing to impute it to baſhfulneſs and want of breeding, rather than to any thing worſe. I embraced her with my uſual tenderneſs, and very heartily wiſhed her joy; and then, turning the diſcourſe, entered into her concerns in as friendly a manner as poſſible, contriving how to accommodate her with lodgings, by removing her ſiſter into ſome of my own. I then enquired of her very kindly, whether the queen knew of her marriage, and very innocently offered her my ſervice, if ſhe needed it, to make that matter eaſy. She had by this time learned the art of diſſimulation pretty well, and anſwered with an air of unconcernedneſs, that 'the bed-chamber-woman had already acquainted the queen with it,' hoping, by this anſwer to divert any further examination into the matter. But I went preſently to the queen, and aſked her, 'Why ſhe had not been ſo kind, as to tell me of my couſin's marriage,' expoſtulating with her upon the point, and putting her in mind of what ſhe uſed often to ſay to me out of Montaigne, 'That it was no breach of promiſe of ſecrecy to tell ſuch a friend any thing, becauſe it was no more than telling it to one's ſelf.' All the anſwer I could obtain from her majeſty was this, 'I have a hundred times bid Maſham tell it you, and ſhe would not.'

The conduct both of the queen and of Mrs. Maſham convinced me, that there was ſome myſtery in the affair; and thereupon I ſet myſelf to enquire as particularly as I could into it; and, in leſs than a week's time, I diſcovered, 'That my couſin was become an abſolute favourite; that the queen herſelf was preſent at her marriage in Dr. Arburthnot's lodgings,' at which time her majeſty had called for a round ſum out of the privy purſe; 'that Mrs. Maſham came often to the queen, when the prince was aſleep, and was generally two hours every day in private with her:' And I likewiſe then diſcovered Mr. Harley's correſpondence and intereſt at court by means of this woman.

I was ſtruck with aſtoniſhment at ſuch an inſtance of ingratitude, and ſhould not have believed it, if there had been any room left for doubting.

My lord Marlborough was at firſt no leſs incredulous than I, as appears from the following paragraph of a letter from him, in anſwer to one from me on this ſubject.

Meldeſt, June 3, 1707.

'The wiſeſt thing is to have to do with as few people as poſſible. If you are ſure that Mrs. Maſham ſpeaks of buſineſs to the queen, I ſhould think, you might, with ſome caution, tell her of it, which would do good; for ſhe certainly muſt be grateful, and will mind what you ſay.'

It became ſo eaſy now to decypher many particulars, which had hitherto remained myſterious; and my reflections quickly brought to my mind many paſſages, which had ſeemed odd and unaccountable, but had left no impreſſions of ſuſpicion or jealouſy. Particularly I remembered, that a long while before this, being with the queen (to whom I had gone very privately by a ſecret paſſage from my lodgings to the bed-chamber) on a ſudden this woman, not knowing I was there, came in with the boldeſt and gayeſt air poſſible, but, upon ſight of me, ſtopped, and immediately changing her manner, and making a moſt ſolemn courteſy, 'Did your majeſty ring?' and then went out again. This ſingular behaviour needed no interpreter now to make it underſtood. But, not to dwell on ſuch trifling incidents, as ſoon as I had got a thorough inſight into her management, being naturally frank and open, I wrote to her the following letter:

September 23, 1707.

Since the converſation I had with you at your lodgings, ſeveral things have happened to confirm me in what I was hard to believe, that you have made me returns very unſuitable to what I might have expected. I always ſpeak my mind ſo plainly, that I ſhould have told you ſo myſelf, if I had had the opportunity, which I hoped for. But, being now ſo near parting, think this way of letting you know it, is like to be the leaſt uneaſy to you, as well as to

Your humble Servant,
S. MARLBOROUGH.

Though I was to go to Woodſtock the next day, I ſtaid at Windſor almoſt all the morning to wait her anſwer. But this could not be had ſo ſoon, it being neceſſary to conſult with her great director in ſo nice a matter. At length, however, an anſwer was ſent after me, the whole frame and ſtile of which ſhewed it to be the genuine product of an artful man, who knew perfectly well the management of ſuch an affair.

Windſor, September 24, 1707.

'While I was expecting a meſſage from your grace, to wait upon you according to your commands, laſt night, I received a letter, which ſurprizes me no leſs than it afflicts me, becauſe it lays a moſt heavy charge upon me of an ungrateful behaviour to your grace. Her majeſty was pleaſed to tell me, that you was angry with me for not acquainting you with my marriage. I did believe, after ſo generous a pardon, your grace would think no more of that. I am very confident by the expreſſion of your letter, that ſomebody has told ſome malicious lye of me to your grace, from which it is impoſſible for me to vindicate myſelf till I know the crime I am accuſed of. I am ſure, madam, your goodneſs cannot deny me what the meaneſt may aſk the greateſt; I mean juſtice, to know my accuſer. Without that, all friendſhip muſt be at the mercy of every malicious lyar, as they are, who have ſo barbarouſly and unjuſtly brought me under your diſpleaſure, the greateſt unhappineſs, that could befal me. I therefore make it my moſt humble requeſt to your grace, that, if ever I had the leaſt ſhare of your friendſhip, you would be pleaſed to give me that parting token to let me know, who this wicked perſon is; and then I do not doubt but I ſhall make it plain how much they have wronged me, as well as impoſed upon your grace. As my affliction is very great, you will, I hope, in compaſſion let me hear from you, and believe me what I really am,

Madam,
Your grace's moſt humble and faithful ſervant,
A. HILL.'

As I believe nobody at this time doubts, whether the writer of this letter was practiſing with the queen to undermine me, I ſhall make no reflections upon it. My anſwer was in theſe terms:

'I received your letter upon the road to this place; and I can aſſure you the occaſion of my complaints did not proceed from any ill offices, that had been done you to me by any body, but from my own obſervation, which makes the impreſſion much the ſtronger. But I think the ſubject is not very proper for a letter; and therefore I muſt defer it till we meet, and give you no farther trouble at this time from

Your moſt humble ſervant,
S. MARLBOROUGH.'

About the ſame time, that I made this diſcovery of Mrs. Maſham's intriguing, my lord Godolphin (as I beforementioned) got notice of Mr. Harley's practices, both within doors and without. He was endeavouring to create in the whigs jealouſies of lord Godolphin and lord Marlborough; and at the ſame time, aſſuring the tories, that they might depend upon the queen's inward affection to them; and that it was wholly owing to thoſe two great lords, that the tories were not ſtill poſſeſſed of all the places and employments. His deſign was to ruin the whigs, by diſuniting them from the miniſtry, and ſo to pave the way for the tories to riſe again, whom he thought to unite in himſelf, as their head, after he had made it impoſſible for them to think of a reconciliation with the duke of Marlborough and lord Godolphin. But, that this able politician might in all things act ſuitably to his parts and genius, he, at the ſame time, that he was employed in the manner I have related, was endeavouring to blind the eyes of thoſe whoſe deſtruction he aimed at, by the moſt elaborate compliments, and the moſt nauſeous profeſſions of affection and duty.

The ducheſs then gave ſeveral letters of Mr. Harley to the duke and herſelf, wherein he extolled the duke's ſervices to his country, ſpoke of his glory as beyond the power of envy or malice to hurt it, and profeſſed a peculiar joy in the contemplation of it, while at the ſame time, ſays ſhe, he was contriving how to ruin that glorious man, in order to raiſe himſelf upon his ruins. The duke was too backward to believe him capable of ſuch deſigns, though it is certain he never had entertained the ſame good opinion of him, as my lord Godolphin had; and though, as one may collect from a paragraph ther with her whole family (for they were fallen very low) in a moſt particular manner. She brought her not only into that poſt, but had treated her with ſuch a confidence, that it had introduced her into a high degree of favour with the queen; which, for ſome years, was conſidered as an effect of the ducheſs's credit with her majeſty. She was alſo nearly related to Mr. Harley; and they two entered into a cloſe correſpondence. She learned the arts of a court, and obſerved the queen's temper with ſo much application, that ſhe got far into her heart. She employed all her credit to eſtabliſh Mr. Harley in the ſupreme confidence with the queen, and to alienate her affections from the ducheſs of Marlborough, who ſtudied no other method of preſerving her favour, than by purſuing the true intereſt of the queen and of the kingdom. It was ſaid, that prince George was brought into the concert, and that he was made to apprehend, that he had too ſmall a ſhare in the government, and that he was ſhut out from it by the great power, which the duke of Marlborough and the lord-treaſurer had drawn into their hands; that all depended upon them; that the queen was only a cypher in the government; that ſhe was in the ducheſs of Marlborough's hands, as her affairs were in the duke's. It was likewiſe talked among thoſe, who made their court to the new favourites, that there was not now a Jacobite in the nation; that all were for the queen; and that, without doubt, ſhe would reign out peaceably her whole life, but ſhe need not concern herſelf for a German family. Theſe diſcourſes began to break out, and gave melancholy apprehenſions to thoſe, to whom they were brought. This went on too long, little regarded. The ducheſs of Marlborough ſeemed ſecure of her intereſt in the queen, and ſhewed no jealouſy of a favour, to which herſelf gave the firſt riſe. This was the ſtate of the court at the opening of the parliament.

graphwih a letter of Mr. Harley's, dated March 25, 1707, the duke had been early warned of his practices. The paragraph contains theſe words:

I return your grace moſt hearty and humble thanks for the favourable expreſſions in your letter. I beg leave to aſſure you, that I ſerve you by inclination and principle, and a very little time will make that manifeſt, as well as that I have no views or aims of my own.'

The conduct, which Mr Harley obſerved, after theſe aſſurances, was ſo directly contrary to them, and became quickly ſo notorious, that my lord Godolphin could not help repreſenting it to the queen as of the utmoſt prejudice to her affairs. And when he found, that her majeſty would believe nothing of it, he went ſo far as to ſay, that, if Mr. Harley continued to act the part he did, and yet to have ſo much credit with her, as he perceived he had, lord Marlborough and himſelf muſt of neceſſity quit her ſervice. The queen appeared pretty much alarmed at this, and preſently wrote a letter to me, in which were ſeveral expreſſions of great kindneſs.

Kenſington, October 30.

'If I have not anſwered all my dear Mrs. Freeman's letters (as indeed I ſhould have done) I beg ſhe would not impute it to any thing but the apprehenſion I was in of ſaying what might add to the ill impreſſions ſhe has of me. For, though I believe we are both of the ſame opinion in the main, I have the misfortune, that I cannot exactly agree in every thing; and therefore what I ſay is not thought to have the leaſt colour of reaſon in it, which makes me really not care to enter into particulars. But, though I am unwilling to do it, it is impoſſible for me to help giving you ſome anſwer to your laſt letter, in which I find you think me inſenſible of every thing. I am very ſorry you who have known me ſo long, can give way to ſuch a thought, as that I did not think the parting with my lord Marlborough and my lord-treaſurer of much conſequence, becauſe I did not mention any thing of my lord Marlborough's kind letter concerning me. The reaſon of this was, I really was in a great hurry, when I writ to you, and not having time to write on that ſubject to both, I thought it was the moſt neceſſary to endeavour to let him ſee he had no reaſon to have ſuſpicions of any one's having power with me, beſides himſelf and my lord treaſurer; and I hope they will believe me. Can dear Mrs. Freeman think, that I can be ſo ſtupid, as not to be ſenſible of the great ſervices that my lord Marlborough and my lord-treaſurer have done me, nor of the great misfortune it would be, if they ſhould quit my ſervice? No, ſure, you cannot believe me to be ſo void of ſenſe and gratitude. I never did nor never will give them any juſt reaſon to forſake me; and they have too much honour and too ſincere a love for their country, to leave me without a cauſe. And I beg you would not add that to my other misfortunes, of puſhing them on to ſuch an unjuſt and unjuſtifiable action. I think I had beſt ſay no more for fear of being too troubleſome. But whatever becomes of me I ſhall always preſerve a moſt ſincere and tender paſſion for my dear Mrs. Freeman, to my laſt moment.'

After my return to London, I had another kind letter from her majeſty in the following terms:

Saturday night.

'My dear Mrs. Freeman I cannot go to bed without renewing a requeſt, that I have often made, that you would baniſh all unkind and unjuſt thoughts of your poor, unfortunate, faithful Morley, which I ſaw by the glimpſe I had of you yeſterday, you were full of. Indeed I do not deſerve them; and, if you could ſee my heart, you would find it as ſincere, as tender, and paſſionately fond of you as ever, and as truly ſenſible of your kindneſs in telling me your mind freely upon all occaſions. Nothing ſhall ever alter me. Though we have the misfortune to differ in ſome things, I will ever be the ſame to my dear, dear Mrs. Freeman, whom I do aſſure once more, I am more tenderly and ſincerely her's than it is poſſible ever to expreſs.

I was every day in expectation of hearing from Mrs. Maſham, who, I ſuppoſed, would now endeavour to clear up what had created ſo much uneaſineſs between us. But, to my great ſurprize, I was twelve days at St. James's under the ſame roof with her, before I had ſo much as any meſſage from her. At length, having one night paſſed by her window in my return home, ſhe ſent one of her maids to my woman to aſk her how I did, and to let me know, that ſhe was gone to Kenſington. This behaviour was ſo very ridiculous, that, the next time I ſaw the queen, I could not forbear ſpeaking of it, and at the ſame time telling her all that had paſſed between us. The queen looked grave, and ſaid, 'She was mightily in the right not to come near me.' I anſwered, that I did not underſtand that, ſince ſhe had expreſſed ſuch a concern at my diſpleaſure, and ſince the clearing up of matters had been referred to our meeting. The queen replied, that 'it was very natural for her to be afraid to come to me, when ſhe ſaw I was angry with her.' To this I anſwered, that 'ſhe could have no reaſon to be afraid, unleſs ſhe knew herſelf guilty of ſome crime.' It was the queen's uſual way, on any occaſion, where ſhe was predetermined (as my lord Marlborough has told me, that it was her father's) to repeat over and over ſome principal words ſhe had reſolved to uſe, and to ſtick firmly to them. She continued therefore to ſay, 'It was very natural', and ſhe was very much in the right.' So that this converſation with her majeſty produced nothing but an undeniable proof, that the new favourite was deeply rooted in her heart and affections; and that it was thought more adviſeable to let the breach between me and Mrs. Maſham grow wider and wider, than to uſe any method to make it up.

But now within two days Mrs. Maſham contrived to make me a viſit, when I was abroad. Upon obſerving this, and conſidering, that our meeting could be to no purpoſe, but to draw fruitleſs and falſe profeſſions from her, I gave a general order to my ſervants to ſay, whenever ſhe ſhould call, that I was not at home. After ſome time it was thought proper, that ſhe ſhould write to me, and deſire I would ſee her; to which I conſented, and appointed her a time. When ſhe came, I began to tell her, that it was very plain, the queen was much changed towards me, and that I could not attribute this to any thing but her ſecret management. That I knew ſhe had been very frequently with her majeſty in private; and that the very attempt to conceal this by artifice, from ſuch a friend as I had been to her, was alone, a very ill ſign, and enough to prove a very bad purpoſe at bottom. To this ſhe very gravely anſwered, that ſhe was ſure the queen, who had loved me extremely, would always be very kind to me. It was ſome minutes before I could recover from the ſurprize, with which ſo extraordinary an anſwer ſtruck me. To ſee a woman whom I had raiſed out of the duſt, put on ſuch a ſuperior air, and to hear her aſſure me by way of conſolation, that the queen would be always very kind to me! At length I went on to reproach her with her ingratitude, and her ſecret management with the queen to undermine thoſe, who had ſo long, and with ſo much honour ſerved her majeſty. To this ſhe anſwered, that ſhe never ſpoke to the queen about buſineſs, but that ſhe ſometimes gave her petitions, which came to the back-ſtairs, and with which ſhe knew I did not care to be troubled. And with ſuch inſincere anſwers ſhe thought to colour over the matter, while I knew for certain, ſhe had before this, obtained penſions for ſeveral of her friends, and had frequently paid to others out of the privy-purſe ſums of money which the queen had ordered me to bring her; and that ſhe was every day long with her majeſty in private. But thus our converſation ended; and, when we had ſat a while ſilent, ſhe roſe up and ſaid, ſhe hoped I would give her leave to come ſometimes, and enquire after my health: which, however, it is plain ſhe did not deſign to do, for ſhe never once came near me after this. Notwithſtanding this, when ſhe owned her marriage publicly, I went with lady Sunderland to viſit her; not that I intended to have any farther intercourſe with her, or to diſſemble the ill opinion I had of her (as I had fully reſolved to let her then know, in caſe I found an opportunity of ſpeaking to her privately) but purely out of reſpect to the queen, and to avoid any noiſe or diſagreeable diſcourſe, which my refuſing that ordinary part of civility might occaſion.

Not many days after this I went to pay my reſpects to the queen in the Chriſtmas holidays; and before I went in, I learnt from the page, that Mrs. Maſham was juſt then ſent for. The moment I ſaw her majeſty, I plainly perceived ſhe was very uneaſy. She ſtood all the while I was with her, and looked as coldly upon me, as if her intention was, that I ſhould no longer doubt of my loſs of her affections. Upon obſerving what reception I had, I ſaid, I was very ſorry I had happened to come ſo unſeaſonably. I was making my courteſy to go away, when the queen, with a great deal of diſorder in her face, and without ſpeaking one word, took me by the hand; and, when thereupon I ſtooped to kiſs her's, ſhe took me up with a very cold embrace, and then, without one kind word, let me go. So ſtrange a treatment of me, after my long and faithful ſervices, and after ſuch repeated aſſurances from her majeſty of an unalterable affection, made me think, that I ought in juſtice to myſelf, as well as in regard to my Miſtreſs's intereſt, to write to her in the plaineſt and ſincereſt manner poſſible, and to expoſtulate with her upon her change to me, and upon the new counſels, by which ſhe ſeemed to be wholly governed. My letter was in theſe terms:

December 27, 1707.

'If Mrs. Morley will be ſo juſt as to reflect and examine impartially her laſt reception of Mrs. Freeman, how very different from what has been formerly, when you were glad to ſee her come in, and ſorry when ſhe went away; certainly you cannot wonder at her reproaches upon an embrace, that ſeemed to have no ſatisfaction in it, but that of getting rid of her, in order to enjoy the converſation of one that has the good fortune to pleaſe you much better, though I am ſure nobody did ever endeavour it with more ſincerity than Mrs. Freeman had done. And if I had conſidered only my intereſt, and that of my family, I might have borne this change without any complaint. For I believe Mrs. Morley would be ſincere in doing us any good. But I have once been honoured with an open kind confidence and truſt, and that made all my ſervices agreeable; and it is not poſſible to loſe it without a mortification too great to be paſſed with ſilence, being ſure, that I have never done any thing to forfeit it, having never betrayed nor abuſed that confidence, by giving you a falſe repreſentation of any body. My temper is naturally plain and ſincere, and Mrs. Morley did like it for many years. It is not the leaſt altered. But I cannot help thinking thoſe things reaſonable, that appear to be ſo. And I appeal to God Almighty, that I never deſigned or purſued any thing, but as I was thoroughly convinced it was for Mrs. Morley's true intereſt and honour: And, I think, I may ſafely put it to that trial, if any thing has yet proved unſucceſsful, that was of any public conſequence, that Mrs. Freeman has been earneſt to perſuade Mrs. Morley to. And it is not poſſible for me to diſſemble, ſo as to appear what I am not.

So much by way of apology for what happened upon Wedneſday laſt. And if Mrs. Morley has any remains of the tenderneſs ſhe once profeſſed for her faithful Freeman, I would beg ſhe might be treated one of theſe two ways, either with the openneſs and confidence of a friend, as ſhe was for twenty years (for to pretend kindneſs without truſt and openneſs of heart is a treatment for children, not friends) or elſe in that manner,

There were at that time three biſhoprics vacant. Sir Jonathan Trelawney, conſiderable for his birth and intereſt in Cornwal, had been removed the ſummer before from Exeter to Wincheſter. The lord-treaſurer had promiſed, that preferments ſhould be beſtowed on men well principled with relation to the preſent conſtitution, and on men of merit. The queen without regarding this, ſecretly engaged herſelf to Dr. Blackall for Exeter; and for Cheſter, (being at the ſame time void by the death of Dr. Stratford) to ſir William Dawes. Theſe divines were in themſelves men of merit, but their notions all were on the other ſide. They had ſubmitted to the government; but they, at leaſt Dr. Blackall, ſeemed to condemn the revolution, and all that had been done purſuant to it. Sir William Dawes was likewiſe looked on as an aſpiring man who would ſethimſelf at the head of the tory party. This nomination therefore gave great diſguſt. To qualify this a little, Dr. Patrick, the pious and learned biſhop of Ely, dying at this time, the queen advanced biſhop More from Norwich to that ſee; and Dr. Trimnel, a worthy perſon in all reſpects, was named for Norwich; yet this did not quiet the uneaſineſs which many were under by reaſon of the other nominations which ſeemed to flow from the queen herſelf, and ſo diſcovered her inclinations.

To prevent the ill effects, that this might have in the approaching ſeſſion, ſome of the eminent members of the houſe of commons were called to a meeting, with the dukes of Somerſet and Devonſhire. Theſe lords aſſured them, in the queen's name that ſhe was very ſenſible of the ſervices which the whigs did her; and though ſhe had engaged herſelf ſo far with relation to thoſe two biſhoprics, that ſhe could not recal the promiſes ſhe had made, yet for the future ſhe was reſolved to give them full content[P]. But while this was ſaid to ſome whigs, Mr. Harley, and his friends Mr. St. John and ſir Simon Harcourt took great pains with the leaders of the tories particularly ſir Thomas Hanmer, Mr Bromley, and Mr. Freeman, to engage them in in the queen's intereſts, aſſuring them that her heart was with them; that ſhe was weary of the tyranny of the whigs and longed to be delivered from it. But they were not wrought upon by that management: they either miſtruſted it, as done only to inſnare them; or they had other views, which they did not think fit to own. This double dealing came to be known, and gave occaſion to much jealouſy and diſtruſt.

A little before the ſeſſion was opened, an eminent misfortune happened at ſea. A convoy of five ſhips of the line (the Cumberland of eighty guns, captain Richard Edwards commodore; the Devonſhire of like force; the Royal Oak of ſeventy guns; and the Cheſter and Ruby of fifty) were ſent to Liſbon, to convoy thither a fleet of about a hundred and thirty ſail of merchant ſhips, with merchandize, proviſions, ſtores of war, and a thouſand horſes bought in England for the king of Portugal. They left Plymouth on the 9th of October, being ordered to ſail, as if it had been by concert at a time when a ſquadron from Dunkirk had joined another from Breſt, and lay in the way, waiting for them under the command of Monſieur Forbin, and Monſieur du Gué Trouin, and making in all fourteen ſail; one of ſeventy-two guns, others of ſixty, ſome of fifty, and none under forty. Some advertiſements were brought to the admiralty of this conjunction, but they were not believed. When the French ſet upon the Engliſh ſhips off the Lizard, the convoy did their part very gallantly, though the enemy were almoſt three to one. One of the Engliſh men of war was blown up, and three of them were taken, ſo that only one eſcaped much ſhattered; but they had fought ſo long, that moſt of the merchant ſhips had time to get away, and ſailed on not being purſued, and got ſafe to Liſbon. This coming almoſt at the ſame time with the loſs of admiral Shovel, the ſeſſion of parliament begun with a melancholy face, and a diſpute, upon the opening, had almoſt put the houſes into great diſorder.

It was generally thought, that, though this was a parliament that had now ſat two years, yet it was a new parliament, by reaſon it had been let fall, and was revived by a proclamation, as has been ſaid. The conſequence of this was, that they who had got places were to be re elected. Others maintained, that it could not be a new parliament, ſince it was not ſummoned by a new writ, but by virtue of a clauſe in an act of parliament. Mr. ſecretary Harley was for maintaining it to be an old parliament; but the duke of Marlborough, upon his coming over, prevailed to have it yielded to be a new one. Accordingly, when, on the 23d of October, the firſt parliament of Great-Britain met at Weſtminſter, all the forms uſual in the beginning of a new parliament were obſerved. The queen came to the houſe of peers, and, the commons being ſent for, they were directed by the lord chancellor to return to their houſe, and chuſe a ſpeaker, and preſent him that day ſe'nnight. They unanimouſly made choice of Mr. Smith their former ſpeaker, and then adjourned to the 30th of the ſame month. The lords alſo adjourned to the ſame day, after thirteen peers of that part of Great-Britain called Scotland, had been admitted to their places by virtue of their reſpective writs, each being introduced by two Engliſh peers of the ſame rank.

On the 30th, the queen came again to the houſe of peers, and the commons being ſent for, preſented their ſpeaker, whoſe election was approved. Then the lord chancellor acquainted both houſes with her majeſty's pleaſure, that they ſhould adjourn to the 6th of November; on which day the queen made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"IT is with all humble thankfulneſs to Almighty God, and entire ſatisfaction to myſelf, that I meet you here in this firſt parliament of Great-Britain, not doubting, but you come with hearts prepared, as mine is, to make this union ſo proſperous, as may anſwer the well grounded hopes of all my good ſubjects, and the reaſonable apprehenſions of our enemies.

"To this end nothing is ſo immediately material, as to convince, as ſoon as poſſible, both our friends and our enemies, that the uniting of our intereſts has not only improved our abilities, but our reſolutions alſo, to proſecute this juſt and neceſſary war, till we obtain a ſafe and honourable peace, for ourſelves and for our allies.

"In ſo great and extenſive a war as this, many things may be uſefully undertaken, which are not fit to be communicated before-hand. The attempt upon Toulon was of this nature; and, though it had not wholly its deſired effect, has nevertheleſs been attended with many great and obvious advantages to the common cauſe in this year, and has made our way more eaſy, I hope, to greater in the next.

"As the French have gained ground upon us in Spain, ſo they have been wholly driven out of Italy, by which it is become more eaſy for all the allies to join their aſſiſtance next year for enabling the king of Spain to recover his affairs in that kingdom, and to reduce the whole Spaniſh monarchy to his obedience.

"The weakneſs and ill poſture of affairs upon the Rhine, in the beginning of the year, has given an opportunity to manner, that is neceſſary for the poſt ſhe is in, which unavoidably forces her to be often troubling Mrs. Morley upon the account of others. And if ſhe pleaſes to chuſe which of theſe two ways, or any other ſhe likes to have Mrs. Freeman live in, ſhe promiſes to follow any rule that is laid down, that is poſſible, and is reſolved to her life's end, and, upon all occaſions, to ſhew, that Mrs. Morley never had a more faithful ſervant.'

My lord Marlborough, or my lord Godolphin (I have forgot which) carried my letter. The queen took no notice of it to either of thoſe lords. But ſome days after ſhe wrote me an anſwer, in which ſhe very much ſoftened what had paſſed. I was much pleaſed to find her majeſty in that diſpoſition, and once more put on as eaſy an appearance as I could.

[P] The ducheſs of Marlborough, in the Account of her Conduct, p. 174, obſerves, that, notwithſtanding the promotion of lord Sunderland to the poſt of ſecretary of ſtate was carried by the whigs, they were ſoon alarmed again by the queen's choice of two high-church divines to fill two vacant biſhoprics. Several of the whigs were diſpoſed to think themſelves betrayed by the miniſtry; whereas the truth was, that the queen's inclination to the tories, being now ſoothed by the flatteries and inſinuations of her private counſellors, had begun to make it irkſome to her to conſult with her miniſters upon any promotions, in either the church or ſtate. The firſt artifice of thoſe counſellors was to inſtil into the queen notions of the high prerogative of acting without her miniſters, and (as they expreſſed it) of being queen indeed. And the nomination of perſons to biſhoprics againſt the judgment and remonſtrances of her miniſtry, being what they knew her genius would fall in with more readily than with any thing elſe they could propoſe, they began with that; and they took care, that theſe remonſtrances ſhould be interpreted by the world, and reſented by herſelf as hard uſage, a denial of common civility, and even the making her no queen.

Her majeſty, however, to quiet the diſſatisfaction of the whigs for the late promotions, ordered her miniſters to aſſure them, that ſhe would prefer no more tories, and ſhe gave the ſame aſſurances with her own mouth in the cabinet-council. And ſhe was ſuffered by her ſecret counſellors ſo far to obſerve this promiſe, as to give, about the ſame time, the biſhopric of Norwich to Dr. Trimnell, a particular friend of lord Sunderland's. And ſhe alſo, ſome time after, gave the profeſſorſhip of divinity at Oxford to Dr. Potter, the preſent archbiſhop of Canterbury, who had Dr. Smalridge for his competitor, recommended by the tories. But this latter favour to the whigs was not ſo eaſily obtained as the former. And, upon the delays, that were made in beſtowing it, my lord Marlborough thought it proper to try what credit he had with the queen, whoſe glory he had carried to a height beyond that of any of her predeceſſors. He wrote therefore a very moving letter to her, complaining of the viſible loſs of his intereſt with her, and particularly of her ſo long deferring the promotion ſhe had promiſed, of the perſon recommended by her miniſtry, as a faithful friend to her government, adding, that, the only way to make her reign eaſy, was to be true to that rule, which ſhe had profeſſed to lay down, of preferring none of thoſe, who appeared againſt her ſervice and the nation's intereſt, &c. He wrote at the ſame time to the ſame effect to me, and I wrote to the queen; and at length by much ſolicitation this matter was obtained, and Dr. Potter fixed in the profeſſorſhip.

the French to make themſelves ſtronger in all other parts: But this defect ſeems in a very promiſing way of being fully remedied againſt next campaign, by the conduct and authority of the elector of Hanover, whoſe ſeaſonable acceptance of that command has ſtrengthened and obliged the whole confederacy.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"The juſt application of the ſums given me by former parliaments, the plain neceſſity of continuing this war, the reaſonable proſpect of putting a good end to it, if we be not wanting to ourſelves, and the honour of the firſt parliament of Great-Britain, are, I make no doubt, ſufficient arguments to incite you to provide the neceſſary ſupplies, which I am obliged to deſire of you for the enſuing campaign in all parts, and particularly for the timely ſupport of the king of Spain, and the making good our treaty with Portugal; as alſo for ſtrengthening the confederate army under the command of the duke of Savoy; all which ſervices, I do not doubt, but you will think ſo neceſſary that they ought not be neglected, even though they ſhould require an augmentation.

"The ſums already expended in this war have been very great; and they are ſufficient proofs how well ſatisfied my ſubjects have always been with the ends of my government; of which I am ſo ſenſible, as never to aſk any ſupplies from them but what are abſolutely neceſſary for the preſervation of religion and liberty. I look upon it as my great happineſs, that I have not the leaſt intereſt ſeparate from that of all my good ſubjects.

My lords and gentlemen,

"In a work ſo great and new in its kind as that of the union, it is impoſſible but that ſome doubts and difficulties muſt have ariſen, which, however, I hope, are ſo far overcome, as to have defeated the deſign of thoſe, who would have made uſe of that handle to foment diſturbances.

There are ſeveral matters expreſsly made liable, by the articles of the union, to the conſideration of the parliament of Great-Britain, which, together with ſuch others, as may reaſonably produce thoſe advantages, that with due care, muſt certainly ariſe from that treaty, I earneſtly recommend to your ſerious conſideration.

"On my part, nothing ſhall be wanting to procure to my people all the bleſſings, which can follow from this happy circumſtance of my reign, and to extinguiſh by all proper means the leaſt occaſions of jealouſy, that either the civil or religious rights of any part of this my united kingdom can ſuffer by the conſequences of this union.

"Such a ſuggeſtion ſhall never, in my time, have any foundation, how reſtleſs ſoever our enemies may be in their endeavours and artifices to diſturb our peace and happineſs. Thoſe great and valuable bleſſings cannot but be always ſecure to us, if we heartily endeavour to confirm and improve our preſent union. I hope therefore you will ſuffer nothing to prevail with you to diſunite among yourſelves, or abate your zeal in oppoſing the common enemy."

The queen's ſpeech variouſly affected both houſes. The commons unanimouſly voted and preſented an addreſs of thanks, wherein, they aſſured her majeſty, "That no diſappointments ſhould diſcourage them from making their utmoſt efforts to enable her, in conjunction with her allies, to reduce the whole Spaniſh monarchy to the obedience of the king of Spain, to make good the treaty with Portugal, and to ſtrengthen the confederate army under the command of the duke of Savoy." But in the houſe of lords, when the queen's ſpeech came firſt under conſideration, inſtead of voting immediately an addreſs of thanks, the earl of Wharton made a ſpeech, wherein, among other things, he took notice of the great decay of trade and ſcarcity of money, which he had obſerved in travelling in the country, ſo that the farmers were not able to pay their rents to their landlords. He was ſeconded by the lord Sommers, who enlarged on the ill ſtate and miſmanagement of the navy, and on the great loſſes of the merchants at ſea the laſt ſummer. The earl of Stamford (at that time made one of the commiſſioners of trade) endeavoured to put a ſtop to the proſecution of this ſubject, by moving and poſtponing the conſideration of the ſtate of the nation till a more proper occaſion, and propoſing the returning thanks to the queen for her ſpeech. This was oppoſed by the duke of Buckinghamſhire, the earl of Rocheſter, and the lord Guernſey; who urged, that they ought, in the firſt place, to conſider the ſtate of the nation; inſinuating, at the ſame time, that addreſſes had before been made to little purpoſe; meaning, with relation to the navy. After ſome other ſpeeches, it was ordered, that the ſtate of the nation ſhould be taken into conſideration, Nov. 19, in a committee of the whole houſe, where the queen was preſent incognito. The lord Herbert of Cherbury being choſen chairman, a petition given in by the two ſheriffs of London, and ſubſcribed by about two hundred of the moſt eminent merchants of the city, was read, complaining of the great loſſes, which they had lately ſuſtained at ſea, for want of convoys and cruiſers, and begging a ſpeedy remedy. After the reading of this petition, which was preſented to the committee by the earl of Wharton, he began the debate, by laying open the miſerable condition of the nation, and the great decay of trade. Several other peers ſpoke to the ſame effect; and, among the reſt, the Lord Haverſham, in his uſual manner, made a long ſpeech [q].

The debate growing high, ſome lords endeavoured to allay it, by propoſing ways and means to retrieve our loſſes at ſea; and, among the reſt, the lord Hallifax moved, That a committtee be appointed to receive propoſals for encouraging of trade and privateers in the Weſt-Indies; which motion being ſeconded by the lord-treaſurer, and the queſtion put, the ſame was carried in the affirmative. After which, [q] The moſt material paſſages of this ſpeech were theſe: 'My lord Herbert,——The two things you have now under your conſideration, your fleet and your trade, have ſo near a relation, and ſuch mutual influence upon each other, they cannot well be ſeparated. Your trade is the mother and nurſe of your ſeamen; your ſeamen are the life of your fleet, and your fleet is the ſecurity and protection of your trade; and both together are the wealth, ſtrength, ſecurity, and glory of Britain.

And this is ſo manifeſt, that thoſe, who have writ upon theſe ſubjects, whether foreigners, or among ourſelves, have all owned it: Which makes it aſtoniſhing, that a thing ſo clear and evident, and wherein our intereſt and ſafety do ſo much conſiſt, ſhould be poſtponed to any foreign conſideration whatſoever; wherein we are leſs concerned. But we are ſo unhappy as to ſtruggle with ſo many complicated difficulties, that what is proper for one thing, is prejudicial to another.

My lord,——Your diſaſters at ſea have been ſo many, a man ſcarce knows where to begin. Your ſhips have been taken by your enemies, as the Dutch take your herrings, by ſhoals upon your own coaſts: Nay, your royal navy itſelf has not eſcaped. And theſe are pregnant misfortunes, and big with innumerable miſchiefs. Your merchants are beggared; your commerce is broke; your trade is gone; your ſtaple and manufacture ruined: The queen has loſt her cuſtoms, and the parliament muſt make good the deficiencies, while, in the mean time, our allies have an open and flouriſhing trade, and our enemies make uſe both of our own ſhips and ſeamen too againſt us!

There is yet a farther grievance: When, through a thouſand difficulties and dangers, the honeſt trader has brought home ſome ſmall effects, he is fallen upon and oppreſſed by vexatious and unjuſt proſecutions. I mention this with relation to the union, and to ſhew, that, though I was always againſt it, yet, ſince it is made, I am for keeping firm and exactly to it.

My lord, The face of our affairs is viſibly changed in the ſpace of one year's time, and the temper of the nation too. Formerly men ſtifled their misfortunes, and were afraid of whiſpering them out, for fear of being overheard and undone. Now it is hard to ſtop their mouths, or keep them within any bounds. The moving objects of ſorrow we meet with every where, the tears of the fatherleſs, and cries of the widows, have raiſed both a compaſſion for the diſtreſſed, and a reſentment and indignation againſt the authors of thoſe misfortunes; and the very fames, which of late have flew abroad, no body knows from whence, and papers, which have been cried in your ſtreets, are all marks of the great ferment the nation is in.

My lord, you are now upon the enquiry, by what ways and perſons we have been brought into this miſerable condition. I think it very indifferent which way you proceed. It ſeems reaſonable, that thoſe lords, who firſt moved this order, ſhould put it into what method they pleaſe; but I muſt take leave to ſay, that, begin where you will, if you do not end with the miniſtry, we ſhall be in a worſe condition, in my opinion, than we were before.

As to the admirality, if the prince's council have committed any fault, it is very fit they ſhould have what they deſerve; but, I hope, no perſuaſion will prevail with the prince himſelf to lay down that commiſſion. The navy, I think, is ſafer in his hands than in any other man's hands whatſoever, and I will give your lordſhip my reaſon for it. He has advantages no other perſon can pretend to. He owes not his commiſſion to the favour of any great miniſter whatſoever, nor is he within the reach of their power. He ſtands upon a much more unſhaken and firm foundation; and, if there be any miſtake, it is impoſſible to be the effect either of fear, or the anger of a great miniſter, or a care to pleaſe him.

My lord, I take the root of all our misfortunes to lie in the miniſtry, and without a change of miniſtry, in my opinion no other remedy will be effectual. I may perhaps be told by ſome lord, that I arraign the miniſtry. I know that is not proper here; yet every lord has liberty of ſpeaking his thoughts freely, and taking notice of any thing he thinks a grievance to the nation; and it is under this notion of complaint, and from a ſenſe of our miſerable condition that I ſay this to your lordſhip; and if I were not confident I ſtand upon ſure ground, I ſhould not venture thus far; but I have my juſtification in my hand. And now my lord, is it fit I ſhould prove what I ſay.

Should I mention the breach of the firſt, fourth, and laſt articles of the union, I am within your order; and thoſe lords, who ſerve, at preſent, for the north part of Britain, I am confident have heard of a complaint and addreſs of the royal boroughs. And I might remember the diſappointment we have met with in Spain. But I hope thoſe two points will be ſome time or other conſidered. I will therefore keep myſelf for proof ſtrictly to your petition; and, I think, nothing is more evident, than that your miniſtry has been the cauſe of theſe misfortunes; and the argument, which convinces me of it, is drawn from an addreſs of your lordſhips in 1704, which I have in my hand. I know before whom I ſpeak: The queen is a princeſs of that conſummate wiſdom, as not to do any thing without the advice of her miniſtry. Your lordſhips did then moſt humbly adviſe and addreſs her majeſty, that particular care might be taken of theſe points. None but thoſe, that have her majeſty's ear, could prevail to the contrary; and the want of following your lordſhips advice has loſt the nation near ten millions ſince; and therefore it evidently follows, that your miniſtry have been the occaſion of thoſe loſſes.

a day was appointed to hear, in a grand committee, what the merchants had to alledge, to prove the ſuggeſtions of their petition. It was obſerved, that as ſoon as the debate was over, the duke of Marlborough took the earl of Wharton aſide, and there paſſed ſome warm expoſtulations between them.

The commons, in a great meaſure, made good their aſſurances to the queen, and chearfully voted the neceſſary ſupplies for the navy, land-forces, and ſome other occaſions. But, at the ſame time, upon a petition of ſeveral merchants of London, complaining of the want of cruiſers in the channel and ſoundings, the commons in a grand committee, took into conſideration the ſtate of the navy and trade of the nation; and, a great many merchants being admitted into the houſe, to make good the allegations in their petition, Mr. Heathcote, ſon of ſir Gilbert Heathcote, and Mr. Dawſon, his partner, two Ruſſia merchants, mode long ſpeeches againſt the admiralty, whom they charged with frauds, malice, and ignorance, particularly in relation to the Ruſſia fleet. Some members endeavoured to interrupt them; but ſir Richard Onſlow, the chairman of the committee, deſired them to proceed, which they did with great freedom, and offered to prove what they had advanced, both by papers, and the teſtimony of many merchants there preſent. However, this debate was adjourned to the 4th of December, when admiral Whetſtone was ordered to attend, with the journal of his voyage towards Ruſſia. But, after all, the affair ended only in this reſolution, "That for the better ſecuring the trade of this kingdom, over and above the ſhips of war for the line, and the convoys to remote parts, a ſufficient number of ſhips (which was afterwards ſettled to four) be appointed to cruiſe in proper ſtations." And a bill was ordered to be brought in for that purpoſe.

The loſſes at ſea complained of were imputed to the weakneſs, or to a worſe diſpoſition in ſome, who had great credit with the prince of Denmark, and were believed to govern that whole matter (particularly Mr. George Churchil) for, as they were entirely poſſeſſed of the prince's confidence, ſo, when the prince's council was divided in their opinions, the deciſion was left to the prince, who underſtood very little of thoſe matters, and was always determined by others. By this means they were really lord-high-admiral, without being liable to the laws for errors and miſcarriages. This council was not a legal court, warranted by any law, though they aſſumed that to themſelves: Being counſellors, they were bound to anſwer only for their fidelity. The complaints were feebly managed at the bar of the commons; for it was ſoon underſtood, that not only the prince, but the queen likewiſe concerned herſelf much in this matter; and both looked on it as a deſign levelled at their authority. Both whigs and tories ſeemed to be at firſt equally zealous in the matter; but, by reaſon of the oppoſition of the court, all thoſe, who intended to recommend themſelves to favour, abated of their zeal. Some were vehement in their endeavours to baffle the complaints. They had great advantages from the merchants managing their complaints but poorly; ſome were frighted, and others were practiſed upon, and carried even to magnify the conduct of the fleet, and to make excuſes for all the misfortunes that had happened. That, which had the chief operation on the whole tory party, was, that it was ſet round among them, that the deſign of all theſe complaints was to put the earl of Orford again at the head of the fleet: Upon which they all changed their note, and they, in concurrence with thoſe, who were in offices, or pretended to them, managed the matter ſo, that it was let fall very little to their honour; and ſevere remarks were made on ſome, who had changed their conduct upon their being preferred at court.

The affair was proſecuted with more zeal and courage in the houſe of lords. The committee appointed to examine the complaints, called the merchants, who had ſigned the petition, before them, and treated them not with the ſcorn, that was very indecently offered them by ſome of the houſe of commons, but with great patience and gentleneſs. They obliged them to prove all their complaints by witneſſes upon oath. In the proſecution of the enquiry it appeared, that many ſhips of war were not fitted out to be put to ſea, but lay in port neglected, and in great decay: That convoys had been often flatly denied the merchants; and that, when they were promiſed, they were ſo long delayed, that the merchants loſt their markets, were put to great charge, and, when they had periſhable goods, ſuffered great damage in them. The cruiſers were not ordered to proper ſtations in the Channel; and when convoys were appointed, and were ready to put to ſea, they had not their ſailing orders ſent them, till the enemies ſhips were laid in their way, prepared to fall on them; which had often happened. Many advertiſements, by which thoſe misfortunes might have been prevented, had been offered to the admiralty, but had not only been neglected by them, but thoſe, who offered them, had been ill treated for doing it. The committee made a report of all this to the houſe of lords; upon which the lord-treaſurer moved, that a copy of the report might be ſent to the lord-admiral, which was done, and, in a few days, an anſwer ſent to the houſe, excuſing or juſtifying the conduct of the admiralty in all the branches of it. The chief foundation of the anſwer was, that the great fleets, which were kept in the Mediterranean, obliged them to ſend ſo many of the ſhips and ſeamen thither, that there was not a ſufficient number left to guard all the trade, while the enemy turned all their forces at ſea into ſquadrons for deſtroying it; and that all the ſhips, that could be ſpared from the public ſervice abroad, were employed to ſecure the trade. That the promiſe of convoys had often been delayed by reaſon of croſs winds, and other accidents, that had hindered the return of the men of war longer than had been expected, they being then abroad, convoying other merchant ſhips: And it was ſaid, that there was not a ſufficient number of ſhips for cruiſers and convoys both. The paper ended with ſome ſevere reflections on the laſt reign, in which great ſums had been given for the building of ſhips, and yet the fleet was at that time much diminiſhed, and four thouſand merchant-ſhips had been taken during that war. This was believed to have been ſuggeſted by Mr. ſecretary Harley, on deſign to mortify king William's miniſtry. Upon reading of this anſwer, a newer and fuller examination of the particulars was again reſumed by the ſame committee; and all the allegations in it were exactly conſidered. It appeared, that the half of thoſe ſeamen, whom the parliament had provided for, were not employed in the Mediterranean; that many ſhips lay idle in the port, and were not made uſe of; and that in the laſt war, in which it appeared there were more ſeamen, though not more ſhips, employed in the Mediterranean than were now kept there, yet the trade was ſo carefully looked after by cruiſers and convoys, that few complaints were then made. And as to the reflections made on the laſt reign, it was found, that not one half the ſum, that was named, was given for the building of ſhips; and, that inſtead of the fleets being diminiſhed during that war, as had been affirmed, it was increaſed by above forty ſhips; nor could any proof be given, that four thouſand ſhips were taken during that war. That all the ſeamen, who were then taken and exchanged, did not exceed fifteen thouſand; and in the preſent war eighteen thouſand were already exchanged, and there were two thouſand ſtill remaining in the enemy's hands; ſo much had the prince been impoſed upon in that paper, that was ſent to the lords in his name.

When the examination was ended, and reported to the houſe, it was reſolved to lay the whole matter before the queen in an addreſs; and then the tories diſcovered the deſign, that they drove at; for they moved in the committee, that prepared the addreſs, that the blame of all the miſcarriages might be laid upon the miniſtry and on the cabinet council. It had been often ſaid in the houſe of lords, that it was not intended to make any complaint of the prince himſelf; and it not being admitted, that his council was of a legal conſtitution, the complaining of them would be an acknowledging their authority, the blame therefore could be regularly laid no where, but on the miniſtry. This was much preſſed by the duke of Buckinghamſhire, the earl of Rocheſter, and the lord Haverſham. But to this it was anſwered by the earl of Orford, the lord Sommers, and the lord Halifax, that the houſe ought to lay before the queen only that, which was made out before them upon oath; and therefore, ſince in the whole examination the miniſtry and the cabinet council were not once named, they could offer the queen nothing to their prejudice. Some of the things complained of fell on the navy-board, which was a body acting by a legal authority. The lords ought to lay before the queen ſuch miſcarriages, as were proved to them, and leave it to her to find out on whom the blame ought to be caſt. So far was the miniſtry from appearing to be in fault, that they found ſeveral advertiſements were ſent by the ſecretaries of ſtate to the admiralty, which, as appeared afterwards, were but too well grounded; and yet theſe were neglected by them; and that which raiſed the clamour higher, was, that, during the winter, there were no cruiſers lying in the Channel; ſo that many ſhips, which had run through all dangers at ſea, were taken in ſight of land; for the privateers came up boldly to our ports. All this was digeſted into a full and clear addreſs laid by the houſe before the queen[r]; who, in her anſwer, aſſured their lordſhips, "That ſhe would take care to make the moſt uſeful obſervations on the ſeveral particulars contained and referred to in their addreſs: That it was always her opinion, that the encouragement of trade and ſeamen, and the good management of the navy, were of the greateſt importance to the proſperity of this kingdom: And that therefore ſhe would uſe her utmoſt endeavours to encourage all thoſe, whoſe duty it was effectually to perform thoſe ſervices." But nothing followed upon this anſwer; and the queen ſeemed to be highly offended at the whole proceeding.

On the 22d of November, upon a petition of ſeveral merchants of Scotland, complaining, "That goods and merchandizes (particularly French wines) brought by them into England, ſince the firſt of May laſt, had been ſeized; and that the petitioners were under a proſecution in the exchequer for the value thereof, and praying relief touching the ſame;" the commons reſolved to addreſs the queen that ſhe would order the attorney-general to enter noli proſequi, to diſcharge the ſeveral informations relating to the goods imported cuſtom-free, from Scotland, before the firſt day of May laſt. The queen readily complied with this addreſs, both the court and parliament being willing by this indulgence, to abate the diſcontents of the Scots againſt the union.

But, on the other hand, the commons ordered a bill to be brought in to repeal the acts paſſed in Scotland, for the ſecurity of that kingdom, and about peace and war, which had given ſo great a jealouſy to the Engliſh nation, that the reſcinding of them was one of the principal views of the miniſtry, in the proſecution of the treaty of union. This done, the commons conſidered thoſe parts of the queen's ſpeech relating to the making the union more complete, and reſolved on the 11th of December, "1. That there be but one privy-council in the kingdom of Great Britain. 2. That the militia of that part of Great-Britain called Scotland be regulated, in the ſame manner as the militia of that part of Great-Britain called England is regulated. 3. That the powers of juſtices of peace for preſerving the public peace be the ſame throughout the whole united kingdom. 4. That for the better adminiſtration of juſtice, and preſervation of the public peace, the lords of juſticiary be appointed to go circuits twice in the year. 5. That the writs for electing members to ſerve in the houſe of commons for that part of Great-Britain called Scotland, be directed to the ſheriffs of the reſpective counties, and that the returns be made of ſuch writs, in like manner as returns are made of ſuch writs in that part of Great-Britain called England." And they ordered a bill to be brought in upon theſe reſolutions. Two days after they took into conſideration the report from the committee, to whom the petition of ſeveral merchants trading to Portugal, Italy, and Spain was referred; which reſolutions were agreed to by the houſe, viz. "Firſt, that the merchants had fully made out the ſeveral allegations of their petitions: Secondly, that the preſerving the Portugal trade was of the utmoſt concern to this nation, being, at preſent, the greateſt mart for vent of our woollen manufactures, corn, fiſh, and other Britiſh commodities. Thirdly, that there was a conſiderable colluſive trade in French prize-wines carried on before, and more increaſed ſince the falling of the fifteen pounds per tun. Fourthly, that except effectual proviſion were made to prevent the like practices, with relation to the colluſive trade of bringing in French wines, as if they were prize-wines, it would not only be a great diſcouragement to the Portugal trade, and traders, but endanger the entire loſs thereof." And a bill was ordered to be brought in upon the laſt reſolutions. Then, the ſtate, accounts, and liſts relating to the forces in Spain and Portugal, having been laid before the houſe, the conſideration of the ſtate of the war in thoſe parts was deferred till the 7th of January; and ſeveral other papers relating to thoſe affairs were ordered to be laid before the houſe[s].

On the 18th of December, the queen came to the houſe

[r] It was dated on the 25th of February, 1707-8, and began thus:

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and obedient ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, do humbly acquaint your majeſty, that early in this ſeſſion of parliament a petition of ſeveral merchants, on behalf of themſelves and others, traders of the city of London, was preſented to the houſe, whereby they complained of great loſſes by the ill-timing of convoys, and for want of cruiſers; ſo that they durſt no longer engage the remainder of their eſtates to carry on their ſeveral trades, unleſs immediate care was taken to remedy theſe two main cauſes of their misfortunes.

"This petition containing complaints of great conſequence to your majeſty's ſubjects; and we being ſenſible, that nothing but a ſtrict and impartial enquiry into matters of fact could put them in a due light, and enable us to diſtinguiſh between ill-grounded clamours, and a juſt cauſe of complaint, in order to take the uſual method of being rightly and fully informed, did refer the petition to a committee, and did alſo refer to the ſame committee ſeveral papers, which the houſe had found neceſſary to call for from the proper officers, for their better information in divers things relating to the navy.

"The committee having prepared a report, and preſented it to the houſe, upon a mature conſideration it was approved and agreed to; and we think it our duty humbly to lay the ſame before your majeſty.

The lords committees have heard many of the petitioners upon their oaths, and have cauſed them to put their depoſitions into writing and ſign the ſame.

"The lords committees obſerving, that the complaints of the petitioners naturally fell under ſeveral heads, for the greater eaſe of the houſe, have endeavoured in their report to reduce the evidence, to the following method, always referring, as they proceed, to the depoſitions themſelves.

"One thing complained of was, the inſufficiency of convoys appointed for the merchants, whereby their ſhips had from time to time become a prey to the ſuperior force of the enemy.

"A ſecond point was, The merchants ſuffered great diſcouragement by their being forced to wait long for convoys, even for the time promiſed and prefixed for their ſailing; whereby the charge of ſeamens wages and victuals, demurrage of ſhipping, damage of goods, and loſs of markets made trading inſupportable.

"A third ground of complaint was, The untimely and unſeaſonable ſailing of convoys, whereby trade to the Weſt-Indies eſpecially, was in a manner ruined.

"A fourth was, The great want of cruiſers in the channel and ſoundings.

"A fifth complaint was, Concerning the arbitrary proceedings of the captains of the queen's ſhips of war, in impreſſing ſeamen out of the merchant-ſhips in the Weſt-Indies; as alſo upon their return into the ports of Great Britain, to the endangering of many, and loſs of ſeveral ſhips."

The addreſs concludes in theſe terms:

"We, having thus performed what we took ourſelves to be indiſpenſibly obliged to, cannot doubt but it will be graciouſly accepted by your majeſty, as coming from moſt dutiful ſubjects, who ſincerely wiſh they may never have occaſion hereafter of making addreſſes to your majeſty, but to congratulate your ſucceſſes, or to return our humble acknowledgments for the bleſſings of your reign.

"We beſeech your majeſty to believe, that none of your ſubjects do exceed us in true reſpect to his royal highneſs the lord-high-admiral. His great perſonal virtues require it; and his near relation to your majeſty makes it our duty. And as we do not mean any thing in this addreſs ſhould in the leaſt reflect upon him; ſo we are very well aſſured, his royal highneſs will nevre ſuffer other perſons to protect themſelves under his name from a juſt purſuit of ſuch faults and neglects, as immediately tend to the ruin of trade and the deſtruction of Britain.

"There cannot be a plainer proof, that ſome perſons, employed by the lord-high-admiral, have made the worſt uſe imaginable of the truſt he honours them with, than in their preſuming to lay ſuch an anſwer before the houſe of lords in his name. For, not to take notice of the many things (which in the ſecond report have been already laid before your majeſty) throughout the whole paper, there is not the leaſt hopes given, that for the future any better care ſhall be taken of our trade. On the contrary, the whole turn of the anſwer ſeems to be intended for expoſing the complaints of the merchants, rather than pitying their loſſes. We are ſure nothing can be more remote from the goodneſs and compaſſion of the lord-high-admiral's temper, and the tender regard he has always ſhewn for your majeſty's ſubjects.

May it pleaſe your majeſty,

"It is a moſt undoubted maxim, that the honour, ſecurity, and wealth of this kingdom does depend upon the protection and encouragement of trade, and the improving and right managing the naval ſtrength. Other nations, who were formerly great and powerful at ſea, have by negligence and miſmanagement loſt their trade, and ſeen their maritime ſtrength entirely ruined. Therefore we do in the moſt earneſt manner beſeech your majeſty, that the ſea-affairs may be your firſt and moſt peculiar care. We humbly hope, that it ſhall be your majeſty's chief and conſtant inſtruction to all, who ſhall have the honour to be employed in your councils, and in the adminiſtration of affairs, that they be continually intent and watchful in what concerns the trade and fleet; and that every one of them may be made to know it is his particular charge to take care, that the ſeamen be encouraged, the trade protected, diſcipline reſtored, and a new ſpirit and vigour put into the whole adminiſtration of the navy."

[s] While theſe things were depending, the commons, on the 25th of November, took into conſideration the report of the committee appointed to examine the petition of Mr. John Aſgill, a member of the houſe, in priſon in the Fleet for debt, at the ſuit of Mr. Holland, a Staffordſhire gentleman; which report was ordered to be re-committed. On the other hand, the houſe being informed of a printed book or pamphlet, ſigned J. Aſgill, intituled, 'An argument, proving, that according to the Covenant of Eternal Life, revealed in the Scriptures, man be tranſlated from hence into that Eternal Life, without paſſing through death, although the human nature of Chriſt himſelf could not be thus tranſlated till he had paſſed through death.' Several paſſages of which treatiſe being contrary to, and reflecting on the chriſtian religion, the book was brought up to the table, and the title, and ſeveral paragraphs therein, being read, it was ordered, That it be referred to a committee to inquire into the author of the ſaid book. On the 16th of December, the commons reſolved, That Mr. Aſgill ought to have the privilege of the houſe, as a member thereof, and be delivered out of the cuſtody of the warden of the Fleet, to attend the ſervice of the houſe. Purſuant to which reſolution he was immediately diſcharged; but two days after the houſe proceeded to take into conſideration the report from the committee, to whom it was referred, to examine, who was the author, printer and publiſher of the book abovementioned, aſcribed to Mr. Aſgill; who having been heard in his place in relation to the report, the commons reſolved, That in the ſaid book are contained many profane and blaſphemous expreſſions, highly reflecting upon the chriſtian religion; and ordered the ſame to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman in the New Palace Yard, Weſtminſter; and reſolved, That John Aſgill, eſq; having in his place owned himſelf to be the author of the ſaid book, be expelled the houſe.

Mr. Addiſon wrote an excellent piece to this purpoſe, which was printed at London in 4to in 1708, under the title of the preſent 'ſtate of the war and the neceſſity of an augmentation conſidered'. In this diſcourſe, after having ſhewn, that the French are the conſtant and moſt dangerous enemies to the Britiſh nation, and that the danger from them was then greater than ever, and would ſtill increaſe till the union with Spain were broken, he ſets forth the ſeveral advantages which this union had already given France, and taken from Great-Britain, in relation to the Weſt-Indies, the woollen manufactures the trade of the Levant, and the naval power of the two nations of lords, and having paſſed ſome money-bills, and the act ſo repealing the Scotch acts of ſecurity, and about peace and war, made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I Am very well pleaſed with the occaſion of my coming hither at this time, and deſirous to take this opportunity of expreſſing to you the ſatisfaction I have in ſeeing ſo good a progreſs made in the public buſineſs.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I am extremely ſenſible of the readineſs and affection, with which you have provided ſo conſiderable a part of the ſupplies. As I am fully perſuaded it muſt needs give the greateſt ſatisfaction to all our allies; ſo I look upon it as a ſure pledge of your being diſpoſed to make good thoſe hearty aſſurances, which you gave me in the beginning of the ſeſſion.

"I told you at the opening of this parliament, that I did hope you would look upon the ſervices relating to Spain, Portugal, and the army under the command of the duke of Savoy, to be of ſo much importance in the proſecution of this war, that they might deſerve an augmentation; which I think will be of the greateſt uſe to the common cauſe, both with regard to thoſe particular ſervices, and the putting ourſelves in a condition to improve ſuch favourable opportunities, as may ariſe in the enſuing year.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I ſhall only add, that as nothing is more eſſential to my own quiet, and the happineſs of all my good ſubjects, than the bringing this war to a ſafe and honourable concluſion; ſo I muſt think myſelf obliged to look upon all thoſe, who are willing and deſirous to ſupport me in it for attaining that end, as the moſt proper objects of my favour and encouragement.

"I cannot conclude, without recommending to you to confirm and improve the advantages of our happy union, not doubting, but, at the ſame time, you will have due regard to what ſhall be found neceſſary for the public peace, throughout the whole iſland of Great-Britain."

This ſpeech occaſioned, the next day, a long debate in the houſe of lords, in relation to the affairs of Spain, the queen being preſent. The earl of Rocheſter ſpoke firſt, and having commended the earl of Peterborough's courage and conduct, and enumerated his ſervices, ſaid, "That it had been a conſtant cuſtom, that, when a perſon of his rank, who had been employed abroad in ſo eminent a poſt as his lordſhip, had returned home, he had either thanks given him, or was called to an account; urging, that the ſame ought to be done in relation to the earl of Peterborough." The lord Halifax, who ſpoke next, enlarged likewiſe upon the earl's ſucceſsful ſervices, but waved the returning him thanks, till the whole tenour of his conduct had been examined; than which the earl himſelf profeſſed, he had nothing more at heart. The lord Haverſham was not ſilent; but, having highly extolled the earl of Peterborough's valour, ſkill, and ſucceſs, made an oblique reflection on the earl of Galway, ſaying, "It was no wonder our affairs in Spain went ſo ill, ſince the management of them had been intruſted to a foreigner." Hereupon ſeveral lords ſhewed the neceſſity of carrying on the war, till the whole monarchy of Spain ſhould be recovered, and king Charles ſettled upon his throne. And, among the reſt, the earl of Peterborough ſaid, "They ought to give the queen nine ſhillings in the pound, rather than make peace upon any other terms;" adding, "That, if it were thought neceſſary, he was ready to return to Spain, and ſerve, even under the earl of Galway." This naturally brought on the conſideration of ways and means to retrieve the affairs of Spain, in relation to which, the earl of Rocheſter ſaid, "That we ſeemed to neglect the principal buſineſs, and mind only acceſſories:" Adding, "That he remembered the ſaying of a great general, the old duke of Schomberg, that the attacking France, in the Netherlands, was like taking a bull by the horns." And therefore his lordſhip propoſed, "That we ſhould ſtand on the defenſive in Flanders, and ſend from thence fifteen or twenty thouſand men into Catalonia." He was ſeconded by the earl of Nottingham, who complained of Spain being in a manner, abandoned. But the duke of Marlborough endeavoured, with ſome warmth, to ſhew the danger of ſuch a ſcheme, and the neceſſity of augmenting, rather than diminiſhing the forces in Flanders. His chief reaſons were, "Firſt, that moſt of the enemy's ſtrong places there might be kept with one battalion in each; whereas the great towns of Brabant, which he had conquered, required twenty times that number of men for their preſervation. Secondly, That if our army in the Netherlands were weakened, and the French, by their great ſuperiority, ſhould gain any conſiderable advantage, the diſcontented party in Holland, who were not a few, and bore with impatience the great charges of the war, would not fail crying aloud for peace." Here the earl of Rocheſter ſaid, "He wondered that noble peer, who had ever been conſpicuous for his calmneſs and moderation, ſhould now be out of his natural temper: Adding, That, there being an abſolute neceſſity to ſuccour Spain, his grace would oblige their lordſhips, if he would let them know where they might get troops to ſend thither; and the obligation would be the greater, becauſe the earl of Peterborough had, that very day, aſſured them, that he had heard prince Eugene ſay, that the German ſoldiers had rather be decimated, than ſent into Spain." The duke of Marlborough anſwered the reproach of having ſhewed ſome warmth by ſaying, "The thing was of too great importance to be ſpoken of without concernment." And as for the queſtion propoſed by the earl of Rocheſter, he ſaid, "That although it was improper to diſcloſe ſecret projects in ſo great an aſſembly" (to which, that day, many ſtrangers had been admitted, by reaſon of the queen's preſence) "becauſe the enemy would not fail being informed of them; yet, to gratify their lordſhips, he might aſſure them, that meaſures, had already been concerted with the emperor, for forming an army of forty thouſand men, under the command of the duke of Savoy, and for ſending powerful ſuccours to king Charles:" Adding, "That it was to be hoped, that prince Eugene might be prevailed with to go and command in Spain; in which caſe the Germains would gladly follow him thither. The only difficulty, which his grace ſaid might be objected to this ſcheme, was the uſual ſlowneſs of the court of Vienna; to which purpoſe he took notice, that, if the ſeven thouſand tions. He then ſhews how theſe advantages would ſtill riſe higher after a peace, notwithſtanding the preſent conqueſts of Great-Britain, with new additions, ſhould be confirmed to the nation, as well becauſe the monarchy of Spain would not be weakened by ſuch conceſſions, as becauſe no guarantee could be found ſufficient to ſecure them to us. For which reaſon he lays it down as a fixed rule, that no peace was to be made without an entire diſunion of the French and Spaniſh monarchies. That this might be brought about, he endeavoured to prove from the progreſs which had been already made towards it, and the ſucceſſes, which the Britiſh nation had purchaſed in the war, and which were very conſiderable, if well purſued; but of no effect, if the nation ſhould acquieſce in them. In order to compleat this diſunion, in which we had gone ſo far, he would not have us rely upon exhauſting the French treaſury, attempts upon the Spaniſh Indies, deſcents on France, but chiefly on out-numbering them in troops, France being already drained of her beſt ſupplies, and the confederates maſters of much greater forces for multitude and ſtrength, both in men and horſes, and provided with generals of great fame and abilities. He then conſiders the wrong meaſures, which had been hitherto taken in making too ſmall levies after a ſucceſsful campaign, in regulating their number by that of the enemy's forces, and hiring them of our confederates; ſhewing at the ſame time the inconveniences ſuffered from ſuch hired troops, and ſeveral advantages, which would ariſe from employing thoſe of our own nation. He further recommends this augmentation of our forces, to prevent the keeping up a ſtanding body of them in times of peace, to enable us to make an impreſſion on the enemy in the preſent poſture of the war, and to ſecure ourſelves againſt the king of Sweden, who was then at the head of a powerful army, and had not yet declared himſelf. In the laſt place he anſwers by ſeveral conſiderations thoſe two popular objections, that we furniſhed more towards the war than the reſt of the allies; and that we were not able to contribute more than we did already. With regard to the former objection, he obſerves, that if it were true in fact, that England contributed more than any other of the allies, he does not ſee any tolerable colour, that ſhe ſhould not make any addition to her preſent efforts. "Suppoſing, ſays he, among a multitude embarked in the ſame veſſel, there are ſeveral, that in the fury of a tempeſt will rather periſh than work for their preſervation; would it not be madneſs in the reſt to ſtand idle, and rather chuſe to ſink together, than to do more than comes to their ſhare? Since we are engaged in a work ſo abſolutely neceſſary for our welfare, the remiſſneſs of our allies ſhould be an argument for us to redouble our endeavours rather than ſlacken them. If we muſt govern ourſelves by example, let us rather imitate the vigilance and activity of the common enemy, than the ſupineneſs and negligence of our friends. We have indeed a much greater ſhare in the war than any other part of the confederacy. The French king makes at us, directly, keeps a king by him to ſet over us, and hath very lately augmented the ſalary of his court, to let us ſee, how much he hath that deſign at heart. Few of the nations in war with him, ſhould they ever fall into his hands, would loſe their religion or form of government, or interfere at preſent with him in matters of commerce. The Dutch, who are likely to be the greateſt loſers after the Britons, have but little trade to the Levant in comparition with ours, have no conſiderable plantations or commerce in the Weſt-Indies, or any woollen manufacture, for Spain, not to mention the ſtrong barrier they have already purchaſed between France and their own country. But, after all, every nation in the confederacy makes the ſame complaint, and fancies itſelf the greateſt ſufferer by the war. Indeed in ſo common a preſſure, let the weight be never ſo equally diſtributed, every one will be moſt ſenſible of that part, which lies on his own ſhoulders. We furniſh, without diſpute, more than any other branch of the alliance, but the queſtion is, whether others do not exert themſelves in proportion according to their reſpective ſtrength? The emperor, the king of Pruſſia, the elector of Hanover, as well as the ſtates of Holland, and the duke of Savoy, ſeem at leaſt to come up to us. The greateſt powers in Germany are borrowing money, where they can get it, in order to maintain their ſtated quota's, and go thorough their part of the expence: And, if any of the circles have been negligent, they have paid for it much more in their late contributions, than what would have furniſhed out their ſhare in the common charges of the war."

German recruits, which the emperor had promiſed for the army in Piedmont, had arrived in time, the enterprize againſt Toulon would probably have been attended with ſucceſs: But that it was to be hoped, and he durſt engage his word for it, that, for the future, his Imperial majeſty would punctually perform his promiſes." This put an end to the debate; and a committee was appointed to draw up an addreſs to the queen, which was preſented the ſame day; wherein their lordſhips returned her majeſty "their moſt humble thanks for her moſt gracious ſpeech to her parliament; adding, that the great ſpirit and reſolution ſhe was pleaſed to expreſs for the vigorous carrying on the war in Spain and Portugal, and ſtrengthening the army of the duke of Savoy, who had deſerved ſo well of the whole confederacy, could not fail to contribute, in the moſt effectual manner, to bring this war to a ſpeedy and happy concluſion. That ſuch an example ought to excite all her allies to a noble imitation; and their lordſhips were ſure, her majeſty would do her utmoſt, to oblige ſuch of them, as hitherto had failed in their parts, for the future, to act as thoſe, who had a real concern for reſtoring and ſecuring peace and liberty to Europe. That her majeſty's favour would always be the higheſt encouragement to her ſubjects; but the zeal their lordſhips had for the preſervation of her majeſty's perſon and government, and the duty they owed to their country, always had, and ever would oblige them to do all that lay in their power, for ſupporting her majeſty in this juſt war, till it were brought to a ſafe and happy concluſion. And as they had ſhewn the greateſt zeal for bringing the union to paſs, and for preventing every thing, that might diſturb it; ſo they unanimouſly promiſed her majeſty, to do all that was poſſible for them, to make it complete and entire."

The ſame day the lords reſolved, "Firſt, That no peace could be ſafe or honourable for her majeſty and her allies, if Spain and the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies were ſuffered to continue in the power of the houſe of Bourbon. Secondly, Than an humble addreſs be preſented to the queen, to thank her majeſty for the care ſhe had taken, and the inſtances ſhe had uſed with the emperor, for the ſending a conſiderable force for the relief of the king of Spain, under the command of prince Eugene; and to deſire her majeſty, that ſhe would continue to make the moſt preſſing inſtances to the emperor, to ſend powerful ſuccours to Spain under the command of prince Eugene, with expedition; and to make good the concert of putting twenty thouſand men under the command of the duke of Savoy; and that the emperor would alſo uſe his utmoſt power and intereſt for ſtrengthening the army on the Rhine, which was now happily put under the command of that wiſe and valiant prince, the elector of Hanover." An addreſs, containing theſe reſolutions, was accordingly drawn up; concluding, "They believed no part of this could be refuſed upon her majeſty's earneſt interpoſition, who had done ſuch great things for the houſe of Auſtria: And that, this being complied with, they might reaſonably hope, by God's aſſiſtance, the next would prove a happy and glorious campaign." The commons having, at the lords deſire, concurred in this addreſs, both houſes, in a body, preſented the ſame to her majeſty, who told them, "That ſhe was fully of their opinion, that no peace could be honourable or ſafe for them, or for their allies, till the entire monarchy of Spain be reſtored to the houſe of Auſtria; and very well pleaſed to find, that the meaſures, ſhe had concerted for the ſuccour of the king of Spain, were ſo fully approved by both houſes of parliament: And that ſhe ſhould continue her moſt preſſing inſtances with the emperor, for the haſtening of further ſuccours, and that they might be commanded by prince Eugene: As alſo, upon all the other particulars mentioned in their addreſs."

Purſuant to theſe aſſurances, the queen preſſed the emperor to ſend prince Eugene to Spain. The Imperial court delayed to comply in this particular, but (as will hereafter be ſeen) ſent count Staremberg thither, who had indeed acquired a very high reputation.

The 19th of December, the commons came to ſeveral reſolutions about the ſupply ſo that by the 22d, they had given very near ſix millions[t].

Upon an addreſs of the commons, for the queen to uſe her endeavours with his Imperial majeſty, to reſtore to her ſubjects the liberty of trade they formerly enjoyed in Auſtria and Stiria; and to prevent, for the future, any prohibitions from being made in any other parts of his hereditary countries, ſhe was pleaſed to anſwer, That ſhe had given directions ſome time before, to her miniſter abroad upon that matter, and would continue her endeavours for the relief of her ſubjects, as was deſired by the commons addreſs.

Towards the end of the year 1706, three French cevonnois, commonly called camiſars, came over into England, and by their enthuſiaſtic effuſions and pretenſions to propheſy, and extatic convulſion, raiſed the curioſity of their countrymen in London, and gained ſeveral followers. This gave great offence to the generality of the French refugees, and the miniſters and elders of the French royal chapel in the Savoy (the head of the French congregations in Weſtminſter) thought it their duty to inquire into the miſſion of theſe new prophets; and being authorized by the biſhop of London, their eccleſiaſtical ſuperior, ſummoned the three camiſars, Elias Marion, John Cavallier, and Durand Fage, to come before them. Two of them obſtinately refuſed to appear; but the third boldly juſtified their pretences to inſpiration. Whereupon the French church in the Savoy made an act on 2d of January, wherein they were declared impoſtors and counterfeits; and this act was confirmed by the lord biſhop of London. Notwithſtanding this anathema, the pretended prophets, acted by Mr. Miximilian Miſſon, a French refugee, Mr. Nicholas Facio, the mathematical profeſſor at Geneva, and others, and continuing their aſſemblies in Soho, uttered their predictions with great noiſe; and being ſupported by ſir Richard Bulkley and Mr. John Lacy, two Engliſh gentleman of good eſtates, branded the miniſters of the eſtabliſhed church with odious names and characters, and denounced the heavieſt judgments againſt the city of London and the whole Britiſh nation. They publiſhed likewiſe their predictions under the title of Prophetical Warnings of Elias Marion, &c. which was a collection of incoherent and unintelligible jargon, and ſhewed the authors of them to be men thoroughly infatuated. But it being ſuſpected by ſome that there was a mixture of deſign and artifice in the affair, Marion, John Daude, and Facio, were indicted and proſecuted at the expence of all the French churches in London, as diſturbers of the public peace, and falſe prophets; and received their ſentences at the court of queen's bench, to ſtand twice on a ſcaffold with a paper denoting their offence; to pay a fine of twenty marks each, and to give ſecurity for their good behaviour, for one year. According to this ſentence they were expoſed on a ſcaffold at Charing-croſs and the Royal-exchange.

At this time two diſcoveries were made, very unlucky for Mr. Harley. Marſhal Tallard wrote often to Monſieur Chamillard, but he ſent his letters open to the ſecretary's office to be peruſed and ſealed up, and ſo to be conveyed by the way of Holland. Theſe were opened upon ſome ſuſpicion in Holland; and it appeared, that one, in the ſecretary's office, put letters in them, in which, as he offered his ſervice, to the courts of France and St Germains, ſo he gave an account of all tranſactions here. In one of theſe he ſent a copy of the letter, which the queen was to write, in her own hand, to the emperor; and he marked what parts of the letter were drawn by the ſecretary, and what additions were made to it by the lord-treaſurer. This was the letter, by which the queen preſſed the ſending prince Eugene into Spain; and this if not intercepted, would have been at Verſailles many days before it could reach Vienna. He, who ſent this, wrote, that by this they might ſee what ſervice he could do them, if well encouraged. All this was ſent over to the duke of Marlborough; and upon ſearch it was found to be writ by Mr. William Gregg, whom Mr. Harley had not only entertained as a clerk in his office, but likewiſe taken into particular confidence, without inquiry into the former parts of his life; for he was a vicious and neceſſitous perſon. He had been ſecretary to Mr. Gregg, when reſident from king William to the court of Denmark, and afterwards to Mr. Vernon, envoy to the ſame court, by whom he was diſmiſſed for his ill conduct[u]. Mr. Harley had made uſe of him to get intelligence in Scotland in 1705, and came to truſt him with the peruſal and ſealing up of the letters, which the French priſoners, here in England, ſent over to France, and by that means he got into the method of ſending intelligence. He, when ſeized on, either upon remorſe, or the hopes of pardon, confeſſed all, and ſigned his confeſſion; upon which he was tried at the ſeſſions in the Old Baily, where an indictment of high-treaſon was read againſt him, importing, "That he had ſent letters to Monſieur Chamillard, one of the French king's prime miniſters, particularly one, dated the 28th of November laſt; and others, wherein were incloſed the proceedings of both houſes of parliament in relation to the augmentation of our forces, a copy of a letter from the queen to the emperor; private buſineſs ſent the duke of Savoy, &c." To which indictment, Gregg, having pleaded guilty, the lord chief juſtice Holt, and moſt of the judges being preſent, the recorder pronounced ſentence of death againſt him, as in high-treaſon.

At the ſame time John Bara and Alexander Valiere (alias John Clarke) were alſo committed to Newgate for correſponding with the enemy; and Mr. Claude Baud, a native of Piedmont, and ſecretary to count Briancon, envoy extraordinary from the duke of Savoy, was apprehended at the requeſt of that miniſter, by warrant from the earl of Sunderland, for traiterous practices againſt her majeſty and government; but the ſame night as the two meſſengers who had him in cuſtody, were carrying him to Newgate, he made his eſcape from them. But being followed by the queen's proclamation, wherein a reward of two hundred pounds was promiſed for diſcovering and ſecuring him, he was within two hours after, betrayed by a French taylor, in whoſe houſe he had taken ſanctuary, and put under the cuſtody of a meſſenger. Valiere and Bara who had been both employed by Mr. Harley as his ſpies, to go often over to Calais, under pretence of bringing him intelligence, were informed againſt as ſpies employed by France to get intelligence from England. They carried over many letters to Calais and Boulogne; and as was believed, gave ſuch information of our trade and convoys, that by their means, the nation ſuſtained ſuch great loſſes at ſea. They were often complained of upon ſuſpicion, but were always protected by Mr. Harley; yet the preſumptions againſt them were ſo violent, that they were at laſt ſeized on, and brought up priſoners.

A committee of ſeven lords were appointed to examine Mr. Gregg, but could not find out much by him[w]. He had but newly begun his deſigns of betraying ſecrets, and he had no aſſociates with him in it. He told them, that all the [u] The committee of the lords, appointed to examine him, obſerve, that the effect of the papers referred to them was as follows:

I. A copy of Gregg's letter, which was intercepted, dated the 28th of November 1707, O. S. ſent to Monſieur Chamillard, incloſed in a packet from marſhal Tallard, directed to Mr. Robineau his ſteward at Paris.

In this Gregg ſends to Monſieur Chamillard a copy of the queen's letter, written with her own hand to the emperor.

In the ſame letter Gregg takes notice of two letters ſent by him to Monſieur Chamillard, the one dated the 24th, and the other the 28th of October laſt, which he underſtood Robineau had put into his hands.

That perceiving by Robineau's letter to his maſter, that Monſieur Chamillard deſired the marſhal's ſentiments of Gregg, Gregg had himſelf written to him.

In expectation of his anſwer, Gregg flattered himſelf, that the paper then ſent, was of that importance, that there could be no longer doubt of the devotedneſs of a Scottiſhman for France; not to ſpeak of his zeal for the ſervice of his prince, who had found refuge there.

That the lines under which he had drawn a ſtroke, were the thoughts of the lord-treaſurer, which he had added with his own hand to the firſt draught of the letter.

The ſame letter contained ſome other news.

II. There was a copy of a letter, dated the 25th of November, O. S. in the ſame packet, ſubſcribed William Gregg, in which notice is taken of what Robineau writes to Monſieur Tallard concerning him; and that he himſelf had written to the marſhal, and deſired Robineau to deliver the incloſed according to the addreſs, as being of great conſequence.

III. The copy of a letter from marſhal Tallard to Robineau, dated the 10th of September, N. S. in which Monſieur Tallard ſays, that as to the letters, of which Robineau made mention in his of the 25th and 28th of November, that he had delivered them according to the adddreſs. Monſieur Tallard knew nothing of their contents, but by the ſame poſt, which brought his letters.

That he was obliged for the offers, but could make no uſe of them while he was a priſoner. When the peace was made, he would give proof of his acknowledgment to him who made the offers, and would endeavour to engage the perſon, to whom the letters were addreſſed, to do the ſame. In the interim Robineau was to tell the perſon to whom he delivered the letters, for whom the marſhal had the utmoſt conſideration, that he was much obliged to him for deſiring to know his thoughts, before he would determine what to do: That the offers made did not ſuit with the preſent times, at leaſt as to him, &c.

IV. An original letter of the 2d of December, 1707, to Mr. Robineau from Gregg, to felicitate him from being delivered from an importunate man, as would appear by marſhal Tallard's letters, unleſs his laſt to Monſieur Chamillard had not made him determine otherwiſe.

V. A copy of another letter of Gregg to Monſieur Chamillard, dated the 23d of December O. S. which was alſo taken in marſhal Tallard's packet, in which he pretends to give Monſieur Chamillard an account of what paſſed in parliament, with the queen's anſwer to the addreſs of the two houſes, and his excuſe for not ſending the addreſs itſelf.

VI. A letter of Robineau to Monſieur Tallard, the 26th of December, N. S. from Paris (tranſcribed by Gregg in his own hand) in which he ſays, he was going to Verſailles to deliver the anſwer, with which he was charged; that he received every poſt, letters from the ſame perſon, and that he took care to deliver them according to the addreſs.

VII. Another of the 30th of December 1707, N. S. that he had been to deliver, as Monſieur Tallard had charged him, the anſwer to which was deſired of Mr. Tallard.

VIII. Another letter in Gregg's hand, dated the 30th of December 1707, found in Gregg's cloſet, written to Monſieur Chamillard, giving an account of the intention to ſend Mr. Palmer to Savoy, and to take ſeveral other German courts in his way.

IX. A confeſſion of Gregg delivered to the lords of the committee, and ſigned by him.

[w] They went to Newgate to him for that purpoſe, on the 12th of February 1707-8, and acquainted him, "That as the crime, of which he ſtood attainted, was of the moſt heinous nature, ſo there were ſome circumſtances ſo extraordinary, which attended his caſe, that the houſe of lords thought it might be of ſervice to her majeſty and the kingdom, to have all the beginning and progreſs of his treaſonable correſpondence fully laid open: That her majeſty, upon the application of that houſe, had ordered all former examinations and papers concerning him to be laid before them. They told him further, that if he, by a true, ingenious and full confeſſion, would deſerve it, he might have ground to hope, the houſe of lords might intercede in his behalf for mercy from her majeſty, which otherwiſe he had no reaſon to look for. He was alſo told, that, being a man of underſtanding, he was not to expect to be aſked queſtions, but was to give an account of himſelf, when, and how he became firſt employed; when and by what inſtigation he was drawn in to correſpond with the queen's enemies; and how far it proceeded."

He ſaid, That one Mr. Gregg, the late king's reſident at Copenhagen, was his kinſman, and ſent for him thither; and he continued with him about three years till his death, which happened about two months before the late king died.

That Mr. Vernon was ſent envoy to Denmark, and took him, whom he found there, into his ſervice, in which he continued about two years and an half, and then he was diſcharged from his ſervice by Mr. Vernon.

Mr. Vernon coming for England about his private affairs, while Gregg was in his ſervice, and ſtaying here ſome time, in that interval Gregg received ſome letters from Mr. ſecretary Harley, which gave him occaſion after to apply to him.

The 9th of December 1704, Gregg came to England, and ſoon made application to Mr. ſecretary Harley for employment, but was not recommended to him by any body.

The 3d of January he ſaw him firſt at his office, where he attended often.

The 5th of February 1704-5, Mr. Jones, the ſecretary's firſt clerk, came to him, and told him, the ſecretary would ſpeak with him. He attended on the ſecretary the ſame day, who aſked him, If he would be willing to be employed in his own country? Gregg ſaid, He was willing to be ſent upon any good errand. Mr. ſecretary told him, It was to give an account of the proceedings of the enſuing parliament, which was to be held under the duke of Argyle.

The 6th of February he went to the office, and Mr. ſecretary told him he ſhould be diſpatched in a few days.

To make ſome trial of him (as he ſuppoſed) Mr. ſecretary aſked him, If he could give an account of the court of Denmark? Gregg ſaid, he was willing to do it as well as he could; and, accordingly, in ſome time drew up a ſtate of that court, and it was not diſapproved.

He attended daily, and, on the 20th of April, Mr. ſecretary Harley gave him a note of twenty pounds, to be paid by his ſteward in Scotland-yard.

On the 23d of May 1705, he was ordered to go for Scotland, and about a week after ſet forwards on his journey. When he was diſpatched, a note of thirty pounds was given to him.

Mr. ſecretary always amuſed him with telling him, he ſhould have inſtructions for his directions in Scotland; but, at laſt, ordered him to draw up ſome queries himſelf about the ſtate of affairs in Scotland; which he did, and they were approved.

Some of the queries were, What were the deſigns of the ſeveral parties? What correſpondence between the Highlands and St. Germains? How affected to the houſe of Hanover, &c. He was alſo ordered to form a cypher of letters, whereby to deſign the great men there.

The 2d of June 1705, he arrived at Edinburgh, and wrote to Mr. ſecretary the Thurſday following, being ordered to direct all his letters to Thomas Bateman in Scotland-yard.

Mr. ſecretary promiſed the receipt of his letters ſhould be acknowledged; and he preſſed often for it, to know they came to hand, fearing his letters were intercepted, becauſe he was ſuſpected as a ſpy in that country. But, though he wrote thrice a week, he never heard one word from Mr. ſecretary, or by his order, during his whole ſtay in that country.

Being aſked by the lords, If he was recommended to any body in Scotland? he anſwered, No.

The 15th of October he arrived at London, and the next day waited on Mr. ſecretary, who thanked him for his letters, and told him, he had named him to the queen, upon occaſion of a paper he had ſent; but Mr. Gregg ſaid, he believed the queen had never heard of his name, till this laſt unhappy accident.

On the 29th of October, Mr. ſecretary ordered twenty-five pounds. He attended daily, and preſſed much to be ſent abroad, particularly to go with Mr. Methuen, when he was ſent to Savoy, but it was declined.

On new-year's day Mr. ſecretary dropped a word, which ſtartled him much: He told him, he would fix him; which Gregg underſtood was bringing him into his office.

Upon this he preſented a petition, that he might not be in the office, becauſe the ſalary was ſmall; and, being in debt, he could not live on it.

He attended every day. The ſecretary enquired of him what he knew of languages. He ſaid, he knew ſome French and German, but knew Latin better than either.

The 16th of April 1706, he was admitted into the office, and a note was given upon Mr. Jones, as for one of the clerks; and Mr. ſecretary told him, papers of ſtate lay ſo careleſsly about the office, that every one belonging to it, even the door-keeper, might have read them all. Mr. Harley's cuſtom was to come to the office late on poſt nights; and after he had given his orders and wrote his letters, he uſually went away, and left all to be copied out, when he was gone. By that means Mr. Gregg came to ſee every thing, in particular the queen's letter to the emperor. He ſaid he knew the deſign on Toulon in May, but did not diſcover it; for he had not entered on his ill practices till October. This was all he could ſay. By the examination of Valiere, Bara, and of many others, who lived about Dover, and were employed by them, a diſcovery was made of a conſtant intercourſe they were in with Calais, under Mr. Harley's protection. They often went over with

It

It was only to keep his hand in uſe, and that he would provide better for him.

The 16th of May, copying a letter ſent to Mr. Vernon, that he was to conſider of ſomebody fit to be left behind, Gregg thought it to be intended in his favour, and wrote to Mr. Vernon on that occaſion, deſiring his countenance.

But the 28th of May, Mr. ſecretary writing word to Mr. Vernon, that he had leave to come at his own time, but muſt leave ſomebody behind; and this being wrote before any anſwer could come from thence, Gregg ſaw nothing was meant for him in the former letter.

Gregg made offers of ſervice to Mr. Pulteney, when he was to go, but he ſaid he was provided.

Then he told Mr. ſecretary, his mind was depreſſed by his debts, and deſired to be thrown abroad, and to go with ſir Philip Meadows; but that was refuſed, and Strahan was ſent.

Then Mr. ſecretary aſked, What would make him eaſy? And he gave in a liſt of his debts, amounting to about thirty-five pounds.

Since that Mr. ſecretary has ordered him at ſeveral times about twenty or five and twenty pounds in the whole; the laſt ſum was ſeven pounds in October laſt, part of a bill of 14 pounds, for which debt he was preſſed at that time.

Being aſked by the lords, If his debts only made him ſo deſirous to be gone? He ſaid, At that rate the buſineſs was managed in the office, it was a perfect drudgery.

Their buſineſs ſeldom began till about eleven or twelve at night, and they ſtaid till two or three, or later, though ſometimes not above two letters to diſpatch; and he thought himſelf happieſt, who could get away ſooneſt.

The method was, firſt, the letters were taken in ſhort hand; afterwards were wrote fair; then ſent to Mr. ſecretary's houſe to be ſigned, and after returned to the office to be entered; ſo that they were obliged ſometimes to ſtay till four o'clock in the morning.

He ſaid, That in April laſt, when Hill the meſſenger was ſent to Turin, the packet was left to him, though the youngeſt clerk, to be made up, and delivered to the meſſenger.

In that packet there was a letter to ſir John Norris, and another to Mr. Chetwynd. Moſt of the laſt letter was in cypher. Gregg entered both thoſe letters. There was alſo another letter to ſir Cloudeſly Shovel, and letters from the lord-treaſurer. He put them all up in the packet, and after gave them to Hill.

Being aſked, If he knew by the letters what the deſign was? Gregg ſaid, he underſtood Toulon was to be beſieged. He could not read the whole, but knew enough to find out that. He ſaid it was wrote in the cypher of the office by Mr. Harley, the earl of Sunderland being ſick at that time.

The queen's letters de cachet are made up before they are brought to the office; but the clerks are truſted to make up other letters.

The lords committees required him to give the whole relation of his correſpondence, when it began, and how long it had been carried on.

Gregg ſaid, The firſt motive of his writing to France was in order to get money, by obtaining a paſs; and that his firſt letter was the 24th of October laſt.

From his firſt entering into the office he had always a great hand in peruſing the French priſoners letters. That convenient opportunity, and his poverty, gave him the temptation.

The French priſoners letters came under a general cover, directed to Mr. Lewis. Marſhal Tallard's letters are under a flying ſeal; the reſt of them came always ſealed, but are opened at the office.

Generally Mr. Lewis threw them down on the table, and left the peruſing them to the clerks, to Mr. Mann and Gregg; and, ſince Mr. Mann left the office, they have been truſted wholly to Gregg.

If Gregg obſerved any thing, that he thought material, he made an extract of it, and ſhewed it to the ſecretary or under ſecretary. He mentioned a particular extract he had made out of a letter of Mr. Chamillard to Mr. Tallard.

Letters came from Nottingham every poſt; ſometimes twenty letters came to them in a day from France. Theſe came always ſealed. From the time he came into the office, theſe letters were never peruſed, either by the ſecretary or under-ſecretary; which he is ſure of, becauſe they were ſealed when he looked on them. He cannot for that reaſon ſay, but Mr. Lewis might ſometimes look into Mr. Tallard's letter, becauſe that had a flying ſeal; but the reſt were left ſealed as they came by Mr. Lewis to the clerks peruſal.

Gregg ſaid, he had a diſpute with Mr. Lewis upon the account of theſe letters, Gregg declaring, he thought it not to be a buſineſs fit for the under-clerks to be truſted with.

Mr. ſecretary Harley wrote a letter in anſwer to one from Monſieur Pontchartrain, thanking him for his civility to one Middleton.

In tranſcribing it, Gregg found it ſo ill turned,-and the French bad, that he acquainted the ſecretary with it at eleven o'clock at night in October laſt. This letter was ſtopped; but after Mr. Lewis ſent it away as it was wrote at firſt.

The rough draught of the queen's letter to the emperor, as it was ordered by the lord-treaſurer, was left in the public book of the office to be entered the ſame night it was to be ſent away. There Gregg ſaid he found it, and tranſcribed it, and any other clerk of the office might have done it as well as he.

All the books in the office lie in a preſs; the key is always in the door; and not only the clerks, but the chamber-keepers may have acceſs.

All letters, except thoſe wrote to the duke of Marlborough, are entered in the books; but thoſe are only copied in looſe ſheets. Gregg ſaid he had copied many of thoſe.

The draught of the queen's letter to the emperor was prepared by Mr. Lewis; it was then written in the hand of Mr. Thomas, Mr. Harley's domeſtic clerk; the addition was in the lord-treaſurer's own hand. Mr. Mann ſaw it as well as Gregg. Mann ſaid to Gregg, That what was added by the lord-treaſurer was much the brighteſt part of the letter.

Gregg ſaid, he ſent all his letters to France under the cover to Mr. Robineau. He owned he ſent the copy of the queen's letter to Mr. Chamillard the ſame night the queen's letter was diſpatched to the emperor.

Gregg ſaid further, that the letter in the queen's own hand was given to Gregg by Mr. ſecretary himſelf about one o'clock at night, and he was ſolely intruſted to put it up in ſir Philip Meadows's packet, after every body had left the office.

Robineau, in his letter to Mr. Gregg, took notice, that he had delivered his letters to Monſieur Chamillard; and that Monſieur Chamillard ſent to advice with marſhal Tallard upon Gregg's propoſal.

Upon this Gregg wrote a letter to marſhal Tallard, of which he ſaid he had no copy, but pretended to repeat the words of the letter to the lords committees.

The lords committees told Gregg, it would be expected by the houſe, that he ſhould be very clear and particular, in declaring by what advice or encouragement he firſt began ſuch a correſpondence. He ſaid, by none at all: He was tempted to it by the devil, and the hopes of getting money.

He ſaid, that, upon hearing a French perriwig-maker was committed to Newgate for high-treaſon, he had deſired to be admitted again to the lords of the cabinet-council. But he would not own, that he knew the man, but ſaid, he had ſince heard his name was Valiere or Clarke; he was told ſo by a gentlewoman, who came to ſee him ſince his condemnation.

He ſaid, he held no correſpondence in England, but only in ſending the common letter of the office, with other printed news-papers, to ſome gentlemen.

Gregg ſaid, he had been long acquainted with one Crookſhanks, who promiſed him, that, if he would procure a French paſs, he ſhould have two hundred guineas; and Gregg undertook to procure the paſs.

The firſt time he wrote to Mr. Chamillard was the 24th of October laſt.

Brown, a merchant, father-in-law to Crookſhanks, and one Bollinger, a merchant, were acquainted with this agreement about the paſs, and they dined together at Brown's houſe; and Brown undertook for the money, if the paſs could be procured.

Gregg ſaid, he acquainted Bollinger of his having ſent a copy of the queen's letter to Monſieur Chamillard, at the Croſs-Keys tavern in Covent-Garden, and ſhewed him extracts of marſhal Tallard's and Robineau's letters. He ſaid alſo, that he read the extracts of their letters at another time in Engliſh to Brown and Crookſhanks.

The lords committees aſked him, To what end he told Bollinger of what he had done, in ſending the queen's letter to Monſieur Chamillard? He only ſaid, it was downright madneſs.

The lords committees aſked him, If any body came to him? he ſaid, one Mr. Arbuthnot came to him, and no body elſe; and his buſineſs was to bring him charity.

The lords committees aſked Mr. Greg, If he had no more to acquaint their lordſhips with? he ſaid, No. And being told by them, that it concerned him very much to conſider of it; that the lords had obſerved he told them nothing but what he knew they had means in their hands to be fully informed of, without his ſaying any thing; and how hard it would be for the houſe of lords to believe, that he would venture upon ſuch a correſpondence without ſome ſupport or encouragement; he perſiſted in it, that he had no more to ſay.

As the lords committees were riſen up, and had called for the keeper to take Mr. Gregg away, he took a brown paper out of his pocket, which was ſealed up, and took out of it a paper, which he ſaid he had prepared againſt the queen's birth-day, and deſired the lords to read it. It purported to be a petition to the houſe of commons. He pretended he knew not how to get it delivered, becauſe he concluded all the papers, ſent by him, would be delivered to Mr. ſecretary Harley.

The lords, finding the paper to be addreſſed to the houſe of commons, told him, it was not proper for them to receive it, and delivered it immediately back to him.

The lords committees, as they went away, told Gregg, that if he would recollect himſelf, and ſet down in writing any thing, that he thought might be for his own ſervice, or of uſe to the queen and her goverment, he might ſend it to them, and the keeper ſhould have directions to convey it ſafely.

The next morning Gregg ſent a letter to the lords committees, which, as ſoon as they had peruſed, they returned to him again by a gentleman with the following meſſage:

"The lords of the committee have ordered me to return this paper to you, they being of opinion, that it is not material to the examination, for which they were ſent to you by the houſe."

The lords committees think themſelves obliged to acquaint the houſe, that they did not obſerve Gregg to be under any diſorder or terror from the apprehenſion or ſenſe of his danger.

The indictment of Gregg for his treaſonable correſpondence with her majeſty's enemies was brought before the lords committees; which indictment he confeſſed upon his trial, and judgment was thereupon given againſt him.

The lords committees do think it their duty to acquaint the houſe, that they having been informed by means of the keeper of Newgate, that one William Gregg had been formerly in Newgate, and indicted for counterfeiting the coin of the kingdom; and that it was talked amongſt the turnkeys in the priſon, that this was the ſame man, they ſent to ſearch the books in Newgate, and found there, that, in May 1697, William Gregg and Elizabeth Gregg were indicted for counterfeiting the coin. Thereupon they ſent for Mr. Tanner, who has the cuſtody of thoſe records: He brought the indictment before them; and it appeared, that Elizabeth Gregg was found guilty and executed; but that William Gregg was acquitted; and Thomas Holloway and Simon Newport were the witneſſes at the trial, who, as was ſaid, are both dead ſince that time.

But one Thomas Kinſerley and James Biddle declaring that they both knew that Gregg, who was then indicted, very well, and believed they ſhould know him again, if they ſaw him; the lords committees ſent them ſeverally to ſee William Gregg now in Newgate, and they both of them did declare, that they believed and were confident, that the ſame perſon, now in Newgate, was the ſame William Gregg, who was then indicted, and whoſe ſuppoſed wife was then found guilty, and burnt, and they did both of them voluntarily make oath to this effect; and James Biddle ſwore, that, after the trial, the diſcourſe in the neighbourhood was, that Elizabeth Gregg took the whole matter upon herſelf at the trial.

Their two affidavits are laid before your lordſhips.

After one of theſe perſons had been to ſee William Gregg, William Gregg wrote a letter, directed to the lords of the committee, in which he did very poſitively deny, that he was the perſon, who had been tried for coining in May 1697.

boats full of wool, and brought back brandy, though both the import and export were ſeverely prohibited. They, and thoſe who belonged to the boats carried over by them, were well treated on the French ſide at the governor's houſe, or at the commiſſary's; and were kept there till their letters could be ſent to Paris, and till returns could be brought back; and were all the while upon free coſt.

The order, that was conſtantly given them, was, that, if an Engliſh or Dutch ſhip came up to them, they ſhould caſt their letters into the ſea; but that they ſhould not do it, when French ſhips came up to them; ſo that they were looked upon by all on that coaſt as the ſpies of France. They uſed to get what information they could, both of merchant ſhips, and of the ſhips of war, that lay in the Downs; and upon that they uſually went over; and it happened, that ſoon after ſome of the ſhips were taken. Theſe men were papiſts, and behaved themſelves very inſolently, and boaſted much of their power and credit. Complaints had been often made of them, but they were always protected; nor did it appear that they ever brought any information of importance to Mr. Harley but once, when, according to what they ſwore, they told him that Monſieur Fourbin was gone from Dunkirk, to lie in wait for the Ruſſia fleet; which proved to be true; for he both went to watch for them, and took a great part of them. Yet, though this was the ſingle piece of intelligence, that they ever brought, Mr. Harley took ſo little notice of it, that he gave no advertiſement to the admiralty concerning it. This particular excepted, they only brought over common news, and the Paris gazettes. Theſe examinations laſted for ſome weeks; and, when they were ended, a full report was made of them to the houſe of lords, who ordered the whole report, with all the examinations, to be laid before the queen in an addreſs, importing, "That having been informed, that William Gregg, a clerk in the office of the late ſecretary Mr. Harley, had been indicted for high-treaſon, in holding correſpondence with her majeſty's enemies, and betraying to them ſecrets of the higheſt importance; and that upon his trial he had confeſſed the indictment, and, by that means, had prevented the examinations, whereby the public might have been truly informed of the particular nature and circumſtances of his crime; they thought themſelves indiſpenſibly obliged, in duty to her majeſty, and for the future ſafety of the kingdom, to do all in their power to find out the riſe and progreſs of this dangerous correſpondence. That in order thereto, they addreſſed her majeſty for all papers relating to the charge againſt William Gregg; and her majeſty having been pleaſed to give orders, that the papers ſhould be laid before them, they referred thoſe papers to a committee, and directed them to examine Gregg, and to report the examination to the houſe; as alſo what they obſerved upon the papers, together with ſuch other matters, as they ſhould think proper, upon their enquiry into the affair: And the report having been made and taken into conſideration by the houſe, they humbly conceived it to be very highly for her ſervice to lay the ſame before her majeſty. That being alſo informed, that one Alexander Valiere, otherwiſe called John Clarke, was in cuſtody for holding correſpondence with her majeſty's enemies, they thought themſelves, in like manner, obliged to direct the committee to examine Valiere, and to enquire to the particulars and circumſtances of his offence: That, this being accordingly performed by the committee, it was reported to them; but the report conſiſting of very many examinations, they thought it would be of uſe to appoint a committee to digeſt and put the ſame into ſome method, to the intent they might be able to form a clearer and more diſtinct judgment of the whole affair; and, that report being made and approved by the houſe, they conceived it would be of importance to her majeſty's ſervice, for them to preſent the ſame to her majeſty; and, for her majeſty's more entire ſatisfaction, they begged leave to annex all the examinations at large to this addreſs. That, having entered into a ſerious conſideration of the ſeveral reports, they had unanimouſly come to the following reſolutions. 1. That the crime, of which William Gregg ſtood attainted, was of ſo heinous a nature, and attended with ſuch extraordinary circumſtances, that it might prove of very pernicious conſequence, if he ſhould not be made an example. 2. And that it plainly appeared to them, as well by what Alexander Valiere and John Bara, had informed againſt each other, as by the many examinations taken concerning them, that they were both in the French intereſt, and unfit to be truſted or employed by any perſons in her majeſty's ſervice: And that the open and public manner of the correſpondence managed by them with the governors and commiſſaries of Calais and Boulogne, could tend only to carry on an intelligence to the advantage of her majeſty's enemies; and that it was highly probable, that thereby the ſtations of our cruiſers, the ſtrength of our convoys, and the times of ſailing of our merchant-ſhips, had been betrayed to the French.". Their lordſhips added, "That it was her majeſty's glory, and the happineſs of Europe, that ſhe was at the head of one of the greateſt confederacies, that ever was known in hiſtory; and it was the common concern of the whole alliance, that her counſels ſhould be kept with the ſtricteſt ſecreſy: But that, in the papers now laid before her, her majeſty would be pleaſed to obſerve, that ſome of her reſolutions of the greateſt moment, and that required the utmoſt ſecrecy, had been ſent to her enemies by the ſame poſt they were diſpatched to the allies. That all the papers in Mr. ſecretary Harley's office, had, for a conſiderable time, been expoſed to the view even of the meaneſt clerks in that office; and that the peruſal of all the letters to and from the French priſoners, was chiefly truſted to Gregg, a perſon of a very ſuſpicious character, and known to be extremely indigent. That it was not eaſily to be known, what ill conſequences might have attended ſuch negligence. But their lordſhips depended upon it, that, theſe matters being thus plainly laid open to her majeſty, they ſhould be well ſecured againſt any dangers of this nature for the future. That they were further in duty bound to beſeech her majeſty, that all poſſible methods might be uſed to put a ſtop to that dangerous and (which might ſoon prove) fatal intercourſe between her majeſty's ſubjects and France, which had of late received ſo great an encouragement by the countenance and protection given to Valiere and Bara; ſince, unleſs that were effectually done, her majeſty's enemies would continue to have what intelligence they pleaſed; her majeſty's men of war and merchant-ſhips would be in danger of being betrayed to the French; and that moſt deſtructive trade of ſending wool to France, which had been with much charge and trouble interrupted, and in good meaſure ſuppreſſed, would be revived to a greater degree than ever."

To this addreſs the queen returned an anſwer, "That ſhe was ſorry, that any, who had been employed by thoſe in her ſervice, ſhould have proved falſe to their truſt, and injurious to the public. That ſhe doubted not, the examples, laid before her by their lordſhips, would be a ſufficient warning to keep all matters of importance as ſecret as might be, and to employ ſuch only, as there ſhould be good grounds to believe would be faithful."

After the preſenting of this addreſs, Gregg was reſpited about a month longer, but, ſtill refuſing to make any farther diſcoveries, he was executed at Tyburn on the 28th of April 1708. He left a paper with the ſheriff[x], wherein he entirely cleared Mr. Harley; though ſome ſuſpected that gentleman to be the contriver of that paper, and aſcribed the compoſedneſs, which appeared in Gregg's countenance, till he came to the place of execution, to a firm expectation,

[x] It was in theſe terms:

"The crime, I am now juſtly to ſuffer for, having made a great noiſe in the world, a paper of more than ordinary length will be expected from the criminal, who therefore takes this laſt opportunity to profeſs his utter abhorrence and ſincere repentance of all his ſins againſt God, and of all the heinous crimes committed againſt the queen, whoſe forgiveneſs I moſt heartily implore, as I ſhall heartily pray for her majeſty's long life and happy reign over her united people, and ſucceſs againſt her enemies, with my parting breath.

"This is all the ſatisfaction I can poſſibly make injured majeſty. I declare, in the next place, the reparation I would make, were it in my power, to thoſe of her majeſty's ſubjects I have wronged in any kind, and particularly the right honourable Robert Harley, eſq; whoſe pardon I heartily beg for baſely betraying my truſt; which declaration, though, of itſelf, ſufficient to clear the ſaid gentleman; yet, for the ſake of thoſe, whom it was my misfortune not to be able to ſatisfy in my life-time, I do ſacredly proteſt, that, as I ſhall anſwer it before the judgment-ſeat of Chriſt, the gentleman aforeſaid was not privy to my writing to France directly nor indirectly; neither I, his unworthy clerk, any ways acceſſary to the miſcarriage before Toulon, nor the loſſes by ſea; all which happened before the firſt of my letters, which was writ the 24th of October 1707. As for my creditors, as I am in no condition to ſatisfy them, ſo I earneſtly beg, they would forgive me; and I pray God to make up their loſſes ſeven-fold.

"For my part, I do freely forgive all men, and die in perfect charity with them, not without humble hopes of finding forgiveneſs, through the merits of Jeſus Chriſt, with God, who in mercy touched my conſcience ſo powerfully from the beginning, as to prevent my proſtituting the ſame to ſave my life; for which inſtance of his love, to be preferred before life itſelf, I bleſs and magnify his holy name with unſpeakable joy and comfort at my death, nothing near ſo ignominious as would have been ſuch a life.

"After this occaſion, the duty of a dying man leads me to profeſs the religion, in which I was brought up, and do now die, which is the proteſtant. The ſcandal given thereunto by my enormous practices cannot be better taken away, than by my publiſhing to the world my hearty ſorrow for thoſe ſenſual pleaſures, which have proved my bane. Therefore let all, who ſhall read this poor paper, take warning by me to ſhun the like youthful luſts; to which whoever gives up himſelf, cannot tell how far they may, when indulged, carry him, even to the committing ſuch crimes, as he thought himſelf incapable of ſome time a day; of which truth I, to my woeful experience, am a melancholy inſtance. But, at the ſame time, I appeal to the great God, before whom I am going to appear, that, notwithſtanding all the pains taken which he was made to entertain, of a reprieve; and others gave out, that he complained, "That there was no truſt in man," while, on the other hand, the ſeven lords of the committee, appointed to examine him, were afterwards reproached with having endeavoured to ſuborn Gregg, and engage him, by a promiſe of pardon, to accuſe Mr. Harley.[y].

During theſe proceedings, an enquiry into the affairs of Spain was begun in both houſes. The earl of Peterborough had received ſuch poſitive orders for recalling him, that, though he delayed as long as he could, yet at laſt he came home in Auguſt 1707; but the queen, before ſhe would admit him into her preſence, required of him an account of ſome particulars in his conduct, in military matters, in his negotiations, and in the diſpoſal of the money remitted to him; to which he made ſuch general anſwers, as gave little ſatisfaction; but ſeemed to reſerve the matter, to a parliamentary examination, which was now entered upon by both houſes. All the tories magnified his conduct, and ſtudied to detract from the earl of Galway; but it was thought, that the miniſtry were under ſome reſtraints with relation to the earl, though he did not ſpare them; which gave occaſion to many to ſay, they were afraid of him, and durſt not provoke him. The whigs, on the other hand, made ſevere remarks on his conduct. The complaints, which king Charles of Spain made of him, were read; upon which he brought ſuch a number of papers, and ſo many witneſſes to the bar, to juſtify his conduct, that after ten or twelve days, ſpent wholly in reading papers, and in hearing witneſſes, both houſes grew equally weary of the matter; ſo that, without coming to any concluſion, or to any vote, they let all, that related to him, fall. But that gave them a handle to conſider the preſent ſtate of affairs in Spain; in which it was found, that of the twenty-nine thouſand three hundred and ninety-five Engliſh forces, provided by parliament, for the ſervice of Spain and Portugal, in the year 1707, there was but eight thouſand ſix hundred and ſixty men in Spain and Portugal, at the time of the battle of Almanza[z], and that not above half the officers, who belonged to thoſe bodies, ſerved there. This gave the houſe of commons a high diſtaſte; and it was hoped by the tories, that they ſhould have carried the houſe to ſevere votes and warm addreſſes on that head; which was much laboured by them, in order to load the miniſtry. In this Mr. Harley and his party were very cold and paſſive; and it was generally believed, that the matter was privately ſet on by them. The commons, on the 5th of February, addreſſed the queen, deſiring that ſhe would order an account to be laid before them, how it came to paſs, that there were no more Engliſh forces in Spain and Portugal at the time of the battle of Almanza, and that ſhe would uſe her utmoſt endeavours that the war in Spain might be vigorouſly and effectually proſecuted. To this addreſs the queen ſent an anſwer, by which it appeared, That, though by death and deſertion the number of the troops in Spain was much diminiſhed, yet the whole number provided, or at leaſt very near it, was ſent out of England. Notwithſtanding this anſwer, the commons renewed the addreſſes they had preſented before, about the forces maintained by the kings of Spain and Portugal, to which the queen gave the following anſwer: "That in relation to that part of the addreſs, which concerned the forces of the king of Spain, her majeſty has ordered to be laid before the houſe a liſt of the troops provided by the king of Spain, for the ſervice of the year 1707: And, in relation to the troops of Portugal, her majeſty had, ever ſince the treaty with that crown, given directions to her miniſters there, to uſe all poſſible means, that his majeſty ſhould furniſh the whole number of men agreed for by the treaty: And ſhe hoped, that thoſe inſtances had, in a great meaſure, had their deſired effect." At the ſame time ſhe obſerved, "That the methods of diſcipline there made it impoſſible to know the number of thoſe troops with the ſame exactneſs, as is practiſed in other parts. And conſidering with what cheerfulneſs and ſucceſs they marched through Spain to Madrid, and the loſſes they ſuſtained; and being very well aſſured, that the king of Portugal had lately raiſed, and was ſtill raiſing a conſiderable number of forces; her majeſty had not thought it adviſeable to make too nice an enquiry into the ſtate of thoſe troops; eſpecially, ſince ſhe was very ſenſible how diligent the enemy was in making continual applications, to break an alliance of ſo great importance to the common cauſe."

The next day the commons took into conſideration the queen's anſwer to their addreſs of the 5th of February, and the queſtion being put, "That the deficiency of the Britiſh troops in Spain and Portugal, at the time of the battle of Almanza, had been chiefly occaſioned by the want of timely and effectual recruits being ſent thither;" It paſſed in the negative; and, on the contrary, an addreſs was voted and preſented to the queen by the whole houſe, "returning her the thanks of the houſe, for her taking meaſures to reſtore the affairs in Spain, and for providing foreign troops for that ſervice." To which the queen replied, "That ſhe had always looked upon the war of Spain to be of ſo great importance to us, that ſhe could never fail of continuing her utmoſt application to ſupport it in the moſt effectual manner; and that the ſatisfaction they had expreſſed, in their addreſs for her endeavours in this matter, was extremely acceptable to her." The ſervice in Spain was much decried, and there was good reaſon for it: Things there could not be furniſhed but at expenſive rates, and the ſoldiers were generally ill uſed in their quarters, and were treated very unkindly, not by king Charles, but by thoſe about him, and the bigotted Spaniards.

The ſame day the addreſs about the forces in Spain was to make me out an old offender, by faſtening on me the crime of counterfeiting the coin, this is the firſt fault, that ever I ventured upon; which was not out of any zeal for the pretender, whom I not only diſown at my death, but ſolemnly declare, that, in all my life, I never thought he had a right to theſe realms, how fooliſhly ſoever I may have rendered myſelf obnoxious in this particular; but the only motive of my mad undertaking was money (of which I never received any) on account of the ſhip-paſs, though I have met with the more juſt reward of ſuch ſecret ſervices intended by

WILLIAM GREGG."

[y] Dr. Swift, in his Examiners, has ſeveral paſſages to this purpoſe.

In No. XXXII. for March 15, 1710-11, he writes thus: "And here it may be worth obſerving, how unanimous a concurrence there is between ſome perſons, once great in power, and a French papiſt [Guiſcard] both agreeing in the great end of taking away Mr. Harley's life, though differing in their methods; the firſt proceeding by ſubornation, the other by violence; wherein Guiſcard ſeems to have the advantage, as aiming no further than his life, while the others deſigned to deſtroy, at once, both that and his reputation. The malice of both againſt this gentleman ſeems to have riſen from the ſame cauſe, his diſcovering deſigns againſt the government. It was Mr. Harley, who detected the treaſonable correſpondence of Gregg, and ſecured him betimes, when a certain great man, who ſhall be nameleſs, had, out of the depth of his politics, ſent him a caution to make his eſcape, which would certainly have fixed the appearance of guilt upon Mr. Harley; but, when that was prevented, they would have enticed the condemned criminal with the promiſe of a pardon, to write and ſign an accuſation againſt the ſecretary. But, to uſe Gregg's own expreſſion, "his death was nothing near ſo ignominious, as would have been ſuch a life, that muſt have been ſaved by proſtituting his conſcience." Dr. Swift repeats the ſame charge in the Examiner, No. XXXIII. and was anſwered in the Medley, No. XXVI. and in a pamphlet, printed in 1711 in 8vo, intitled, 'A letter to the ſeven lords of the committee appointed to examine Gregg.'

preſented to the queen, there was a great debate in the grand committee of the houſe of lords, occaſioned by a bill paſſed by the commons, for rendering the union of the two kingdoms more entire and complete; whereby, in the firſt place it was enacted, "That from the firſt of May 1708, there ſhould be but one privy-council in the kingdom of Great-Britain." All the court was againſt this bill. Thoſe, who governed Scotland, deſired to keep up their authority there, with the advantage they made by it; and they gave the miniſters of England great aſſurances, that by their influence elections might be ſo managed, as to ſerve all the ends of the court; but they ſaid, that without due care, theſe might be carried ſo, as to run all the contrary way. This was the ſecret motive; yet this could not be owned in a public aſſembly; and therefore that, which was pretended, was that many great families in Scotland, with the greateſt part of Highlanders, were ſo ill affected, that without a watchful eye, ever intent upon them, they could not be kept quiet. It lay at too great a diſtance from London to be governed by orders ſent from thence. To this it was anſwered, that by the circuits of the juſticiary courts, and by juſtices of peace, that country might be well governed, notwithſtanding its diſtance, as Wales and Cornwal were. The bill had been carried in the houſe of commons by a great majority, that there ſhould be only one privy-council for the whole iſland. But in the houſe of lords, it met with a conſiderable oppoſition. The court ſtood alone; all the tories and the much greater part of the whigs were for the bill. The court ſeeing the party for the bill ſo ſtrong, were willing to compound the matter; and whereas, by the bill, the council of Scotland was not to ſit after the firſt of May, the court moved to have it continued to the firſt of October. It was viſible, that this was propoſed only in order to the managing elections for the next parliament; for which reaſon the lords adhered to the day prefixed in the bill. But a new debate aroſe about the power given by the bill to juſtices of peace, which ſeemed to be an encroachment on the juriſdiction of the lords, regalities, and of the hereditary ſheriffs and ſtewards, who had the right of trying criminals, in the firſt inſtance, for fourteen days time; yet it was ordinary, in the caſes of great crimes and riots, for the privy-council to take immediate cognizance of them, without any regard to the fourteen days: So that by this act the juſtices of peace were only empowered to do that which the privy-council uſually did; and except the occaſion was ſo great, as to demand a quick diſpatch, it was not to be doubted, but that the juſtices of peace would have great regard to all private rights. Yet, ſince this had the appearance of breaking in upon private rights, this was much inſiſted on by thoſe who hoped, by laying aſide theſe powers given to the juſtices of peace, to have gained the main point of keeping up a privy-council in Scotland. For all the Scots miniſters ſaid, that the country would be in great danger, if there were not a ſupreme government ſtill kept up in it. But it ſeemed an abſurd thing, that there ſhould be a different adminiſtration, where there was but one legiſlature. While Scotland had an entire legiſlature within itſelf, the nation aſſembled in parliament could procure the correction of errors in the adminiſtration; whereas now, that it was not a tenth part of the legiſlative body, if it was ſtill to be kept under a different adminiſtration, that nation could not have ſtrength enough to procure a redreſs of its grievances in parliament; by which means they might come to be ſubdued and governed as a province. And the arbitrary way, in which the council of Scotland had proceeded ever ſince king James the firſt's time, but more particularly ſince the reſtoration, was freſh in memory, and had been no ſmall motive to induce the beſt men of that nation to promote the union, that they might be delivered from the tyranny of the council; and their hopes would be ſtill diſappointed, if they were ſtill kept under that yoke. This point was in concluſion yielded, and the bill paſſed by a majority of fifty lords againſt forty-five, though to the great diſcontent of the court. There was a new court of exchequer created in Scotland, according to the frame of that court in England. Special acts were made for the elections and returns of the repreſentatives in both houſes of parliament; and ſuch was the diſpoſition of the Engliſh to oblige them, and the behaviour of the Scots was ſo diſcreet, that every thing that was propoſed for the good of their country, was agreed to: Both whigs and tories vied with one another, who ſhould ſhew moſt care and concern for the welfare of that part of Great-Britain.

On the 11th of February there happened an important change in the adminiſtration in England, for Mr. Henry Boyle, uncle to the earl of Burlington, and chancellor of the exchequer, was made ſecretary of ſtate in the room of Mr. Harley. Probably the affair of Gregg, Valiere, and Bara, which in ſome meaſure affected Mr. Harley's credit, made him more earneſt to bring about a change in the conduct of affairs, on which he relied on the credit of the new favourite Mrs. Maſham. The duke of Marlborough, and the lord-treaſurer, having diſcovered many of his practices, laid them before the queen, who would believe nothing that was ſuggeſted to his prejudice. Her majeſty denied, that ſhe had given any authority for carrying meſſages to the tories; but would not believe, that he or his friends had done it, nor would ſhe enter into any examination of his ill-conduct, and was uneaſy when ſhe heard it ſpoke of. Theſe lords wrote therefore to the queen, that they could ſerve her no longer, if he was continued in that poſt; and on the Sunday following when they were ſummoned to a cabinet-council, they both went to the queen, and told her, that they muſt quit her ſervice, ſince they ſaw ſhe was reſolved not to part with Mr. Harley. Her majeſty ſeemed not much concerned at lord Godolphin's offering to lay down; and it was believed to be a part of Mr. Harley's new ſcheme to remove him; but ſhe was much touched with the duke of Marlborough's offering to quit, and ſtudied, with ſome ſoft expreſſions, to divert him from that reſolution: But he was firm, and did not yield to them. Upon this they both went away, to the wonder of the whole court. Immediately after, the queen went to the cabinet-council; and Mr. Harley opened ſome matters relating to foreign affairs. The whole board was very uneaſy; the duke of Somerſet ſaid, That he did not ſee how they could deliberate on ſuch matters, ſince the general was not with them. He repeated this with ſome vehemence, while all the reſt looked on ſo cold and ſullen, that the cabinet-council was ſoon at an end; and the queen ſaw, that the reſt of her miniſters, and the chief officers were reſolved to withdraw from her ſervice, if ſhe did not recal the two, who had left it. It was ſaid, that ſhe would have put all to the hazard, if Mr. Harley himſelf had not apprehended his danger, and reſolved to lay down. The queen ſent the next day for the duke of Marlborough, and, after ſome expoſtulations, ſhe told him that Mr. Harley ſhould immediately leave his poſt, which he did within two days. But the queen ſeemed to carry a deep reſentment of his and the lord Godolphin's behaviour on this occaſion; and, though they went on with her buſineſs, they found they had not her confidence. The ducheſs of Marlborough, for ſome weeks, abſtained from going to court; but afterwards, that breach was made up in appearance, though it was little more than an appearance. Both houſes of parliament expreſſed a great concern at this rupture in the court, and apprehended the ill effects, which it might have. The commons let the bill of ſupply lie on the table, though it was ordered for that day. Upon Mr. Harley's removal, ſir Simon Harcourt, the attorney-general, ſir Thomas Manſell, comptroller of the houſehold, and Mr. St. John, ſecretary at war, laid down likewiſe their poſts [a].

[a] The ducheſs of Marlborough, in the Account of her Conduct, p. 252, &c. ſpeaks of this affair on the following terms: The duke of Marlborough and lord Godolphin had often told the queen in the moſt reſpectful manner, that it was impoſſible for them to do her any ſervice, while Mr. Harley was in her confidence. Her majeſty nevertheleſs ſeemed determined not to part with him, till at length thoſe two lords, being urged by neceſſity to it, declared their reſolution to ſerve no longer with him; and they abſented themſelves from the council. Mr. Harley would have proceeded to buſineſs without them, when the council met; but the duke of Somerſet ſaid, he did not ſee how it could be to any purpoſe, when neither the general nor the treaſurer was preſent; whereupon the council immediately broke up. This had ſuch effect upon the queen, that, very ſoon after, Mr. Harley was diſmiſſed from his poſt. Such a compliance with the miniſters ſeemed to the eye of the world a very great conceſſion, but was in truth nothing. For it was evident by what followed, that this appearance of giving up Mr. Harley was with his own conſent, and by his own advice, who, as long as Mrs. Maſham continued in favour, would, under pretence of viſiting her, who was his couſin, have all the opportunities he could wiſh for, of practiſing upon the paſſions and credulity of the queen; and the method of correſponding with him had been ſettled ſome time before.—I was fully apprized of all this, continues the ducheſs; yet I reſolved to try, if by being eaſy and quiet I could regain any influence with her majeſty. She had given me ſome encouragement to hope it. For when a little before Mr. Harley's diſmiſſion, lord Marlborough reſolved to quit the ſervice; and when on that occaſion, I had with tears (which a tender concern at the thought of parting from her majeſty made me ſhed) repreſented to her, that if the duke retired, it would be improper, and even impoſſible for me to ſtay at court after him; ſhe declared, that ſhe could not bear the thought of my leaving her; and that it muſt never be. And at the ſame time ſhe made me a promiſe, that if ever I ſhould leave her) which ſhe again ſaid muſt never be) ſhe would beſtow my offices among my children. Nay, the whigs had ſome reaſon to flatter themſelves about this time, that her majeſty would become better diſpoſed to them, than ſhe had hitherto been. The pretender's attempt to land in Scotland, which happened about this time, gave her an alarm, that ſeemed to bring a conviction along with it, that the whigs were the moſt to be depended upon for the ſupport of her government; at leaſt what ſhe ſaid in anſwer to the lords addreſs upon the occaſion, had this appearance. But as the danger preſently blew over, and as her fears ceaſed with the cauſe of them, ſo all the hope which the whigs had raiſed in themſelves from thoſe fears, preſently vaniſhed.

A few days after this breach at court, the nation was ſuddenly alarmed with the news of an invaſion. The French king, to retaliate the late attempt upon Toulon, reſolved to carry the war into Great-Britain, by ſending the pretended prince of Wales to Scotland with a fleet and army, to poſſeſs himſelf of that kingdom, being induced thereto by the hope given him, that the Scots were ſo highly diſcontented on account of the union, as to be ripe for a revolt, and ready to join him on his arrival amongſt them. The neceſſary preparations for the expedition were carried on at Dunkirk with all imaginable diligence, and with ſuch ſecreſy than the deſign was rather gueſſed at than known, till the pretender himſelf ſet out from St. Germains, when it was no longer a myſtery, that he intended to make deſcent upon Scotland. The day before his departure, the French king went to St Germains to take his leave of him, and wiſh him ſucceſs; preſented him with a ſword enriched with diamonds of a conſiderable value, and deſired him always to remember, that it was a French ſword. The chevalier de St. George (for this was the name the pretender aſſumed in this adventure) anſwered the compliment with aſſuring him, "That, if it was his good fortune to get poſſeſſion of the throne of his anceſtors, he would not content himſelf with returning him thanks by letters and ambaſſadors, but would ſhew his gratitude by deeds: Nay, he would come in perſon to acknowledge his majeſty's protection and aſſiſtance." To which the French king replied he hoped never to ſee him again. Upon his arrival at Dunkirk, the pretender was furniſhed with very fine tents, a large ſet of gold and ſilver plate of curious workmanſhip, clothes for his future life-guards, liveries for his houſhold and other neceſſaries; towards the charge of which, and of this armament, the pope was ſaid to have contributed a conſiderable ſum of money [b]. The pretender's motto upon the colours and ſtandards were, Dieu & mon droit, "God and my Right:" Nil deſperandum Chriſto duce & auſpice Chriſto, "I ought not to deſpair, ſince Chriſt is my guide and helper:" And, cui venti & mare obediunt, impera Domine, & fac tranquillitatem; "Thou, Lord, whom the winds and ſea obey, command, that it be calm."

The preparations of the French at Dunkirk gave great uneaſineſs to the ſtates-general, who concerted with the Britiſh miniſters the neceſſary meaſures for diſpelling the ſtorm, which ſeemed to threaten her Britannic majeſty's dominions, of which they gave timely information to the queen; as did likewiſe her envoy major-general Cadogan, who had early intelligence of the deſign from a Jew reſiding at Dunkirk.

Upon this Mr. ſecretary Boyle acquainted the commons, "That her majeſty had commanded him to lay before the houſe ſeveral advices received the night before, and that morning, of great preparations at Dunkirk, for an immediate invaſion upon England by the French, and of the pretended prince of Wales's being come to Dunkirk for that purpoſe." The letters and extracts relating thereto being read, it was unanimouſly reſolved to preſent the following addreſs to her majeſty, in which the houſe of lords readily concurred.

"We your majeſty's moſt faithful and obedient ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal and commons of Great-Britain in parliament aſſembled, do beg leave to return our moſt hearty thanks to your majeſty for being graciouſly pleaſed to communicate to your parliament the intelligence you have received of an intended invaſion of this kingdom by the pretended prince of Wales, ſupported by a French power.

"We are ſo ſenſible of the happineſs we enjoy under your majeſty, and are ſo affected with the dangerous conſequences of ſuch an attempt, both to your perſon and government, that, with hearts full of concern for your majeſty's ſafety, we beſeech your majeſty, that you will be pleaſed to take particular care of your royal perſon: And we, on our part are fully and unanimouſly reſolved to ſtand by and aſſiſt your majeſty with our lives and fortunes, in maintenance of your undoubted right and title to the crown of theſe realms, againſt the pretended prince of Wales, and all other your enemies both at home and abroad.

"The care your majeſty has taken for the defence of your dominions and particularly in fitting out ſo great a fleet in ſo ſhort a time, gives ſatisfaction and encouragement to all your good ſubjects, who are likewiſe very ſenſible of the zeal the ſtates-general have ſhewn upon this occaſion.

"As a farther inſtance of our duty, we humbly deſire, that you will be pleaſed to order that the laws againſt papiſts and non-jurors be put in execution; and that directions be given to ſeize and ſecure ſuch perſons with their horſes, and arms, as your majeſty ſhall have cauſe to ſuſpect are diſaffected to your perſon and government.

"And as we doubt not, but, by the bleſſing of God upon the continuance of your majeſty's care, your enemies will be put to confuſion, ſo we readily embrace this opportunity, to ſhew to your majeſty and the whole world, that no attempts of this kind ſhall deter us from ſupporting your majeſty in a vigorous proſecution of the preſent war againſt France, till the monarchy of Spain be reſtored to the houſe of Auſtria, and your majeſty have the glory to complete the recovery of the liberties of Europe."

To this addreſs her majeſty was pleaſed to anſwer in the following terms:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I have ſuch entire dependence on the providence of God, and ſo much truſt in the faithful ſervices of my good ſubjects, that I hope this attempt will prove dangerous only to thoſe, who undertake it.

"I am extremely ſenſible of your concern and affection for me and my government, and ſhall have a very particular regard to the advice you give me upon this occaſion.

"I am alſo very well pleaſed with the juſtice, which you have done the ſtates-general, in taking notice of their timely care for our ſafety, and their readineſs to give us all poſſible aſſiſtance.

"The firm reſolution, which you expreſs upon all occaſions, of ſupporting me and bringing this war to a ſafe and happy concluſion, as it is moſt eſſentially obliging to me; ſo I aſſure myſelf, it will mightily diſhearten our common enemies, and give the greateſt encouragement and advantage to all our allies."

The parliament paſſed two bills; the one, that the abjuration might be tendered to all perſons and that ſuch as refuſed ſhould be in the condition of convict recuſants. By the other, the habeas corpus act was ſuſpended till October, with relation to perſons taken up by the goverment on ſuſpicion. The pretender and his adherents were proclaimed traitors and rebels.

Upon the firſt notice of the French armament in Dunkirk, major-general Cadogan repaired to Bruſſels, and concerted with Monſieur d'Auverquerque the march of the Britiſh forces to be ſhipped off for Great-Britain, and how to ſupply their room in their ſeveral garriſons. From Bruſſels he went to Ghent; and having conferred with general Lumley, the governor of that place, and commander in chief of the Britiſh troops, orders were given to ten battalions, one of the guards, two of Orkney's, one of Argyle's, one of Primroſe's, one of Lalo's, one of Howe's, one of Ingoldeſby's, one of North and Grey's, and one of Godfrey's, to hold themſelves in readineſs to march at an hour's warning. This done, Cadogan repaired to Oſtend, to forward the preparations, which, by his early directions, were making there for the embarking of thoſe regiments, as ſoon as there ſhould be certain advice, that the twelve French battalions, that were to attend the pretender in his expedition were actually on board. On the other hand, the admiralty of Great-Britain fitted out a fleet with ſuch incredible diligence, that (without diminiſhing the convoy provided for the Liſbon fleet, which conſiſted of twelve Britiſh, and five Dutch men of war, under the command of ſir John Leake,) ſir George Byng and the lord Durſley ſailed from Deal towards the coaſt of Dunkirk, on the 27th of February, O. S. in the morning, with twenty-three Britiſh and three Dutch men of war, and one Britiſh fire-ſhip. The ſame day, about noon, ſir George Byng came to an anchor in Gravelin-pits; and,

[b] The French king wrote the following letter to the pope, upon occaſion of the pretender's expedition:

Holy father,

"The great zeal which I have always had to re-eſtabliſh on the throne of England king James Stuart III, is well known to you; though there was not hitherto a time proper for it, as well by reaſon of the conjunctures, as by the unity of my enemies, which did not give me leave to act in ſo righteous a cauſe for our holy faith, the chief object of all our actions. We have now thought good to let him depart from our royal ſeat, on the 7th of March, in order to embark himſelf on board a fleet, where every thing has been prepared for him, with ſufficient forces to eſtabliſh him on the throne, after he ſhall have been received on his arrival by the faithful people of Scotland, and proclaimed as their true and lawful king. I have thought it fit not to omit ſending you this important news, that by your ardour the union of our holy mothe the church may increaſe in that kingdom, and that God may proſper him, whilſt the time is favourable. It is now, holy father, your buſineſs to accompany him by your zeal with your holy benedictions, which I alſo ask for myſelf; and I remain, holy father, your moſt loving ſon. Louis."

immediately after, went into a ſmall frigate, and ſailed within two miles of Flemiſh Road, from whence he had a proſpect of the ſhips that lay there; and, the next day, learned from a fiſherman, taken off the ſhore, the number and ſtrength of the enemy's ſhips; and about ten thouſand men were in and about Dunkirk, ready to embark; that they expected every day ſeveral ſhips from Breſt; that that the pretender was come to Gravelin in his way to Dunkirk; where he arrrived on the 9th of March, N. S. in the morning.

The French who imagined that admiral Leak might by this time have ſailed for Liſbon, and conſequently that Great-Britain was unprovided of ſhipping, were ſo confident of the meaſures they had taken, that they publicly boaſted, that God alone could diſappoint their deſigns. But ſo great was their ſurprize, upon the Britiſh fleets appearing off Mardyke, that a ſtop was put to the embarkation of their troops, and frequent expreſſes were diſpatched to Paris for new orders. The count de Fourbin, who commanded the enemy's ſquadron, having repreſented to the French king, that he might indeed get out of Dunkirk harbour, and perhaps land the troops; but that he could not anſwer for his majeſty's ſhip's[c]; that Monarch, who was fully determined on this expedition, ſent him poſitive orders to reimbark his troops, and to put to ſea with the firſt fair wind. In the mean time, the enemy gave out, that their diſembarking of the troops at Dunkirk was upon account of the pretender's being indiſpoſed with the meaſles, attended with an ague; but, as ſoon as the French king's laſt orders came, that pretence vaniſhed; the prince was ſaid to be perfectly recovered; and count Fourbin having, on the 14th of March, N. S. received advice from Boulogne, that the Britiſh fleet, being forced from their ſtation by high winds, was ſeen off that place, ſteering, on the 12th for the Downs, they began at two in the afternoon, to reimbark their forces. The wind turning fair for them on the 17th of March, N. S. they took that opportunity, and ſailed at four in the afternoon from the road of Dunkirk; but, the wind changing about ten at night, they were obliged to come to an anchor in Newport-pits; where they continued till the 19th, at ten in the evening, when, the wind changing, they ſet ſail again, ſteering their courſe for Scotland. On the other hand the fleet under the command of ſir George Byng, which came back into the Downs the 2-13th of March, and was ſince reinforced to the number of above forty men of war of the line of battle, beſides frigates and fire-ſhips, ſet ſail again the 6-17th on a ſignal given by one of the ſcouts, who obſerved ſix ſhips to the weſtward, ſuppoſed to be the Breſt ſquadron, on the 9-20th, at ten in the morning, ſir George Byng, who was then between Dunkirk and Calais, received an intelligence by an Oſtend ſhip ſent out by major-general Cadogan, of the ſailing of the Dunkirk ſquadron from Newport-pits: Upon which he called a council of war, and according to the reſolution taken in it, ſailed immediately in purſuit of the enemy; having firſt made a detachment of a ſtrong ſquadron, under the command of admiral Baker, with inſtructions to convoy the troops, that were embarked at Oſtend, and to look after the ſhips ſtill remaining in Dunkirk road.

In the mean time, the parliament proceeded with great unanimity and vigour in their reſolutions, for the ſupport of the government againſt the pretender and his adherents. They paſſed a bill to diſcharge the clans of Scotland from their vaſſalage to their heads, who ſhould take up arms againſt the queen. This bill was chiefly owing to major-general Stanhope, and ſir David Dalrymple; but the enemy not landing in Scotland the bill had no effect. On the 10th of March, the queen came to the houſe of peers, and made a ſpeech to both houſes, importing, "That ſhe had received advices that morning from Oſtend, that the French fleet ſailed from Dunkirk on Tueſday, at three in the morning, northward, with the pretender on board: That ſir George Byng had notice of it the ſame day at ten, and he being very much ſuperior to the enemy both in number and ſtrength, her majeſty made no queſtion but by God's bleſſing, he would ſoon be able to give a good account of them. That ſhe had alſo advice, that ten battalions of her troops were embarked at Oſtend ready to ſail with their convoy, as there ſhould be occaſion; and that ſhe ſhould continue to take all proper meaſures for diſappointing the enemy's deſigns." Hereupon the houſe of commons unanimouſly voted the following remarkable addreſs, which was preſented to the queen by the whole houſe:

Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"WE your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons of Great-Britain in parliament aſſembled, humbly wait on your majeſty, to expreſs the great ſenſe we have of your grace and favour, in communicating to us from the throne the account of the French king's perſiſting to invade your dominions, and to impoſe a pretender upon theſe realms, over which your majeſty is rightful and lawful ſovereign.

"The ſmall number of ſhips and troops, with which this project is proſecuted, notwithſtanding the great naval force your majeſty has fitted out with ſo much expedition, as it ought to be regarded with contempt on the one ſide, ſo on the other it gives us juſt cauſe to believe, that their chief dependance is upon ſome of your ſubjects, whoſe reſtleſs paſſions and arbitrary principles have, for ſome years, engaged them in forming deſigns to undermine and deſtroy the moſt happy eſtabliſhment that the government of this iſland was ever founded upon.

"The defence of your majeſty's perſon and government, and the ſupport of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, are things ſo ſacred to us and your people, that, as a demonſtration of our unfeigned zeal to aſſiſt and ſupport your majeſty to the utmoſt of our power, we do, in the name of the commons of Great-Britain, give this aſſurance, that whatever charge you ſhall be at by augmenting your troops at home, and replacing thoſe you have recalled from abroad, or for ſuch other ſervices, as your majeſty ſhall judge neceſſary upon this extraordinary occaſion, ſhall be effectually made good. And as we humbly recommend it to your majeſty, that the ſevereſt puniſhments may be inflicted upon ſuch as ſhall aſſiſt in ſo unnatural a deſign, as that of betraying your majeſty and their country; ſo we doubt not but you will give ſuitable encouragement to all thoſe, who ſhall ſhew their fidelity, by oppoſing the invader and his accomplices in Scotland, or wherever the deſcent ſhall be.

"Your majeſty wants no incitement to a ſteady proſecution of the war, in which you are engaged for the common cauſe; yet permit us to take this opportunity to entreat your majeſty, that this enterprize may no ways divert your conſtant vigour, that all the world may ſee, that both your majeſty and your people are determined to ſupport your allies in all parts, whatever attempts are made at home.

May it pleaſe your majeſty,

"There can be nothing ſo dangerous or fatal to the ſafety of your royal perſon, and the ſecurity of the preſent happy eſtabliſhment, as thoſe perſons, who endeavour to create diviſions and animoſities among your faithful ſubjects, or by any artful methods leſſen the juſt eſteem your majeſty has for thoſe, who have ſo eminently, and in ſo diſtinguiſhing a manner, commanded your armies, and managed your treaſure, to the honour and glory of your majeſty abroad, and the entire ſatisfaction of your people at home. We therefore humbly beg leave to beſeech your majeſty to diſcountenance all ſuch perſons and deſigns in the moſt remarkable manner."

The queen's anſwer to this addreſs was:

Gentlemen,

"I GIVE you my hearty thanks for this repeated aſſureance and certain proof of your zeal for me, and for the proteſtant ſucceſſion.

"I am glad your thoughts of the war abroad ſo perfectly agree with my firm reſolution upon that ſubject.

"You may depend, that no apprehenſions (further than are reaſonable) ſhall have any influence on my meaſures, while the cauſe of religion and liberty, with the good affections of my people, are on my ſide.

"I think all who endeavour to make diviſions among my faithful ſubjects, muſt be mine and the kingdom's enemies;

[c] He obſerves in his Memoirs, that he had no opinion of this enterprize. 'All the time I ſtaid at court, ſays he, I made ſeveral attempts to perſuade the miniſters to drop an enterprize, which I ſaw would be ſo unprofitable: I quite tired myſelf with repreſenting the inconveniences of it; I told the prime miniſter again and again, that the beſt we could make of it would be an unprofitable and diſhonourable cruize; that I was thoroughly mortified at his majeſty's having made choice of me for an expedition, which had all the evidence of being attended with ill ſucceſs: That, if a deſcent was made, the ſix thouſand men would ſurely be loſt, and the forces of the kingdom diminiſhed in proportion, beſides the ſcandal of giving into a chimerical enterprize, which ought to be looked upon as a mere dream. The anſwer to all this was, 'The loſs of the ſix thouſand men gives us no trouble; the king of England, forſooth, ſo they miſcalled the pretender, muſt be ſatisfied.' I never could get any thing elſe out of the miniſtry. The night before I ſet out for Dunkirk, I went to court to take my leave of the king: 'Monſieur Le Count, ſaid his majeſty, you are ſenſible of the importance of your commiſſion, I hope you will diſcharge it like yourſelf.' 'Sir, replied I, your majeſty does me a very great honour, but, if you will vouchſafe me a moment's audience, I have ſeveral things to repreſent to you concerning this commiſſion.' The king, who had been informed by the miniſter of the objections I had made to it all along, only ſaid, 'Monſieur Fourbin, I wiſh you a good voyage, I have affairs upon my hands, and cannot hear you now.'

and I ſhall never countenance any perſons, who would go about to leſſen the juſt eſteem, which I have for thoſe, who have done, and continue to do me, the moſt eminent ſervices."

The lords addreſs was as hearty as that of the commons, and, among other expreſſions of equal truth and affection, they ſaid,

"We hope your majeſty will always have a juſt deteſtation of thoſe perſons, who, at any time, when this helliſh attempt was a-foot, and ſo near breaking out, were uſing their endeavours to miſrepreſent the actions of your beſt ſubjects, and create jealouſies in your majeſty of thoſe who had always ſerved you moſt eminently and faithfully. And we beſeech your majeſty not to give ſo juſt a cauſe of uneaſineſs to your people, as to ſuffer any ſuch hereafter to have acceſs to your royal perſon.

"We hope for this good effect from ſo unhappy an occaſion, that the univerſal zeal, which will appear for the preſervation of your majeſty's government and the proteſtant ſucceſſion, will unite us to one another, and cure our miſtakes and miſapprehenſions, which have been ſo induſtriouſly and maliciouſly improved. But nevertheleſs we moſt humbly offer it to your majeſty as our opinion, that your majeſty ſhould principally depend upon and encourage thoſe, who have been ever ſince the revolution moſt ſteady and firm to the intereſt of the late king, and of your majeſty during your happy reign."

Her majeſty's anſwer to this addreſs was in theſe terms:

My lords,

"I AM extremely ſenſible of your zeal and concern for the ſafety of my perſon and government, and very well pleaſed to find your thoughts agree ſo exactly with mine, that no attempt of our enemies againſt us at home ſhould divert us from proſecuting the war abroad with the greateſt vigour, the hopes of which has probably been one of their principal motives to ſo preſumptuous an undertaking.

"As I cannot but wiſh there were not the leaſt occaſion of diſtinction among my ſubjects; ſo I muſt always place my chief dependance upon thoſe who have given ſuch repeated proofs of the greateſt warmth and concern for the ſupport of the revolution, ſecurity of my perſon, and of the proteſtant ſucceſſion."

The queen, being much alarmed with the danger of this invaſion, ſaw with what falſhoods ſhe had been abuſed by thoſe, who pretended to aſſure her there was not now a Jacobite in the nation. For this reaſon ſhe was obſerved to make a remarkable variation in her ſtile. She had never in any ſpeech mentioned the revolution, or thoſe who had been concerned in it. And many of thoſe, who made a conſiderable figure about her, ſtudied, though againſt all ſenſe and reaſon, to diſtinguiſh her title from the revolution, on which it was plainly founded, and on nothing elſe. But in this anſwer and another ſpeech ſhe named the revolution twice, and ſaid, ſhe would look on thoſe concerned in it as the ſureſt to her intereſts. She alſo fixed a new deſignation on the pretended prince of Wales, and called him the pretender (particularly in her ſpeech at the cloſe of this ſeſſion) and he was ſo called in a new ſet of addreſſes, which, upon this occaſion, were made to the queen.

Beſides the ten Engliſh battalions, which Cadogan had embarked at Oſtend, and which, ſailing from thence the 28th of March, N. S. under the convoy of admiral Baker, arrived three days after at Tinmouth, the firſt and ſecond troop of life-guards, a ſquadron of horſe grenadiers, the duke of Northumberland's regiment of horſe-guards, the dragoons of Eſſex and Carpenter, a detachment of ſixteen men out of each company of the firſt and ſecond regiments of foot-guards, making a complete battalion, and ſeveral regiments of foot, were ordered to march towards Scotland, whither the earl of Leven, commander in chief of the forces in that part of Great-Britain, and governor of Edinburgh caſtle, went poſt betimes, to provide for the ſecurity of that important fortreſs, and to make all the neceſſary diſpoſitions to baffle any attempts, which the enemy could make on that ſide. Several regiments, in the ſouth parts of Ireland, were at the ſame time commanded towards the north of that kingdom, from whence, if occaſion had required, they might, with eaſe, have been tranſported into Scotland. But all the precautions by land proved wholly unneceſſary, by the diſappointment of the enemy's deſign at ſea, of which ſir George Byng gives an account in two letters of the 13th and 15th of March, from on board the Medway; the firſt whereof is as follows: "According to the opinion we had framed, when we left the ſtation off Dunkirk, it has proved, that the enemy was deſigned for Edinburgh. This morning we ſaw the French fleet in the mouth of the Frith, off of which place we anchored the laſt night, and ſent a boat a-ſhore to the iſle of May, from whence we had an account, that the French came to an anchor yeſterday in the afternoon. They ſent one ſhip up into Leith road, which had a flag at the maintop-maſt head. They report it, a blue one; but we are rather of opinion, that it is the ſtandard. The people of the iſland ſay, that, by the time that ſhip could get up before the town, they heard ſeveral guns fire, which were in the manner of a ſalute. The ſhip, that went up yeſterday, came down this morning, and is now within two leagues of us. She appears to be a ſhip of ſixty guns, but has now no flag on board. We ſaw this morning, when they weighed, a flag at the main top-maſt head, on board of one of their ſhips. They ſtand from us, and we after them, with all the ſail we can."

The ſecond letter, dated from Leith road, was as follows: "We chaſed the enemy to northward of Buccaneſs, ſome times with reaſonable hopes of coming up with them. The Dover and Ludlow-Caſtle, being the only clean-ſailing ſhips we had, they were the firſt, which came up with part of the enemy's ſquadron, paſſing by ſome of the ſmaller, to engage ſome of the larger ſhips, and ſtop them till they could be received. They attacked two or three of their ſhips, among which was the Saliſbury: They did not part with them, till more of our ſhips arrived, but worked their ſhips in a handſome manner, to cut them off from the reſt of the fleet; but in the darkneſs of the night they all got out of ſight, except the Saliſbury who falling in amongſt our head-moſt ſhips, the Leopard entered men on board her. We are informed by the officers, who were taken, that there were twelve battalions on board their ſquadron, commanded by Count de Gacé, a marſhal of France. The pretended prince of Wales, lord Middleton, lord Perth, the Mac-Donals, Trevanions, and ſeveral other officers and gentlemen, were on board the Mars, in which alſo was Monſieur Fourbin, who commanded the ſquadron. The number and ſtrength of their ſhips are very near the account we lately received from Dunkirk; nor were they joined by the Breſt men of war. And they further aſſure us, that the ſhips, our outſcouts ſaw off Calais, were privateers, and their prizes, going into Dunkirk. The morning after this chaſe we ſaw but eighteen of the enemy's ſhips, as far as we could perceive them from the maſt-head, in the eaſt north-eaſt of us. Having no proſpect of coming up with them, we lay off and on Buccaneſs all day yeſterday, to gather our ſhips together; and this day, it blowing hard at north-eaſt with a great ſea, judging the enemy could not ſeize the ſhore to make any attempt, we bore up for this place; which was thought moſt reaſonable; not only to ſecure, but to give countenance and ſpirit to her majeſty's faithful ſubjects, and diſcourage thoſe, that could have thoughts of being our enemies[d]."

[d] Mr. de Gace (who commanded the land forces, and was for this unſucceſsful ſervice made a marſhal of France by the title of marſhal de Matignon) gave alſo an account of the invaſion to Mr. de Chamillard in a letter dated at Dunkirk in April: 'I had the honour to acquaint you with our embarkation at Dunkirk the 17th paſt; and you ſhall ſee by the following journal what has happened ſince till our return.

The 17th, at four in the afternoon, the chevalier de Fourbin ſet ſail with the fleet; but, about ten in the evening, the wind proving contrary, we were obliged to caſt anchor in the Downs off Newport, where we were detained the 18th and 19th. The Proteus, on board of which were four hundred landmen; the Guerrier and the Barentine, with two hundred men each, were obliged, by the high winds, to put back into Dunkirk. The ſame day, the 19th, at ten in the evening, the wind having chopped about, we ſet ſail again; and, having purſued our courſe the 20th, 21ſt, and 22d with a ſtrong gale, we made the Frith of Edinburgh the 23d in the morning, and in the evening caſt anchor at the mouth of it. The 24th in the morning, as we made ready to enter the Frith, we diſcovered a great number of ſhips, which we ſoon found to be the enemy's ſquadron to the number of twenty-eight ſail, whom we judged to be the ſame, that had appeared off Dunkirk; whereupon Monſieur de Fourbin reſolved to bear off by the favour of a land breeze, which very luckily carried us from the enemy. They purſued us pretty cloſe all that day, the 24th, and, four of the beſt ſailors being come up with our ſternmoſt ſhips, the enemy's foremoſt ſhip attacked, at four in the afternoon, the Auguſt, with whom they exchanged ſome guns for ſome time; after which the Engliſh bore down upon the Saliſbury, which was more a-ſtern, and endeavoured to put her between themſelves, and another Engliſh ſhip, that was coming up to her. The fight between theſe two ſhips, and ſome others on both ſides, laſted till night; during which time the Saliſbury made a great fire with their ſmall arms.

Our fleet being diſperſed, and the enemy near us, Monſieur de Fourbin ſteered falſe during the night, which had a good effect; for the next day, the 25th, we found ourſelves with twenty ſail at a conſiderable diſtance from the enemy; whereupon I diſcourſed with Monſieur de Fourbin, to know of him, whether, having miſſed our landing in the Frith of Edinburgh, we might not attempt it in another place? He propoſed to me Inverneſs, which is a very remote part in the north of Scotland; and we went immediately to ſpeak of it to the king of England, who entertained the motion with joy, and told us, 'We ought to concert together the meaſures, that were to be taken, and he would purſue our reſolutions.'

The

Sir George Byng having loſt ſight of the French, and conſidering, that the Frith was the ſtation of the greateſt importance, as well as ſafety, and was the place where they deſigned to land, put in there, till he could hear what courſe the French ſteered, who were not heard of in England till a fortnight after. Three of their ſhips landed near the mouth of Spey, only to refreſh themſelves; for, the ſhips being ſo filled with landmen, there was a great want of water. At laſt all their ſhips got ſafe into Dunkirk. The landmen either died at ſea, or were ſo ill, that all the hoſpitals in Dunkirk were filled with them. It was reckoned, that they loſt above four thouſand men in this unaccountable expedition; for they were above a month toſſed in a very tempeſtuous ſea. If they had landed, it might have had an ill effect on our affairs, chiefly with relation to all paper credit; and if by this the remittances had been ſtopped, in ſo critical a ſeaſon, that might have had fatal conſequences abroad; for, if the nation had been put into ſuch diſorder at home, that foreign princes could no more reckon on its aſſiſtance, they might have been diſpoſed to hearken to the propoſitions, which the king of France would then probably have made to them,

The houſe of commons, upon a ſuggeſtion, that ſir George Byng might have deſtroyed the whole Dunkirk ſquadron, if his ſhips had been clean, reſolved to preſent an addreſs to her majeſty, "That ſhe would be pleaſed to give directions, that an account might be laid before the houſe of the number of ſhips, which went in the expedition with ſir George Byng, when the ſame were cleaned:" Which account having been laid before the houſe, and examined, it was reſolved, "That the thanks of this houſe be given to his royal highneſs, the lord high-admiral, for his great care in ſo expeditiouſly ſetting forth ſo great a number of ſhips, whereby the fleet, under the conduct of ſir George Byng, was enabled ſo happily to prevent the intended invaſion." Which was accordingly done.

Some days before, the commons came to an unanimous reſolution, "That whoever deſignedly endeavoured to deſtroy or leſſen the public credit, eſpecially at a time, when the kingdom was threatened with an invaſion, was guilty of an high crime and miſdemeanor, and was an enemy to her majeſty, and the kingdom." And indeed, the moſt dangerous effect of the enemy's intended invaſion, was the occaſioning great demand upon the Bank of England; which viſibly tending to the ruin of its credit, with which that of the exchequer was cloſely connected, the miniſtry thought proper to apply a ſpeedy remedy to that evil. In order to that, the lord-treaſurer ſignified to the directors of the bank, that her majeſty would allow, for ſix months, an intereſt of ſix per cent. upon their bills, which before were only three per cent. And, at the ſame time, his lordſhip offered them a conſiderable ſum of money; as did alſo ſeveral other peers, particularly the dukes of Marlborough, Newcaſtle, and Somerſet. On the other hand, the directors of the bank having reſolved to call in twenty per cent. upon their capital ſtock, they were in a condition to anſwer the demands of the moſt importunate, among whom were reckoned, firſt, the diſaffected, who improved that conjecture to diſtreſs the government with impunity; ſecondly, the timorous uſurers, who were unreaſonably alarmed at the intended invaſion; and laſtly, the gold-ſmiths, who having, in great meaſure loſt the advantageous trade, they carried on with the money, that private perſons lodged in their hands, before the eſtabliſhment of the Bank of England, had ever ſince endeavoured to ruin its credit. One of theſe, ſir Richard Hoare, was ſo concerned at his being reflected on, as having contributed towards the run upon the bank, that he was very ſolicitous to vindicate himſelf as to that particular. But it was obſerved, to the honour of the French, Dutch and Jewiſh merchants, that they were ſo far from calling in the money they had in the bank, that, on the contrary, they carried more into it, to ſupport its credit.

Thus the intended invaſion was totally defeated, without its having the leaſt ill effect on the affairs of Great-Britain, though the court of France had been ſo ſecure of ſucceſs, that their king wrote a circular letter to his miniſters in Rome, Switzerland, Geneva, and other neutral places, directing them to declare in his name, "That he had been long of opinion, that the aſſiſting the king of England to poſſeſs the throne of his anceſtors would be for the general good of all Europe. That he believed, that a peace would be the conſequence of its ſucceſs: And that this princes's ſubjects would eſteem themſelves equally happy, in contributing to re-eſtabliſh him in the place of his predeceſſors, and in being themſelves delivered from thoſe continual impoſitions, wherewith they were overwhelmed, to maintain a war altogether foreign to them. That, as the Scots had yet more reaſon than the Engliſh to be diſſatisfied with the preſent government of England, it appeared to him a convenient opportunity to reſtore to that nation their lawful ſovereign, and to enable the prince to deliver it from the oppreſſion it had ſuffered ſince the revolution, which happened under the late king of England, James the ſecond. That theſe were the reaſons, which had determined him to equip a ſquadron of his ſhips at Dunkirk, and to furniſh the king of England with a conſiderable number of his troops, to accompany him to Scotland, to ſupport thoſe his faithful ſubjects, who ſhould declare for him. That he [the pretended king of England] left Verſailles the 7th of March, N. S. to go to Dunkirk, in order to embark, and get, with all expedition, to Scotland. That his intention was not to enter the kingdom by right of conqueſt, but to oblige them to receive him as legal poſſeſſor of it. That he would behave himſelf in like manner with reſpect to all his other dominions, that ſhould pay the obedience they owed him; and his ſubjects would only be diſtinguiſhed according to the zeal and affection they ſhewed for him, without examining what religion they profeſſed, in which he left them to their entire liberty." The French king concluded, "That he had no thoughts of enlarging his power, by aſſiſting to re-eſtabliſh this prince: That it was ſufficient, that he did an act of juſtice, in vindicating the honour of crowned heads, highly affronted in the perſon of the late king, his father; and his wiſhes would be entirely accompliſhed, if (by God's bleſſing on his endeavours) the ſucceſs became the means of procuring a laſting peace, ſo neceſſary to all Europe."

When theſe miniſters received this circular letter, they had likewiſe advice ſent them, which they publiſhed both at Rome, Venice, and in Swiſſerland, that the French had, before this expedition was undertaken, ſent over ſome ſhips with arms and ammunition to Scotland: And that there was already an army on foot there, that had proclaimed this pretended prince, king. It was ſomewhat extraordinary to ſee ſuch eminent falſhoods publiſhed all Europe over: They alſo affirmed, that hoſtages were ſent from Scotland to Paris, to ſecure the obſerving the engagements, they had entered into; though all this was fiction and contrivance[e].

The ſeſſion of parliament was cloſed the 1ſt of April, ſoon after defeating the deſign of the invaſion. The queen made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

The buſineſs was now to get pilots to conduct us thither, and give us the neceſſary notices. But there being none in our ſquadron, that was acquainted with that port, Monſieur de Fourbin detached a frigate with the Sieurs Caron and Bouyn, to fetch ſome from the cape of Buccaneſs. All that day, the 25th, we ſteered with a pretty favourable wind towards the north of Scotland; but, about eleven at night, there aroſe a ſtrong contrary wind, which having continued the next day with violence, Monſieur de Fourbin told me, it was high time to acquaint the king with the inconveniencies of purſuing our courſe, which were the inevitable diſperſion of our fleet; the danger, which the ſhips, that ſhould be ſeparated, would be in, either of falling into the enemy's hands, or of periſhing on the coaſt, if they were driven thither; and even the wanting of proviſions.

The impoſſibility the Sieurs Caron and Bouyn found of approaching the ſhore, by reaſon of the ſtormy weather, and conſequently of bringing pilots to guide us; the uneaſineſs and dangers of landing in a port we were ſtrangers to, and where the enemy might come up again with us, together with other hazards and difficulties, having been repreſented to the king by Monſieur de Fourbin in the preſence of the duke of Perth, my lord Middleton, Mr. Hamilton, my lord Galmoy, and Meſſieurs de Beauhornois and d'Andrezel, the king of England, with the unanimous advice of all thoſe gentlemen, reſolved to return to Dunkirk, where we could not arrive before this day, by reaſon of the calms and contrary winds.

[e] Lockhart, in his Memoirs (p. 342, &c.) has given us a large account of the grounds, on which the ſucceſs of this undertaking was founded. As ſoon as the union took place, two commiſſions were appointed for managing the cuſtoms and exciſe of Scotland, being partly Engliſh, and partly Scotſmen; but, at the ſame time, vaſt numbers of ſurveyors, collectors, and other officers, being ſent down from England, and executing the new laws with all rigour, were ſo grievous to the people, that men of all ranks and perſuaſions reſented the loſs of the ſovereignty, and were eaſily perſuaded by the pretender's friends, "That nothing but the reſtoration of the royal family by the means of Scotſmen could reſtore them to their rights." Nor were many of the nobility and gentry leſs deſirous to ſee the pretender amongſt them; and therefore had, for ſome time paſt, preſſed his coming over, as the luckieſt opportunity for reſtoring him, and advancing the intereſt of France, by giving a diverſion to the Engliſh. Upon the repeated inſtances of the court of St. Germain's, and the ill ſucceſs of the French arms in 1706, the French king began to reliſh the propoſal, and ſeemed in earneſt to do ſomething for the pretender; but, before he proceeded any farther, he ſent over colonel Hookes to get intelligence, and treat with the Scots. It was the opinion of many, that Hookes was pitched upon by the court of France, as one, who would follow their directions, and aſſerted, That he ſhewed more concern to raiſe a civil war (which was what the French king chiefly wanted) than to promote the pretender's ſervice and intereſt. However that was, it is certain, he rather widened than made up the diviſion he found among the Scots Jacobites, which was occaſioned, by a miſunderſtanding between the dukes of Hamilton and Athol. Hamilton claimed merit upon account of his paſt actions, his intereſt, and qualifications; and Athol valued himſelf on the intereſt he had got of late with the north-country gentry, and the great numbers of men he could raiſe. Many, being diſguſted with the duke of Hamilton for his equivocal behaviour in the laſt Scots parliament, inclined to think, that the duke of Athol would venture further for the pretender; which, as it piqued the one, ſo it elevated the other; and this jarring went ſo far, that ſome of the duke of Athol's partizans railed openly at the duke of

My lords and gentlemen,

" I cannot conclude this ſeſſion, without acknowledging the wiſe and ſpeedy proviſions, which you have made for the public ſecurity.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

" I am alſo to thank you in particular, for the large and timely ſupplies, which you have provided for the effectual proſecution of the war. I aſſure you, they ſhall be carefully and punctually applied to the uſes for which they are appointed.

My lords and gentlemen,

" I take theſe (eſpecially at this juncture) to be ſuch undeniable proofs of your zeal and affection to my ſervice, as muſt convince every body of your doing me the juſtice to believe, that all which is dear to you, is perfectly ſafe under my government; and muſt be irrecoverably loſt, if ever the deſigns of a popiſh pretender, bred up in the principles of the moſt arbitrary government, ſhould take place.

" I am ſatisfied, that very falſe repreſentations of the true inclinations and intereſts of my people muſt have been made of Hamilton, and pretended to do all themſelves. Others, again, reflecting on the duke of Athol's conduct on ſeveral occaſions, were afraid he was not firm, but acted rather from a deſire of revenging himſelf of the courtiers, who had ſlighted him, than a true principle of loyalty to the pretender; and, conſidering that he was by no means qualified to be the head of a party, thought he was not to be humoured ſo far, as to diſguſt the duke of Hamilton. For, though the latter's cautious behaviour in concerting meaſures was not approved, yet the Jacobites being perſuaded of his entire affection to their cauſe, and convinced, at the ſame time, that he was abſolutely neceſſary to be with the pretender, by reaſon of his intereſt, courage, and conduct, and particularly his dexterity in managing the different parties; upon all theſe conſiderations they thought he was to be reſpected, and adviſed with; and therefore recommended him to the earl of Middleton, who, agreeing with them, repreſented him to the pretender, as the fitteſt perſon to ſerve him in Scotland. But the duke of Perth, who entirely differed from the earl of Middleton, ſoon cloſed with the duke of Athol; and, having more intereſt with the prieſts and Roman catholics than the earl of Middleton, prevailed ſo far with the court of France, or at leaſt with Hookes, that Hookes, upon his arrival in Scotland, in the beginning of March 1707, made his chief application to, and concerted meaſures with his correſpondent, the duke of Athol. Beſides his credentials from the pretender and French king, empowering him to treat with the people of Scotland, in order to bring about the king's reſtoration, and to recover the nation's ſovereignty, and ancient privileges; colonel Hookes produced a paper, containing ſeveral queries drawn by the marquis de Torcy, relating to the number of men, that could be raiſed in Scotland; the conveniences for ſubſiſting and quartering troops, and carrying on a war; and the number of forces, ſums of money, and quantities of arms and ammunition, neceſſary to be ſent from France. A diſtinct anſwer being made to each query, containing a full account of the ſtate of affairs, particularly the inclination of the people to venture all for the pretender's ſervice, and earneſtly entreating him to come over as ſoon as poſſible; that paper was ſigned by the

Duke of Athol,	Lord Nairne,
Lord Drummond,	Fatheringhame of Powrie,
Earl of Errol,	Lyon of Auchterhouſe,
Earl of Strathmore,	Graham of Fintree,
Viſcount of Stormount,	Drummond of Logie,
Lord John Drummond,	Ogilvy of Boyne,

and others, and it was then delivered to colonel Hookes, who carried it to France in May 1707. It is to be obſerved, that he had brought over letters from the pretender to the duke of Hamilton, and the earl of Mariſchal, but before he tranſmitted thoſe letters to them, he had ſo cloſely attached himſelf to the duke of Athol, and made ſuch advances in the treaty, that the duke of Hamilton and earl Mariſchal highly reſented their being thus diſregarded, and did not think fit to ſend their anſwers by Hookes, but choſe another hand to communicate their thoughts to the earl of Middleton. Hereupon Hookes ſent them impertinent threatening letters; and when he arrived in France, fluſhed with the ſucceſs of his embaſſy, he triumphed over the earl of Middleton, whom, and his friends in Scotland, he accuſed of backwardneſs to ſerve the pretender. Before he embarked for France, he had aſſured the Jacobites that their king would be with them by the month of Auguſt following; but before that time came, notice was ſent to Scotland, that the the attempt could not be made ſo ſoon. There being afterwards little appearance of its being executed, people began to ſuſpect, that the French king's affairs being ſomewhat retrieved by the battle of Almanza, he reſerved the deſign in favour of the pretender to another occaſion; which ſurmiſe proceeded from a well-grounded jealouſy, that the court of France regarded him no farther, than they thought him ſubſervient to their own intereſt and private views. Of this opinion was the duke of Hamilton, who having waited till the end of January 1707-8, without ſeeing any effect of the French king's promiſes, and his affairs requiring his preſence in England, he ſet out from Kenriel with his ducheſs and family towards Lancaſter. The third day he was on his journey, an expreſs from captain Straton informed him, that he had certain advice, that the pretender would proceed on his expedition before the middle of March; whereupon the duke ſeemed extremely perplexed what to do; but after ſome conſideration, he reſolved to proceed on his journey as a maſk to cover his real deſign; and in the mean time directed Mr. Lockhart of Carnwarth, who had accompanied him ſo far, inſtantly to repair to the ſhire of Lanerk to raiſe their friends and lead them to Dumfries, where he promiſed to meet him and where he was ſure to be joined with a great number of horſe and foot. Beſides the good diſpoſitions and ſolemn aſſurances of the pretender's friends, the court of France had reaſon to expect ſucceſs in Scotland; for the regular troops there did not exceed two thouſand five hundred men, moſt of whom were diſaffected and ready to join the pretender: The garriſons being unprovided with warlike ſtores, muſt have yielded at the firſt ſummons: A good part of the equivalent money being in the caſtle of Edinburgh, would have helped to carry on the war: And a fleet of Dutch ſhip's had ſome time before run a-ground on the coaſt of Angus, in which was a vaſt quantities of ammunition, beſides cannon and ſmall arms, and a great ſum of money which the Jacobites of that country would have ſecured. So that all things ſeemed to concur to give ſucceſs to the attempt upon Scotland. As ſoon as the French fleet was ready to ſail, the pretender diſpatched Mr. Charles Fleming, brother to the earl of Wigton, to acquaint his friends in Scotland therewith; and with him he ſent ſeveral copies of a paper containing inſtructions to his party how they were to behave, particularly deſiring them not to ſtir till they were ſure he was landed; and that then they ſhould ſecure all the money, horſes, arms and proviſions, that were in the hands of ſuch as were not well affected to him, and even their perſons if poſſible; and Mr. Fleming was to provide pilots to meet him at the mouth of the Frith of Forth, and guide his fleet up the ſame, being reſolved to land on the ſouth-ſide thereof, at or about Dunbar.

Mr. Fleming arriving at Slains, the earl of Errol immediately ſent him to Perthſhire, where he communicated his inſtructions to ſuch as he thought proper. The earl of Errol likewiſe ſent Mr. George, a ſkipper in Aberdeen, to be ready to go from Fifeneſs with Mr. Malcolm of Grange, to pilot the pretender up the Frith; and farther deſired him to go over the water to Edinburgh, to advertiſe captain Straton and Mr. Lockhart of Carnwarth of Mr. Fleming's arrival and inſtructions. The appearance of the French fleet in the Frith, as it wonderfully elated the ſpirits of the Jacobites, ſo it ſtruck no ſmall terror into the well-affected. However the magiſtrates and corporations of the city of Edinburgh ſhewed ſuch zeal and readineſs to aſſiſt the government, and ſuch care and diligence were uſed in obſerving and ſecuring ſuſpected perſons, that, by this means, together with the ſpeedy march of ſome Engliſh forces northwards, and ſir George Byng's continuing in Leith-Road, till certain news came of the pretender's return to Dunkirk, the peace of Scotland was happily preſerved.

Mr. Lockhart, from whom this account is extracted, obſerves, p. 375, that the reaſons alledged by the marſhal de Matignon, in his letter to Monſieur Chamillard, for not landing in the north or weſt of Scotland, were frivolous. 'And yet, ſays he, conſider the want of reſolution and firmneſs, that has of late appeared in the French councils; and it is not improbable, that having miſſed of the firſt aim of landing in the Frith, and being afraid of the Engliſh fleet's falling upon them, they might be at a ſtand and deſpair of ſucceeding. But is it not ſtrange they ſhould have undertaken ſuch an expedition, and not reflected upon, and been provided with orders for all accidents, that might happen? And was it ſo extraordinary a thing, that they could not foreſee, that the Engliſh fleet which was then at ſea, might have endeavoured to prevent the landing in the Frith; and yet on ſuch an emergency leave all to the admirals own diſpoſal? But ſince as I mentioned before, the king was ſo preſſing to have landed in the north, I am apt to believe Fourbin had ſecret orders from his maſter, which he did not communicate to the king. And therefore I cannot altogether condemn thoſe who are of opinion, that the French king did never deſign the king ſhould land; for being fully perſuaded and ſatisfied, that the Scots were zealouſly bent to riſe in arms, he might think that upon his fleets arrival on the coaſt, they would have appeared; and having once ſet the iſland by the ears together, and kindled a civil war, he might ſpare his men and money, and reſerve the king in his power to ſerve him on another occaſion. Elſe, ſay they, why did he not ſend ſuch a number of forces, as was capitulated? For the treaters demanded ſix or ſeven thouſand, and others ten thouſand; which was promiſed, and yet they were but betwixt four and five thouſand, and thoſe none of the beſt; neither was the ſum of money, nor quantity of arms, and other warlike ſtores, near ſo great as was demanded and agreed to. And ſince he had been at ſo much charge in equipping this expedition, and made ſuch a noiſe of it all the world over, why did they not land in the north or weſt, where they could meet with no oppoſition? It is true, indeed, the ſouth-ſide of the Frith was the place adviſed and moſt proper (though other places both in the north and weſt, had been ſpoke of too) becauſe the north-country were ſecure againſt any attempts, and well inclined to ſerve the king, and the landing on the ſouth ſide of the Frith, gained them Edinburgh, and opened a communication betwixt the north and the ſouth, and the weſt of Scotland and north of England. But ſure the difference betwixt weſt, ſouth and north, was not ſo great, as, if any one failed, the whole deſign was fruſtrated. But not to inſiſt further on the French king's ſecret deſigns (which are all myſteries to us) this is certain, that, had the French managed their affairs right, they might have landed even in the Frith; for, had they ſailed their courſe directly from Newport-pits, they might have reached it a day ſooner than they did; but, in place thereof, thou they knew the Engliſh fleet was in queſt of them, and that England and all the world knew of their deſign, they ſtood out ſo far to the north ſeas, for fear, as they ſince alledged, of alarming England, that the firſt ſight, they had of Scotland was near thirty miles to the north of Aberdeen; and ſo though they had the ſtart by near a day of ſir George Byng, yet he arrived in the Frith in a few hours after them; and one of their ſhips, which proved leaky, and was obliged to return to Dunkirk, and remained there two days after they ſailed, reached the Frith ſeveral hours before them. And if it was true, as I have been informed, that the French king's orders to Fourbin were, that, provided he could land on any place on the ſouth of the Frith, rather than loſe the opportunity, he allowed him to deſtroy his ſhips, and join his ſeamen to the land forces; why did they drop their anchors at the mouth of the Frith, and loſe half a day and a whole night? For, had he ſailed on, he might have reached the windings in the head of the Frith, before the Engliſh fleet could have come up to the Frith, and lain ſome time concealed from them, who, he ſaw, knew not where the French were, but dropped their anchors. But ſuppoſing the Engliſh had diſcovered them, next day they would at leaſt have got ſo many hours ſailing of them, that before they could have come up, their great ſhips might have unloaded, and the leſſer ones run into creeks and ſhallow places (which abound there) where the Engliſh big ſhips could not have come at them. Laſtly, it was unaccountable in them to come from Dunkirk, where were abundance of Scots ſeamen, who would have been glad of the occaſion, and not bring a pilot, who knew the coaſt, with them; the loſs of which they found, when they arrived there, and were obliged to take in ſome fiſhermen for that purpoſe off of Montroſe. I know ſome have attributed their landing to the duke of Perth, whoſe heart they ſay, failed him when it came to the puſh. But, for my part, I cannot conceive how his opinion or inſtruction could have that weight in the managing a matter of ſuch importance. Again, it has been ſaid, that the earl Mariſchal omitted to anſwer the ſignal of a ſhip which was ſent by agreement to the coaſt near his houſe, to learn intelligence from him of the ſtate of affairs. It is true indeed, his lordſhip failed on his part; but can it be thought that the vigorous execution of the project could ſtop on ſo ſlight a diſappointment? Beſides, Mr. Malcolm of Grange did actually go on board ſhip, which, I told you, came after the French out of Dunkirk, and arrived in the Frith before the fleet, and informed them of all that was neceſſal. But to leave theſe ſpeculations with this animadverſion, that the French might have landed, if they had pleaſed or managed their affairs right; and that time muſt diſcover the true reaſon of their not landing, of which, by the bye, none of the court of St. Germains, though often wrote to on this ſubject, will give any return, which makes it the more myſterious.'

by ſome of my ſubjects, who have given encouragement to this deſperate attempt; ſince, without ſomething of that nature, it ſeems very little conſiſting with the uſual precaution of our enemies, to hazard the expence of ſo vain and ill-grounded an undertaking. However, it is certain, we muſt be all inexcuſable, if we do not take warning from this attempt, to complete what may be neceſſary for our ſecurity at home, and the diſcouraging the like for the future; to which, by God's bleſſing, nothing ſhall be wanting on my part..

"And to the ſame end I muſt recommend to you, at your return into your counties, to uſe your utmoſt care and diligence in putting the laws in execution againſt papiſts, and all others diſaffected to my government, and in making them pay towards the public taxes, to the full of what the law requires from them; nothing being more reaſonable, than that they, who, by their principles and practices, encourage (if not actually foment) ſuch diſturbances, ſhould doubly contribute to the charge of quieting them, and ſecuring the kingdom's peace; and ſhould know themſelves, on all ſuch occaſions, to be reſponſible for the many inconveniences that may enſue."

Then the parliament was prorogued to the 13th of April; and, two days after, was diſſolved by proclamation, and writs were iſſued out for the elections of a new parliament. On the 26th of April, a proclamation was publiſhed, commanding all the peers of North Britain to aſſemble at Holy-rood houſe in Edinburgh, the 17th of June, to nominate and chuſe, by open election, the ſixteen peers, who were to ſit and vote in the houſe of peers in the enſuing parliament of Great-Britain, purſuant to the twenty-ſecond article of the treaty of union; and accordingly the dukes of Hamilton, Montroſs, and Roxburgh; the marquis of Lothian; and the earls of Orkney, Crawford, Rothes, Leven, Mar, Loudoun, Wemys, Roſeberry, Glaſgow, Northeſk, Seafield, and Ilay; ſome of whom were juſtly ſuſpected of diſaffection to the preſent ſettlement. But in England, the juſt fears and viſible dangers, to which the attempt of the invaſion had expoſed the nation, had ſo good an effect, that the elections, for the moſt part, fell on men well-affected to the government, and zealouſly ſet againſt the pretender.

Four days after the diſſolution of the parliament, Edward Griffin, late lord Griffin, John lord Clermount, and Charles Middleton, two ſons of the earl of Middleton, and colonel Francis Wauchope, who had been taken on board the Saliſbury, were brought up to London; and, having been examined by a committee of the privy-council, were committed priſoners to the Tower for high-treaſon, by warrant of the earl of Sunderland, ſecretary of ſtate; and, two days after, the following Iriſh officers, taken alſo on board the ſame ſhip, were, for the ſame crime, committed to Newgate: Edward Fitzgerald, Oliver Bourk, Daniel Baily, Stephen Connor, Conſtance Kiefe, Michael Pendergaſt, Edmund Fitzgerald, Teague Macmahon, Cleary, —— Fitzmorris, —— O Sullivan, —— Maccarty, —— Fannon, —— Denovan, —— Hymes, and Anthony Stanburker. Several perſons were likewiſe ſeized in Scotland, and ſent up to London[f].

Before ſir George Byng ſailed from Leith-road to the Downs, he was viſited by ſir Patrick Johnſon, repreſentative in the late parliament for the city of Edinburgh, in the name of the magiſtracy of that city; and preſented with an inſtrument, whereby he was made a citizen of Edinburgh, incloſed in a gold box, and accompanied with a letter from ſir Samuel Meldrum, lord provoſt of that city, wherein he "deſired the admiral to accept of it, as a mark of their high reſpect to him, who had been the happy inſtrument of ſo ſeaſonable a deliverance to this iſland, for which his memory would be honoured in future ages." Not many days after ſir George Byng arrived at court, and was received, both by the queen, and her royal conſort, with thoſe marks of favour, which his late eminent ſervices had deſerved. All this while, the miniſters of ſeveral foreign princes and ſtates had audiences of the queen and prince, to congratulate the diſappointment of the pretender's deſign on North-Britain; but, on the 7th of April, ſignior Cornaro, ambaſſador from the republic of Venice, was forbid the court, upon account of ſome diſreſpect ſhewn by the cuſtom-houſe officers of Venice to the Gondola, and two boatmen of the earl of Mancheſter, the Britiſh ambaſſador[g]. But this matter was afterwards accommodated to the queen's entire ſatisfaction[h].

During the ſeſſion of parliament, on the 18th of February, died a very eminent member of it, ſir Edward Seymour, at his ſeat at Maiden-Bradley in Wiltſhire. Nobility of deſcent, eminency of parts, great popularity, and a leading influence in the houſe of commons, were the diſtinguiſhing circumſtances of his life. Whether they were attended with real virtue and merit, cannot be deemed an improper enquiry; ſince without theſe, outward appearances are inſignificant and [f] Towards the end of April 1708, the chief ſtate-priſoners in the caſtle of Edinburgh, viz. the marquis of Huntley, the earls of Errol, Seaforth, and Nithſdale; the lords viſcounts Stormount and Kilſyth, the lord Drummond, the lord Nairn, and James Murray (the two laſt named brothers to the duke of Athol) ſir George Maxwell, and others, ſet out from thence, in order to be brought up to London, guarded by a party of dragoons. As for the duke of Hamilton, who on the 10th of April, arrived at Weſtminſter with his dutcheſs, attended only by one of her majeſty's meſſengers, his grace made ſuch large profeſſions of his loyalty and affection to her majeſty's perſon and government, that he was ſoon after diſcharged; as was alſo the earl of Aberdeen, the lord Balmerino, the biſhop of Edinburgh, ſir Walter Bruce, lieutenant-colonel Balfour, Mr. Fletcher of Salton, Dugal Stewart, brother to the lord Bute, and ſome others. On the 7th of June, the lord Drummond, ſir George Maxwell, and Robert Murray of Palmay were committed priſoners to the tower of London; and the lairds of Cardeen and Keir to Newgate, by warrants, from the lords of her majeſty's privy-council. The next day the following priſoners were brought up to London from Edinburgh, the duke of Gordon, Viſcount Kenmure, Fotheringham of Powrie, Lyon of Auchterhouſe, lord James Murray, Robinſon of Strowan, Seaton of Touch, Stuart of Starachio, Macdonald of Keppock, Edmiſton of Newton, Laird of Keppendarvie, Gordon of Gallachy, and Stuart of Boyce; as were, on the 13th of that month, the earl of Mariſchal, the earl of Murray, the earl of Traquair, the lord Belhaven, the lord Sinclair, ſir John Macleane, the laird Lochiel, the laird of Appin, major-general Buchan, and Mr. Cambel of Glenderowick. Theſe priſoners having ſeverally been examined by the lords of the privy-council, ſuch againſt whom there was no particular information, were admitted to bail; which favour extended to moſt of them, but the lord Belhaven did not long enjoy it, for on the 21ſt of June he died of an inflammation or mortification in his brain, and in him expired the warmeſt oppoſer of the union of the two kingdoms.

But it will be proper to hear what Mr. Lockhart, in his Memoirs, p. 382, ſays upon this ſubject. 'The caſtles of Stirling and Edinburgh, ſays he, and all the priſons in Edinburgh, were crammed full of nobility and gentry. At firſt, no doubt, the government expected to have had proof enough to have brought ſeveral of them to puniſhment; but, failing, bleſſed be God, in that, the next uſe they made of them was to advance their politics; for no ſooner did any perſon, who was not of their party, pretend to ſtand a candidate to be choſen a parliament-man at the elections, which were to be next ſummer, but he was clapped up in priſon, or threatened with it, if he did not deſiſt; and by theſe means they carried, generally ſpeaking, whom they pleaſed. But to return to the priſoners, after they had been in cuſtody for ſome weeks, orders came from London to ſend them up thither, which was accordingly done, being divided in three claſſes, and ſent up three ſeveral times, led in triumph under a ſtrong guard, and expoſed to the raillery and impertinence of the Engliſh mob. And now it appeared to what a fine market Scotland had brought her hogs, her nobility and gentry being led in chains from one end of the iſland to the other, merely on account of ſuſpicion, and without any accuſation or proof againſt them. Whilſt this was a doing, the duke of Hamilton, being likewiſe brought up priſoner to London, and taking the advantage of the diſcords between the treaſurer and the whigs, ſtruck up with the latter, and prevailed with them to obtain, not only his, but all the other priſoners liberation (excepting the Stirlingſhire gentlemen, who were ſent home again to undergo their trial, upon their finding bail to appear againſt a certain day (which was likewiſe ſoon remitted) and engaged to join with them (the whigs) and their friends in Scotland, viz. the Squadrone, in the election of the peers for the parliament of Great-Britain; which having accordingly done, ſeveral of the court-party were thrown out. This certainly was one of the neateſt ſteps the duke of Hamilton ever made; and, had he not hit upon this favourable juncture, and managed it with great addreſs, I am afraid ſome heads had paid for it; at beſt, they had undergone a long confinement; ſo that to his grace alone the thanks for that deliverance was owing.'

[g] That earl gives the following account of this affair, in a letter to the earl of Sunderland from Venice, March 30, 1708, printed in Mr. Cole's Memoirs of Affairs of State, p. 519, which letter begins thus: 'I write under all the concern imaginable, being ſenſible, that the affront they have done me here is of the higheſt nature, as you will ſee by my memorial; and, unleſs it is repaired in the moſt public manner, it will reflect extremely on the honour of the queen and the whole nation. This has been occaſioned by the roguery and villainy of one B—— a merchant, ſon to Mr. B—— in the city, who inveigled and perſuaded two of my boatmen to go on board a ſhip, and and load from it ſome cloth, which is prohibited here. It is well known, that the boat of an ambaſſador is ſo ſacred, that it is not to be viſited or ſtopped on any account whatſoever, though there was a priſoner of ſtate in it. This made B—— conclude, that his cloth was ſecure, though my honour and reputation muſt have ſuffered; for it could not but be known here, though this had not happened.' The circumſtances of the affront are thus related in the earl of Mancheſter's Memorial, preſented on the 29th of March 1708: 'On Monday laſt my gondola, with two of my boatmen, dreſſed in my ordinary and well-known livery, was attacked in coming from Malamocco by the officers of this moſt ſerene republic, armed with fire-arms and ſteel weapons. Theſe officers entered the boat by main force; and, after having done what they thought fit, they ſuffered the gondola to row away.'

[h] The earl of Mancheſter, in a letter to the earl of Sunderland from Venice, July 6, 1708, printed in Cole's Memoirs, p. 540, obſerves, 'that the ſenate of Venice had conſented to reſtore the cloth in the manner the earl had deſired; to condemn the men into the gallies; and, in lieu of the pillory, to bring them at the hour of juſtice from the priſon through the place of St. Mark into the galley, and the chief of them to have a paper prefixed to him, denoting their crime and puniſhment, &c.' The concluſion of this affair will appear from the following paſſage of the earl of Mancheſter's letter to the earl of Sunderland from Venice, September 7, 1708: 'I can now acquaint your lordſhip, that yeſterday the men were brought through the place of St. Mark to the galley. The chief of them had a paper on his breaſt and back with the inſcription, as it was agreed on. There were great numbers of people. This day they delivered the cloth to my boat, in the place, where they took it. I ſent it immediately to the four hoſpitals, ſo all is paſſed to our entire ſatisfaction, and much to the honour of the queen; and I have the good fortune to have the approbation of all people here in this affair. As ſoon as the men have made their ſubmiſſion, I intend to go to the college to get them releaſed. One of the men being lame of the gout, he was carried in a chair, which made it more remarkable. They were eleven in all.'

offenſive. In the reign of king Charles II. he laboured with uncommon diligence to promote the meaſures of the court, for the deſtruction of civil and religious liberty; and was neither afraid nor aſhamed of any ſort of management. His contemptuous and brutal behaviour towards the houſe of commons, while he was in the chair, was aſtoniſhing and ſcarce credible. He acted there as the marſhal of the court, and agreeably to his inſtructions from thence, allowed the houſe a long or ſhort day for buſineſs. He ſeemed to affect to be remembered by a ſeries of words and actions, full of indignity and inſolence; nor did he eſcape the public reproaches of many members for the licentiouſneſs of his morals, which they declared to be a diſgrace to the ſtation, which he bore in their houſe. In order to bring him under proper diſcipline and correction, the next houſe of commons choſe him their ſpeaker; but his royal maſter, to preſerve him from diſgrace and vexation, refuſed his approbation in an unuſual manner. His concurrence in the revolution, and directing the aſſociation, are to be aſcribed to a reſentment of what he eſteemed ill uſage under king James. To the eſtabliſhment, eaſe, and ſucceſs of king William's government, no one ever gave ſtronger proofs of an utter averſion. When that king had full evidence of his treaſonable practices, ſuch was his majeſty's generous regard to his firſt appearances, that he gave him his choice of taking a place or his trial. Though he had often profeſſed a contempt for the maſter and the ſervice, prudence and guilt diſpoſed him to a place. His conduct in this ſituation was a very ungrateful return for the favour, which he had received. In purſuance of his counſels early and ſeaſonable remedies were neglected; every thing was to wait the attention of parliament. Thus the coin was reduced to a ruinous ſtate, which proved the occaſion of infinite miſchief to affairs both at home and abroad. Whilſt he declaimed againſt and proſecuted real or imaginary corruptions in others, he was a conſtant and moſt able practitioner this way. Rival companies and rival projectors ſucceſsfully employed the ſure method of procuring his protection. Foreign powers were very ſenſible of the certain way of aſſuring to themſelves ſo ſignificant and daring an advocate. Much of this kind was ſuſpected, and many things well known; yet with an amazing ſufficiency he continued to ſupport his authority and influence. The regards of his party were ſecured by his unwearied ſincere hatred of king William. In this reign, he, who in a former had betrayed and trampled on the privileges of a houſe of commons, commenced the patron and enlarger of its rights.

His higheſt pretenſions to public ſpirit and public virtue were owing to oppoſite motives. His zeal in the impeachment of the earl of Clarendon, was not the effect of offences ſuggeſted in the articles, but flowed from a deſire of recommending himſelf to a corrupt court. Malevolence had been long working there, on the account of that earl's having joined with the earl of Southampton, in preventing profuſe and deſtructive ſettlements of parliament. The proſecution of lord Sommers aroſe from that lord's ability and fidelity in the ſervice of his prince and the public; for neither ſir Edward's obligation nor inclination would have urged him to purſue a real enemy of France. After he had been the terror of his enemies; and lived amongſt his friends with a haughty ſuperiority, a mean wretch hurried him out of the world, its moſt imperious diſturber. When infirmities had confined him to his chair, his houſe was deſerted by the ſervants on the account of ſome new diverſions; and, in the mean time an old female beggar of the maddiſh tribe happened to wander into the apartments. Finding the great man thus alone, ſhe reproached him for all his cruelty and oppreſſions, threatened, terrified, and handled him in a manner, the effects of which ſoon put an end to a life, through the whole courſe of which he ſeemed equally inſenſible of crimes and puniſhments.

The removal of Mr. ſecretary Harley having occaſioned ſome other vacancies, Robert Walpole, a gentleman of quick parts and maſterly eloquence, was, in Mr. St. John's room, made ſecretary of war; and the place of ſecretary to the marines, which had been likewiſe held by Mr. St. John, was given to Mr. Joſiah Burchet. Some time after, the queen delivered to the earl of Cholmondley the ſtaff of comptroller of her houſhold; and, about the middle of April, her majeſty made a promotion of general officers, by which the earl Rivers was advanced to the poſt of general of the horſe[i].

Some time before, orders and commiſſions were delivered for new raiſing the regiments of Montjoy, Gorges, Alnut, Mordaunt, Wade, Maccartney, and lord Mark Kerr, which ſuffered moſt at the battle of Almanza; and their officers, who were priſoners in France, were ſupplied by others. About the ſame time, the earl of Wemys and ſir John Leake were added to the lord high admiral's council. On the 22d of April, her majeſty nominated Dr. William Fleetwood to the biſhopric of St. Aſaph, vacant by the death of Dr. Beveridge, and ſir William Giffard was appointed governor of Greenwich hoſpital; and Hugh Boſcowen warden of the ſtannaries.

The Scotch privy-council being diſſolved by virtue of the late act, entitled, An act for rendering the union of the two kingdoms more entire and complete, the queen, on the 10th of May, appointed the firſt privy council of Great-Britain[k].

On the 15th of May, the lord Griffin, one of the priſoners taken on board the Saliſbury, being attainted by outlawry for high-treaſon, committed in the reign of king William, was brought to the bar of the queen's-bench, and, after reading of the outlawry, being aſked, what he had to ſay, why execution ſhould not be awarded againſt him? He ſaid, in his defence, "That he was neither in arms, nor in council with the enemy; but was forced by the French court upon the expedition entirely againſt his judgment and inclination, notwithſtanding he had expreſſed his diſlike of it, as a raſh and fooliſh attempt;" adding, "That he threw himſelf at the queen's feet for mercy, and hoped the favour of the court." His defence being judged entirely foreign to the outlawry, upon which he was brought to the bar, the court made a rule for his execution, as is uſual in ſuch caſes: But though the queen was prevailed with to ſign the warrant for ſentence to paſs upon him, a reprieve, however, for a fortnight, was ſent the night before to the Tower; and that, expiring the laſt day of June, was then renewed, and afterwards continued from month to month, till he died a natural death in the Tower, about two years after.

On the 20th of May, Meinhard, duke of Schomberg, and John Smith, late ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, who, about this time, was conſtituted under-treaſurer, and chancellor of the exchequer, in the room of Mr. ſecretary Boyle, were ſworn of the privy-council, as was the duke of Somerſet the week after; and, towards the latter end of the ſame month, the duke of Queenſberry was made a peer of Great-Britain by the title of Baron of Rippon, and marquis of Beverley in the county of York, and duke of Dover in the county of Kent.

An act had paſſed the laſt ſeſſion for the better ſecurity to our trade by cruizers and convoys, and for the encouraging privateers, particularly in the Weſt-Indies and South-ſea. They were to have all they could take, entirely to themſelves; the ſame encouragement was alſo given to the captains of the queen's ſhips, with this difference, that the captains of the privateers were to divide their captures, according to agreements made among themſelves, but the diſtribution of prizes taken by men of war was left to the queen. A proclamation was therefore publiſhed at this time in May, ordering the prizes to be divided into eight ſhares. The captain was to have three eighths, unleſs he had a ſuperior officer, in which caſe the admiral or commodore was to have one of the three. The commiſſion officers and maſter were to have one eighth, the warrant-officers one, and the petty officers another, and the ſailors the other two.

The ſtorm, which threatened Great Britain, being diſpelled, and the neceſſary meaſures for the ſecurity of the government taken, the duke of Marlborough ſet out from London the 29th of March, and, having reached Margate that evening, embarked there, and the next day, at two in the afternoon, came in ſight of the coaſt of Holland, and arrived late the ſame night at the Hague, where prince Eugene of Savoy was come, two days before, to meet him.

1708. The advantages gained by the French, the laſt year, prompted them to entertain ſeveral projects, and to make ſtill greater efforts to recover their former ſuperiority. And indeed their forces this year ſeemed to be more numerous than ever, eſpecially in the Netherlands, where it was believed the elector of Bavaria and the duke de Vendoſme would have again commanded. But an unexpected alteration was ſuddenly made, and the French king declared the duke of Burgundy generaliſſimo of his forces, appointing the duke de Vendoſme to ſerve under him; and he was to be accompanied by the duke of Berry. The pretender (who was returned from his unſucceſsful expedition to Scotland) went with them, without any other character than that of the chevalier de St. George. The elector of Bavaria was to command on the Rhine, with the duke of Berwick under him, the marſhal de Villeroy being recalled, and appointed to command in Dauphine. Theſe proceedings of the French king ſurprized every one; but he conceived great hopes from theſe alterations of his generals. The credit with relation to money was ſtill very low in France. For, after many methods taken for raiſing the credit of the mint-bills, they were ſtill at a diſcount of forty per cent. No fleets came this year from the Weſt Indies, and therefore they could not be ſupplied from thence.

On the 12th of April, N. S. in the evening, there was a great conference between prince Eugene, the duke of Marlborough, the deputies of the ſtates for private affairs, and penſionary Heinſius, in the chamber of Triers, the uſual place of conferences in the ſtates apartment; which was pitched upon to avoid the trouble of the ceremonial; for otherwiſe it muſt have been at the duke of Marlborough's, as ambaſſador extraordinary; whereas prince Eugene had no character, his credentials importing only, "that his Imperial majeſty had ſent his firſt counſellor, preſident of the council of war, and general-lieutenant, prince Eugene, to concert the operations of the campaign, in whom the ſtates were deſired to put an entire confidence." As ſoon as they were entered the room, the duke of Marlborough took prince Eugene by the hand, and led him to a ſeat above his own; after which the ſtates deputies placed themſelves, without obſerving any precedency among them. Prince Eugene opened the conference with a ſpeech, wherein he gave a particular "account of the emperor's forces in Naples, Lombardy, and Piedmont, and of thoſe deſigned for Spain and having mentioned the troops which his Imperial majeſty intended to employ in Germany, he gave, in very modeſt terms, his own opinion of the operations of the next campaign, both on the Upper Rhine and the Low Countries; concluding, that he had inſtructions from his Imperial majeſty to uſe his endeavours to engage the queen of Great Britain and the ſtates general to approve the ſcheme he had propoſed, and to ſecond, on their parts, his Imperial majeſty's efforts, both to reduce the exorbitant power of France, and to reſtore his brother king Charles III. to the whole monarchy of Spain."

After prince Eugene had ended his ſpeech, the duke of Marlborough acquainted the aſſembly with the inſtructions he had received from the queen his miſtreſs in relation to the buſineſs before them; and laſt mention was made of a ſeparate army to be commanded by prince Eugene. This conference, which laſted above an hour, was but a kind of preliminary; for the deputies ofthe ſtates were not empowered to make any anſwer, either to prince Eugene's, or the duke of Marlborough's propoſals, but only (according to the uſual methods obſerved by that republic) to receive them, and to report the ſame to their high mightineſſes; which they did on the 16th.

Several other conferences were held, though more privately, between the duke of Marlborough, prince Eugene, and the deputies of the ſtates; the reſult of which was (as it afterwards appeared) 'That moſt of the Imperialiſts employed the year before on the Upper Rhine, with the Saxons and Heſſians in the pay of Great-Britain and Holland and the troops which the elector Palatine was to furniſh, in conſideration of his Imperial majeſty's reſtoring him to the poſſeſſion of the Upper Palatinate, with the prerogatives enjoyed by his anceſtors, ſhould march into the Netherlands to act there, under prince Eugene, in concert with the Britiſh and Dutch forces, commanded in chief by the duke of Marlborough, and under him, by veldt-marſhal Auverquerque.' Whether prince Eugene, who took Hanover in his way to the Hague, then communicated this ſcheme to the elector of that name, and found him averſe to it, or propoſed other meaſures to his electoral highneſs, is not known; but it was thought fit that prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough ſhould now both wait on that prince, in order to obtain his concurrence to the reſolutions taken at the Hague, and engage him to return to command the army on the Upper Rhine.

The duke of Marlborough intended to have gone back to England before the opening of the campaign; but prince Eugene was very earneſt with him to meet him at Hanover, and the ſtates having repreſented to the queen of Great-Britain the neceſſity of his preſence on that ſide, and how uncertain the winds might make his timely return, the ſeaſon being ſo far advanced, he reſolved upon the journey to the court of Hanover. Prince Eugene having finiſhed his negociations at the Hague, ſet out the 20th of April N. S. arrived the 22d at Duſſeldorp, and, having ended his buſineſs, the next day, with the elector Palatine, and ſent an expreſs to Vienna, purſued his journey towards Hanover. The duke of Marlborough met him the 26th, two German miles from that place, and, arriving there the ſame evening, together, they alighted at the Britiſh envoy's. The duke went firſt to court, and was followed thither ſoon after by prince Eugene, where the ſeveral audiences of ceremony, which they had of the electoral family, being over, they had together a long conference with the elector, who gave orders for their being accommodated at his own palace. Their conferences were continued the three following days, the count de Rechteren aſſiſting on the part of the ſtates-general. They met with ſome difficulties at firſt, which were removed by the dextrous and prudent management of prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough; and his electoral highneſs, though he was ſenſible, that, by this ſcheme for making vigorous efforts in Flanders, the army which he was to command himſelf on the Upper Rhine, muſt be extremely weakened, and he ſhould be obliged to ſtand on the defenſive; yet at length, he conſented to part with ſeveral regiments, and, being ſatisfied with the laurels he had already gained, chearfully ſacrificed to the common cauſe the glory he might have reaped by acting offenſively. But though it was agreed that prince Eugene ſhould come into the Netherlands, yet it was induſtriouſly given out, that he was to act with a ſeparate body on the Moſelle, which obliged the enemy to ſend a conſiderable number of forces that way under the command of the duke of Berwick.

On the 29th of April N. S. prince Eugene ſet out for Leipſic, to confer with king Auguſtus, who was come thither on purpoſe, two days before, from Dreſden. On the prince's arrival he finiſhed his negociations in a few hours, and purſued his journey the next day to Vienna. The duke of Marlborough made no long ſtay after prince Eugene at Hanover; for he ſet out from thence the day after, and arrived the 3d of May at the Hague, where he communicated to the ſtates-general the reſult of the conferences held at Hanover; and having concerted with their high mightineſſes further meaſures for opening the campaign he went to Ghent, where having reviewed the Britiſh forces, he proceeded to Bruſſels[1]. The duke having conferred with veldt-marſhal d'Auverquerque, who, notwithſtanding his infirm ſtate of health, preſerved a vigorous mind, and ſeemed reſolved to die, like a hero, in the field, gave orders to the troops to march to Andernach near Bruſſels, where the Dutch, Pruſſians, and Hanoverians, began to form the army the 23d of May, N. S. The 26th they marched to Billingen, where the duke of Marlborough, took up his quarters in the abbey of that name; and the veldt-marſhal d'Auverquerque, fixed his at Hall, a little town which lay in the front of a little town, which lay in the front of the firſt line. The Britiſh forces repaired to his camp likewiſe with all poſſible expedition, as did alſo a conſiderable body of troops in the ſervice of the ſtates-general from their reſpective garriſons in Flanders: And, laſt of all, the field-deputy, of their high mightineſſes arrived there, who behaved themſelves this campaign with ſo much prudence and reſolution, that they contributed very much to the ſucceſs of it.

[1] Here the duke was honoured with a letter from the queen, dated May 6, by the manner of which, as the ducheſs of Marlborough obſerves in the Account of her Conduct, p. 255, her majeſty ſeemed ſtill to have retained a great degree of regard for Mr. Harley. After complaining to the duke of being ſo tired that day with importunities from the whigs, that ſhe had not ſpirits left to open her afflicted heart ſo freely and fully as ſhe intended, ſhe goes on to ſay, that ſhe was entirely of his opinion, thinking it neither for her honour nor intereſt to make ſteps (meaning the firſt ſteps) towards a peace, as the duke had been preſſed to do abroad; and aſſures him, that, whatever inſinuations her enemies might make to the contrary, ſhe would never give her conſent to a peace, but upon ſafe and honourable terms. She begs the duke to be ſo juſt to her, as not to let the miſrepreſentations made of her have any weight with him; adding, that it would be a greater trouble to her than could be expreſſed; and concludes with theſe words; 'I cannot end without begging you to be very careful of yourſelf, there being nobody, I am ſure, that prays more heartily than her, who will live and die moſt ſincerely yours, &c.'

Upon notice of theſe motions, the duke de Vendoſme aſſembled his army, on the 25th of May, between Mons and St. Ghiſtſlain, and took up his head quarters at St. Simpronien, from whence he marched the next day to Soignies, poſting his right at Naiſt, and his left at Canchie Notre Dame, within three leagues of the confederate camp. He was joined the ſame day by the duke of Burgundy, who had the chief (at leaſt titular) command of the army, together with the duke of Berry, his brother, and the pretender.

On the 29th of May, the confederate army, which conſiſted of a hundred and eighty ſquadrons of horſe, and a hundred and twelve battalions, made a motion from Bellinghen, advancing the right to Herſelingen, the left to Lembecy, and fixing the head-quarters at St. Renelle, in hopes of bringing the enemy to an engagement; which, by their bold march to Soignies, they ſeemed rather to ſeek than decline, being ſuperior, at leaſt, in number, to the allies; for their army conſiſted of a hundred and ninety-ſeven ſquadrons, and a hundred and twenty-four battalions. The ſame day the enemy received their heavy baggage from Mons, but ſent it back thither on the 31ſt, which ſtill gave the confederates hopes they ſhould come to an engagement; and thereupon the duke of Marlborough ordered the troops to be in readineſs to march at an hour's warning. The ſame evening the duke received intelligence, that the enemy's heavy baggage, having received a counter-order, was returned to the camp, and that they had foraged for two days; whence it was reaſonably concluded, that they would not march the next day, as the deſerters had reported. The duke of Marlborough, having adviſed with the other generals, reſolved to ſend the horſe to forage the next morning; and they went out, before break of day; but they had not been out an hour, before advice came, that the enemy had begun the night before, at ten, to ſend their heavy baggage to Mons, and decamped without any noiſe at eleven, marching towards Nivelle. The foragers were immediately recalled, and, to avoid all loſs of time, the infantry marched firſt of all about noon from St. Renelle, and were followed by the cavalry. About four they formed four columns, intending to encamp the right towards Anderlech, and the left to Lake; but upon further notice, that the enemy had not encamped at Nivelle, but had continued their march by Bois Signieur Iſaac to Braine la Leu, the duke judged, that they could not have any other deſign, than to poſt themſelves on the bank of the Deule, to hinder the allies from paſſing that river, and to ſeize Louvain; being the very ſame project, which the duke de Vendoſme had formed the laſt year, but miſcarried in it. To prevent the enemy, there was no other remedy, but to continue marching all night; ſo that, on the 3d of June, in the afternoon, the army of the allies arrived at the camp of Terbank, very much fatigued, as well by this long march as by the continual rains, which had fallen for four and twenty hours together. The French, having received intelligence of this expeditious march of the confederates, did not venture to advance farther than Genap, but encamped their right to that place, and their left to Braine la Leu. Upon which the duke of Marlborough took up his quarters in the abbey of Terbank, and Monſieur d'Auverquerque his in the ſuburbs of Louvain. On the 4th, ſeveral bridges were laid on the Deule, between Havre and Louvain, and, on the 5th, almoſt the whole confederate army foraged in the neighbourhood of their camp. The 6th being appointed by the duke as a day of thankſgiving for the paſt ſucceſſes of the arms of the allies, and to implore a bleſſing upon the preſent campaign, it was religiouſly obſerved throughout the whole army.

The enemy continuing quiet in their camp, the duke of Marlborough took that opportunity of reviewing his troops, which he began to do the ſeventh, and continued for eight or nine days following, when he had the ſatisfaction to find, that the reſpective bodies were all very complete, the men in the moſt excellent order, animated with their former victories; and eager to engage an enemy, that was deſpicable in their eyes. In this camp it was, that the electoral prince of Hanover (his preſent majeſty king George II.) came to the army, and was received with greateſt marks of reſpect and diſtinction by all the general officers.

It was now plain, that the enemy had no inclination to engage the confederates. They had indeed in view the recovery of the places they had loſt in the year 1706; but it was by their uſual method of ſurprize and treachery. Nor were their hopes altogether vain, for the elector of Bavaria, who had gained ſome intereſt in the provinces of the Netherlands, among people of all ranks, by his profuſeneſs and popular behaviour, with the aſſiſtance of count de Bergeyck, a perſon of great credit, and no leſs activity, and other friends of the houſe of Bourbon, eaſily found means to practiſe upon the levity and reſtleſs ſpirits of the chief inhabitants of the cities of Ghent[m], Bruges[n], and Antwerp, who promiſed to open their gates to the troops of France and Spain, as ſoon they could find a fair opportunity[o]. The truth was, the Dutch were ſevere maſters, and the Flandrians could not bear it. Though the French had laid heavier taxes on them, yet they uſed them better in all other reſpects. Their bigotry, being wrought on by their prieſts, diſpoſed them to change their maſters. The duke of Marlborough reſolved not to weaken his army by many garriſons; and therefore put none at all into Bruges, and a very weak one in the citadel of Ghent, reckoning, that there was no danger, as long as he lay between thoſe places and the French army. The two armies had lain about a month looking on one another, ſhifting their camps a little, but keeping ſtill in ſafe ground; the confederates, for their parts, being in expectation of prince Eugene's taking the field, with an army compoſed of Pruſſian and Heſſian troops, ten thouſand Palatines and ſome Imperialiſts. The motion of this body was retarded by ſeveral difficulties about the march of the Palatine forces; of which the French getting intelligence, they concluded, that the confederates would hardly venture to force them in the paſſes and defiles they were poſſeſſed of, and therefore commanded a detachment to march towards Ghent and Bruges, to ſurprize thoſe towns; which was effected in this manner:

On the 5th of July, N. S. a party of the enemy's troops commanded by the brigadiers la Faille and Paſteur, advanced before break of day towards Ghent, and, at the opening of the gates between five and ſix in the morning, half a dozen foot-ſoldiers, with two or three troopers, who were ſent before, pretending to be deſerters, were admitted into the town by the watch of burghers, who were no more in number than themſelves. When they were going to be carried to the main guard, ſome of them pretended a wearineſs, and ſetting themſelves down on the ground, deſired ſome brandy, to delay time; which being brought, they drank with the burghers, and, amuſed them with a ſtory of the march of the French army, and their own deſertion. Soon after an-

[m] Ghent is a vaſt large city and caſtle, one of the principal of the Low-countries, the marquiſate of the earldom of Flanders, and territory of Ghent, a biſhopric under the archbiſhop of Mechlin. It was ſurprized by, or rather betrayed to the French the beginning of this campaign; but beſieged and recovered by the duke of Marlborough towards the end of the year. It ſtands on the river Scheld and Lys (which divide it into twenty-ſix iſlands) twenty-ſeven miles almoſt ſouth-weſt of Antwerp, thirty north-weſt of Bruſſels, ninety-four almoſt ſouth of Amſterdam, and an hundred and fifty-four north-eaſt of Paris.

[n] Bruges is a fair, ſtrong, and noble city of the Low-countries, in the earldom of Flanders, the head of the territory of Bruges, a biſhopric under the archbiſhop of Mechlin. This town made its ſubmiſſion to the duke of Marlborough after the famous battle of Ramillies; the French ſurprized it, or rather had it betrayed to them the beginning of this campaign, but abandoned it upon the approach of the confederates, towards the end of December, the ſame year. It ſtands twenty-four miles north-weſt of Ghent, eleven eaſt of Oſtend, thirty-four north-eaſt of Dunkirk, and forty weſt of Antwerp.

[o] Dr. Hare, in his Thankſgiving-ſermon before the houſe of commons, on Thurſday, February 17, 1708-9, tells us, p. 11. 'That there was a conſpiracy to have all the Netherlands betrayed to the enemy by the intereſt of that unhappy prince, who has ſuffered ſo much in their cauſe. When we ſaw the ſons of France come into the field, we could not but ſuſpect there was ſomething more than ordinary in agitation. It was not enough to think they came to learn the art of war in an army, that aims at nothing but inaction, or to give courage to their troops, which their greateſt general had not been able to do, though fetched from Italy on purpoſe, at a time when he leaſt could have been ſpared; for the event has ſhewn, he brought no more courage with him than he left behind him; nor could it be expected, that their bare preſence ſhould make a ſtarved and naked army act with as much vigour, as if they had been warmly clothed and well paid. No, we were ſure it muſt be ſomething elſe they came for, not to gain any honour in the field, but to reap the mean glory of ſome ſucceſsful treachery, and ſo it proved. A deſign, we found, had been formed ſome time to ſurprize Antwerp; all was agreed, and every thing within a day or two ripe for execution, when the princes joined the army; but the plot, which was more than they knew, was then actually diſcovered; and this was a deſign of ſuch importance, we were inclined to think it was the whole they aimed at. But the ſequel ſhewed the treachery was deeper laid; and, while we were waiting the forces from the Rhine, another part of it ſucceeded better. Had both taken effect, what condition had our affairs been in? We had then, it is likely, without a blow loſt all the fruits of the Ramillies campaign; and the conſequence of that had been, not only putting the war two or three years back; it is more than probable the conſternation it would every where have raiſed, would have ſoon frightened the allies into an ill peace; or the ſucceſs of the Italian league, which then could not have miſcarried, might in another year have forced them to it.

other ſmall party of pretended deſerters came and entertained the watch with the like frivolous ſtories, till brigadier la Faille, who not long before had been high-bailiff of that city, and had ſtill a conſiderable intereſt there, coming in perſon, commanded the burghers, who guarded the gates, to lay down their arms, and admit the French troops. They began at firſt to make a ſhew of reſiſtance; but the pretended deſerters, riſing up at once, preſented their bayonets, and ſtopped them. Reſiſtance would now have been to little purpoſe; ſo the brigadier's commands being immediately obeyed, he left ſome of his men there, and with the reſt marched directly into the town. It being early, they only met with a few labourers in the ſtreets, ſome of whom took them for deſerters, and others they quieted with gold. In this manner they advanced to the gate of Bruges, which they ſeized with little or no reſiſtance, as they did likewiſe the bridge of Meuleſtede. In the mean time, Monſieur Grimaldi, who followed Monſieur de la Faille at a diſtance, entered the town likewiſe, and marched with the reſt of the detachment to the market-place. All the gates being ſoon after ſeized, about ten, Monſieur, de la Faille marched to the town-houſe, and having aſſembled the magiſtrates and chief burghers, he cauſed a pardon to be read to them, ſigned by the elector of Bavaria, and underneath by the count de Bergeyck; upon which they readily ſubmitted.

The enemy, being thus become maſters of the town, ſummoned the governor of the caſtle to ſurrender; but Monſieur de Labene, major of ſir Richard Temple's regiment of foot, who commanded in that fortreſs with about three hundred men, expecting either to be reinforced by major-general Murray, or relieved by the approach of the confederate army, anſwered, "That he would defend it to the laſt extremity." The French began to prepare for attacking the caſtle; and major-general Murray, who was poſted at Marienkirk, with two Engliſh regiments of foot, and one of Spaniſh dragoons, in vain attempted to throw a reinforcement into the place. Major Labene, having been ſummoned a ſecond time, and being wholly unprovided for defence againſt ſo powerful an army, obtained an honourable capitulation.

Some hours after the enemy had ſurprized Ghent, count de la Motte appeared with a ſtrong detachment before Bruges, which ſurrendered the next day, without making the leaſt reſiſtance, or putting the enemy to the trouble of firing more than three pieces of cannon. There was indeed a ſort of capitulation agreed upon, in which the Sieur Briel, receiver of the contributions, and Mr. Volmar, his comptroller, were included; but it appeared by every circumſtance, that this was a thing of form only, and that the articles had been long before ſettled by other perſons than they that pretended to grant and accept them.

This done, count de la Motte marched immediately to Damme, hoping to meet with the ſame ſucceſs there; but as this place was fortified and garriſoned, the governor opened the ſluices, and put the whole under water, which obliged the count to retire. From thence he marched to Plaſſendahl, a little fort on the canal, which leads from Bruges to Oſtend, and is a ſecurity to the communication of thoſe two places. The officer, who commanded it, refuſed to ſurrender; upon which the count attacked and took it ſword in hand.

Major-general Murray, having found it impoſſible to reinforce the caſtle of Ghent, retired to Sas van Ghent, where he found the deputies of the ſtates-general for the affairs of Flanders, and concerted with them the neceſſary meaſures for putting the frontiers in a poſture of defence, and ſecuring thoſe poſts which were moſt expoſed.

The duke of Marlborough, who was yet in camp at Terbank received advice, that a conſiderable detachment was marched towards Tubize, and in the night, that their whole army had followed at nine in the evening. The duke gave immediate orders for the confederate army to be in readineſs to march. Accordingly, about three in the morning, the 5th of July, they marched from the camp at Terbank, paſſed the canal in four columns, and encamped with the left at Anderlech, and the right at the mill of Tomberg. Here the duke got intelligence of the enemy's deſign on Ghent, and that the detachment they had made for that end was advanced as far as Aloſt, and had broken down the bridge over the Dender: He thereupon ordered major-general Bothmar, with four regiments of horſe and dragoons, to paſs over at Dendermond, in order to obſerve the enemy, and to prevent their deſign upon Ghent; but he came too late.

The ſame day the French paſſed the Senne at Hall and Tubize, and were paſſing at the mill of Goicke till night, within a league of the right wing of the allies; which coming very late into the camp, and the army having made a very long march through difficult ways, it was not thought practicable to attack the enemy that night. However, the greateſt part of the horſe and foot having been brought to the right during the night, in order to engage the enemy, the whole army was formed the next morning early in order of battle; but their deſign was fruſtrated by the French, who were employed the whole night, with all poſſible expedition, in paſſing the Dender through the town of Ninove, and over ſeveral bridges built near that place for the ſame purpoſe; ſo that the detachment, ſent to attack the rear-guard, came too late to find any thing but their ſmall baggage, which was attended by a ſtrong guard. Theſe major-general Schulemberg and ſir Richard Temple, with ten ſquadrons and five batallions, ſupported by major-general de Veyne, with ten ſquadrons more, ſoon defeated, put them to flight, and took a great deal of baggage.

The confederate army encamped the ſame night at Aſche, where prince Eugene of Savoy, having made a quick march from the Moſelle, and left his cavalry at Maeſtricht, reſolving to be preſent as ſoon as poſſible, at whatever action might happen, though his troops ſhould not come up in time, arrived that evening with major-general Cadogan, whom the duke of Marlborough had ſent to attend him. The arrival of prince Eugene, and the approach of his troops, not only revived the ſpirits of the ſoldiers, but was very acceptable to the generals themſelves, after the ungrateful news they had received that very day of the French having ſurprized Ghent. The duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene, from the very moment they met, acted with the moſt perfect unanimity. The next day a council of war was held, in which it was reſolved to regulate the march of the army according to the motions of the enemy; and the pioneers were ſent on every ſide to make ways; the reſolution, which the duke had before taken of bringing the enemy, if poſſible, to an engagement, being again confirmed. And ſo eager were the generals for it, that it was determined, if a fair opportunity offered, not to wait the arrival of the Imperial troops. In the afternoon prince Eugene went to Bruſſels to pay a viſit to his mother, the counteſs of Soiſſons; and the day following the duke of Marlborough being much indiſpoſed and feveriſh, the orders were given at Monſieur Auverquerque's quarters; and, according to theſe orders, four battalions marched to reinforce the garriſon of Bruſſels, and eight battalions were ordered, with major-general Cadogan, and the quarter-maſters, to make the ways.

The ſmall advantage, which the enemy had in ſurpriſing Ghent, proved the occaſion of their own much greater loſs; and the governor of that caſtle not delivering it, till the 8th of July, had this good effect, that it amuſed the enemy two or three days in their camp from above Aloſt to Schilebille on the Scheld. This delay proved fatal to them; for the French generals receiving intelligence, that prince Eugene was bringing a reinforcement of about thirty thouſand men, with all expedition, from Germany into Brabant, bethought themſelves of retiring towards their lines and ſtrong towns, before the conjunction of the confederate troops, in hopes, that being reinforced with a good body of troops, which were coming to join them from Alſace (though not with ſuch ſpeed as the Germans, who were remarkably expeditious on this occaſion beyond their uſual cuſtom) under the command of the duke of Berwick, they might afterwards be a match for the confederates, or, at leaſt, might preſerve their late eaſy conqueſts. They likewiſe imagined, that they might ſurprize or reduce Oudenard, the only paſs the allies had on the Scheld, ſince the taking of Ghent, before the allies could be in any readineſs to prevent it; and to this end, count de Chemerault having broke down all the bridges on the Scheld, and intimidated all the leſſer places in thoſe parts, they cauſed Oudenard[p] to be inveſted on the 9th of July early, and intended to have taken poſſeſſion of the advantageous camp of Leſſines.

Monſieur de Sigterman, who commanded in Oudenard, fearing that the inhabitants might be treacherous, as it was ſuſpected it had been in other places, immediately called a council of war, to conſider of means how to keep them within the limits of their duty, if they ſhould be otherwiſe inclined. It was reſolved to defend the place to the laſt extremity, and to declare to the townſmen, that it was hoped they would contribute all that lay in their power to that end; but that, if they offered to make the leaſt attempt towards ſurrendering the place, they would ſet fire to it in every part, and reduce it to a heap of aſhes. The inhabitants made all poſſible proteſtations of their fidelity, and aſſiſted the governor in putting the town in the beſt poſture of defence.

[p] Oudenard is a rich and very ſtrong town of the Low-countries, in the earldom of Flanders, the marquiſate of the territory of Oudenard: It ſurrendered to the duke of Marlborough in 1706. The French laid ſiege to it in the beginning of this campaign; but the approach of the confederate army made them abandon the place, and engaged them in a battle near it, which proved a fatal overthrow to them. It ſtands on the river Scheld, thirteen miles ſouth of Ghent, thirteen north-weſt of Aeth, thirty-ſix weſt of Bruſſels, and thirty-ſeven almoſt north of Mons.

The duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene, having either information or ſuſpicion of the enemy's deſign, ordered brigadier Chanclos to throw himſelf into Oudenard, with ſeven hundred men, detached from Aeth, Courtray, and Mening, and Walef's dragoons, which was performed accordingly. This proved a great diſappointment to the enemy; for, if they could have ſecured this place, they would have cut off the communication of the allies with Mening and Courtray.

The ſame day Oudenard was inveſted, the confederate army (which was encamped at Aſche) marched in four columns, the earl of Albemarle being left, with all the grenadiers of the army, and thirty ſquadrons, to make the rear-guard, in caſe the enemy ſhould have made any motion towards Bruſſels. The ways being in good repair, the army marched with the greateſt expedition, and advanced as far as Herſelingen, above five leagues from Aſche, before eleven in the morning. Here the duke of Marlborough gave orders for the army to pitch their tents, fronting towards the enemy; who being far from expecting, that the confederate army could poſſibly make ſo ſwift a march, did not meet the general till three in the afternoon, thinking themſelves ſure of the camp of Leſſines, in order to cover the ſiege of Oudenard, for which they had their artillery ready at Tournay. Prince Eugene having rejoined the army at Herſelingen, the duke of Marlborough detached major-general Cadogan about four in the afternoon, with eight ſquadrons, and as many battalions, to take poſſeſſion of the camp of Leſſines. Accordingly, eight hundred men of this detachment entered the town of that name, about midnight; and the reſt having paſſed through, at four in the morning, poſted themſelves on this ſide the river Dender. On the other hand, the retreat, which was the ſignal for ſtriking the tents, being beat at ſeven, the evening before, in the camp at Herſelingen, the whole army marched immediately, and, moving on all night, began, the 10th, about eleven in the morning, to paſs the Dender over the bridges laid by major-general Cadogan, and continued their march to the camp of Leſſines, on the other ſide; the chief ſtrength whereof conſiſts in the rivulet, which falls below it into the Dender. The enemy, perceiving themſelves diſappointed of this camp, altered their march towards Gavre, in order to paſs the Scheld there.

The 11th in the morning, upon intelligence, that the enemy had quitted Gudenard, and were purſued by brigadier Chanclos with Walef's dragoons, Cadogan was ſent with ſixteen battalions and eight ſquadrons to make the ways and bridges at Oudenard. The army began to march at eight o'clock by the left, ſtill in four columns, as they had encamped; and after the news came, that the enemy were ſtill paſſing at Gavre, the Duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene reſolved to endeavour to bring them to an engagement. In order to this, the army continued their march with ſuch ſpeed and diligence, that, at two in the afternoon, the front was at the bridges, over which Cadogan's ſixteen battalions were then paſſing. Eight ſquadrons, and part of the former detachment, with the quarter-maſters, and major-general Rantzaw at the head of them, were poſted behind a rivulet that runs into the Scheld, where they obſerved, that the French army were partly marching, and partly drawn up in order of battle. They took notice likewiſe that the enemy had thrown ſeven battalions into the village of Heynem (which is ſituated on the banks of the Scheld) and the neighbouring plains, which confronted that ſmall village, were filled with the troops of the houſhold, who were drawn up exactly oppoſite to the eight ſquadrons under major-general Rantzaw, no obſtacle but a ſmall rivulet dividing them. Behind the village were moraſſes, woods, and defiles; ſo that an army had no other way to march, but through the high-road. This diſpoſition of the French made it uncertain, whether their real deſign was to hinder the duke of Marlborough's paſſing the Scheld, or to gain their own lines between Liſle and Tournay, which they thought they might eaſily have done, not imagining, that ſo conſiderable a body, as that of the confederates, could march five leagues in a cloſe country abounding in paſſes and defiles, have their roads levelled, croſs a great river, and make an attack upon them the ſame day.

The deſign of the duke de Vendoſme in placing the ſeven battalions in the village of Heynem, and the ſquadrons, which the confederates had diſcovered on the plain, which were to the number of twelve, was to have advanced towards the bridge, over which the allies were paſſing, to a certain diſtance, in order to have waited there till half their troops were paſſed, and then to have attacked them with all the advantage which his ſuperiority of number could have given him, not doubting but he ſhould eaſily have defeated them, before the other half of their army could come to their aſſiſtance. It was with this intent, theſe troops were advanced, and the duke would ſoon have followed with the whole army; but the duke of Burgundy did not approve of this project. He had all along ſhewed an inclination to retire towards Ghent; and this propenſity appeared now ſtronger than ever; he ordered the troops to ſtop ſhort in their march at Gavre in the perplexity, not knowing which way to move. He even recalled the ſquadrons, which were in the plain, and prepared to retire; and to this the French attribute their misfortune, which enſued.

It would have been eaſy for the French, either to have cut off the detachment of the allies, which had advanced and laid Bridges over the Scheld, or, at leaſt, to have deſtroyed thoſe bridges, before the whole confederate army could come up; and if then they had ſupported their left at Heynem, poſted their horſe behind the caſtle of Beveren, towards the mill of Oycke, and placed their centre on the height between Wertigem and Heurne, they would undoubtedly have had all the advantage, which the moſt difficult ground could give; and perhaps the choice would have been on their ſide, whether to engage in a general action, or not. But the dukes of Burgundy and Vendoſme, who had been at variance for ſome days before, what courſe they ſhould take, ſtill differed in their opinions, and were both yet ſtrangely at a loſs, what meaſures they ſhould reſolve upon, and what diſpoſitions to make. This irreſolution laſted till three in the afternoon, when moſt of the young commanders in the French army, to make their court to the duke of Burgundy, contradicted all that was adviſed by the duke of Vendoſme, and declared loudly for an engagement, which in a great meaſure determined the duke of Burgundy; and the duke of Vendoſme was obliged to ſubmit.

Major-general Grimaldi was therefore ordered by the duke of Burgundy, with the horſe of the king's houſhold, to begin the attack on the right, and diſlodge major-general Rantzaw from the eminence, on which he was poſted; but when they came to the rivulet, and found it marſhy, they were diſcouraged from attempting the paſſage, and retired towards their own right, though their army had twelve thouſand men more in number than the confederates, and ſeveral other advantages. This attack the duke of Vendoſme diſapproved of; and therefore ſent Monſieur Jennet, his aid de camp to the left, to attack the allies on that ſide. But the duke of Burgundy countermanded it, upon information, as it was ſaid, that there was an unpaſſible moraſs on that ſide; which, however, the duke of Vendoſme had paſſed over but an hour before. Upon this Cadogan, who had paſſed the river with twelve of his ſixteen battalions between three and four o'clock, attacked the village of Heynem, with ſuch reſolution (brigadier Sabine, with his brigade, being at the head) that they ſoon made themſelves maſters of it, and took three of the ſeven battalians entire, making many of the officers and private men priſoners that belonged to the other four. Immediately after, major-general Rantzaw, with the eight ſquadrons, and the quarter-maſters, paſſed the rivulet, and advanced into the plain, where the French horſe had been drawn up, between the villages of Singhem and Mullen. Several of the ſquadrons of their rear-guard being ſtill paſſing through the plain, the eight ſquadrons with the quarter-maſters attacked them with great vigour, and drove them into the cloſe ground and the highway, which led into the march of their own army.

Here it was, the electoral prince of Hanover, his preſent majeſty of Great Britain, gave diſtinguiſhing proofs of his early valour. He charged, ſword in hand, at the head of a ſquadron of his father's dragoons: His horſe was ſhot under him, and colonel Luſchky, who commanded the ſquadron, was killed fighting bravely by him. Lieutenant-general Schulemberg, and ſeveral other volunteers, behaved with great reſolution, and led up the ſquadrons. The French regiment of la Bretche, and ſeveral other regiments, were entirely broken; and the colonel himſelf, being dangerouſly wounded, was taken, together with a great many other officers, and twelve ſtandards and kettle-drums. The confederate army continued, in the mean time, to paſs the bridges with all imaginable diligence. The Pruſſian horſe formed themſelves upon the right in the ſame plain, where the advanced guard was; and the reſt of the horſe, as they paſſed, followed the Pruſſians through the village of Heurne, into the plain; but the foot, becauſe of the length of the march, came later to the bridges; ſo that none but the ſixteen battalions were there till five o'clock.

The duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene being at the head of the horſe, which were forming in the plain, and obſerving the great want there was of infantry, ſent orders to the foot, which had been employed in attacking the village, to leave their poſt, and throw themſelves into the hedges on the plain, whether the enemy ſeemed to be marching with great diligence. On that ſide of the plain were no more than two battalions of major-general Collier's and brigadier Grunkau's; which were attacked with great fury; but they maintained their poſt with equal bravery, till more foot came up to their aſſiſtance. The duke of Marlborough ſent repeated orders to the foot, to preſs their march, the enemy being then forming, and ready to attack the infantry, which was already there, with very unequal numbers. In the interim, the duke of Argyle arrived with twenty battalions, which were ſcarce poſted, when the French attacked them very briſkly, and drove ſome Pruſſian battalions from their poſts; but notwithſtanding the inequality of numbers, about ſix in the evening, they retook it ſword in hand. By this time count Lottum was coming up, to ſuſtain this attack with the remainder of the foot of the right; and the duke perceiving, that the great ſtreſs of the battle would lie on the right, ſent to the left for twenty battalions. The left wing arrived ſomething later than the right, and having paſſed their horſe through Oudenard, and their foot on bridges below the town, had formed themſelves in two lines, with the village of Moreghem behind them.

The ſucceſs, which the confederates had already obtained in the ſeveral engagements near the villages of Heynem, Mullem, and Heurne, made the French generals ſenſible, they ſhould ſoon be attacked on all ſides. They therefore found themſelves under a neceſſity of making a ſtand; to which end, they poſted their foot very advantageouſly before the villages of Wanigen, Lede, and Huyze, having in their front ſeveral defiles, fenced with incloſures of hedges, ditches, or thickets, and placed moſt of their cavalry on their right, near the villages of Oyke and Wirtigen.

As ſoon as the confederate foot arrived, they formed themſelves in two lines before the horſe, and then attacked, in very good order, the incloſures and villages in their front, where the French were poſted; ſo that about ſeven o'clock the fire grew general, both on the right and on the left; and, though the enemy gave way in moſt places, yet, being ſuſtained with freſh troops, the action was maintained very obſtinately a good while after.

There was before the left of the left wing a kind of opening, through which run a road, that led into the plain, on the top of the hill, and which the prince of Orange-Naſſau, at the head of the Dutch foot, cleared with great vigour and reſolution. At the ſame time the duke of Marlborough diſpatched orders to the veldt-marſhal d'Auverquerque and the count de Tilly, who were on the top of the hill near Oycke, to preſs the enemy as much as poſſible on that ſide. Theſe orders were punctually obeyed; and Auverquerque ordered major general Weeck to march with the brigades of Waſſenaer and Oudenburgh; which being ſupported by count Tilly with the Daniſh cavalry under his command, paſſed through a narrow defile into a field where all the French houſhold were drawn up.

The confederate troops no ſooner approached, than the French, who did not in the leaſt apprehend being attacked on that ſide, retired, and endeavoured to ſhelter themſelves under the hedges between Wirtigem and the caſtle of Beveren towards the main body of their army, where the fire was very hot; but the prince of Orange-Naſſau, with count Oxenſtiern, coming up with four brigades of infantry, led them on with great gallantry, paſſed ſome defiles, attacked the enemy in flank, and obliged them to give way. Thoſe, who were thus retiring, were forced back into the incloſures in great diſorder; and it growing dark, many battalions and more ſquadrons being in the utmoſt confuſion, ſome were cut in pieces, and others deſired to capitulate for their whole regiments.

While this happened on the left, the duke of Marlborough, who till then had been the whole time in company with prince Eugene, viſiting the field of battle, leading on, poſting, and ranging the reſpective bodies of troops; but thinking now it would be more advantageous to ſeparate, and direct in different places, arrived there, having left the care of the right to prince Eugene, who ſhewed great ſatisfaction in leading on the Engliſh troops, whom he ſaw perform wonders; ſo that at laſt the enemy finding themſelves charged and borne down on all ſides by the confederate forces, retired in the utmoſt confuſion, leaving great numbers of priſoners behind them. Their dragoons favoured their retreat, and, to ſave the troops of the houſhold, received ſeveral diſcharges from the confederate infantry, and were moſt of them either killed or taken.

Night coming on, and the fire being directed ſo many ways at once, that it was impoſſible to diſtinguiſh friends from enemies, the confederate generals gave poſitive orders to their troops to give over firing, and to let the routed enemy eſcape, rather than to venture putting themſelves into diſorder. This put an end to the ſlaughter, and ſaved the remainder of the enemy's army; for, had there been but two hours more of day-light, in all probability their whole body of foot, and their right wing of horſe, would have been entirely cut off, they being ſurrounded almoſt on every ſide.

During this memorable action, the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene gave their orders with ſo much compoſedneſs of mind and clearneſs of judgment, as ſeemed peculiar to theſe two great men. The expoſed their perſons to the greateſt dangers, when neceſſity required it; and yet had both the good fortune to eſcape unhurt. The electoral prince of Hanover had alſo a great ſhare in the glory of the day. At the head of his father's cavalry, he charged the celebrated troops of the French king's houſhold, bearing down all that oppoſed his career. The young prince of Orange-Naſſau, ſtadtholder of Friſeland, and father of the preſent prince of Orange, diſtinguiſhed himſelf likewiſe by his martial ardour, bravery, and conduct. The brave veldt-marſhal d'Auverquerque, though worn out with the fatigues of above thirty campaigns, and in a languiſhing condition, exerted his expiring vigour, and was on horſe back at the head of his troops in the hotteſt of the fire. Count Tilly, the prince of Wirtemberg, lieutenant-generals Rantzaw and Nutzmer, major-generals Webb and Cadogan, brigadier Sabine, and, in ſhort all the generals and officers animated the ſoldiers every where by their own example.

The different troops, of which the confederate army conſiſted, fought with ſuch emulation of each other, that it was difficult to determine, which deſerved the greateſt applauſe; yet it was obſerved, that the Pruſſian Gens d'Armes ſignalized themſelves in ſeveral vigorous charges, which they made and ſuſtained againſt the French cavalry, in which they loſt near half of their number.

If we may believe ſome of the French writers, the dukes of Burgundy and Berry and the pretender had a great ſhare in this battle; but if the Dutch accounts are to be credited, they, or at leaſt the two latter, only beheld the engagement from the ſteeple of an adjacent village, and conſulted their ſafety by a timely retreat. As for the other generals of the enemy's army, they committed ſeveral groſs errors, as well before as during the action, either for want of unanimity or judgment: But, for their troops, it muſt be acknowledged, that, in general, they fought better at this time than they had upon any other occaſion.

The French endeavoured by their partial relations to palliate their defeat, and make a drawn battle of it[q]; for which they had the only pretence of having ſaved their baggage. Now that could not be otherwiſe, ſince they left it behind them, as they did likewiſe their artillery, having only made uſe of four or five pieces of canon during the whole action. But the field, where the battle was fought, of which the confederates remained maſters, with ſix or ſeven hundred of the enemy's officers, and about ſeven thouſand private ſoldiers, who were made priſoners, together with ten kettle-drums, and above one hundred ſtandards and colours taken, were all evidences of an indiſputable victory on the ſide of the confederates.

The enemy retired in the night, by the road which leads through the village of Huyſe from Oudenard to Ghent. The duke of Vendoſme propoſed to the duke of Burgundy, that they ſhould halt, in order to form their troops, and give their march, at leaſt, the air of a retreat; but his advice was

[q] All that father Daniel ſays of it is in theſe words: 'Prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough being arrived at Oudenard by long marches, they paſſed the Scheld with their army, which they drew up in order. The French army arriving there at the ſame time, in order of battle, gave the charge. The onſet was furious, and laſted from four in the evening till night came on, which put an end to the fight. The army of France retired towards Ghent: The left, which made the rear-guard, remained upon the field of battle till it was broad day, and then marched off in good order, under the conduct of the chevalier du Rozel, lieutenant-general, who attacked them, not being able to do them any miſchief.' The marquis de Feuquieres, in his memoirs, obſerves thus: 'Since we made no diſpoſitions for the encounter, our loſs of men, though very great, is not to be conſidered as a deciſive event: And indeed the confuſion, as well as the extraordinary loſs, happened in the retreat we made in the night, when the troops were neither ſenſible where they fled, nor by whom they were conducted. In a word, the diſpoſitions for their engagements, and the motives which induced us to undertake it, ought never to be repeated in any future conjuncture.'

unregarded; for, of all the general officers preſent, only the count d'Evreux was of his ſentiment. Obſerving therefore, that nothing was to be done with men terrified out of their ſenſes, he gave the word for a retreat, which was no ſooner done, than the generals, as well as private men, threw themſelves into the road of Ghent with the utmoſt precipitation. The duke of Vendoſme looked with grief and ſhame on this ſcandalous behaviour: Finding, however, twenty-five ſquadrons, of his beſt troops, and about the ſame number of battalions unbroken, he formed with theſe a rear-guard, and ſo preſerved the army from a ſecond defeat, which would certainly have proved more fatal than the firſt.

The confederates, in the mean time, continued under arms, hoping to renew the engagement again the next morning, and impatient, in the mean time, for day, that they might have a true information how far this victory had extended, of which the darkneſs of the night left them in ignorance. To this end, as ſoon as it was light, the duke of Marlborough ordered forty ſquadrons from the right, commanded by the lieutenant-generals Bulau and Lumley, with conſiderable body of foot, to follow and attack the enemy's rear guard, which they did with great vigour. But ſeveral companies of French grenadiers, being advantageouſly poſted along the highway leading to Ghent, killed and wounded ſeveral of the officers and private men of the confederates, and obliged them to leave off the purſuit, there being but one road, ſecured by hedges and ditches, lined with the enemy's grenadiers; but no place for the confederate cavalry to form themſelves in. On this occaſion ſeveral officers of the grenadiers, commanded by Major Erwin, were killed or wounded; and general Meredith received a ſhot in the cheek; but the enemy on their ſide, were much greater ſufferers. The regiment of Riſburg, which cloſed their rear, was entirely ruined, and two whole companies taken priſoners; as was likewiſe brigadier Pourienne, who commanded the hindermoſt brigade, with ſeveral other officers.

As to the killed and wounded on either ſide, the allies reckoned among the ſlain major-general Berenſdorf; the colonels Adercaſz and Bolzen, count Rantzaw, and ſir John Matthews, with captain Dean of the Britiſh guards, and about eight hundred private men; and, among the wounded, lieutenant-general Natzmer, major-generals Gaudecker and Berner; the colonels Groves, Pennyfeather, and four others; a hundred and ſixty other officers, and about two thouſand private ſoldiers; which loſs was abundantly repaired by deſerters and priſoners, Germans, Swiſs, and Savoyards, who liſted themſelves voluntarily in the ſervice of the allies. The French endeavoured to conceal their loſs with all poſſible induſtry; but that it was much greater than that of the allies, is evident from ſeveral very authentic accounts[r]; from which it appears, that the number of priſoners taken from

High and mighty lords,

By reaſon of the ſhortneſs of time, we could only let your high mightineſſes know yeſterday, that we engaged the enemy about four in the afternoon. Wherefore we give ourſelves the honour of ſending your high-mightineſſes farther advice, that our army, having marched on Sunday night from Aſche, took the rout of Leſſines, in order to paſs the Dender at that place, without oppoſition from the enemy, whom we had prevented by a ſudden march; and, arriving there on Tueſday evening, we underſtood, that the enemy were marched from Aloſt towards Gavre, where they cauſed bridges to be made, in order to paſs the Scheld; which made us believe they deſigned to poſt themſelves upon the height of Oudenard, and hinder us from paſſing the Scheld. And, though our army was very much fatigued by the foregoing march, yet we reſolved to proceed on our march yeſterday, and, if poſſible, to prevent the enemy. We detached therefore ſixteen battalions in the night, to take poſt on the other ſide of the Scheld near Oudenard, and to lay the bridges neceſſary for our paſſage. Yeſterday morning about nine we received advice, that the enemy had paſſed the Scheld, and were marching towards Oudenard, which made us haſten our march as much as poſſible, for fear our detachment, that was ſent over, ſhould be defeated, and ourſelves prevented in our deſign of paſſing the Scheld. But, by that time the enemy were come near Oudenard, they ſaw we had already taken poſt over the Scheld, which made them reſolve to ſtrike off to the right; but, to cover their march againſt ours, they thought fit to throw troops into the hedges and into a village upon the Scheld below Oudenard. About three in the afternoon, as ſoon as our foot began to come up, it was judged adviſable to attack the village, and thereby oblige the enemy to go no farther, but ſtop their march. This attack was made with ſo much vigour and ſucceſs that the enemy were immediately driven out of the village, our men falling upon them with their bayonets on the muzzels of their muſkets, and not firing a piece; ſo that they preſently threw down their arms, and a whole brigade, together with a brigadier, ſurrendered priſoners. The few horſe, that had paſſed with the detachment, attacked likewiſe the French ſquadrons poſted behind the village with ſo much ſucceſs, that they were put into diſorder and puſhed, our men taking from them eight or ten ſtandards and ſome horſes. Hereupon the enemy were forced to face about to us, and form themſelves about four o'clock, when, moſt of our foot being over, and formed, the general engagement began, firſt on the right, and afterwards on the left wing. The fight was properly between the foot, and was obſtinate; but our men got ground, and drove the enemy from one hedge to another, till night put an end to the combat. The horſe, who, by reaſon of the broken ground, could not act, were detached to the right and the left wing, and advanced ſo far, that they attacked the enemy in flank and rear; which, when they perceived, they fell in the night into the utmoſt confuſion; and part of them retired, with their baggage and artillery, towards Ghent and Deynſe; another part towards the road of Courtray; and, according to computation, ſix or ſeven thouſand ſurrendered themſelves priſoners, with the three or four hundred officers at their head; among whom are ſeveral dukes and general officers. Had not the night come to their aſſiſtance, we believe they would have ſaved very little of their army. We therefore congratulate your high-mightineſſes upon this complete victory, which God Almighty has ſo graciouſly vouchſafed, and which gives us an opportunity, with this victorious army, and that of prince Eugene, who was preſent at this action, to extend the frontiers further, and bring the enemy to reaſon. Each general made ſo good a diſpoſition, and every regiment attacked the enemy ſo well, and with ſo much intrepidity, that it was impoſſible for any one to diſtinguiſh themſelves in a particular manner. Our loſs, God be thanked, is ſo ſmall, that there is not, as we know of, one regiment out of a condition to make the reſt of the campaign. Among the horſe our loſs is nothing at all. Nor do we yet know that we have loſt any head officer of the ſtate. With which, high and mighty lords, &c.

Velt-marſhal d'Auverquerque's letter to the Greffier Fagel.

On Monday laſt, at ſeven o'clock, we broke up (as I have already had the honour to acquaint your lordſhip) with the army from Herſelinghen near Enghien. We marched the whole night, and the next day paſſed the Dender at and above Leſſines. Yeſterday morning we marched again from Leſſines towards Oudenard, where we arrived about noon. We had received intelligence, that the army broke up on Tueſday from the neighbourhood of Aloſt, and were encamped at Gavre, and that they had alſo paſſed the Scheld yeſterday at that place; which indeed we found to be true, perceiving, upon our arrival at Oudenard, the enemy upon a full march towards Tournay. We laid the bridges over the Scheld in their ſight, and our troops paſſed the river with an unſpeakable ſpeed and courage. About two o'clock the greateſt part of our army had paſſed, with which the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene formed the right wing near Broan-caſtle, about half a league from the town, and began to engage the enemy in a battle. In the mean time I marched likewiſe with the troops of the ſtates, which compoſed the left wing, in order to attack the enemy, which I did about five o'clock, having been obliged to make a great round to come at them: And God has been pleaſed ſo to bleſs the arms of the high allies, that we have entirely beaten the enemy, and forced them to retire in great confuſion, ſome toward Courtray, and others towards Ghent.

I give myſelf the honour to congratulate their high-mightineſſes upon this important victory. We ſhall endeavour all we can to make our advantage of it. The enemy will have much ado to bring their army into the field again this year in a good condition. The loſs of the ſlain on their ſide is very conſiderable, beſides a good number of officers (ſome of them of diſtinction) and common ſoldiers, priſoners. We have alſo taken ſeveral ſtandards and colours, of which I will ſend their high-mightineſſes a liſt by the next courier.

The bravery and wiſe conduct of the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene cannot be enough commended, nor the zeal and courage of the other generals of the ſtates, who did all which their duty and regard for the ſervice required of them. All the officers and troops, without diſtinction, did all that could be expected from brave men and good ſoldiers. We ſent out a body of horſe and foot this morning to purſue the run-away enemy, and ſcatter them yet more, but they were got too far off by the favour of the night. I remain

Your lordſhip's
Humble and obedient ſervant,

Mr. Cardonnel's letter to Mr. Cole at Venice.

Sir, Camp at Oudenard, July 12, 1708.

As ſoon as the enemy had an account, that our army had paſſed the Dender at Leſſines, they recalled their troops that were come to inveſt Oudenard, and marched with their whole army to Gavre, where they began to paſs the Scheld yeſterday morning, and continued paſſing till about four in the afternoon. And as my lord duke was reſolved to purſue them, in order to engage them to a battle, major-general Cadogan was ſent away very early with a ſtrong detachment, to paſs the ſame river through this town, and to make bridges for the whole army, which followed with all poſſible diligence, to prevent the enemy's paſſing the Lys, or their retreat towards the lines. Accordingly, about three in the afternoon, the detachment, with the head of our army, began to attack the enemy in their march; and, in a little time, brigadier Sabine, at the head of his brigade, beat ſeven of the enemy's battalions, of whom he killed a great number, and took moſt of the reſt priſoners. The enemy then formed their line, and the battle began about five, and laſted with great firmneſs till near ten at night, it being chiefly the foot that were engaged, the enemy ſtill retiring; ſo that, beſides a great ſlaughter, we made a great number of priſoners. We cannot yet give the particulars of this great victory; but ſome thouſands of priſoners, and, among them ſome general officers are already brought into town. Forty ſquadrons of horſe, with twenty battalions of foot, are in purſuit of the reſt of their army, which is retiring towards Ghent. My lord duke, with the prince of Savoy, and Monſieur d'Auverquerque, continued on horſe-back the whole night, to animate our troops, and to give the neceſſary orders for the purſuit.

I am, &c.
H. CARDONNEL.

P. S. Since the writing of this, we have an account of about ſix thouſand priſoners brought into the town, beſides near five hundred officers, of which ſeveral the enemy amounted to ſeven thouſand men, among whom were two lieutenant-generals, two major-generals, five brigadiers, about thirty colonels, above a hundred officers of the ſtate-major, and four hundred ſubalterns, together with ſeventy or eighty ſtandards or colours. The largeſt liſt, on the ſide of the allies, make the loſs of the enemy to be nine thouſand eight hundred priſoners, officers included; four thouſand two hundred killed and wounded; two thouſand four hundred deſerted; in all nineteen thouſand four hundred: Taken beſides, ten pieces of cannon, fifty-ſix pair of colours, fifty-two ſtandards, eight pair of kettle drums, four thouſand five hundred horſes. On the other hand, the loweſt computation amounts together to fourteen thouſand ſeven hundred killed, wounded, and taken priſoners, without mentioning deſerters; and the loweſt calculation, given by the French themſelves, allows their loſs to have been above ten thouſand men.

The dukes of Burgundy and Berry, with the pretender, reached Ghent the morning after the battle, by five o'clock; and about nine, the duke of Vendoſme, who brought up the rear, arrived there alſo. As they were apprehenſive of being purſued by the whole confederate army, the duke immediately commanded his troops to march through Ghent to Lovendegen, on the canal not far from that city; where, for their greater ſecurity, they caſt up entrenchments, and planted upon them their artillery, which they had left at Gavre with their heavy baggage. In this camp they recovered themſelves out of their firſt conſternation; but the former miſunderſtandings revived among their generals, eſpecially, between the dukes of Burgundy and Vendoſme who, notwithſtanding the interpoſition of the court could never be brought to a reconciliation [s].

While the French were entrenching themſelves behind the canal between Ghent and Bruges, the confederate troops being returned to their camp (which was the field of battle) they reſted two days. Mean time the duke of Marlborough, prince Eugene, Monſieur Auverquerque and the ſtates deputies, debated in a council of war, how they might beſt improve their late ſucceſs. The reſult was, that the duke of Marlborough's army ſhould immediately march to Menin, paſs the Lys, level the French lines between Ypres and Warneton, and hinder any detachment from getting into Ypres, or the French army from retiring that way; and that prince Eugene, with a detachment of the grand army, ſhould march, at the ſame time, towards Bruſſels, to aſſemble his forces, obſerve the motions of the duke of Berwick, and hinder likewiſe the enemy's army near Ghent, from retreating through Brabant the ſame way they came. According to theſe reſolutions, count Lottum, general of the Pruſſians, marched, the 13th of July, at night, with thirty battalions, and forty ſquadrons, the next day advanced towards the French lines, and took ſeveral ſmall places. The ſame day the army took their route towards Menin, paſſed the Lys near that place, and encamped at a ſmall diſtance from the town. Whilſt a detachment from the confederate army demoliſhed the French lines between Ypres and the Lys, another was ſent to raiſe contributions as far as Arras, which ſtruck a terror every where that it reached the very city of Paris.

Whilſt theſe affairs were in agitation, the confederate troops expected their heavy cannon, in order to undertake an important ſiege; and the French continued in their poſts along the canal of Bruges, without giving the allies any diſturbance. The only method they pitched upon, as moſt ſeveral are of note. I heartily congratulate with you on this great and glorious victory, &c.

Letter from the duke of Marlborough to the earl of Mancheſter.

My lord, Camp at Werwick, July 15, 1708.

I return your lordſhip many thanks for the favour of your letter of the 22d of laſt month, and am glad to ſee your lordſhip was like ſoon to have juſt ſatisfaction from the republic of Venice. You need not doubt then, but the queen will readily grant your deſire of returning home. We are in great expectation of ſir John Leake's being ſailed for Catalonia, where the ſuccours from Italy will have been very much wanting. We hear the duke of Orleans perſiſted in the ſiege of Tortoſa, notwithſtanding the loſs of his proviſion-ſhips taken by our fleet. Your lordſhip will have heard with concern the enemy's taking the city of Ghent, by the treachery of ſome of the inhabitants. But the good news that will ſoon have followed of our defeating, on Wedneſday laſt, part of their army near Oudenard, and obliging them to retire behind the canal between Ghent and Bruges, will have made ſome amends. We took between ſix and ſeven thouſand priſoners, beſides about ſeven hundred officers, of which ſeveral are of note, and a great number of ſtandards and colours. Our army lay on their arms that night, and on Thurſday encamped on the field of battle: On Friday we reſted, the troops having need of ſome eaſe, after their great fatigue; and about midnight we detached forty ſquadrons and thirty battalions towards the enemy's lines, between Warneton and Ypres. The whole army followed by break of day, and encamped at Helchin, whence we purſued our march to-day to this camp cloſe to the lines, which we found our detachments had forced, and taken five hundred priſoners, the only guard the enemy had left for their ſecurity. We do not think, that their army is marched from behind the canal, which, with their poſſeſſing of Ghent, will be a great obſtruction to our bringing up our heavy cannon and other artillery; ſo that I fear we ſhall be obliged to retake that place, before we can make any further progreſs.

Extract of an intercepted letter from a French officer, who was in the battle.

I can only ſend you an unwelcome relation of the particulars of the battle, which happened yeſterday about two in the afternoon near Oudenard. It will prove a great blow to France; for, without exaggerating the matter, we had above ten thouſand men killed, wounded, or taken. The action was very ill managed on our ſide; for, inſtead of attacking the enemy when they began to paſs the Scheld near Oudenard at eleven in the morning, we let them come over the river quietly, which they never would have adventured to do, had we, in any tolerable manner offered to diſpute their paſſage; but ſeeing us ſtand ſtill, they were encouraged to proſecute their firſt deſign, and began to paſs over two bridges, which they had laid. As faſt as their horſe and foot came over, they ranged themſelves in order of battle againſt us; and while our generals were in ſuſpenſe what reſolution to take, whether to venture an engagement or not, the enemy's army continued coming over the river, and ſoon poſſeſſed themſelves of ſome villages and hedges; ſo that, at laſt, our generals were compelled to endeavour to diſlodge them. Accordingly, our infantry advanced, and the ground was diſputed two or three hours, with a terrible fire and great obſtinacy on both ſides; but our foot being tired with charging the enemy five or ſix times, and being diſheartened to ſee themſelves not ſupported by our horſe (who could not act, becauſe the ground was full of incloſures) and preſſed hard by the enemy, were, at length, forced to retire, and quit the ground to them. We dragoons were obliged to endure the continual fire of the enemy's foot and cannon, without daring to ſtir, becauſe we were on the right of the king's houſhold, who ſuffered as much as we. Towards the evening we were fallen upon by a great number of the enemy's horſe, to hinder us from ſuccouring the reſt, who were put to the route, and of ſeven regiments of dragoons we loſt above half. At laſt, we had no other expedient left, than to force our way through the enemy; but firſt we ſent to ſee whether we could be aſſiſted in that deſign by any of our forces. In the mean time night came on apace, and we were informed, that the king's houſehold (whoſe retreat was covered in ſome meaſure by us) were at too great a diſtance. Things ſtanding thus, our reſolution of breaking through the enemy ſunk, and, ſome of the enemy's adjutants ſummoning us to yield ourſelves priſoners of war, we ſubmitted to it, ſeeing no other way to ſave our lives. At leaſt forty of our regiments are reduced to a wretched condition, the greateſt part of them being killed or taken; ſo that it will be long before they can be re-eſtabliſhed. Of four regiments of the king's houſhold, at leaſt half are taken priſoners, and among them are ſeveral perſons of note. The chevalier de Longueville and fifteen other officers were mortally wounded, and two of them are dead ſince the battle. The regiments of Pfiffer and Villars are quite ruined, and almoſt all their officers are taken, with all their baggage, &c. Amongſt the priſoners were above ſeven hundred officers, viz. a lieutenant-general, four major-generals, five brigadiers, fourteen colonels, eight lieutenant-colonels, nine majors, two hundred and ſix captains, one hundred and forty-ſeven lieutenants, ninety-ſix cornets, one hundred and eighty-ſix gens d'armes, chevaux legers, or life-guards, and forty-ſeven quarter-maſters. The marquis de Ximenes, colonel of the regiment of royal Rouſſillon, and the ſieur de la Betrache, colonel of horſe, with a great number of other officers, were killed.

A letter written by one of the duke of Vendoſme's confidents, ſuppoſed to be Monſieur Capiſtron, the duke's ſecretary.

Away with your conſternation, ſir, and do not betray in yourſelf the weakneſs common to your nation, who never light of a misfortune but preſently all is loſt. I tell you, in the firſt place, that the reports you hinted to me are falſe, and the duke of Vendoſme laughs at them. As for the three marches which he ſuffered to be ſtolen from him, and his not guarding the Dender, every body knows, the duke of Vendoſme was for diſputing the paſſage of that river; and that after three days conteſt, he was forced to ſubmit to the ſentiments of thoſe, who, to avoid an engagement, voted for paſſing the Scheld. However it was then that they were obliged to own, what the duke had foretold them, viz. That whenever prince Eugene underſtood they had a mind to avoid fighting, he would force them to do it, whether they would or no.

As to what they ſay, that the duke of Vendoſme ought to have attacked the van of the enemy's army, in their paſſing the Scheld, he knew better things. For ſoon as he received advice from the marquis of Biron, that part of the enemy's army was over, he was for attacking it, while he ſaw the duſt made by the columns of that army on the other ſide of the river, about half a league from Oudenard; but he was ſingle in his opinion, and conſequently not hearkened to. This was at ten in the morning. At four in the afternoon major-general Grimaldi was ordered, without the duke of Vendoſme's knowledge, to begin the attack; which, however, when he ſaw, he was for continuing it. Accordingly he ſent Monſieur Jenet, his aid de camp, to the left, with orders for them to engage, but he was killed in his return. Theſe orders were not executed, ſome officers inſinuating mal à propos to the duke of Burgundy, that there was a quagmire and an impracticable moraſs; whereas the duke of Vendoſme's and the count d'Evreux had paſſed an hour before.

As the retreat, the duke of Vendoſme was not for it; but as he was backed in his opinion by the count d'Evreux only, he was again obliged to ſubmit. No ſooner therefore had he given the word for the army to retreat, but all got on horſeback, and with aſtoniſhing precipitation fled to Ghent; and there were not wanting thoſe, who adviſed the princes to ſet out poſt from thence to Ypres.

The duke of Vendoſme, who was obliged for a good part of the time, to make the rear-guard with his aid de camp did not reach Ghent till almoſt nine in the morning, when he made a firm reſolution to poſt the army behind the canal, which goes from that place to Bruges, though againſt the advice of all the general officers, who threatened for three days together to abandon him; and ſaid, they ought to endeavour to join the duke of Berwick. That firmneſs ſaved the king's army and France itſelf; for the fright the army was in would have cauſed a greater diſgrace than that of Ramillies. Whereas the duke of Vendoſme, by poſting himſelf behind the canal, has covered Ghent and Bruges, which is the eſſential point, and thereby revived and put courage into the troops, and given the officers time to recollect themſelves, and to know the country. In a word, he has thrown the enemy out of action; and if they attack any of our ſtrong places, as Ypres, Liſle, Mons, or Tournay, the duke of Vendoſme will take Oudenard, make himſelf maſter of the Scheld, and ſo puzzle them. This, ſir, is the very truth, and the ſame, the duke of Vendoſme has ſent to the king, &c.

[s] Burnet obſerves, Vendoſme took ſo much upon him, that the other officers complained of his neglecting them; ſo they made their court to the proper to be put in execution, was to harraſs the Dutch Flanders with ſmall parties. This they did, and, whilſt the confederate army raiſed great contributions in Picardy and elſewhere, the French plundered a few Boors under the government of the ſtates. Their next attempt was againſt the forts of the Red Houſe, and fort Plaſſendale, which they made themſelves maſters of ſword in hand. But whilſt they were endeavouring to amuſe the confederates by theſe proceedings, ſeveral detachments of the allies plundered the countries of Piccardy and Artois. Count Tilly, the lieutenant generals Orkney, Rantzaw, and Hompeſch, the major generals Webb, Rantzaw, and count d'Arbach, with forty ſquadrons, twelve battalions, and a thouſand grenadiers, advanced into Picardy, to lay the ſame under contribution, to put that province under military execution. This detachment fell in with eight hundred horſe near la Baſſee and Lens (part of the cavalry belonging to the duke of Berwick's army) of which a conſiderable number were killed, and a colonel, a major, a captain, and two hundred troopers taken priſoners. The confederate troops purſued the enemy to the gates of Lens, wherein they had poſted fourteen hundred foot, which abandoned the place upon the approach of the confederate infantry. After this the generals raiſed conſiderable ſums in the province of Piccardy, burnt the ſuburbs of Dourlens, and returned with hoſtages for the contributions they had agreed on to be paid to the allies, without any manner of oppoſition.

Some time after, a detachment from the French army at Lovendegen, under the command of the chevalier de Rozen, made an irruption into the Dutch Flanders; but they performed little more than the other part of the army commanded by the duke of Burgundy. They fell in upon the Dutch lines of Bervliet, which they took, having no manner of guard to defend them, lieutenant general Fagel and major general Murray retiring before them, for want of a ſufficient force to make a ſtand; their troops not amounting to more than three battalions, and a regiment of dragoons. Afterwards the French advanced, and fell into the iſland of Caſandt, where they plundered and burnt above a hundred houſes belonging to the country farmers and boors, and beſides, obliged the inhabitants of the iſland to pay contributions. Thus they finiſhed their expedition, without putting any thing farther material in execution, and retired back to rejoin their main body.

This invaſion of Dutch Flanders did not occaſion any alteration in the meaſures that had been concerted for a conſiderable ſiege; in order to which a great train of artillery, and a vaſt number of waggons laden with warlike ſtores, had, with all poſſible expedition, been provided at Bruſſels. Prince Eugene's army from Germany had now joined the confederates; and the French foreſeeing the ſtorm, and rightly conjecturing, that Liſle was the place, which the allies intended to bend their main force againſt, had made proviſions ſuitable to the greatneſs of the danger they apprehended. For, beſides the preſence of the marſhal de Boufflers, governor of all French Flanders, and of the lieutenants general de Surville, Lee, and other officers of diſtinction, they threw into the place twenty-one battalions of the beſt troops of France. But notwithſtanding the difficulties, that muſt naturally attend the ſiege of ſo ſtrong and ſo well-provided a place, beſides others occaſioned by the confederates being cut off from their magazines in Antwerp and Sas van-Ghent; all which made the duke of Vendoſme ſay, "That he did not think ſo wiſe a captain as prince Eugene would venture upon ſo raſh an enterprize;" yet nothing was able to deter the confederate generals from their reſolutions. So that, having brought a great convoy of proviſions, ammunition, and other warlike ſtores from Bruſſels to Menin, Liſle[t] was inveſted on the 13th of Auguſt, N. S. on one ſide by prince Eugene, and on the other by the prince of Orange-Naſſau, ſtadtholder of Friſeland, in the following manner: The artillery being arrived at Pottes, and all things concerted for the ſiege, the prince of Orange-Naſſau was detached with thirty-one battalions, to take poſt at Marquet upon the Deule, within half a league of Liſle, and lieutenant general Wood, with thirty-four ſquadrons, marched to Potteghem. The grand army marched likewiſe from their camp at Werwick to Helchin; and, the ſame day, prince Eugene, having paſſed the Marque at Pont-a-Treſſin, inveſted the town between that place and the Upper Deule, whilſt the prince of Orange-Naſſau did the ſame with his detachment between the Upper and Lower Deule; by which means the enemy were ſhut up, and could put no further reinforcements into the place. The duke of Marlborough took upon him to cover the ſiege; and to that end encamped at Helchin, where he had a convenience from time to time to reinforce the troops employed in the ſiege, or to march and fight the enemy, as occaſion ſhould require.

This important ſiege was to be carried on with fifty battalions; ſix Imperialiſts, nine Palatines, five Heſſians, and thirty from the grand army; and, all matters being put into a proper poſture for a vigorous ſiege, the trenches were opened on the 22d of Auguſt, between ſeven and eight in the evening, on the right and left of the Lower Deule; the right againſt the gate of St. Andrew, under the direction of Monſieur des Roques, and the other againſt St. Magdalen gate, under the care of Monſieur du Mey. Four thouſand workmen were commanded for this ſervice, covered by ten battalions of the Imperial, Palatine, and Heſſian troops, commanded by lieutenant general Wilke, and major general Volkerſhoven. Ten battalions and ſix hundred horſe were ready to ſuſtain them; but the trenches were carried on with ſo good ſucceſs, that the allies had above two hours time to cover themſelves, before they were perceived by the enemy; who made a terrible fire from the town, though with ſo little execution, that the confederates had not above three or four men killed, and about fifteen wounded. On the 23d, lieutenant general Pettenſdorf, in the ſervice of the elector Palatine, and the major generals Sacken and Soble, relieved the trenches with four Imperial and ſix Heſſian battalions, and one thouſand workmen at each attack. But Pettenſdorf going from one attack to the other, and miſſing his way in the night, had the misfortune to be taken priſoner, and carried into the town. The 24th, lieutenant general Spaar relieved the trenches, with major general Collier, the brigadiers Waſſanaer and Keppel, and the Britiſh battalions of Godfrey and Ingoldſby, two Pruſſian, the Daniſh guards, and the battalions of Orange, Bellem, Swarts, and Mey. The ſame night, three hundred and twenty grenadiers were commanded to attack the chapel of St. Magdalen, wherein the enemy had a hundred and twenty grenadiers, with two captains, and ſome ſubaltern officers, who having loſt one of their captains, and about twenty men, the reſt ſurrendered. The beſiegers had, in this action, near thirty men killed and wounded; ſome officers and Monſieur du Mey (director of the attacks) received a ſmall contuſion. The 26th the beſieged retook the chapel, having made a ſally with moſt of the grenadiers and two ſquadrons of dragoons. But the prince of Orange-Naſſau being in the trenches, cauſed two battalions to advance, who retook it, and cauſed the enemy to retire with precipitation, into the counterſcarp. The 27th in the morning, the beſiegers fired fifty pieces of cannon and twenty mortars upon the town with ſo good ſucceſs, that they beat down one of the enemy's batteries. On the 29th, early in the morning, the confederate troops ſtormed a fortified mill on the right near the gate of St. Andrew with three hundred grenadiers, beat the enemy from that poſt, and took ſeveral priſoners; but, at the ſame time, the enemy made ſo terrible a fire from the ramparts, that the beſiegers were obliged to quit it. The next day three hundred grenadiers were commanded to retake that mill, but the enemy ſet it on fire, and abandoned that poſt. On the laſt of Auguſt the prince of Holſtein-Beck relieved the trenches; and each battalion was ordered to furniſh ſix waggons, to carry ſtones near the batteries, to throw the ſame with mortars into the enemy's works. The 1ſt of September, at night, the Imperialiſts relieved the trenches, and the beſiegers carried on the ſap towards the ſaliant angle of the counterſcarp of the horn-work, within fifty paces of the palliſadoes; and a vaſt quantity of faſcines and gabions were prepared for making their lodgment on the counterſcarp. At the ſame time the breach being very wide, and the ditch almoſt filled up with the ruins of the walls, marſhal Boufflers was apprehenſive, that the town would fall into the confederates hands, and therefore ordered ſeveral of the largeſt pieces of cannon to be removed into the citadel. On the 4th the prince of Holſtein-Beck relieved the trenches; as did alſo lieutenant general Spaar the duke of Burgundy, and laid the blame of all his miſcarriages on Vendoſme. He kept cloſe to the orders he had from Verſailles, where the accounts he gave and the advices he offered, were more conſidered, than thoſe that were ſent by the duke of Burgundy: This was very uneaſy to him, who was impatient of contradiction, and longed to be in action, though he did not ſhew the forwardneſs in expoſing his own perſon, that was expected: He ſeemed very devout, even to bigotry; but from the accounts we had from France, it did appear, that his conduct during the campaign, gave no great hopes or proſpect from him, when all things ſhould come into his hands; Chamillard was ſent from court to ſoften him, and to reconcile him to the duke of Vendoſme, but with no effect. Vol. II. 509.

[t] Liſle is a large, rich, and ſtrong city, the capital of French Flanders, and, next to Paris, was reckoned the chief place of the king of France's dominions. The allies inveſted it Auguſt 13, 1708. The town was ſurrendered to them, October 23, and the citadel, December 11. It ſtands among the pools and marſhes, fifteen miles weſt of Tournay, twenty-eight north of Doway, thirty-ſix ſouth-weſt of Ghent, thirty-ſeven ſouth-eaſt of Dunkirk, and thirty-eight almoſt weſt of Mons.

next day; and the approaches were carried on ſo ſucceſsfully, that it was judged, the counterſcarp would be ſtormed the ſame evening; but that enterprize was deferred till the 7th.

Whilſt the ſiege of Liſle was thus vigorouſly carried on, the dukes of Burgundy, Vendoſme, and Berwick made two or three feint advances, as if they deſigned to attack the duke of Marlborough; who, upon thoſe motions, gave orders for his army to be ready to march upon the firſt occaſion; and, in the mean time, detached the earl of Athlone, with fifteen hundred horſe, to obſerve the enemy. The earl advancing towards Leuſe, his van-guard fell in with an hundred horſe, detached from the duke of Berwick's army, whom they charged, defeated, and took thirty priſoners. The enemy made ſeveral marches and counter-marches, whereby it was apparent, that they deſigned to attempt the raiſing of the ſiege. The duke of Burgundy likewiſe ſent a ſpy, to endeavour to get into Liſle, and acquaint the marſhal Boufflers, that, their army being on this ſide Tournay, he might depend upon being relieved; but that meſſenger happened to be diſcovered and ſeized by the allies. Upon this the duke of Marlborough, in expectation of an engagement, ordered the confederate army, on the 5th of September, to march to the ground marked out for them, in order to give the enemy battle; and being reinforced by prince Eugene with ſeventy-two ſquadrons and twenty-ſix battalions from the ſiege (with which troops came alſo king Auguſtus and the Landgrave of Heſſe as volunteers) and lieutenant general Fagel having marched with incredible ſpeed out of Dutch Flanders and Brabant, and joined the confederate army with ſeven battalions and as many ſquadrons, they continued till ten o'clock in order of battle. But the enemy declined coming to an engagement; ſo that the confederate generals ordered the tents to be pitched again, and the detachment of prince Eugene returned to the camp before Liſle, except ſome Imperial and Heſſian ſquadrons. The generals concluding, that the enemy had no other deſign than to give them frequent alarms to retard the ſiege, and ſtreighten them in their forage, without venturing an engagement, one hundred men out of each battalion were ordered to caſt up an entrenchment in the front of their army, which would both ſecure the troops from any ſudden ſurprize, and leave the beſiegers at liberty to carry on their attacks without interruption.

The confederates, thus finding it impracticable to bring the enemy to a battle, thought fit to ſtorm the counterſcarp of Liſle, which had been delayed by theſe movements; and, on the 7th of September in the morning, they made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for that enterprize, having received a reinforcement from the grand army of ſeven hundred grenadiers, and the like number of fuſileers, and ſix hundred workmen. Eight hundred grenadiers, ſupported by the like number of fuſileers, thirty carpenters, and two hundred workmen, were commanded for the attack of the right, between the Lower Deule and the gate St. Andrew, under the direction of the ſieur des Roques; and ſixteen hundred grenadiers, ſupported by the like number of fuſileers, thirty carpenters, and two thouſand workmen, were commanded for the attack of the left, between the river and the gate of St. Magdalen, under the direction of the ſieur du Mey. The batteries of the confederates made a continual fire before the attack on all the baſtions to diſturb the enemy; and after the ſignal of three guns, and a general diſcharge of all the artillery, the attack was made with ſo much order and courage on the part of the officers and ſoldiers, that the counterſcarp was taken in a ſhort time, notwithſtanding it was defended by two hundred men of each regiment in the garriſon; and the beſiegers lodged themſelves in the covered way. But the enemy made ſuch a terrible fire from their out works with their cannon, mortars, and ſmall arms, and ſprung three mines in the covered way, that there were no leſs than one thouſand men wounded and ſlain.

The confederates, having made themſelves maſters of the counterſcarp, endeavoured to perfect their works with all poſſible application. In the night, between the 9th and 10th, the enemy made a ſally, but were repulſed with conſiderable loſs. On the 11th, the Imperialiſts relieved the trenches, and an adjutant came from the grand army, to acquaint prince Eugene, that the French were advanced within ſight of the intrenchments, and ſeemed to have a deſign to attack them. Whereupon the prince marched with fifteen battalions, and the cavalry, to reinforce the duke of Marlborough. The duke being at dinner, received advice, that the French foragers were advanced within a quarter of a league of the confederate camp, and were ſuſtained by ſeveral regiments. Lieutenant general Wood, who happened to be at table, deſired his permiſſion, that he might charge them with two battalions only: The duke granted his requeſt; and having detached the regiment of ſir Richard Temple, and another Engliſh battalion for that enterprize, they fell upon the enemy, whom they repulſed as far as Ennevelin, where they had poſted ſome forces in a caſtle, which was ſurrounded with ditches. The Engliſh endeavoured to diſlodge them from thence, and charged the French with great bravery. But the duke of Vendoſme cauſed all his grenadiers, and the piquet of ſix brigades, which were encamped in the front of his army near Pont-a-Marque, to ſupport his troops in the caſtle. Whereupon the two battalions were obliged to retire, after a very ſtout reſiſtance, and retreated in good order, with the loſs of about ſix or ſeven officers, and near two hundred men killed or wounded. The next morning the French troops began to be in motion, and about two in the afternoon the allies ſaw the head of their army, conſiſting of ſeveral battalions and ſquadrons, with their workmen, who levelled the ground between them and the allies entrenchments. The confederate generals now thought the enemy were reſolved upon an attack, ſo that the troops were immediately ordered to their arms, and the regiments commanded to their reſpective poſts, behind the entrenchments. Prince Eugene likewiſe joined the army; and, at the ſame time, orders were ſent to the earl of Albermarle (who was then between Oudenard and Menin, with thirty ſquadrons, to guard a convoy from Bruſſels) to return to the camp with the utmoſt expedition; and, accordingly the earl, on the 12th, by break of day, arrived with his detachment. About four in the afternoon, the enemy began to cannonade the confederate camp, directing there fire chiefly againſt the village of Entiers (where the brigadiers Evans and Wertmuller were poſted with two brigades of foot) and were anſwered by the artillery, planted on the entrenchments, which continued till it was dark. The confederate troops, which lay upon their arms all night, were the next day formed in order of battle, and early in the morning the enemy renewed their cannonading with between thirty and forty pieces, moſt twenty-four pounders, and the allies did the like with almoſt equal execution on both ſides. At length the enemy withdrew their heavy cannon; and the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene perceiving, that they had no other deſign than by frequent alarms to delay the ſtorming the out-works of Liſle, the troops were ordered to encamp in ſuch a manner, as to be immediately ready to receive the French, provided they ſhould make any farther attempts, and the works about the village of Entiers were repaired, and enlarged for the greater ſecurity of that poſt. Prince Eugene being ſatisfied, that the confederate camp was ſufficiently ſecured, he returned, on the 13th of September, with his troops to the ſiege.

In the mean while, the French generals were contriving means to diſtreſs the confederate army in ſuch a manner as to oblige prince Eugene to raiſe the ſiege; and in order to this, they at laſt found an opportunity of engaging ſome of the inhabitants at Aeth in a conſpiracy to deliver up that town; while on the other hand, they were indefatigable in concerting meaſures for cutting off the convoys, of which the camp before Liſle ſtood in need. The former ſcheme failed; for, before the conſpiracy at Aeth was ripe for execution, it was diſcovered. But in the latter part of their deſign, they ſucceeded; for after various motions of both armies, they began to throw up lines for ſecuring the paſſes of the Scheld, and worked at them ſo hard, that they appeared rather like the fortifications of a town, than entrenchments thrown up in haſte, notwithſtanding they were ſeventy miles in length. On theſe they laid cannon, and poſted the greateſt part of their army upon them, ſo that they did effectually ſtop all communication by the Scheld. Upon which, the ſtates ordered all that was neceſſary, both for the army and for the ſiege, to be ſent to Oſtend: And if the French had begun their deſigns, with the intercepting this way of conveyance, the ſiege muſt have been raiſed for want of ammunition to carry it on.

The duke of Burgundy was very uneaſy for want of intelligence from Liſle; which put Dubois, a captain in his army, on one of the boldeſt enterprizes, which perhaps was ever undertaken by a ſingle man: He determined to attempt getting into the city, notwithſtanding the ſtrict guards kept by the beſiegers. He undreſſed himſelf, and having hid his clothes, ſwam over ſeven canals and ditches, and ſo got into the town. Marſhal Boufflers having provided him with clothes, conducted him to both the attacks, ſhewed him the condition all things were in, and having written a letter to the duke of Burgundy, he rolled it up in wax which the captain put in his mouth. He then returned the ſame way he came, with the intelligence the duke of Burgundy wanted; by which it was ſaid, marſhal Boufflers acquainted him, that, if one of the allies convoys could be intercepted, the ſiege would be raiſed; and that he would undertake the place ſhould hold out till the 6th or 10th of October.

On the 12th of September, about nine in the morning, the beſieged came out of the town in great numbers, with four colours, attacked the trenches on the left in ſix different places, having at the ſame time, another body of troops in the covered way ready to ſuſtain them. But before they could do any other damage than the overturning a few gabions, they were engaged by the next battalions in the trenches, and obliged to retreat in great diſorder, having had above ſixty men killed, and among them ſeveral officers; and, of the confederates, fourteen men were killed, and near thirty wounded. Lieutenant general Arnam continued that night in the trenches, which were relieved the night between the 13th and 14th by the prince of Holſtein-beck; but the works were not advanced very much, becauſe the troops, which had joined the grand army with prince Eugene, were not returned to their reſpective poſts. However, they arrived the 14th, a little before break of day. The ſame night the trenches were relieved by lieutenant general Spaar, with ten battalions, as uſual; and the beſiegers began to work upon ſome mines, in order to fill up the ditch of the tenaille, and they placed a great many gabions on the palliſadoes. On the 15th, prince Eugene thought fit to alter the former diſpoſitions for relieving the trenches, and ordered, that all the lieutenant generals of his army ſhould roll according to their turns: That one of them ſhould mount the trenches every day with a major general: That the former ſhould take his poſt at the attack on the left, and latter on the the right: And that twelve battalions, inſtead of ten, ſhould mount the trenches, five Imperialiſts, Palatines, and Heſſians, and ſeven detached from the troops of the prince of Naſſau. Accordingly, on the 17th in the evening, lieutenant general Wilks relieved the trenches with twelve battalions; and the ſame night, director du Mey attacked, with fifty grenadiers, and the like number of fuſileers, a traverſe in the covered way, from which he beat the enemy with conſiderable loſs. From the 17th to the 20th, the beſiegers made their advances with all poſſible diligence. The aſſault was intended to be made on the 20th in the evening; but, the enemy having burnt the galleries and bridges, which were to be made uſe of therein, it was for this reaſon put off to the 21ſt in the evening. About half an hour after ſix, the trenches were relieved by lieutenant general Wilks, major general Saiken, and ſir Richard Temple, with the uſual number of battalions, the ſignal being given by a general diſcharge from the batteries, and the mines on the right and left ſprung with good ſucceſs. The grenadiers marched out with great intrepidity, mounted the breach of the tenaille on the right, obliged the enemy to retire into the retrenchment of that work, and made there a good lodgment. On the left, they had ſtill greater ſucceſs, for they poſſeſſed themſelves of a place of arms on the counterſcarp of the tenaille, and drove the enemy out of the counterſcarp before the grand breach, ſo that here they made two lodgments; but on a ſudden, the enemy came down in ſuch numbers, that the officer, who commanded this party of the allies with a conſiderable number of his men, were preſently killed, the lodgments ruined, and the reſt of the grenadiers obliged to retire. Prince Eugene ſeeing this, and believing, that his preſence would re-animate the grenadiers, came out of the trenches, and, as the French accounts ſay, rallied them thrice, advancing at their head, till he received a wound by a muſket-ſhot, which, grazing over his left eye, beat off his hat. The prince of Heſſe-caſſel, who was near him, took his own hat, which was likewiſe ſhot through, and put it upon prince Eugene's head, who was prevailed on to retire, in order to have his wound dreſſed. This action coſt the allies near a thouſand men, to ſupply which, the duke of Marlborough ſent, the next day, a reinforcement of four hundred Britiſh and Pruſſian grenadiers from his army to the ſiege. The ſame morning the duke and king Auguſtus went to make prince Eugene a viſit, and finding him ready to mount on horſeback, they prevailed on him to continue a few days in his chamber, till he was perfectly recovered; during which time the duke ſuſtained the weight of the command, both of the ſiege and his own army; for he immediately went into the trenches, viſited the works, and performed all that prince Eugene would have done, had he not been prevented by his wounds.

On the 22d major general Cadogan ſet out for Oſtend to view a conſiderable number of troops, which were landed there from England, under the command of lieutenant general Erle, and to concert the neceſſary meaſures for ſecuring a great convoy they expected from Oſtend. Theſe troops had been embarked on board the fleet for ſome time, made a feint of landing in Boulogne-bay, and afterwards alarmed the French coaſt of Normandy, to the great terror and expence of the inhabitants; and, at length returning to their own coaſt, the duke of Marlborough deſired they might be landed at Oſtend; and they proved a very ſeaſonable reinforcement to the grand army in that critical conjuncture. The ſame day the four hundred grenadiers, who were detached from the duke's army, and five and fifty fuſileers, were to poſt themſelves that evening in the tenaille on the left; but the grenadiers arriving too late, the attack was deferred till the next day; ſo that, the 23d, all things being in readineſs, the duke of Marlborough, who was in the trenches, cauſed a ſignal to be given for the ſtorm to begin, which was carried on with all imaginable ſucceſs. The troops drove the enemy quite from the tenaille on the left (that on the right being taken on the 21ſt at night) and made a great lodgment along the covered way, without any conſiderable loſs, except ſome engineers and officers, who were wounded. It was obſerved on this occaſion, that the enemy did not defend theſe poſts with the ſame vigour, which they had formerly exerted; from whence it was conjectured, that either the garriſon had been much weakened in the hot diſputes, which they had ſuſtained, or began to want ammunition, which afterwards proved very apparent. For the ſiege having been protracted to an unuſual length, and the garriſon having ſuſtained ſeveral aſſaults, and made all the while prodigious fire, marſhall Boufflers found means to acquaint the duke of Vendoſme, that he had ſcarce ammunition ſufficient for four days; which preſſing neceſſity obliged the enemy to venture upon a bold attempt of ſupplying the place. In order to that, the duke of Vendoſme detached the chevalier de Luxemberg, and under him Monſieur de Tournefort, with a body of horſe and dragoons to endeavour to ſupply the beſieged, each man having a bag of forty pound weight of powder behind him. They advanced the 28th at night, along the cauſey from Doway to Liſle, and were met by an out-guard of one hundred horſe, commanded by count Schlick, who had been encamped at Pont-a-Treſſin with thirty ſquadrons. This out-guard challenged them, and they declared that they belonged to the allies grand army, and were conducting ſome priſoners to the camp. But a ſubaltern officer, having a miſtruſt, advanced to examine them, who, thinking it impoſſible to conceal themſelves any longer, rode full gallop along the cauſey, and got into the line of circumvallation. The guard and centinels having fired at them, the camp in general took the alarm, and ſeveral Palatine dragoons getting on horſeback with the utmoſt expedition, fell upon the enemy, and purſued them to the barrier of the town, which the beſieged were at firſt cautious of opening, and left their men for ſome time expoſed, by which means a great many were killed, and ſeveral returned back into the confederate camp, and endeavoured to ſave themſelves by favour of the night. The infantry made ſeveral diſcharges at them, and the powder they had in their bags taking fire did great miſchief. Thoſe who made their eſcape, threw away their powder, which was ſet on fire by their horſes ſtriking againſt the pavement. The allies took ſeven officers and about forty priſoners; but what numbers were killed and blown up, could not eaſily be known [u].

[u] The hereditary prince of Heſſe-caſtle gave the following account of this affair to the ſtates-general.

High and mighty lords,

Yeſterday towards the evening we heard a great blow, which we ſuppoſed to be mine: Half an hour after another crack was heard, and at midnight ſuch a blaſt, that the ground ſhook with it. This alarmed the whole army. I went to the right, from whence the noiſe came (having firſt given order to all the cavalry under my command to ſaddle and mount) and found that a great detachment of the enemy, coming from Doway, had endeavoured to break through at the aperture of the line of circumvallation, on the highway between Doway and Liſle, where the Palatinate horſe are encamped. Part of them having paſſed, and our men putting themſelves in a poſture to oppoſe them, the bags of powder, which moſt of the French horſe and dragoons had behind them, of about fifty pound weight each, took fire, which made a terrible noiſe. The foremoſt of them upon this accident rode full gallop towards the town. Nevertheleſs, before they could reach it, the ſame diſaſter befel them a ſecond time, juſt as they came up to the barrier, which might in all probability be occaſioned by the horſes ſhoes ſtriking upon the pavement, or by the ſparks of the firſt fire, that fell upon their men, who were not aware of it. It is ſaid, that at leaſt an hundred men periſhed in this manner near the gate; and it is likely, this is the laſt noiſe we heard. Between fifty and ſixty troopers were killed upon the place, where they paſſed the line; and it was a dreadful ſpectacle to ſee the way ſtrewed with dead carcaſes, horſes, heads, arms, and legs half burnt. The others, who were behind, retired as faſt as they could. I cauſed them to be purſued, but it was impoſſible to overtake them. They found, however, upon the road, for two leagues beyond the camp, ſacks of powder, ſwords, piſtols, and looſe powder, which ſhews the precipitation, with which they made their retreat. Our Heſſian huſſars ſet fire to a great many ſacks, which they found in the road, as they returned from the purſuit. We reckoned, that about three hundred men got into the town, but carried too little powder with them, to balance their loſs. On the other hand, it is plain, that ammunition, which is ſo neceſſary for their defence, begins to fall ſhort in the place.

Your high mightineſſes will, no doubt, have had direct advice of the advantage, which the troops, lately arrived from England ſuſtained by those general

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting before Liſle, the duke of Marlborough, who, on the 25th of September, returned to the camp at Lanoy, was employed in making detachments, and taking other meaſures for ſecuring a great convoy of ammunition that was expected from Oſtend. The duke had ordered ſix battalions, and eight hundred horſe under brigadier Lanſberg, ten ſquadrons under brigadier Starkerberg, and ſix battalions under general Els, to guard the convoy. But having received advice, that the Engliſh troops under lieutenant general Ede had advanced to Leſſingen, on the canal between Bruges and Newport, and that the count de la Motte had been reinforced with ſeveral brigades from the French army to intercept him; he concluded, that the detachment he had ordered, would not be ſufficient to oppoſe the enemy. And therefore major general Webb, and brigadier count Naſſay-Woudenburgh, ſon to the veldt-marſhal d'Auverquerque, marched the 26th, by break of day, with twelve battalions more, to join the detachment on the road between Menin and Oſtend, and were ordered to advance as far as Ichtegem, in the country called le Franc de Bruges, about four leagues from Leſſingen. Major general Cadogan marched in the mean time, with a detachment of horſe and foot, to meet the convoy upon their paſſing the canal of Bruges. Notwithſtanding it was impoſſible to take other precautions for ſecuring that convoy, than thoſe which were taken, yet the confederates were under great uneaſineſs for it, upon advice that the body of troops, which the enemy had about Bruſſels were marched about Ninove to Ghent, to join the count de la Motte; and that the intercepting of that convoy was judged ſo important, that the duke of Berwick was gone to Bruges to command the army aſſembled there. The French having concerted all the neceſſary meaſures for diſturbing the allies, and depriving them of any ſupplies, the count de la Motte marched from Ghent with about twenty-two thouſand men, and came up with ſix thouſand of the confederate troops, that were ordered to guard the convoy; which occaſioned one of the moſt glorious and remarkable actions recorded in hiſtory; of which there cannot be a better relation, than what was preſented by major general Webb, to the queen, on the 6th of October, and afterwards publiſhed by authority in the following manner[x]:

After that the detachments, which were ſent to cover the march of the waggons from Oſtend to the ſiege of Liſle, had joined at Turout the 27th of September, general Webb, who, as eldeſt major-general, commanded in chief, received advice, that major Savery of the regiment of Gethem had poſſeſſed himſelf of the poſt at Oudenburgh; whereupon he ſent ſix hundred grenadiers under the command of colonel Preſton; a battalion of Orkney's, under the command of colonel Hamilton, with that of Fune, commanded by colonel Voogt; the whole under the direction of brigadier Landſberg, to reinforce that poſt. The 28th, at eight in the morning, all the horſe under the command of general Cadogan) were ordered to Hoglede, to wait the arrival of the convoy there, except a hundred and fifty horſe, which were ſent the night before, under the command of count Lottum, to Oudenburg, with orders to the two battalions and ſix hundred grenadiers to guard the Cocklaer and afterwards to rejoin the foot at Turout. About noon, count Lottum returned to Turout, with advice, that, in his way to Ichtegem, he met with an advanced guard of the enemy, which he puſhed into the plain, where he obſerved ſixteen ſquadrons mounting in great great haſte, on the alarm which their advanced guard gave them: Whereupon he thought it neceſſary to return in all haſte, to give the general an account of it. On this advice all the foot, conſiſting of twenty-two battalions, count Lottum, with his hundred and fifty horſe, making the advanced guard, with the quarter-maſters and grenadiers, that were not detached, were ordered to march immediately, to goin the village of Ichtegem, by the way of Wynendale[y]. As ſoon as the advanced guard got to Wynendale, they perceived the enemy in the opening of the plain; whereupon the quarter-maſters and grenadiers were drawn up in order of battle. Major general Webb and count Naſſau-Woudenburg, at the head of the hundred and fifty horſe, advanced to reconnoitre the enemy, giving orders at the ſame time to the foot advance, and form themſelves as faſt as poſſible in the plain. The horſe were left at the opening of the plain, under the command of count Lottum, to amuſe the enemy, and, to embarraſs them the more, the quarter-maſters and grenadiers were poſted in a low coppice on that ſide of the plain where the enemy were expected to paſs. As ſoon as our troops paſſed out of the defile into the plain, major general Webb drew them up in order of battle, poſting them in the opening, between the wood of Wynendale and the coppice, on the other ſide where the quarter-maſters and grenadiers were poſted. We had ſcarce got ſix battalions into the opening, when the enemy began to cannonade us with forty pieces of cannon, whereof ten were of three bores. But notwithſtanding the great fire of the enemy, the hundred and fifty horſe, kept their ground; which produced the deſired effect, in giving the general time to form his foot in two lines. The left wing was extended beyond the low coppice, as well to prevent the enemy from paſſing that way as to cover our flank. On our right wing was poſted, in the wood of Wynendale, the regiment of Hukelom; and on our flank on the left, the regiment of the hereditary prince of Pruſſia, commanded by colonel Rhador, with orders not to diſcover themſelves, nor fire, till they could take the enemy in flank. Some platoons of grenadiers were advanced forty paces upon the right and left, with the ſame orders; and the quarter-maſters were alſo poſted in a road on the left, that croſſed through the forementioned low coppice. The enemy, after three hours cannonading, advanced towards us on the plain in twelve lines, whereof ſix were foot and ſix horſe. Whereupon count Lottum was ordered to retire, and poſt himſelf three hundred paces behind the foot, which he did in very good order. The French continued to march ſtrait up to us with forty battalions and ſixty ſquadrons. But, the general perceiving they extended themſelves to the right in the coppice, he ſent count Naſſau to obſerve their motion, who immediately ordered thither the regiment of Grumkau, commanded by colonel Beſchefer: and brigadier Eltz, being come up with the laſt regiment was poſted on the right in the wood of Wynendale: About half a quarter of an hour before the engagement began, brigadier Landſberg, with the two battalions and ſix hundred grenadiers, that had been detached, having advice, that the enemy advanced to attack us, rejoined us juſt time enough to form a third line. Some minutes after the enemy began the attack, marching within a hundred and fifty paces of our flank on the right, where the battalions, who hid themſelves, according to the general's orders, and who were not to fire till the French flank came oppoſite to them, gave them ſuch a warm fire, that their left wing gave into the centre; and the regiment of the hereditary prince, who was poſted on the flank on our left, much about the ſame diſtance, did not miſs the opportunity of their diſorder, to give them a vigorous diſcharge, which put their whole line in confuſion. Neverthelſs, the enemy puſhed on, and put two of our battalions into diſorder. But the Swiſs regiment of Albemarle, under the command of colonel Hirtgell, advancing upon their horſe, that were endeavouring to penetrate, engaged them long enough to give time to the general and count Naſſau, to bring up the regiments of Benſdorf, Gauvain, and Lindeboom, to ſupply the room of thoſe that were preſſed; which was done in a moment. However, the enemy, ſupported by ſo many lines, made another attempt to penetrate; but our battalion rather advanced than gave way, though the general gave orders againſt advancing, fearing, leſt that might render the fire of our flanks uſeleſs. This precaution had all the deſired ſucceſs; the regiments and grenadiers making ſuch a continual fire; as forced their two wings upon their centre, and obliged the whole to retire in the greateſt confuſion, notwithſtanding all the efforts their officers could make by enconragement or violence, to keep them up; ſo that they only fired at a great diſtance on our lines, which ours returned, advancing by platoons, as at their exerciſe, with all the order imaginable. Major general Cadogan, who came up ſome time after the action began, offered to charge the enemy in their diſorder with two ſquadrons of horſe; the other four, which he had ſent for, not being arrived till near ſeven at night. But it was not thought adviſeable to expoſe ſo ſmall a number to charge the enemy, who had brought up all their horſe to favour their retreat. The battle laſted two hours and was very hot, in neral Cadogan carried with him from the army, have obtained near the canal, that goes from Oſtend to Newport, over the duke of Berwick's troops, that attacked them. The great convoy is arrived at Menin. I congratulate your high mightineſſes upon both theſe accounts; and am, &c.

From the camp before Liſle,
September 29, 1708. FREDERICK, prince of Heſſe.

[x] The London Gazette of the 20th and 23d of September, having, from a wrong and partial information tranſmitted by M. Cardonnel, the duke of Marlborough's ſecretary, given the honour of the action to major-general Cadogan, without ſo much as mentioning major-general Webb, to whom it was entirely due, the latter reſenting the affront, left the army in diſguſt, came over into England, and gave the queen a true relation of the affair of Wynendale.

[y] Wynendale is an inconſiderable place in Spaniſh Flanders, adjoining to a wood, called the wood of Wynendale, eleven miles ſouth-weſt of Bruges, and twenty-eight north of Liſle.

which we had nine hundred and twelve officers and ſoldiers killed and wounded. But the enemy (as we are aſſured by letters from Ghent and Bruges, and by report of priſoners and deſerters) loſt betwen ſix and ſeven thouſand men. They made their retreat in ſo great a confuſion, that they left moſt of their cannon in a wood, which they did not carry off till the next day at eleven o'clock, after hearing that our convoy were paſſing Rouſſelaer. We remained on the field of battle till two o'clock the next morning, having firſt carried off all our wounded, and ſeveral of the enemy. This victory is the more ſurpriſing, that by reaſon of ſeveral detachments, we had not above ſix thouſand in the action; whereas the enemy by their own accounts, had no leſs than twenty-four thouſand men.

The count de la Motte, being obliged to retire, gave the convoy an opportunity to arrive the ſame night unmoleſted at Rouſſelaer, and the next day at Menin: And, as this critical action was chiefly owing to general Webb's conduct and military abilities, ſo that eminent ſervice was deſervedly acknowledged, both by the unanimous thanks of the commons of Great Britain, and, in a particular manner, by the king of Pruſſia who conferred on that general the noble order of generoſity [z].

On the 30th of September, prince Eugene being recovered of his wound, viſited the trenches, to the inexpreſſible joy of the confederate troops. The next day the trenches were relieved by the prince of Holſtein-Beck, major general Sacken, and ſir Richard Temple, with five battalions on the right, and ſeven on the left; and that evening they attacked and made a lodgment on the counterſcarp, before the great breach on the right, the enemy retiring behind the traverſes on the left. On the third a diſpoſition was made for attacking the ravelin on the right, and three hundred grenadiers were detached from the duke of Marlborough's army to join the troops for that ſervice. The attack began about noon, and ſucceeded ſo well, that by half an hour after one they made a lodgment on the ravelin, and forced the enemy behind the traverſes to leap into the water, where moſt of them were killed or drowned; ſo that the beſiegers were now maſters of both the counter guards and the ravelin. On the 7th the beſiegers continued to finiſh the batteries on the counterſcarp, to ruin the batteries of the enemy on the courtine, and beat down the bridge of communication, which they had from a place of arms to the ravelin. They carried on two mines on the left attack towards the ſaliant angle of the counterſcarp, over-againſt the breach, and the miners diſcovered two mines of the enemy, from which they took out the powder. On the 8th in the evening, the enemy ſallied out, and overturned ſeveral gabions about our places of arms at the left attack; and the next day was partly ſpent about repairing the works, and ſetting up the gabions again, which the enemy had overturned the night before. On the 12th the beſiegers continued to enlarge the place of arms for the general aſſault, and finiſhed two deſcents into the ditch on the right. But on the left the enemy returned behind two traverſes of the covered way behind the courtine, which hindered the advancement of the work on that ſide. On the 13th the beſiegers ſprung a mine under the place of arms, which blew up ſeveral of the enemy's men; and, in the evening thirty grenadiers attacked the enemy behind the two traverſes on the left, and overſet the boat, by which they would have retired; ſo that, of a lieutenant, a ſerjeant, and twenty men, three only were made priſoners, the reſt being either killed or drowned. The 15th the beſiegers ſprung four mines in the place of arms on the right, where the enemy had caſt up an entrenchment; enlarged the places of arms for the general aſſault; and on the left made ſome progreſs in the lodgment in the covered way. The 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th, the beſiegers made all the neceſſary preparations for a general ſtorm, by continuing to drain the ditch, making apertures in the walls, working on the galleries, filling up the ditch, perfecting their lodgments and places of arms, and finiſhing their batteries, which conſiſted of forty-five pieces of cannon and fifty-five mortars; to ſupply which a new convoy of twenty thouſand weight of powder, with a great number of bombs, cannon-balls, and hand-grenadoes, arrived at the ſiege from Oſtend.

The duke of Vendoſme, exaſperated at count de la Motte's ſhameful defeat at Wynendale, marched in perſon to Oudenburg with the beſt part of the French army, and ordered the dykes between Bruges and Newport to be cut in ſeveral places, in order to lay the country under water, and hinder the communication between Oſtend and the duke of Marlborough's army. But, notwithſtanding the great inundation, major general Cadogan, favoured by the Britiſh troops at Leſſinghen, found means to carry through the water conſiderable quantities of ammunition and other neceſſaries. Hereupon the duke of Vendoſme bent his efforts againſt the village of Leſſinghen with ſeven or eight thouſand of his men [a]. They entrenched themſelves, and threw up batteries againſt the place, as if it had been one of the moſt regular fortifications in the world. On the 19th of October, the enemy fired the whole day from one of their batteries with red-hot bullets againſt the houſes, wherein about four hundred barrels of powder were lodged; but, to prevent miſchief, that ammunition was ordered to be laid under water, preſerving only as much as was thought neceſſary for maintaining that poſt. On the 20th, upon advice that the duke of Vendoſme was to be that night in the trenches, it was reſolved to attack the enemy on the other ſide of the canal; and fifty grenadiers of the Dutch regiment of Vanderbeck, commanded by captain Moor, and the ſame number of the regiment of Caris, commanded by captain Clare, the whole ſupported by two hundred Engliſh, were ordered for that ſervice. Four grenadiers were ſent before, who, pretending to be deſerters, amuſed the enemy, whilſt the reſt of the troops came up, who, charging the French with great bravery, drove them from that poſt to a ſecond entrenchment, and ſeized their battery, where they continued for ſome time. The enemy loſt an hundred men in this attack, beſides forty taken priſoners, among whom were a captain and the chevalier de Croiſſi Colbert, a major general and engineer, who offered the ſoldier, that took him, two hundred piſtoles and a commiſſion for his liberty, which he generouſly refuſed. On the confederates ſide captain Clare was killed, and captain Moor received a mortal wound through his body with a bayonet, beſides which two ſubalterns were wounded, and fifteen private men killed or wounded. On the 15th, early in the morning, the French attacked a church-yard, wherein colonel Caulfield, who commanded in Leſſinghen, had poſted an hundred and fifty men, who made but little reſiſtance, and retired into a redoubt near the canal. At laſt a great body of the enemy, conſiſting of fifty companies of grenadiers, ſupported by ten thouſand foot, poſſeſſed themſelves of the village, and obliged colonel Caulfield, with the reſt of his troops, to ſurrender themſelves priſoners at diſcretion.

This eaſy conqueſt was not an equivalent for the great loſs which the enemy ſuſtained two days after by the ſurrender of the town of Liſle. For the batteries of the beſiegers, conſiſting of about fifty pieces of cannon and twenty-five mortars, began to fire, on the 21ſt of October, with ſo much ſucceſs, that, on the 22d, the garriſon beat a parley, and offered to capitulate for the town. Whereupon hoſtages were exchanged, and it was agreed, that marſhal Bouffilers ſhould capitulate for whatever related to the garriſon, with prince Eugene of Savoy; and that the magiſtrates and council of the town ſhould propoſe their own terms for themſelves and the caſtellary of Liſle, and agree about the ſame with the field deputies of the ſtates-general; which was done accordingly. The 23d in the morning, the capitulation was concluded and ſigned, containing in ſubſtance, "That the French ſhould that afternoon, ſurrender the Magdalen-gate, and all magazines of proviſions and ammunition in the town. That all their ſick and wounded ſhould either be tranſported to Doway, or remain in Liſle till their recovery, at their own charge. That the horſe, who had entered the town ſince the ſiege, might be ſent to Doway, with the wives and families of the officers and ſoldiers, &c. That all priſoners taken during the ſiege be reſtored on both ſides: And that the troops of the allies ſhould not enter the town before the 25th of October; by which time the French garriſon was to withdraw into the citadel." Theſe articles being agreed on, and all things diſpoſed for the performance of the capitulation, the cavalry, which got into the place, under the command of the chevalier de Luxemburg, marched out the 25th for Doway, with the other perſons that were allowed by the capitulation; and, at the ſame time, the prince of Holſtein-Beck, who was appointed to be governor of the town, marched in with two Engliſh and thirteen other battalions, and a detachment of horſe. It is difficult to determine the [z] If this great convoy of eight hundred waggons had been intercepted the ſiege muſt have been raiſed. For the duke of Marlborough had ſent ſome ammunition from his army to carry on the ſiege, and he could ſpare no more: He began to deſpair of the undertaking, and ſo prepared his friends to look for the raiſing the ſiege, being in great apprehenſions concerning this convoy, upon which the whole ſucceſs of this enterprize depended.

[a] Leſſinghen is an inconſiderable village in the neighbourhood of Oſtend, where a body of the confederate troops were poſted, in order to keep open a communication with the grand army of the allies, to the beſiegers of Liſle; and from whence the duke of Vendoſme could not drive them, without attacking it in form.

loſs on either ſide, from the 13th of Auguſt, N. S. when Liſle was inveſted, to the 23d of October, the day on which the town ſurrendered. But, according to the French account, they had twelve thouſand men in garriſon, when the confederates broke ground againſt them, beſides three thouſand burghers, who did conſtant duty with the regular troops; of which four thouſand five hundred only retired with marſhal Bouffliers into the citadel; and it is computed, that about two thouſand more were ſick and wounded at the time of the capitulation; ſo that the French loſt betwixt ſix and ſeven thouſand men, upon a reaſonable computation, and the allies near eight thouſand.

The ceſſation of all acts of hoſtility between the town and the citadel, which was to expire the 26th, according to the articles of capitulation, was continued till the 29th; during which time the inhabitants, who were very much afraid that the French would not have ſo much regard to their houſes as the allies had, uſed their utmoſt endeavours to perſuade Bouffliers to capitulate. The enemy made extravagant demands of money, and pretended to march out with all their cannon; and that the allies ſhould ſet at liberty marſhal Tallard, with ſome other unreaſonable pretenſions, which the allies rejected with ſcorn. Theſe negotiations being broke off, the hoſtilities began at five o'clock; but during the ceſſation, the beſiegers had caſt up entrenchments, and drawn a parallel from one end of the eſplanade to the other. They had alſo made ſeveral coupures on the wall near the citadel, to the right and left. The hereditary prince of Heſſe-Caſſel poſted himſelf at la Baſſée, and orders were given to fortify that place. The duke of Marlborough continued at Rouſſelaer, for the more eaſy ſubſiſtence of the confederate troops. From thence he detached the earl of Stair, to provide corn for the army in the diſtricts of Furnes and Dixmuyde. That detachment had the good fortune to ſurprize four companies of French grenadiers, at the bridge between Dixmuyde and Newport. On the other hand, they met with the great mortification to have four of their ſquadrons undergo the ſame fate. Thoſe troops were all Pruſſians, and defended themſelves for ſome time with great bravery; but finding, that all the avenues were cloſed, and that there was no poſſibility of forcing their way through the enemy's troops, they were obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war.

While theſe matters were tranſacted, the brave veldt marſhal Auverquerque departed this life on the 18th, in his quarters at Rouſſelaer, in the 67th year of his age; whereby the command of the Dutch troops fell of courſe to the count de Tilly, as the eldeſt general in the ſervice of the ſtates. On the 29th, about five in the afternoon, the beſieged in the citadel of Liſle began hoſtilities, by the diſcharge of five pieces of cannon, which they continued to fire the reſt of the evening, without doing the beſiegers any conſiderable damage. On the other hand, the allies contracted the lines of circumvallation, and erected batteries of cannon and mortars, which they were ready to fire upon the citadel by the 11th of November. The beſiegers carried on their approaches by the ſap; and, the beſieged ſparing their ſmall ſtock of ammunition, as well as the beſiegers, the attack of that fortreſs was maintained with conſiderable loſs. On the 13th, the confederates lodged themſelves by the palliſadoes of the firſt covered way; and the next day they made themſelves maſters of the whole counterſcarp, except two places of arms, which the enemy abandoned the 15th. The allies erected two batteries on that work, but did not deſign to play their artillery from thence, till they had lodged themſelves on the ſecond counterſcarp. For which purpoſe, they prepared a great quantity of faſcines, continued to drain the ditch, made ſeveral openings into it, paſſed the ſame the 17th in the night, and lodged themſelves on the glacis of the ſecond covered way, without any loſs. Four days before the prince d'Auvergne was detached from la Baſſée, to attack the fort St. Venant upon the Lys, on the frontiers of Artois, in which the enemy had poſted a hundred men, who, upon the approach of that prince, made only one diſcharge, and retired towards Aire.

While the ſiege of the citadel of Liſle was carrying on with all the vigour that is conſiſtent with the cautious method of ſapping, both out of a juſt regard for the lives of valient men, who had already gone through incredible fatigue and innumerable dangers, and for want of ſufficient ſtores of ammunition; the enemy thought to have taken ſuch infallible meaſures for diſtreſſing the allies, as well by their inundations between Bruges and Newport, as by their entrenchments along the Scheld, that their public miniſters in Rome and Venice boldly aſſerted, "That the confederate army was ſo cooped up, that they would ſoon either be famiſhed, or obliged to abandon Liſle." But the two great confederate generals being indefatigably intent upon their buſineſs, the duke of Marlborough in providing corn out of the country of Artois, and the diſtricts of Furnes and Dixmuyde; and prince Eugene in managing what was ſent him by the duke of Marlborough, both armies lived in parſimonious plenty; and the ſiege of the citadel was carried on with all the ſucceſs, that could be expected.

The enemy opened a new ſcene; their parties made incurſions into the diſtrict of Boiſleduc, burning and ravaging part of the open country; and, at the ſame time, the elector of Bavaria approached Bruſſels with a body of ten thouſand men. But the duke of Marlborough, having concerted meaſures with prince Eugene to paſs the Scheld, immediately diſpatched orders for ſeveral Britiſh and Dutch regiments to be tranſported from Oſtend to Antwerp, and ſent to Monſieur Paſchal, the governor of Bruſſels, to aſſure him, that he would certainly come to his relief. Upon which encouragement, the ſtates deputies reſolved to ſtay in Bruſſels; and the vigorous meaſures, they took with the council of ſtate and the governor, were very inſtrumental in the preſervation of that important place. Nor were the ſtates-general leſs ſollicitous for Antwerp, whither they diſpatched ſome of their own members, with general Freſheim, an experienced officer, and ordered troops to haſten thither from Naerdin, Heuſden, Grave, and other places. On the 22d of November, N. S. the elector of Bavaria inveſted Bruſſels[b]; and, the next day, ſent a trumpeter, with a ſummons to general Paſchal to ſurrender, in theſe terms: "His electoral highneſs knowing, that the commandant is not in a condition to defend himſelf with the few troops he has; if he obliges his electoral highneſs to begin the attack, he ſhall have no capitulation for himſelf or his garriſon. Let not the commandant flatter himſelf, that he can retire with his garriſon to Antwerp, if he delays to ſurrender; for he is to know, that he will ſoon find troops poſted to hinder his retreat." The governor, who had nine battalions and a thouſand horſe under him, returned an anſwer by the ſame trumpeter: "That he was very unfortunate in not having the honour to be known to his electoral highneſs; that he durſt aſſure him, he would do all that a man of honour ought to do, and that he was ſatisfied with his garriſon." The elector was not a little ſurprized at this reſolute anſwer; and, on the 26th of November, in the morning the enemy began to fire from their batteries againſt the city (but with little ſucceſs) and in the evening with their ſmall ſhot againſt the men in the outworks, and, about nine at night, they attacked the counterſcarp with great fury, between the gates of Louvain and Namur. The fire was terrible on both ſides, and laſted till five the next morning; during which time the enemy made nine attacks, and at laſt lodged themſelves on the glacis of the counterſcarp. But about ſix o'clock the beſieged made a ſally from the covered way ſword in hand, with ſuch ſucceſs, that the enemy were driven out of their works, after a moſt obſtinate and bloody engagement. The action ceaſed the 27th, about ten in the morning, and the allies expected to be attacked a ſecond time at night; for their ſpies unanimouſly reported, that the enemy had a deſign, not only to make a general aſſault, but would alſo fire with red-hot bullets, to excite the burghers to ſedition; upon which the beſieged diſpoſed all things as well as poſſible for reſiſting the enemy's attacks. But in the afternoon, inſtead of renewing the engagement, the elector of Bavaria demanded a ſuſpenſion of arms, in order, as he pretended, to bury the dead, and draw off the wounded; which proved but a ſtratagem to raiſe the ſiege with leſs diſadvantage. For upon the arrival of two couriers from Mons, with intelligence, that the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene had paſſed the Scheld, in order to relieve Bruſſels: his electoral highneſs ſent away his baggage, and in the night marched off with his troops, without ſound of trumpet or beat of drum, and with ſuch precipitation, that the enemy left in their camp twelve pieces of cannon nailed up, two large mortars, and about twenty barrels of powder. They alſo left about eight hundred men wounded in the adjacent villages; and the dragoons and huſſars, who, the next morning, went out in purſuit of the enemy, brought in a great many priſoners, and ſome baggage. So that it was computed, that, what with their killed, wounded, priſoners, or deſerters, this unſucceſsful expedition coſt them above three thouſand men; whereas the loſs of the allies did not amount to above five or ſix hundred killed or wounded.

[b] Bruſſels is a very fair, large, and noble city of the Low-Countries, the marquiſate of the dukedom of Brabant in the quarter of Bruſſels, ſubject to the queen of Hungary, and the ſeat of her chief governor for theſe parts. It was abandoned by the French immediately after the memorable battle of Ramillies, and made its ſubmiſſion to the duke of Marlborough. The elector made ſeveral furious aſſaults upon it during the ſiege of Liſle, but the duke of Marlborough, paſſing the Scheld, made him precipitately quit the ſiege. It is pleaſantly ſeated on the river Senne, twenty-four miles ſouth of Antwerp, thirty ſouth-eaſt of Ghent, and ninety-ſix ſouth of Amſterdam.

For this brave and reſolute defence of the city of Bruſſels, lieutenant general Paſchal was juſtly advanced by king Charles III, to the dignity of a marquis. However, it had no been poſſible for that general to defend himſelf much longer, with a garriſon of ſcarce five thouſand men, in ſo large and unfortified a place. The preſervation of Bruſſels was therefore principally owing to the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene, who, with incredible ſecrecy and expedition, paſſed the Scheld the 27th of November in the morning, with very little oppoſition; the French, in a panic fear, abandoning thoſe lines and entrenchments, which they had been caſting up for three months paſt. This affair was managed with ſo much precaution, as redounded greatly to the reputation of the confederate generals. For the duke of Marlborough being early acquainted with the extremity, which the city of Bruſſels was in, recalled the troops, which were in the diſtrict of Furnes, commanded by lieutenant general Fagel, which joined the army at Rouſſelaer on the 22d, and alſo the detachment, which was at Lens and la Baſſée. The ſame day they received advice, that the dam which the enemy had been making near Gavre, to ſtop the courſe of the Scheld, was broke and carried away by the rapidity of the ſtream, which very much facilitated their paſſing that river. The army arrived the 25th at Harlebeck, and continued there till four in the afternoon, for giving time to prince Eugene to come up to the place appointed.

The meaſures were concerted thus: That prince Eugene's army ſhould paſs the river between Eſkenaffe and Hauterive; the duke of Marlborough and count Tilly at Kerkhoven; and count Lottum, with the earl of Orkney, between Gavre and Aſperon. Major general Cadogan, and brigadier Evans, were ſent before to lay the pontoons over the Scheld, who not only performed their orders, but paſſed the river, and poſted themſelves and their detachment on the other ſide, and put to flight a body of the French, which lay entrenched thereabouts. The confederate troops were therefore ordered to march with all poſſible expedition, and, as they paſſed the river, they formed themſelves in order of battle. Prince Eugene, having advice of theſe proceedings, paſſed directly over the river, and joined the duke of Marlborough at Kerkhoven. Upon their conjunction, they advanced to Berchem, in order to diſlodge the enemy from that poſt; but Monſieur Souteron, who commanded there, retired with the utmoſt precipitation. The Dutch cavalry purſued them, and happened to fall in with a party of grenadiers, who had lined ſome hedges and ditches, in order to ſecure the retreat of the reſt. In this action the allies had about ſixty men either killed or wounded; among the latter brigadier Baldwin, in the ſervice of the ſtates, was ſhot through the body; and the earl of Albemarle, prince William of Heſſe, and count Maurice of Naſſau, had their horſes killed under them. The confederates purſued the enemy till it was dark, and encamped on the hills near Oudenard, to the joy of the whole army, who expected to have met with great difficulties in paſſing the Scheld, and to the ſurprize of the generals themſelves, who could not have imagined, that the enemy would have ſo eaſily abandoned poſts ſo advantageous by nature, and which they had fortified with ſo much application and labour. In the ſeveral purſuits, the confederate troops took great part of the enemy's baggage, their bread waggons, ſeveral colours, ſtandards, and two or three pair of kettle-drums, and killed and made priſoners near a thouſand men[c].

The duke of Marlborough, upon his arrival at Oudenard, took the neceſſary meaſures for advancing towards Bruſſels, and, in his march, he was informed at Aloſt, that the elector of Bavaria, upon the firſt notice of the paſſage of the Scheld, had quitted the ſiege with great precipitation, leaving all his artillery and wounded men behind him. The duke came to Bruſſels on the 29th of November in the morning, to take proper meaſures for ſending a ſupply of ammunition and ſtores to the ſiege of the citadel of Liſle, and to thank the garriſon of Bruſſels for their vigorous defence. He was received with great acclamations of joy, and complimented by the ſtates of Brabant, and the magiſtrates of the city, upon their deliverance, which they juſtly attributed to his conduct and expeditious march. The day before, prince Eugene, with his troops, and a detachment of eight battalions and thirty ſquadrons from the grand army, returned to Liſle, and the ſixteen battalions under count Lottum marched back to the camp. But, the ſame morning, lieutenant general Dompre, with forty ſquadrons, advanced towards Aloſt, being ordered to encamp between that place and Aſche, in order to relieve Bruſſels.

The duke of Marlborough, with king Auguſtus, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, having been entertained at dinner by general Paſchal, and given the neceſſary directions, returned in the evening to his camp at Aloſt, where the troops reſted the 30th. The day following, the confederate army removed from thence, and encamped with the right at Oudenard, and the left near Bierleghiem. At the ſame time, lieutenant general Dedem was ordered to advance with twenty battalions, and to paſs the Scheld at Oudenard, where he encamped on the other ſide of the river, to aſſiſt at the works that were ordered to be made for the ſecurity of that place, and to be near at hand to join lieutenant general Hompeſch, who, with thirty eight ſquadrons and eight battalions, were encamped near Menin; by which diſpoſitions a communication was maintained with prince Eugene's forces at Liſle.

The ſiege of the citadel at Liſle was all this while carried on with great diligence; and, in the abſence of prince Eugene, the beſiegers had lodged themſelves on the ſecond counterſcarp, and began, on the 1ſt of December, to raiſe batteries thereon; which being finiſhed in ſix days, the prince ſent a ſummons to Boufflers, offering him an honourable capitulation, if he would ſurrender before the batteries had begun to fire; otherwiſe to expect no other terms, than for him and his garriſon to be made priſoners of war. The governor whoſe ſtock of ammunition was almoſt exhauſted, and who was informed, that the communication between Bruſſels and Liſle was free and open, thought fit to prevent the conſequences of a breach being made in the body of the citadel, by beating a parley the 8th of December, N. S. hoſtages being exchanged, the articles were ſigned the day following; and, on the 10th, the marſhal, with the whole garriſon, marched out with all the uſual marks of honour, and were conducted to Doway[d].

If the difficulties of an enterprize encreaſe the glory of it, the taking of Liſle muſt be one of the moſt glorious actions that ever was known[e]. The place itſelf was as ſtrong as art

[c] Burnet ſays (vol. ii. 509.) The duke of Marlborough, hearing the duke of Bavaria was going to attack Bruſſels, made a ſudden motion towards the Scheld: But, to deceive the enemy, it was given out, that he deſigned to march directly towards Ghent, and this was believed by his whole army, and it was probably carried to the enemy; for they ſeemed to have no notice nor apprehenſion of his deſign on the Scheld: He advanced towards it in the night, and marched with the foot very quick, leaving the horſe to come up with the artillery: The lines were ſo ſtrong, that it was expected, that, in the breaking through them, there muſt have been a very hot action: Some of the general officers told me, that they reckoned it would have coſt them at leaſt ten thouſand men; but to their great ſurprize, as ſoon as they paſſed the river, the French ran away without offering to make the leaſt reſiſtance; and they had drawn off their cannon the day before. Our men were very weary with the night's march, ſo they could not purſue; for the horſe were not come up, nor did the garriſon of Oudenard ſally out; yet they took a thouſand priſoners. Whether the notice of the feint, that the duke of Marlborough gave out of his deſign on Ghent, occaſioned the French drawing off their cannon, and their being ſo ſecure, that they ſeemed to have no apprehenſions of his true deſigns, was not yet certainly known: But the abandoning thoſe lines, on which they had been working for many weeks, was a ſurprize to all the world: Their counſels ſeemed to be weak, and the execution of them was worſe; ſo that they, who were ſo long the terror, were now become the ſcorn of the world.

[d] The prince of Orange wrote the following letter to the ſtates-general on this occaſion:

High and mighty lords,

All the lodgments before the citadel having been joined, and all things being ready to make the deſcents into the covered way, and to finiſh the batteries on the left, in order to batter in breach; the enemy beat a parley yeſterday morning at ſeven o'clock. The hoſtages on both ſides being exchanged, prince Eugene went with thoſe of the French to the abbey of Loos; but the capitulation was not ſigned till this day at four in the afternoon; and I thought it my duty to ſend it by major Thilo van Thilau, my adjutant general. I moſt humbly congratulate your high mightineſſes on this new conqueſt, which is ſo much the more conſiderable, becauſe the enemy had been obliged to ſurrender in a ſeaſon of the year ſo far advanced, and that we have not on our part fired a gun, and have loſt very few men. I pray God to bleſs more and more the arms of your high mightineſſes, and thoſe of your allies; ſo that after a ſeries of glorious and happy ſucceſſes, there may reſult from thence a firm and laſting peace; and that the luſtre and glory, which this ſtate has attained to, by the particular favour of the Almighty, under the moſt wiſe government of your high mightineſſes, may be long preſerved. I am, &c.

From the camp before Liſle, December 9, 1708.

J. W. FRISO, prince of Orange and Naſſau.

[e] Dr. Hare, in his Thanſgiving-ſermon above-quoted, obſerves, that Liſle was looked upon by the French as impregnable, 'it being the maſter-piece of the ableſt engineer that kingdom has produced; and the great king had added ſuch beauty to its ſtrength, as ſhewed, he thought no body would dare to touch a place, which he had been at ſo much charge to make his own; and he was juſtified in thinking ſo by an undiſturbed poſſeſſion of more than forty years. In truth, the very ſlender knowledge our beſt engineers had of it is a ſufficient proof, they never dreamt of ſeeing that glorious day, when a confederate army ſhould be able to come againſt it. It was ſo great an enterprize in the judgment of the enemy, that they could not believe we really meant it, when it was plain we could mean nothing elſe: They thought it was a feint only to draw them from the poſts they were entrenched in, or pretended to think ſo, to colour their ſtaying ſo long in them to ſo little purpoſe, or could make it, on the fortifications whereof the celebrated Monſieur de Vauban had exerted his utmoſt ſkill. It was defended by a numerous garriſon, under the command of a marſhal of France, and ſeveral other experienced generals; provided with all manner of neceſſaries, and encouraged to a vigorous defence by the approach of a powerful army, which was as numerous, if not ſtronger, than the forces of the allies. And yet the allies, without having any communication with with their own territories, ever ſince the duke of Vendoſme took the village of Leſſinghen after a ſiege of eight days, reduced Liſle, found means to ſubſiſt about it till the reduction of the citadel, and got corn from the territories of the enemy. The French thought this beyond the power of man, and herefore boaſted, that, without ſtriking a blow, they would oblige the allies to abandon the ſiege. And, indeed, the difficulties, which the allies had to ſtruggle with, were ſo many and ſo great in themſelves, that the confidence of the enemy did not appear altogether unreaſonable. But what would have been impracticable by the duke of Vendoſme and other French generals, was accompliſhed by prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough, who, after the reduction of the town and citadel of Liſle, were reſolved to crown their conqueſts, before the end of the campaign, with the recovery of Ghent and Bruges[f].

or to excuſe their not endeavouring to prevent our artillery from coming up. But, when it was too late to diſſemble their concern, then what confuſion were they in! What a noiſe was there, that they would and muſt raiſe the ſiege, coſt what it will! How many councils were there held! What furious motions did they make, or rather what not! Sometimes they threatened a powerful diverſion, that they would beſiege this place and that, and a third, and a fourth, and give us ſufficient reaſons to repent ſo raſh an enterprize: Sometimes nothing would do, but they would fight us; and once they ventured nearer than they would have done, when we had by entrenching helped them to a decent pretence for not attacking us, and they were aſſured we ſhould not attack them. But in their cooler thoughts they were content to ſit down with a deſign to ſtarve us; a poor deſign, had not the ſiege been drawn out into an unexpected length; and, to compaſs it, there was no action ſo mean, they did not condeſcend to; no faith ſo ſacred, they did not violate. Once indeed they had the courage to try a braver part, and with a great body of troops marched to intercept a convoy, without which they knew the ſiege could not be carried on; but the event ſoon ſhewed, it had been better for them to have lain ſtill, their attempt having ſerved to nothing elſe, but to make another place famous by a freſh defeat of them. Wynendale will be always named among the ſucceſſes of this memorable year, where a ſmall body of foot, under the command of a member of this honourable houſe, maintained themſelves againſt near thrice their number, though ſupported by a good number of horſe, and provided with a numerous artillery; and, after a brave defence, obliged them to a ſcandalous retreat. Thus we have the fulleſt proof even from the enemy, that the right uſe was made of our firſt ſucceſs, and that a more fatal blow could not have been given them; but we want not the voice of enemies or friends to witneſs the importance of this enterprize, by the ſucceſs of which not only their frontier is broke into in the moſt deſirable part, and a fair advance made towards penetrating into the heart of France; but, what the great the great monarch owes more to than his ſword, his treaſure alſo is extremely affected by it; it loſes him a great revenue, which at this time he can very ill want; it makes a mighty interruption in traffic and commerce through his own kingdom, and almoſt cuts off the greateſt advantage he had by an open trade with our allies. In ſhort, taking Liſle is cutting a nerve in the body politic, one of the largeſt and moſt uſeful nerves; from whence his greateſt armies received their nouriſhment, from whence his Flanders forces were always paid. Could we not have formed that ſiege, little had remained of our victory, but the glory of regaining by the ſword what ſurprize and treachery had taken from us; but a ſiege, much leſs ſo great a one, we could not undertake without artillery; and to have artillery, while the enemy were in poſſeſſion of Ghent, every body, I believe, will own they thought impoſſible, till he, who has a genius equal to all difficulties, ſhewed the way, and contrived the means; which were executed with that wonderful dexterity and diligence, that the greateſt train, that perhaps was ever brought ſo far by land, was provided in a little time, and conducted between two armies of the enemies, without the leaſt diſturbance, ſafe to us. After this ſucceſs, which might juſtly be eſteemed a ſecond victory, there ſeemed to be little to do, but to attend quietly four or five weeks the iſſue of the ſiege; but by ſetting out wrong at firſt, our engineers ſoon came to want, what, of all things was hardeſt to be ſupplied; and the ſlow progreſs, that was made afterwards, put the ſiege in the utmoſt danger of miſcarrying, and the army of ſtarving. And thoſe unpromiſing appearances made not a few wiſh the weather would give us a pretence to raiſe the ſiege we ſeemed unable to go through. Never ſure had covering army ſo much work, never had commander ſo great a trial of all the qualities, that go to make a conſummate general. To hinder ſo long the junction of the enemy, to prevent their diſturbing the ſiege, or making a diverſion, to keep for ten weeks a communication with Bruſſels, and, when that was ſtopped, to open another with Oſtend, and after that ſtill to find out new reſorts, and ſubſiſt a great army thrice the time that was expected, in an enemy's country, that we ſeemed to have eat up, even before we were perfectly confined to it; theſe are difficulties nothing could ſurmount, but a mind, that cannot be puzzled or diſmayed. But this is not all; while we were beſieging, we were beſieged ourſelves, the enemy had hemmed us in on every ſide, and for ten weeks together entrenched the Scheld with all the diligence they could, reſolved, it ſeems, we ſhould not paſs on any terms. But, when the ſiege they had laid to Bruſſels, made the trial neceſſary, neither river, nor army, nor entrenchments availed any thing. We ſurprized the enemy at a time, when they were moſt concerned to be upon their guard; and what is beyond all belief, paſſed the river they had been ſo long fortifying, without the loſs of one man; and by that happy paſſage their ſiege was raiſed before it was well begun. Theſe are ſuch difficulties, as greatly enhance the value of the ſucceſſes we rejoice in; and ſerve for ſhades to illuſtrate and ſet off the many maſterly ſtrokes, which a curious eye cannot but diſcern in the beautiful plan of this great and wonderful campaign. I might add, that the length of our ſiege made it late in December, before we could attempt to retake the places the enemy had ſtolen from us, which is itſelf a circumſtance, as is without example in that country; but in the end, this ſucceſs was alſo added to the reſt, and the campaign was happily concluded with the year.—There is nothing the interpoſition of God has more viſibly appeared in, than the favourable weather we were bleſſed with ſo long together; which was ſo neceſſary for us, that without it, every body ſaw we could have done nothing; and yet ſo extraordinary, that the like has not been known in the memory of man; nor was there any thing the enemy truſted more to, than that the rains would overtake us; which had they done, had not the heavens been ſhut up in the latter ſeaſon, we muſt inevitably have been obliged to raiſe our ſiege, though no diſturbance had been given by the enemy. Had we known in December to the very end of it ſo much ill weather, as they commonly have three or four months before, we muſt have been content to ſet the enemy enjoy their treachery, which could not but have had a very ill influence on the next campaign. To what can we impute this, but to his good providence, who opens ond ſhuts the heavens as he will? Wonderful has his favour been to us in this reſpect, beyond our moſt forward hopes, beyond what we dared to wiſh for. To paſs by ſeveral remarkable inſtances of this kind, the paſſing and repaſſing of the Scheld, the firſt of which was the ſaving of Flanders, and the other of Brabant, both depended on great marches, that were made without the leaſt diſturbance from the weather, which might eaſily have defeated the ſucceſs of them; though the firſt was ſoon followed with a great rain the very night of the battle, and the other was preceded by a greater, which the enemy felt all the evil of, being then on their march to inveſt Bruſſels; but this weather laſted no longer, than till we were ready to make uſe of better. But there was another circumſtance in our repaſſing the Scheld, which I cannot omit: a night march, which we were forced to make in order to it, was happily for us, by an unforeſeen coincidence, directed by the full aſſiſtance of the moon.'

'The marquis de Feuquieres, in his Memoirs gives the following account of the errors committed in the defence of Liſle. Marſhal de Bouffllers, ſays he, governor-general of French Flanders, and of Liſle in particular, defended this place againſt the armies of the allies, who beſieged it. The place was ſtrengthened with a garriſon of near ſixteen thouſand men; and yet the beſiegers only attacked it on the ſide of the Maiden-gate, before a front of fortification, that comprehended near a thouſand fathoms in extent; and even this attack was ſeparated by the Deule; and conſequently the enemy approached the ſame front by two attacks, interſected by the river, which afforded them the only communication they had with each other. This conduct of the enemy might have induced the beſieged to think it very practicable to make ſallies under the protection of the works, either on one ſide of the attack or the other; by which means they might have deſtroyed the works of ſeveral days; and yet they only made one ſally, with above five hundred men, which did not produce any conſiderable effect.

The beſiegers, in the conduct of their works, committed a greater error, and which the beſieged neglected to take the advantage. The error was this: Their comprehenſion of this great front ceaſed in proportion as they approached the place; ſo that, when they advanced to the glacis, their grand front was ſo contracted, that it only equalled the extent of the two ſaliant angles before the tenaille of the counterſcarp; by which means the front of the attacks was more extenſive than that of the aſſailants. As the beſiegers therefore were under no neceſſity of forming ſuch a diſpoſition, but committed this eſſential error in conſequence of mere incapacity in the conduct of works, it ſeemed reaſonable to chaſtiſe them for their proceeding; and yet the beſieged wanted reſolution to attempt it, though they eaſily might have opened their glacis, under the protection of the counterſcarp, and thoſe works, that were not comprehended; and they might have made ſuch lodgments on the glacis, as would have conſtantly enabled them to gaul the flanks of the beſiegers contracted front of the attack. This advantage was ſo much in favour of the beſieged, as the beſiegers made but one attempt to ſtorm the counterſcarp at the two ſaliant angles before the tenaille, where they only appeared with five or ſix hundred men, becauſe they could not march a greater number in the ſmall front they had formed. Moſt of theſe men were killed in their advance upon the palliſade; and this ſingle experiment ſhould have convinced the beſieged, that their capital operation for the defence of the place was to make ſuch lodgments on the glacis, as were above-mentioned, in order to multiply the fires againſt the attack, and to take thoſe, who approached, in flank, and to greater advantage, than in the covered way, which was not comprehended within the beſiegers works.

Though the want of powder frequently ſilenced the beſiegers cannon, and conſequently ſuſpended the fire of the bombs; yet the beſieged did not improve that favourable opportunity in any reparation of the breaches during the night, or clearing away the ruins in the day, though the inhabitants of Liſle were numerous and loyal, and might have been employed in this work, while the beſiegers artillery ceaſed to batter the breaches. The guard even of the attacked work was kept with ſo little vigilance, that only one centinel was awake, and the poſt was ſurprized, while all the ſoldiers were aſleep, after the deſertion of that treacherous centinel, ſo that the work was carried without the leaſt oppoſition on the part of the beſieged. It would have been a very eaſy affair however to have doubled the centinels in every place, where the negligence or infidelity of one expoſed them to the beſiegers.

But the moſt ſurpriſing circumſtance of all is, that marſhal de Boufflers capitulated for the city almoſt as ſoon as that half-moon was loſt, and without waiting ten or twelve hours, to ſee the beſiegers fill up the ditch which would have employed them at leaſt for that time, on account of its breadth, depth of water, and quantity of ſoft ſoil on its bottom. For of what particular importance could it be to marſhal de Boufflers whether the reſt of the proviſions and ammunition were conſumed in defending the city ſome time longer, or in a new defence of the citadel? It was however a very eſſential point, to prolong the defence of the city, as much as poſſible, ſince the ſurrender of it to the enemy would afford excellent accommodations to an army, who greatly needed them in that advanced ſeaſon, when the rains are ſo frequent in Flanders, that if they had happened during the ſiege of that city, they would certainly have rendered that great enterpriſe unſucceſsful.

The diſpoſitions for the defence of Liſle were very inconſiderate. The ſiege from the beginning was rendered too fatiguing to the garriſon, which was divided into two bodies, alternately upon duty, for the ſpace of twenty-four hours. This time was much too long. Half of the troops were poſted in out-works, and the reſt were ſtationed on the ramparts, and employed in the works; ſo that the garriſon had never any ſtated hours of reſt, which are ſo abſolutely neceſſary for the officers as well as the ſoldiers, both for the preſervation of their health, and to render them capable of defending the place for a greater length of time. The inhabitants of Liſle were numerous and well affected; and yet they were not employed in any ſervice, either for the relief of the garriſon, or the preſervation of the place.

It was reported, that marſhal de Boufflers wanted proviſions towards the cloſe of the ſiege, and could not ſupply the citadel with a ſufficient quantity

The French generals not imagining that the confederates would have attempted any thing after the laſt important conqueſt, eſpecially in ſo advanced a ſeaſon of the year, ſeparated their army and returned to Paris. But all neceſſary preparations being made for the ſiege of Ghent, that city was inveſted on the 20th of December, N. S. in the following manner: Count Lottum, with thirty-nine battalions, and thirty-ſix ſquadrons, were poſted between the Upper Scheld and the Lys: The hereditary prince of Heſſe, with forty ſquadrons, and twenty battalions, between the Lys and the canal of Bruges, and from thence to the canal of Sas: The duke of Wirtemberg between Muleſtein and the lower Scheld, with twenty-five ſquadrons, and twenty-ſix battalions: Count Tilly with thirty ſquadrons, and thirty battalions, between the Upper and Lower Scheld: And the duke of Marlborough encamped at Meerlebeck, that he might be near the centre of the ſeveral attacks. On the 14th, in the evening, the trenches were opened at the attack commanded by general Lottum; and two thouſand workmen, covered by ſeven battalions, and two more in reſerve, with ſix hundred horſe, were ordered for that ſervice, under the command of lieutenant general Fagel, major general Wecke, and the lord North and Grey. The men worked about half an hour before the enemy diſcovered them, and then they made ſuch a terrible fire, that the allies had near thirty men killed and about ſeventy wounded. They carried on their works with good ſucceſs from St Peter's gate towards fort Monterey, and finiſhed a parallel of a thouſand paces from the right to the left, within two hundred paces of the counterſcarp. On the 25th at night, the trenches were opened at the duke of Wirtemberg's attack, with four battalions and ſix hundred horſe, commanded by major general Murray, who covered fourteen hundred pioneers, and this attack was directed againſt the caſtle. The ſame night they opened the trenches before the Bruſſels gate, between the Upper and Lower Scheld, with four battalions and ſix hundred workmen, commanded by brigadier Evans, who carried on their works with great ſucceſs, and made a communication without any loſs. But, the works on the right being very difficult, and time as well as faſcines being wanting to finiſh the ſame, the garriſon made a ſally with ten companies of grenadiers, who put the firſt troops into ſome confuſion; and, whilſt brigadier Evans was bringing up the next battalions to ſupport them, he was taken priſoner with colonel Grove of the lord North and Grey's regiment. They had likewiſe about twenty officers and ſoldiers killed or taken; but the enemy retired upon the firſt firing of the troops, and had not time to level the works. On the 26th the batteries began to fire upon the Red Fort, and the garriſon, conſiſting of two hundred men, ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war. The following days the approaches were carried on with a great deal of ſucceſs; and, the batteries being ready to fire, on the 30th at ſix in the morning, with red hot bullets, and the mortars to throw bombs and carcaſes into the town, the count de la Motte ſent out a trumpeter to the duke of Marlborough, and demanded an honourable capitulation, which was granted him; purſuant to which one gate of the city, and another of the caſtle, were delivered to the troops of the allies on the 31ſt of December, N. S. and two days after count de la Motte marched out with his garriſon, which conſiſted of above thirty battalions and ſixteen ſquadrons, in order to be conducted to Tournay. The duke of Argyle, with ſix Britiſh battalions, immediately after took poſſeſſion of the town and citadel.

The reduction of Ghent occaſioned a great ſurprize at the French court, and was indeed in itſelf very wonderful, conſidering the ſituation and largeneſs of the place, the numerous garriſon, the hard ſeaſon of the year, and the fatigue which the troops had already undergone in this extraordinary long and difficult campaign. The conſequence of ſurrendering that important city was the enemy's quitting of Bruges, Plaſendale, and Leſſinghen, and retiring into their own territories. The duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene, having thus glorioufly finiſhed this campaign, and ſettled the winter-quarters for the forces of the allies, ſet out, the 9th of January, from Bruſſels for the Hague, having left all the confederate troops under the command of count Tilly, general of the Dutch forces.

If Ghent and Bruges had not ſurrendered when they did, it could not have been poſſible to have kept them much longer; for, within two or three days after, there was a great fall of ſnow, and that was followed by a moſt violent froſt, the whole laſting about three months. Many died in ſeveral parts by the extremity of the cold; it was ſcarce poſſible to keep the ſoldiers alive, even in their quarters; ſo that they muſt have periſhed, if they had not brok up the campaign before this hard ſeaſon.

The miſcarriage before Toulon did not diſcourage the duke of Savoy from meditating a new irruption into France, in return for the ſiege of Turin. The preparations made by his command through Piedmont during the winter and the ſpring, his aſſembling ſo great a body of troops on his frontiers, and preparing, not only a train of field-pieces, but a quantity alſo of heavy cannon, gave the French apprehenſions not only of an incurſion, but of ſome important ſiege. And, according to French writers, the duke never diſſembled his intentions, which were to enter Dauphine, and to extort contributions as far as Lyons. But though the bad weather could not ſuffer him to take the field till the month of July, yet the lateneſs of the campaign was ſoon made up by the rapidity of his conqueſts; which the vigilance and activity of the marſhal de Villars (whom the French uſed to call their favourite general) could neither foreſee nor prevent. The duke, the better to cover his deſign, had firſt, with great labour and fatigue bent his march towards Savoy, over Mount Cenis, as if he intended to penetrate into Dauphine through fort des Barreaux; but, having by this feint drawn the enemy's forces on that ſide, he turned ſhort towards Sezane and Oulx, prevented Villars quick march, and took ſuch right meaſures, that from the 12th to the 31ſt of Auguſt, N. S. he compaſſed his true deſign, which was to make himſelf maſter of the important fortreſs of Exilles, Fort la Perouſe, and the valley of St. Martin and Feneſtrella. By which conqueſts he ſecured his own dominions againſt France, and gained free entrance into the enemy's country, the French having built a ſtrong citadel at Feneſtrella, after the blowing up of the fortification of Pignerol, in order to cover that frontier. The greateſt difficulty in taking theſe places was from the impracticableneſs of the ground, which drew the ſieges out into ſuch a length, that the ſnow began to fall by the time Feneſtrella was taken. By this means the Alps were cleared, and Dauphine was now open to him: And all things were ready for a greater progreſs in another campaign. Beſides theſe advantages, the duke likewiſe made a diverſion in favour of king Charles III, obliging the enemy to ſend a great detachment from Rouſſillon to Villars's ſupport and aſſiſtance.

The queen of Great Britain and the ſtates-general had ſolicited the Imperial court and the German princes to act with greater vigour than they had hitherto done, and particularly preſſed the emperor to give the utmoſt aſſiſtance he could to his brother in Spain, and heartily concurred with king Charles in deſiring, that prince Eugene might be ſent thither to command in chief. But this point could not be obtained [g]; and, count Guido de Staremberg being appointed in that prince's room, he arrived at Barcelona on the laſt of

for the garriſon. This indeed is true, but the fault muſt be imputed to the diſorder and want of œconomy in the diſtribution of the proviſions, which was always equal, ſo that no care was taken to leſſen the allotments in proportion to the loſs of men. A company, that had been greatly weakened in the progreſs of the ſiege was allowed the ſame ſubſiſtence, as it received when it was much ſtronger; ſo that at the latter end of the ſiege the proviſions were diſtributed in almoſt double the quantity that was neceſſary; and this irregularity alone would have occaſioned the loſs of the place, had it been accommodated never ſo well.

[g] This affair will be beſt explained by the following extracts of letters publiſhed by Mr. Cole in his Memoirs of Affairs of State:

The earl of Mancheſter, to the earl of Sunderland.

Vienna, January 7, 1707-8.

This evening count Gallas is at prince Eugene's, where the affairs of king Charles are to be under debate. I had orders from Britain, to urge their ſending prince Eugene to Spain, and alſo a letter writ by the queen to the emperor, recommending the ſame as a matter of the greateſt conſequence, but to no purpoſe. Prince Eugene is to be at hand to defend them, in caſe of need againſt the Turks, and to ſecure them from any future inſults from the Swede, who has demanded the like liberty for the reformed to exercise their religion in Sileſia, as by count Wratiſlaw's convention at Alt Rantitad the Lutherans are to enjoy. Count Guido of Staremberg is declared general for Spain without conſulting Britain or Holland, whether they will put their troops under his command. I have writ my thoughts pretty freely upon theſe practices, and Monſieur Bruyninx has done the ſame. Prince Eugene has a commiſſion to act as the emperor's lieutenant-general, being to command all who may ſerve with him. I do not know how the elector of Hanover will reliſh the being commanded by prince Eugene. I believe he will not ſubmit to it; but they muſt rather let the commiſſion lie dormant this next ſummer.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Sunderland.

Venice, January 17, 1707-8.

I am glad, that both houſes of parliament have taken notice of the ſending prince Eugene into Spain. If any thing will prevail with the court of Vienna, I think that ſhould; but I am far from thinking, that it will. The April, the ſupplies demanded by king Charles being arrived there before. Great hopes were conceived of this new general, who had before commanded the Imperial troops in Hungary; but it was generally believed the affairs in Spain would have had much better ſucceſs if they had been managed by prince Eugene.

The duke of Orleans ſtill commanded in Spain, and, according to the vanity of that nation, it was given out, that they were to have mighty armies in many different places, and to put an end to the war there. Great rains had fallen all the winter in all parts of Spain; ſo that the campaign could not be opened ſo ſoon as it was firſt intended. The troops of Portugal which had lain at Barcelona ever ſince the battle of Almanza, were brought about by a ſquadron of Engliſh ſhips, to the defence of their own country. Sir John Leake came likewiſe over to Liſbon from England with recruits and other ſupplies with which the queen of Great Britain was to furniſh the crown of Portugal. When all was landed, Leake ſailed into the Mediterranean to bring troops from Italy, for the ſtrengthening of king Charles, whoſe affairs were in great diſorder.

Soon after Staremberg's arrival in Spain, major general Stanhope came to us (ſays the author of the manuſcript ſo often mentioned) with a commiſſion of commander in chief of all her majeſty's forces in Spain, as Belcaſtle had orders to command the Dutch. All the troops marched out of their winter-quarters to different camps, in the road to Cervera and Lerida. When Leake came with his fleet to Barcelona, king Charles ſent immediately for count Staremberg from the camp at Montblanc, to conſult with the generals Stanhope and Carpenter, and admiral Leake, whether he could undertake any thing for the ſervice; and, nothing being fixed, the admiral ſailed for Italy, from whence he brought both the new queen of Spain and eight thouſand men with him. But by reaſon of the ſlowneſs of the court of Vienna, theſe forces came too late to raiſe the ſiege of Tortoſa, before which place the enemy came the 30th of June. Upon the news of this, a council of war was held, to ſee whether we could undertake any thing to ſave that town, which, on the ſeaſide, was the key of Catalonia from Valencia. Count Efferen, a Palatine major general, was ſent to command in Tortoſa, with a good garriſon. The trenches were opened on the 9th of June, and, in about a month's time, the governor, having no reaſon to expect any relief, ſurrendered upon honourable terms, and marched his garriſon to our camp at Conſtantino, in the Campo de Terragona. During the ſiege, Leake diſſipated a fleet of Tartans, ſent from France to ſupply the duke of Orleans's army, and took about fifty of them; which was a very ſeaſonable relief to thoſe in Barcelona, and which, it was hoped, though in vain, would have cauſed the ſiege to be raiſed.

From Conſtantino the army marched for Cervera with a good train of artillery, where they were joined by all the forces from Italy, and by ſome Dutch and Spaniſh battalions from Lampaurdan. Beſides Tortoſa, the enemy alſo took Denia, and the garriſon were made priſoners of war. But theſe loſſes were abundantly made up to the allies, by the reduction of the kingdom of Sardinia, and of the famous Port Mahon, with the whole iſland of Minorca.

Sir John Leake having taken on board the fleet a few troops commanded by the marquis of Alconzel, better known by his former title of Conde de Cifuentes, arrived before Cagliari[h], the capital of Sardinia on the 12th of Auguſt, N. S. and immediately ſummoned the marquis of Jamaica, the viceroy to ſubmit to king Charles III. The marquis inſiſted at firſt upon extravagant terms: But on the throwing of a few bombs into the city, the inhabitants reſolved to compel him to ſurrender, with his garriſon, at diſcretion; whereupon both he and the magiſtrates accepted ſuch articles, as the admiral was pleaſed to grant[i]. The greateſt part of the Spaniſh garriſon readily liſted themſelves in king Charles's ſervice. Beſides which, near two thouſand horſes were found there ready to be tranſported to Spain, for remounting the enemy's cavalry; part of which were diſpoſed of to the diſmounted dragoons, who were employed in this expedition. The marquis d'Alconzel, who was conſtituted vice-roy and captain general of that kingdom, having held an aſſembly of the deputies of the ſeveral ſtates, they gave aſſurances of their affection and fidelity to king Charles III, and, for a proof, offered to furniſh thirty thouſand ſacks of corn for that king's ſervice. This ſupply made the conqueſt of Sardinia the more conſiderable, for in Catalonia, they were at that time much ſtraitened for want of proviſions.

The conqueſt of the iſland of Minorca[k], which followed ſoon after, was entirely owing to major general Stanhope, who was the firſt projector, and had the principal ſhare in the execution of the deſign. In the beginning of Auguſt he received a letter from the lord-treaſurer, to acquaint him, that the admiralty had repreſented to the queen, that it was almoſt impracticable, and very dangerous for our fleet to winter in the Mediterranean, except ſome ſafe harbour were procured for it. Upon this, general Stanhope immediately fixed his thoughts upon the iſland of Minorca, which was a very great enterprize, and required a greater number of troops, than could be ſpared out of our army. He took a ſhort journey to Barcelona, to conſult the proper meaſures with the admiral; which done, he returns poſt to the camp, and acquaints Staremberg with his deſign, who much applauded it;

The Dutch envoy at Vienna to the earl of Mancheſter.

Vienna, January 28, 1707-8.

We can by no means ſucceed to make prince Eugene go into Spain, and his Imperial majeſty alledges reaſons for this, that ſeem to have ſome weight; but the emperor deſigns to ſend thither the count Guido of Staremberg, who is likewiſe a good general.

Earl of Sunderland to the earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, February 17, 1707-8.

I wiſh with all my heart, the court of Vienna would come to reaſon in relation to the ſending prince Eugene to Spain; but that matter ſeems to be quite over, and Staremberg will be the man.

[h] In the Memoirs of Affairs of State, publiſhed by Chriſtian Cole, eſq; p. 545, is the following letter of ſir John Norris to the earl of Mancheſter, relating to the deſigned expedition.

Ranelagh, with the fleet bound to Cagliari, July 26, 1708.

My lord,

The 17th inſtant we arrived with the fleet and troops at Mattero, where we landed the queen of Spain, ſhe being from thence to make her entry into Barcelona. The next day our tranſports got to Barcelona, where we landed the horſe and foot in good condition. We loſt but forty horſes in the paſſage, and nineteen that were in a Geneoſe veſſel, which loſt company with the fleet, and was taken by a cruizer of the enemy. The troops have joined the reſt of the army, which all people ſay is in a good condition, and that there is a good agreement with the commanders of each nation. But from our unfortunate loſs of Tortoſa, and the accidents of this compaign, the foot we brought does but juſt make up the number we have loſt; and in that the enemy is much ſuperior; but in horſe we have the advantage, both in number and goodneſs, &c. We are under this difficulty, that the land we have there, with the iſland of Majorca, will not afford grain enough to feed the army and country; for which reaſon we are now going with the fleet, to try if we can reduce the iſland of Sardinia to the obedience of king Charles. The troops we have to do it with are our ſeamen, twelve hundred marines, and ſome unmounted Spaniſh dragoons; and, if half be true of what is repreſented to us, we ſhall ſucceed in the reduction of that kingdom. We have the conde Cifuentes with us, but he is not to meddle till the place has declared. We go directly for Cagliari, which is the ſeat of the vice-king, and the capital of the country. I am, &c.

JOHN NORRIS.
